tion by similarity and by contiguity, but in the distinction between what he called relative and simple suggestion. The explanation of the flow of ideas given by English Associationists is utterly inadequate because it neglects the Herbartian doctrine of apperception.—The paper was followed by a discussion.

MEETINGS FOR THE ENSUING WEEK.

- Mon. London Institution, 8.—'The Beginnings of Modern Europe,' I. Rev. Canon Benham.
— Victoria Institute, 8.—'Monism, Pantheism, and Dualism of Brahmanical and Zoroastrian Philosophers,' Sir M. Monier-Williams.
— Surveyors' Institution, 8.—'Betterments,' Mr. T. W. Wheeler.
— Geographical, 8.—'Lieut. H. B. Vanhan's Recent Journey in Eastern Persia,' Major-General Sir F. J. Goldsmid.
Tues. — Horticultural, 11, Lecture, 3.
— Royal Institution, 3.—'The Post-Darwinian Period,' Prof. G. J. Romanes.
— Society of Architects, 7½.
— Colonial Institute, 8.
— Society of Arts, 8.—'Claims of the British School of Painting to a thorough presentation in the National Gallery,' Mr. J. Orrock.
— Civil Engineers, 8.—Discussion on the Papers by Messrs. Burge, Walton, and Gruitwell on the Hawkebury, the Dufferin, and the New Blackfriars Bridges.
— Anthropological Institute, 8½.—Exhibition of the Skull of a Carib from a Cave in Jamaica, Prof. Flower; 'Manners, Customs, Superstitions, and Religions of South African Tribes,' Rev. J. Macdonald.
Wed. — Gymnæsiarion, 8.—Preservation of Ancient Monuments in Wales, Mr. J. E. Allen.
— Society of Arts, 8.—'The Chemin de Fer Glissant, or Sliding Railway,' Sir D. Gaiton.
— Huguenot, 8.—'Huguenot History in Venetian Archives,' Sir H. A. Layard.
— Geological, 8.—'Deep Channel of Drift in the Valley of the Cam, Essex,' Mr. W. Whitaker; 'The Monian and Rood Cambrian Rocks of Rhosphire,' Prof. J. F. Blake; 'Crocodylian Jaw from the Oxford Clay of Peterborough,' and 'Two New Species of Labrynthodonts,' Mr. K. Lydeker.
Thurs. Royal Institution, 8.—'The Early Development of the Forms of Instrumental Music,' Mr. F. Niecks.
— Surveyors' Institution, 4.—General Meeting of Fellows.
Royal, 4½.
— London Institution, 7.—'Fashion in Music,' Prof. E. Pauer.
— Electrical Engineers, 8.—Adjourned Discussion on 'The Theory of Armature Reactions in Dynamos and Motors' and 'Some Points in Dynamo and Motor Design.' — Society of Arts, 8.—'Agriculture and the State in India,' Mr. W. R. Robertson.
— Mathematical, 8.—'Some Groups of Circles connected with Three Given Circles,' Mr. R. Lachlan; 'Perfect Numbers,' Major F. A. MacMahon.
Antiquaries, 9½.—'Fragment of a Trochilus ilicis from Southern Italy,' Dr. A. S. Murray; 'Remarkable Glass Bottle of the Roman Period from Cyprus,' Dr. J. Evans; 'Inventories of the Cathedral Church of Lincoln,' Rev. C. Wordsworth.
Fri. United Service Institution, 3.—'The Shooting of Horses for Military Purposes,' Principal Veterinary Surgeon Dr. G. Fleming.
— New Shakespeare, 8.—'On those Characters in Shakespeare which Depart from their Originals (Hamlet, Macbeth, &c.), contrasted with those developed from their Originals (Brutus, Julius Caesar, &c.),' Mrs. C. Stopes.
— Astronomical, 8.—'The Glow of Phosphorus,' Prof. T. E. Thorpe.
Sat. Royal Institution, 3.—'Electricity and Magnetism,' Lord Rayleigh.
— Society of Arts, 8.—'The Atmosphere,' Prof. V. Lewis (Popular Lecture).

Science Gossip.

PROF. SCHUSTER has chosen as the subject of his Bakerian Lecture 'The Discharge of Electricity through Gases.'

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK has nearly ready a revised edition of his volume of 'Scientific Lectures,' to which he has added an 'Address on Money,' delivered before the Institute of Bankers.

THE centenary of Poggendorff's Annalen was celebrated the other day at Leipzig. This well-known journal was begun in 1790 by Prof. Gren, of Halle, under the name of Journal der Physik. In 1799 Prof. Gilbert became his colleague in the editorship, and it was called Annalen der Physik. Gilbert died in 1824, and Poggendorff became the editor, and held his post for the long period of fifty-three years. Since 1877 it has been edited by Prof. G. Wiedemann.

FINE ARTS

ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTER-ETCHERS.—THE ANNUAL EXHIBITION of the Works of the Fellows and Associates of this Society, together with a Selection from the Etched Work of Rembrandt, is NOW OPEN at the Society's Gallery, 5, Pall Mall East, from Ten till Six. Admission, 1s.; Catalogue, 6d.

Sir W. R. DRAKE, Honorary Secretary.

'The Horsemen' of Tarentum: a Contribution towards the Numismatic History of Great Greece. By Arthur J. Evans. (Quaritch.)

THIS monograph on this particular coinage of Tarentum is one of the most complete and exhaustive of its kind, and moreover illustrates the remarkable advance which has been made of late years in the study of Greek numismatics. No very great experience in ancient numismatics is needed to be able to detect at the first glance whether a coin was struck in Italy (Great Greece), in Greece proper, or in Asia, each district having its distinct style of art and work; but in arranging in their chronological order any particular section or class of coins the knowledge of the numismatist is put to a severe test, and unless he is thoroughly grounded in the intricacies of the styles and work of each period, in the various metrological systems, as also in his history, he is liable to go astray.

The classification in their chronological sequence of the various coinages of the cities of the Greek world is a comparatively modern study. One of the foremost to give it an impetus has been Mr. Barclay Head, whose first attempt was made some fifteen years ago with a history of the coinage of Syracuse. Since then he has published similar treatises on the coinages of Ephesus, Boeotia, Lydia, &c. These monographs have served as key-notes to the arrangement of the coinages of other places and districts. They are, in fact, the landmarks of Greek numismatics.

In dealing with one particular section of the coinage of Tarentum Mr. Evans has, perhaps, undertaken a more difficult task than Mr. Head essayed in dealing with the coinage of Syracuse. That series is marked by great changes of types, remarkable epochs of history, and singular variations of styles. These guides were not to be found in the 'Horsemen of Tarentum.' This coinage, which consists of silver staters or didrachms, shows throughout no actual change of type, but only an almost countless number of small varieties, out of which the author has had to form his chronological sequence. In his opening chapter Mr. Evans states his difficulty in clear language:—

"This general unity of type, combined with the multiplicity of issues presenting continued variations of pose, attributes, and symbols, has surrounded the study of these equestrian types of Tarentum with peculiar difficulties."

The term "horsemen" at once identifies to the numismatist the type of the coins. On the obverse is seen a rider on horseback, who is represented in a variety of attitudes. On some coins he is a naked boy or Ephebus crowning his horse, as if after an agonistic victory; on others he is a man in full vigour, now naked, and now armed with helmet, shield, and lance. Occasionally he leads a second horse, in which case he is, perhaps, one of the famous Tarentine cavalry, who went into action with two horses, "binos secum trahentes equos." The horse is standing, walking, cantering, or galloping. On the reverse is seated on a dolphin Taras, the son of Poseidon, the reputed founder of the first Iapygian settlement in that district, who was miraculously saved from shipwreck by his father, who sent a dolphin, on whose back Taras was carried to the shore. He also is represented in various attitudes and with various attributes.

Having fixed the first issue of these coins to B.C. 450, about which time Tarentum adopted a more democratic form of government, the author proceeds to divide the history of the city into periods, ascribing to each certain classes of these coins. To Period II., B.C. 420-380, of which time there are scarcely any records of the city, but when it appears to have been in a flourishing condition, are assigned the coins which mostly resemble the "democratic" series in workmanship. To Period III., B.C. 380-345, the culminating epoch of the prosperity of Tarentum, during which the philosopher Archytas was chief of the state, are attributed those pieces which show the highest perfection of work and also bear upon them the artists' signatures in monogram. Periods IV.-VI., B.C. 344-281, show a continued development of the types with artists' signatures at greater length. Period VII., B.C. 281-272, marks the time when Tarentum, distrustful of her own strength to carry on the struggle against Rome, called to her aid Pyrrhus, King of Epirus, whose advent is clearly delineated on the coins, not only by the occurrence of certain symbols, such as the elephant, the eagle, or the thunderbolt, but also by a reduction of the standard weight, which shows an alliance with other cities, thus giving to the currency a federal character. How vain this struggle was is only too well known, and Tarentum after a few years was doomed to fall under the sway of all-conquering Rome. This happened in B.C. 272; but with her loss of liberty Tarentum did not relinquish her nominal independence, being left in possession of her own laws, which carried with them the right of issuing her own separate coinage. This right the city retained till after the Hannibalic occupation, B.C. 212-209, after which she lost all semblance of independence, and with it her coinage ceases. This is merely the outline and general principle of Mr. Evans's classification. It would be impossible here to enter with any detail into his reasonings and arguments; they are far too technical for any notice of this kind. He states his views with great clearness, and his work throughout shows the hand and mind of the experienced numismatist, who has accomplished his task without stint of labour and time. He tells us that his inquiry entailed upon him repeated visits to Tarento and other sites of cities of Great Greece, where he had the good fortune to meet with several recent large finds of Tarentine coins, of which he gives detailed lists in the appendices. The results arrived at by the examination of these finds were supplemented by visits to the national collections of Paris, Berlin, Naples, the British Museum, and several others, public as well as private. In fact, this monograph is the outcome of several years' close study and research.

Though confining his attention chiefly to the classification of the "Horsemen" coins, Mr. Evans gives some account of the gold coinages of Tarentum, so far as they are necessary to confirm and strengthen his views of classification. In the chapter on the artists and their signatures much new light is thrown on the general working and economy of the ancient mints of Italy. These signatures we now know mean more than the mere identification of a particular die-sinker's work. The artist who made the dies for the coins appears also to have been responsible for their proper weight and for the purity of the metal. His position corresponded to that of the Anglo-Saxon and Early English "moneyer"; and he was, in fact, master of the mint, acting under the control of the State. The occurrence, too, of more than one signature on the same piece suggests, according to Mr. Evans's opinion, the existence of confraternities or companies of moneyers, and indicates the joint responsibility of several maestri working in the same bottega.

We need scarcely add that monographs of this description are of the highest importance to numismatists as well as to archaeologists. Coins have one special feature above all other objects of antiquity, such as sculpture, terra-cottas, vases, bronzes, and gems, inasmuch as they are capable of being dated often to within a few months of their issue, almost without exception to within a very few years. To one important authentic piece of sculpture we have at least five hundred coins which show Greek art in all its phases, from archaism to a condition of perfection, and again downwards in its various stages of degradation. They act, in fact, as guides to the dating of every other class of object, and, as such, archaeologists cannot neglect their study.

The work is well supplied with indices and also with illustrations done by the autotype process, which are of the greatest use in following the learned author's arguments and reasonings.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.—WINTER EXHIBITION. (Seventh and Concluding Notice.)

We have left to the last the most novel element in this exhibition, viz., the series of life-size, whole-length portraits of English ladies and soldiers of the seventeenth century painted by D. Mytens and an unknown Dutchman of the same school, and all more or less associated with wars in the Low Countries and the deeds of the brothers Vere. Such a company has not been brought together since 1866. The Royal Academy is pretty sure to repeat this interesting experiment, and draw again upon those stores of portraits with which British mansions are crowded. The present collection comes from Raynham Hall, the Marquis Townshend's place in Norfolk, and Charlton Park, the Earl of Suffolk's seat in Wiltshire. A little care and insight enable us to see that the stiffness and, to us, quaintness of the figures are due to the painters, not to their subjects. If they look as if they were pinned against their backgrounds, or as if they would stumble were they to begin to walk on their high-heeled shoes, their features and even the characteristic air of each are not the less veracious and lively because the artists, masters of face-painting as they were, did not know how to put the figures on their legs, or were unable to prevent the ladies' often beautiful hands from hanging in front of petticoats that are stiff with brocade and glisten with embroideries.

Each face is distinct from its neighbour, while many are autobiographical. For example, Mytens's Countess of Exeter (No. 190), dressed in deep black and wearing large pearls, is a nervous-looking matron, already on the wane. She wears on her attenuated finger a mourning ring, secured to the wrist by a sable cord, and her darkening skin and sunken eyes attest the ravages of time and sorrow not less effectively than they bear witness to the scrupulous veracity of a sincere artist, who had no idea of what we call flattering, unless he was painting Queen Elizabeth. Then the painters of the day could not help themselves; but even in her case they never made an old woman look young. To return to Mytens: the Lady Dorothy Carey (188) is a lively dame, fair-haired and young, whose eyes have a world of laughing mischief in them, while a gay smile ripples in her cheeks and rosy lips. Her dress is of cream white splendidly embroidered, under a cloak of black satin sumptuously enriched and stiffened with elaborate arabesques of the needle in gold thread. Her pale-brown hair is frizzed out in the French fashion of the time, not generally met with in portraits of the class and period, so as to enclose, as with a frame, her bright face, its rosy complexion and clear-cut contours. A hood, as coquettish as it is neat, of fine lace crowns the dainty head, while a square collar of superb Venetian point is stretched on wires about her comely shoulders, and her deep-blue bodice is secured with narrow scarlet ribbons; her black mantle is lined with blue. Like the rest of the ladies represented here, she stands between looped-up curtains of rich rose.

The Lady Isabella Rich (187) is a maiden "in her hair," as it was customary to call a marriageable girl. She afterwards wedded Sir John Smythe, who wrote pedantic books on the 'Conduct of Warres,' which, although one of them went through two editions, no man now reads. Her elaborately wavy hair flows in thin tresses down her back; her gown is white silk, stiff with needlework of a similar design to the Lady Dorothy's, while across her shoulders hangs a broad and heavy scarf of vermilion velvet, lined with sky-blue satin and tied in a huge bow on her left shoulder. One sees that she was not a woman of taste, but fond of garish attire, quite different from the Lady Dorothy's.

The next portrait to be noticed is that of Elizabeth, born Basset of Blore. The picture seems to have been painted while she was the wife of the Lord Thomas Howard. She had for her second husband William Cavendish, Earl, and afterwards Duke, of Newcastle, "the thrice Noble, High and Puissant Prince," whose life by his second wife everybody has read. The portrait is No. 186, a young and comely woman, with bright black eyes; her face is somewhat pale, yet fair, and her dark, almost brown hair is arranged in the fashion of Lady Dorothy's. She wears no coronet of any kind. On her beautiful finger is a broad wedding-ring, such as few of her companions here wear. Her ruff is of superb Venetian point-lace stiffened into flutes, and her ruffles are of the same material, but threefold. Her gown of black brocaded silk is opened in the front to reveal a sky-blue petticoat enriched with Italian embroidery in silver and a heavy silver fringe. This Italian work is exceptional, for nearly all the embroideries in these portraits are English, and, though beautiful in colour and design, are very simple and naive. The embroideries of the underskirts of Nos. 187, 188, and 189 (The Countess of Banbury) are examples of this primitive and English taste, but those in No. 169, The Countess of Suffolk, with scrolls of foliage, on which kingfishers and partridges are perched, on a deep red ground, are probably Italian, and thoroughly influenced by that Oriental taste which, in another form, marks the handsome Turkey carpets on which nearly every lady stands. The patterns of these carpets are all worthy of attention. The Countess of Banbury is posed on a black Malabar carpet; the Countess of Suffolk, the Duchess of Newcastle, and Lady Isabella Rich all stand on pure Turkeys, of design similar to those still in vogue. Lady Dorothy Carey's carpet is a rectangular mosaic-like Turcoman of very coarse texture. The Countess of Oxford and Lady Stamford stand on varieties of an existing type. These young ladies of King James's court all wear laces coloured with the famous yellow starch with which a certain Mrs. Turner was at another time infamously associated. Their shoes are white, and adorned with huge roses of gold or blue sumptuously enriched with lace, those of the Lady Rich being further decorated with tear-shaped pearls, or the glass beads so called. The hose of all the younger ladies (186, 187, and 188) is of a deep blue and well shaped, thus showing it was of French manufacture. Although Mytens was able to discern character with judgment, and depict it with spirit and a sense of humour, he or his drapery painter delineated embroideries, laces, and brocades as if he had been a mere pattern-drawer, trained by a department of science and art; he sets out the designs in the flat, so as to show their details with little regard to perspective.

It is observable that nearly all the ladies, unlike their daughters and granddaughters whom Van Dyck, Lely, and Kneller painted, are flat-chested; they wear stiff corsets, and, except the Scotch Countess of Suffolk (169), a daughter of George, Earl of Dunbar, whose taste was more "loud" than fine, they all had true and choice feeling for colour. The Countess of Oxford (168) and the Countess of Stamford (170)—being Diana and Ann, daughters of William, Earl of Exeter, and his Countess, whose portrait is No. 190—are sisters who must surely have been painted in the same garments. Each holds a lace handkerchief of the same pattern to a thread; each wears a silk dress of warm white embroidered in chevrons of gold, and a skirt most elaborately slashed; each carries a Chinese fan of carved ivory; and their attitudes, collars, cuffs, pearls, coiffure, even the chairs and curtains and carpets, are identical.

Of the men's portraits Henry, Earl of Oxford (171), and Sir Jerome Bowes (185) illustrate the skill of a very capable artist, who knew how to put his models on their feet much better than Mytens did. He was thoroughly good at rendering the characters and attitudes of his men, for instance, Sir Jerome Bowes and the jovial, robust, and full-featured Sir Robert Carey (176); and he had an excellent eye for colour of a kind. For example, No. 179, Sir Simon Harcourt, is a fine and masculine study in russet-buff and olive-grey; and the visitor should look at the reddish brown and darkened silver, with a broad blue baldric, of Sir Robert Carey. The scarlet, blue, and pearl-white of Sir Henry Paiton (180), however bright, are in harmony with each other, and with the sad and warm olive-brown dress, laced with tawny braid, the bright blue sash and nodding plume, of Sir William Lovelace (181), form excellent examples of a good school. As each soldier was evidently painted in his customary attire, the good choice of colours in the portraits is doubtless not due to the painter, but the treatment and harmonizing of them on the canvases are clearly the work of an accomplished and resourceful hand. Most of these productions are to be admired for the masculine brush-work of the faces, and the highly intelligent designing and draughtsmanship of the hands. Each of these captains "of the Queen's" has the face, air, and movement characteristic of him, like the morion at his side, distinguished by its nodding feathers, red, white, or blue. The sculptured counterparts of some of these men still lie on tombs in English village churches, where the restorer has not destroyed them, although collectors and curiosity dealers may have filched from overhead the "hollow helmets" which are depicted in these pictures, and the banners which drooped above the graves. The swords, which in so many instances adorned their tombs, are most of them now in cabinets. The tomb of Sir Francis Vere, where the noble canopy, sustaining his arms and armour, is borne above his effigies on the shoulders of four kneeling captains such as these, is still a famous ornament of Westminster Abbey. By his side, the same tomb serving for both, lies Horace, Lord Vere of Tilbury juxta Clare, whose portrait by Miereveldt is No. 177 before us.

These pictures are curious reminders of the ancient martial custom of going into winter quarters, at which periods the captains not actually needed went to the chief towns of Belgium and Holland and whiled away the time by sitting for portraits such as these, which some forgotten painter produced for Sir Horace Vere, the English chief commander, who kept them in his ancestral house at Kirby, and whose descendants preserved them in — an old hall, hung about with pikes, guns, and bows, With old swords and bucklers, that had borne many shrewd blows, because they remembered that these were the valiant and worthy comrades of those of whom the old ballad declared :—

The most courageous officers Were English captains three;
But the bravest man in battle
Was brave Lord Willoughbee.

The next was Captain Norris,
A valiant man was he;
The other Captain Turner,
From field would never flee.
With fifteen hundred fighting men,
Alas! there were no more,
They fought with fourteen thousand then
Upon the bloody shore.

"Stand to it, noble pikemen,
And look you round about;
And shoot you right, you bow-men,
And we will keep them out:
You musket and caliver men,
Do you prove true to me,
I'll be the foremost man in fight,"
Says brave Lord Willoughbee.

Then quoth the Spanish general,
Come, let us march away,
I fear we shall be spoiled all
If here we longer stay.

Our space admits only of the briefest reference to the designs, architectural and sculptural, of Alfred Stevens, to which the Academy has wisely devoted an important room. Had opportunity and time permitted, no doubt a better collection might have been got together, but more than enough is exhibited to prove how admirable a disciple of the Italian Renaissance he was, in this being, no doubt, to some extent, an anachronism, but, at any rate, a noble and accomplished master. The occasion may be seized by those who respect the great Duke of Wellington as well as the artist who worthily constructed his monument to demand how long that noble work of art is to be imprisoned in a little chapel at St. Paul's.

It is the duty of all who have profited by this extremely interesting exhibition to join in thanking the owners of the works of art, as well as the Royal Academicians, especially the President and Mr. Horsley, for the instruction and pleasure it has given.

MINOR EXHIBITIONS.

MESSRS. BOUSSOD, VALADON & Co. have never had a finer exhibition at their gallery in New Bond Street than the forty pictures of C. F. Daubigny, to which many English owners have contributed. Most of these works are distinguished by the dignified and serene sentiment characteristic of the illustrious artist, whose place in French landscape art has not yet been filled. On the Oise (No. 2) shows his favourite haunt in pure silvery light, with a tenderly flushed sky of grey clouds. The noble Moonlight (3) is a view over a vast plain; the firmament is a dark blue, but nearly covered by silvery nacreous clouds of exquisite semi-transparency and lovely hues and tones most delicately graded. It belongs to Mr. H. T. Wells, R.A., and so slight was English knowledge of French art at the time it was sent to the Royal Academy in 1866, that the Hanging Committee could find no nobler place for this masterpiece by a member of the Institute of France than the topmost tier in the East Room at Trafalgar Square, although apart from the high reputation of the painter the supreme beauty of his work ought to have secured for it one of the best places on the line of that room. The serene evening in Village on the Banks of the Oise (4) is a painted poem. Banks of the Oise (5) is a pathetic gem of fading twilight, lovely in its pathos of a sad but restful repose, and beautiful in colour. A lighted champaign and darkening water are treated with felicity in Landscape, with Lake (8). Each visitor will admire the delicate harmonies of tone and tint in the New Moon (12) from Mr. J. S. Forbes's collection. On the Banks of the River Cure, Morvan (22), is a dignified landscape made solemn by the tokens of impending rain. Prairies of Villerville (44), lent by Mr. G. P. Boyce, is a beautiful study of the Norman coast, comparable with On the Shore near Villerville (16). Other admirable instances are On the Seashore (7), Rivulet, with Women Washing (18), Grey Morning on the Loire (27), and Landscape with a Church and Houses (36).

The Society of Painter-Etchers has opened an unprecedentedly valuable exhibition in the gallery of the Society of Painters in Water Colours. To students no part of this collection will be so important as the century of Rembrandt's works lent (his sole contribution) by Mr. F. Seymour Haden, and comprising specimens in various states of the larger number of the great etcher's masterpieces. Within our limits it is impossible to say more concerning these beautiful and varied works than that they represent and exhaust genius, knowledge, and skill devoted to the needle by the one master of whom it might be truly said that he "ascended at one bound to the summit of his art." Without studying his works no one is a judge of what are the right limits, successes, and aims of the art. Of the more modern contributions we may briefly notice the best in the order of the Catalogue. Mr. Urwick's At Sonning (No. 4) is delicate and bright, a true etching according to Rembrandt's principles.—Also good are Campden, Gloucestershire (13), by Mr. C. J. Watson; the vigorous and firm Transept, Burgos Cathedral (16), by Mr. A. Haig, as well as his Patio of the Cloisters, Burgos Cathedral (45), and Two Bridges, Cuenca, Spain (123), all of which are in the well-known manner of this Piranesi of our time.—Mr. F. Short has happily attempted the almost forgotten process of aquatint in The Curfew (21), which has the qualities of a mezzotint, with desirable clearness and sharpness of touch. It possesses sentiment and dignity. His Cornish Harbour (94) is a deftly-drawn etching of exemplary merit; his Calm (237) demands the same praise. It is a triumph of delicate precision and deftness of touch.—Mr. E. Slocombe's Rue des Épiceries, Rouen (24), departs slightly from his wonted methods, and loses nothing thereby; see likewise, and admire, his capital Sketch from a Bridge (30).—Taking the Oath (34) is a powerful Rembrandtish example of the skill of Mr. W. Strang, who loyally follows his master, Mr. Legros, and has improved in drawing the human form; he will do better in this respect by-and-by. All his contributions are artistic and pathetic, but they need a little more refinement.—Mr. C. J. Watson's Rue Chanoinesse, Paris (39), is an honourable and accomplished compromise between Méryon and Rembrandt; his Groothoofdpoort, Dordrecht (58), is equally to be accepted as a specimen of what etching, combined with thorough draughtsmanship, ought to be. In passing let us say that the student of etching must needs be glad to see that the art of drawing—which means more than simple outlining—is no longer regarded as a superfluity by etchers, least of all by the Society of Painter-Etchers.—Very delicate and solid is Mr. W. Ball's pretty Abingdon (43).—Mrs. C. M. Nichols's St. Helen's Cloisters, Norwich (49), needs only a little more finish to be a gem in its wealth of tones and tints.—We admire Mr. E. Barclay's Farm near Bude (62); Mr. R. Goff's The Pool, London (71); Mr. T. C. Farrer's capital "As pensive evening deepens into night" (109); Mr. L. B. Phillips's A Brittany Castle (126), which is full of light and marks a great improvement on his part; and Mr. T. Ellis's Courtyard of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre (127).

SALES.

MESSRS. CHRISTIE, MANSON & WOODS sold on the 1st inst. the following pictures: J. F. Herring, sen., A Horse Fair, 136l. J. Linnell, The Flight into Egypt, 556l. D. MacIise, Snap-Apple Night, or All-Hallows Eve, in Ireland, 304l. T. S. Cooper, In the White Hall Meadows, Canterbury, 504l.; Sheep descending from the Mountains, 194l. R. Beavis, The Shore at Scheveningen, waiting for the Boats, 157l. J. B. Burgess, The Presentation, English ladies visiting a Moor's house, 189l.; Col. Newcome's Visit to the Nursery, 189l. R. Ansdell, The Cotter's Revenge, 123l. John Faed, After the Victory, 101l. T. Webster, Waiting for the Bone, 173l. E. Long, A Question of Propriety, 1,050l. T. Faed, Music hath Charms, 483l. F. Holl, Want, 163l. W. Collins, Shrimp Boys at Cromer, 1,260l.; The Capstan at Work, drawing up fishing-boats, 840l.; The Kitten Deceived, 682l.; Children playing with Puppies, 241l. W. Owen, Beggars, a woman and child, portrait of the artist's son, 267l.; The Blind Beggar of Bednal Green, 147l. W. Dobson, Portrait of the Artist, with his wife and child, 131l.

Just-Int Gossy.

SIR J. MILLAIS will be represented at the next Royal Academy Exhibition by one or two portraits and two most important and beautiful landscapes. The subject of each is new to him, and is treated with great originality and feeling for its beauty. One of these works has for its motto "The moon is up and yet it is not night." The time is just after the setting of the sun, while almost colourless, but warm daylight lingers in the calm, cloudless, and even-tinted sky of a late autumn, and all the air is suffused with mist. Through the mist the pale golden disc of the moon at full appears, half way to the zenith, and enclosed by a barely distinguishable halo. The landscape proper comprises, in front, an open, level glade, covered with the burnt remains of the year's furze and fern, and bounded on either hand by clumps of oaks, graceful birches, and larches, while beyond these the darker pines rear themselves like tall phantoms, and loom in the vapour; in the mid-distance a wan reflection of the moon's disc betrays the lake which, so to say, lies perdu there; in the remoter space the shadow-like masses of uplands are dimly seen against the hardly less substantial sky. The loneliness and silence of the place have attracted two stags, who, issuing from the thicket, advance into the open, and one of them, fancying he hears a movement near, lifts his head and stands at gaze in our direction. The effect of the whole, tender, soft, and broad as it is, its coloration—composed of delicate browns and warm, silvery greys—and the absence of shadows in the scene, add to the charm of the dim, mysterious illumination of the picture. The second landscape has a motto from "In Memoriam," and depicts an autumnal scene in a dense wood, with a fern-crowded vista between trees opening to and ending in a lofty mass of russet oaks, ruddy beeches, and grey larches; the vista is formed by similar foliage to right and left, but, being nearer, is more distinct, because the vapours which surcharge the view have been searched by the sun, whose lustre glows

On these dews that drench the furze,
And all the silvery gossamers
That twinkle into green and gold.

The underwood is pierced through and through by the long crimson arms of a briar, half smothered in the dark-green masses of the gorse, and nearly lost in the multitudinous fern stems, whose massed fronds hide the earth, and the trees are "knee-deep" among them. The pervading vapour has condensed upon the furze, ferns, and leaves, and upon the gossamers which seem to lace the one to the other and glitter in silvery films amid the thicket. Quite in the front, embedded among the fern stems, is ensconced a hen-pheasant, while her mate, his splendid plumage merged in the shadow of the herbage, is close at hand.

THE British Museum has acquired a Greek vase long reckoned among the art treasures of Castle Howard. Though belonging to the decadence of Greek vase painting, it is interesting because of its bearing the signature of the artist (Πύθων ἑργαφει), and because of the subject, which presents one of the Greek legends in a light till now unknown in the Greek literature which we possess. It is the story of Alcmena. Her husband Amphitryon has returned from the war, and is filled with indignation at her conduct during his absence. She has fled to an altar for protection, where we see her on the vase. Mean time Amphitryon and Antenor have piled up in front of the altar a pyre of wood and are proceeding to light it. Alcmena raises her hands to the heavens and implores Zeus to help her. In the upper part of the vase appears Zeus, partially visible; he first hurls his thunderbolts at Amphitryon and Antenor, and next sends a tempest of rain to put out the fire. The rain is indicated directly by a great rainbow enclosing a space thickly dotted with drops of rain, and indirectly by two Hyades above the rainbow, who pour down water from vases. Beside one of the Hyades is a figure of Morning (Eos). The names of the various persons, except the Hyades, are inscribed on the vase, so that there is no doubt of the meaning. The vase belongs to a time when it was not uncommon for vase-painters to take their subjects from the dramas of Euripides, and it is thought that the source of this design had been a lost drama of his entitled 'Alcmena,' several fragments of which have been handed down by grammarians. In Plautus a storm is called an "Alcmena of Euripides." A similar scene was enacted in the case of Croesus when Cyrus, having taken him prisoner, set him on a pyre to be burnt alive. Croesus appealed to Apollo, to whose temples he had made so many valuable presents, and Apollo responded by a violent shower of rain, which had the effect of releasing Croesus. That scene also occurs on a vase. The work in the Museum is unique as comprising a representation of rain. Most curiously, the garments of the Hyades, which are distinctly crimson, are spotted in white lines of dots, which, beyond a doubt, indicate drops of rain. The rainbow is banded in different colours.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN, M.P., has accepted an invitation to preside at the annual dinner of the Artists' General Benevolent Institution, which is appointed for the 10th of May next.

The recent death of Lord Lamington having created a vacancy among the Trustees of the National Portrait Gallery, Mr. Alexander has accepted the vacant seat. It is needless to add that this appointment confirms the opinions of those who ascribed to Mr. Alexander the magnificent gift of a new building for the gallery in question. The designs for this work are now under consideration by the authorities, and when approved will be immediately put in the builder's hands for execution upon that site in the rear of the National Gallery which has been secured for the purpose. The design Mr. Christian has prepared agrees generally with that of the façade in Trafalgar Square. The triangular piece of land in front of the gallery to be has been bought for a very sufficient "consideration" by the Government from the County Council of London. As it might have been sold for a tavern, it was desirable to prevent the chance of such a thing.

MR. HENRY TATE, of Streatham, has offered to the Trustees of the National Gallery about sixty fine modern pictures, the cream of his collection, estimated to be worth nearly 90,000l. These pictures include Sir John Millais's 'Vale of Rest,' 'North-West Passage,' and 'The Knight Errant'; three works of Mr. Hook, being 'Home with the Tide' (1880) and two others; Mr. Orchardson's 'First Dance,' 'Her Mother's Voice,' and 'The Tiff'; Mr. Waller's 'Success'; two pictures by Mr. Alma Tadema; two by Mr. Gow; two Linnells; Mr. H. W. B. Davis's 'Mare and Foal'; and examples by J. Crome and Constable, Messrs. P. Graham, Waterhouse, Frank Bramley ('Saved,' No. 698 at the last Academy), and Boughton, and Lady Butler. This gift is offered, we understand, contingent on the pictures being housed without unnecessary delay in Trafalgar Square as a portion of the National Gallery. The Trustees of the National Gallery, naturally enough, wish to be allowed to select the best pictures from the Tate Collection and decline the rest. It is said that the owner demurs strongly to this idea. Meanwhile, the Trustees are in communication with the Treasury as to the means of extending the Gallery so as to accommodate the greater part, if not the whole of the pictures in question. It is hoped that the generous collector will not insist on "the whole or none" being placed in the public gallery, where it is obvious room ought to be found only for the finest examples of the best masters.

DR. ROBERT MUNRO, honorary secretary of the Society of Antiquaries, Scot., is preparing for publication the Rhind Lectures of last year on the 'Lake Dwellings of Europe.' The work will be very fully illustrated and of a comprehensive character. It is expected to be issued early in the autumn.

MR. ARTHUR G. LANGDON, who has given a good deal of attention to the Celtic ornaments on old Cornish crosses, and has read more than one paper on the question, is now making drawings to scale of all the early crosses of the county, with a view to publication. It is a subject that has often been treated, with more or less success, in a fragmentary way, but has never yet been taken in a thorough or exhaustive fashion.

THE Institute of Painters in Water Colours, Piccadilly, has appointed Friday, the 14th inst., for the private view of the exhibition, which will be opened to the public on the following Monday.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. will publish Miss Jane Harrison's book on the 'Cults and Monuments of Ancient Athens,' to which Mrs. Verrall has contributed a translation of the text of the part of Pausanias which deals with Athens and Attica. In a certain sense Miss Harrison supplies a commentary on Pausanias, but her primary object is to elucidate the mythology of Athens, and with this intent she has examined the monuments, taking Pausanias as her guide. It is hoped that the book will be found useful by students at home as well as by those who have opportunities of seeing the monuments for themselves.

DR. SCHLIEMANN has not, as was reported, left the Troad, but still remains there, and he has just obtained from the Sultan a new firman, allowing him to make fresh excavations at Hisarlik. His attention is now directed, it is thought, to a thorough exploration of the lowest strata, occupied by the earliest inhabitants of the supposed site of Troy.

THE American School of Athens has received the authorization of the Greek Government to conduct excavations at Platea.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

STEINWAY HALL.—Madame Backer-Gründahl's Pianoforte Recital.

ALBERT HALL.—Royal Choral Society.

WHAT must be regarded as an outrage upon musical art was committed at Madame Backer-Gründahl's pianoforte recital on Wednesday afternoon. For some reason impossible to explain, it has pleased Grieg, the Scandinavian composer, to whom we are indebted for much charming music, to lay violent hands upon Mozart's familiar Fantasia in c, which generally precedes the Sonata in c minor, and add thereto a part for a second piano, utterly out of keeping in style, harmony, and phraseology with the original work. Even if the Mozartean spirit had been preserved, the addition would have deserved condemnation as so much useless tampering with a great master's ideas. As it is, a feeling of astonishment mingles with indignation that an excellent musician should so far forget what is due to the dignity of his art as to perpetrate such an offence. That a thoughtless assemblage should loudly applaud the performance, in which the recital giver was assisted by Madame Haas, was only to be expected. It seems useless to look for the manifestation of true artistic feeling from an ordinary English audience. The programme of the recital was mainly composed of trifles, Chopin's Nocturne in c minor and Ballade in a flat being the only pieces of importance. These were played in a broad intellectual style, but with little sentiment. We fancy Madame Backer-Gründahl would be heard to the greatest advantage in the larger works of Beethoven and Schumann. Some of Grieg's minor pieces were exquisitely played, and a weird Scandinavian dance called 'Fanti-tull,' by Ole Olsen, may be mentioned for its undoubted cleverness, though it borders on vulgarity. The pianist contributed some well-written pieces from her own pen, and two Scandinavian songs, which were sung by Mlle. Janson.

For the first time in his career Dr. A. C. Mackenzie has chosen a Scottish poem as the foundation for a choral work. If any surprise has been felt that the composer should not long before this have gone to the rich stores of poetry and legend of his native country for inspiration, his setting of Burns's homely story 'The Cottar's Saturday Night' affords the best explanation that could be desired. It is obvious from this that the peculiarities of Scottish melody and harmony do not fit in easily with the ideas of the composer's own brain. He has endeavoured to impart Northern colouring to his work, but the effort has been unsuccessful, the only episode where it would be recognized being that in which he introduces, appropriately enough, a genuine old Scotch tune, 'The Shepherd's Wife.' In art work it is always unadvisable to force the expression of the mind out of its natural groove, and Dr. Mackenzie will be wise in future to select such subjects as will invite, or at any rate permit, perfect freedom of manner in the setting. At the same time, regarded as abstract music, there is much in 'The Cottar's Saturday Night' that calls for admiration. The composer has restricted himself to the chorus and orchestra, but the absence of solo voices is not felt. In accordance with the modern style, the music is continuous, but it is not fragmentary. There are several well-developed movements, the most important being that which commences with the entry of the "neebor lad," Jenny's peasant lover, and goes on to describe the chatter of the humble folk round the supper table, and the energetic yet simply constructed final chorus, an excellent setting of the fine stanza commencing "From scenes like these old Scotia's grandeur springs." The music descriptive of the simple evening worship of the family is as appropriate as it is artistic in construction, and the most impressive point in the whole work is that where the poet speaks of the vision of St. John in the isle of Patmos. Though the introduction of a regularly developed fugue would be absurd in the illustration of such a theme as the present, Dr. Mackenzie has contrived to avail himself very happily of the effects to be gained by imitation and canonic writing without the slightest suggestion of pedantry. In short, 'The Cottar's Saturday Night' is in every respect worthy of the composer, and it cannot fail to interest choral societies. It should be mentioned that some of the stanzas of Burns's poem are omitted, and that the composer has exercised sound judgment in his elisions. That the Albert Hall Choir was heard to the fullest advantage in the performance on Wednesday cannot be said. The Scotch words and pronunciation, which, of course, proved grateful to the Edinburgh Choral Union, when the work was first performed on December 16th last year, naturally hampered English choristers, and this probably accounts for the uncertainty which prevailed at times. It was otherwise in 'The Dream of Jubal,' which formed the second part. Here the choir recovered itself, and attacked the noble choruses of the work with its customary power and spirit. The most striking feature of the performance, however, was the beautiful delivery of Mr. Bennett's graphic verse by Miss Julia Neilson. Perfect in voice and elocution, and graceful in gesture, Miss Neilson gave the utmost significance to every line, and roused the audience to enthusiasm. The principal vocalists, Miss Macintyre, Miss Hannah Jones, Mr. Barton McGuckin, and Mr. J. McB. Gibson, were all satisfactory, and the rendering of this exceedingly fine and imaginative work must have given the utmost satisfaction to the composer, who occupied the conductor's seat throughout the evening.

Musical Gossip.

MADAME BACKER-GRÖNDAHL, having returned to this country, on Saturday last made her first appearance at the Crystal Palace, where she played Grieg's Pianoforte Concerto, the work in which she made such a striking impression at the Philharmonic Concerts last season. As the Norwegian pianist will remain in London for some time, opportunities will doubtless be found of forming a judgment as to her capacity in other schools of pianoforte playing. Of two pieces by M. Saint-Saëns—a transcription of the 'Jota Aragonesa'—and a 'Marche Militaire' from the Suite Algérienne, Op. 60—we cannot speak, as they were placed at the end of the programme. The other orchestral items were Beethoven's Symphony in D, No. 2; Mozart's Overture to 'Idomeneo,' with Reinecke's ending; and Dvorák's curious little Notturmo in B, for strings, Op. 40. Mr. Braxton Smith created a favourable impression in Handel's 'Love in her eyes' and Schubert's Serenade.

A SERIES of performances of Gluck's 'Orpheus and Eurydice' in English is announced to take place in the theatre at Cambridge on May 13th, 14th, 15th, 16th, and 17th. Orpheus will be played by Mrs. Alfred Bovill, Eurydice by Miss Anna Russell, and Eros by Miss Margaret Davies. The performances will be given under the direction of Prof. Villiers Stanford, and the orchestra and chorus will consist of eighty performers. This enterprise cannot fail to commend itself highly to the consideration of musicians.

M. DE PACHMANN'S Chopin recitals are still attractive, but little remains to be said about them. At his farewell performance for the present season, on Monday, at St. James's Hall, the Russian artist was heard at his best in the B flat minor Sonata, the Ballade in A flat, the Impromptu in F sharp, and the Études Nos. 2 and 3, Op. 25. On the other hand, he cannot escape blame for introducing vulgarized versions of the Waltz in D flat and the Nocturne in the same key. Who is responsible for the ridiculous additions to the text in these pieces we cannot say, but they are wholly unjustifiable.

THERE is again little to note concerning the Popular Concerts. On Saturday the concerted works were Beethoven's Quartet in E flat, Op. 74, and Brahms's latest Trio in C minor, Op. 101. Miss Fanny Davies played Mendelssohn's Prelude and Fugue in E minor, Op. 35, No. 1, and Herr Joachim gave Schumann's Fantasia in A minor, Op. 131, a somewhat dry work, though, as it was composed expressly for the Hungarian violinist, it is but natural that he should bring it forward from time to time. The vocalist was Madame de Swiatlowsky, a Russian lady with a powerful mezzo-soprano voice and a somewhat dramatic style.

ON Monday the most important items were Brahms's Sextet in B flat, Op. 18, and Beethoven's Trio in C minor, for strings, Op. 9, No. 3. Madame de Pachmann did not create much effect in Mendelssohn's 'Variations Sérieuses.' She seemed ill at ease, and certainly did not play the work so well as at her recent recital. Mr. Hirwen Jones was the vocalist.

THE principal works performed by the Wind Instrument Chamber Music Society at its first concert last Friday at the Royal Academy of Music were Beethoven's early Sestet, for clarinets, horns, and bassoons, Op. 71; Spohr's Septet, for wind and strings, Op. 147; and Franz Lachner's Octet, for wind only, Op. 156.

MR. ANTON HARTVIGSON, a sound, though not a striking executant, gave a pianoforte recital at the Princes' Hall on Wednesday afternoon. His programme included pieces by Chopin, Gade, and Liszt, but was defaced by the same caricature of Mozart's Fantasia in C mentioned above, and an equally reprehensible derangement of one of the sonatas, also by Grieg. Mr. Fritz Hartvigson took part in these inartistic transcriptions, the expediency of which cannot be maintained on any ground whatever.

WE regret to learn that the Royal Academy of Music is about to lose the services of Mr. John Gill, who for twenty-two years has fulfilled the duties of secretary, to the great advantage of the institution. It was in great measure owing to the efforts of Mr. Gill that the Academy was saved from the collapse which threatened it in 1868, and its present prosperity is certainly in part due to his excellent business capacity.

THE orchestra of professors and pupils of the Royal College of Music has reached a very high stage of proficiency. At the concert in Alexandra House on Thursday last week an excellent performance was given of Mozart's Symphony in E flat, and the rendering of the prelude and closing scene from Wagner's 'Tristan and Isolde,' if somewhat rough, was careful and intelligent. Miss Annie Grimson's performance of Scharwenka's Pianoforte Concerto in B flat minor, a work that has recently suffered neglect, deserves a word of commendation. The concert was conducted by Prof. Villiers Stanford.

MISS BESSIE COX gave the first of a series of three concerts at the Steinway Hall on Thursday last week, the performers being chiefly her own vocal pupils. Several of them displayed considerable promise, but it would be invidious to particularize. Mr. M. Barton gave a moderately successful rendering of Schumann's 'Papillons.'

THE Clapham Philharmonic Concert on Thursday last week consisted chiefly of chamber music, the executants being the Messrs. Hann. The programme included Schumann's Quintet in E flat, Op. 44; Spohr's Quartet in C minor, Op. 4, No. 2; and Mozart's Sonata in A, for piano and violin, No. 17. Mr. Walter Mackway's ladies' choir was announced to sing Schubert's 23rd Psalm, Grieg's 'At the Cloister Gate,' and Brahms's 'Ave Maria.'

A PERFORMANCE of Berlioz's 'Faust' was announced under Sir Charles Halle at Manchester on Thursday evening, with Mrs. Henschel, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Hilton, and Mr. Henschel as the principal vocalists.

THE resumption of the Bristol Monday Popular Concerts has so far proved highly successful. A large guarantee fund has been secured, and the attendances at the first and second concerts have been very encouraging. The orchestra of seventy performers consists of local professional musicians and about twenty-five members of the Society of Instrumentalists, including several ladies. Mr. Riseley may yet realize that his self-sacrificing efforts in the cause of music have not been made in vain.

WITH reference to Bristol, it may be remembered that an assertion was made some time ago to the effect that the Orpheus Glee Society would pay a second visit to London at the invitation of the Prince of Wales. Nothing, however, has yet been settled in the matter.

HERR SCHRÖTER, director of the Zurich Theatre, made an important discovery during his inspection of the cellars after the recent fire. He found, amongst other things, a number of small bundles, much blackened externally and soaked with water. Upon carefully unrolling them he saw that they contained nothing less than the score of 'Tannhäuser,' written with Richard Wagner's own hand, and signed with his name. Happily only a few sheets are wanting, and the margins alone are burnt, while the notes are perfectly clear and intact. This valuable relic is to be preserved in the archives of the new Zurich Theatre.

THE preparations for the production of 'Tannhäuser' at Bayreuth next year have already commenced. Herr Knieke is making a tour of Germany in order to secure the most suitable artists. In 1892 it is hoped to perform 'Tannhäuser,' 'Tristan und Isolde,' 'Die Meistersinger,' and 'Parsifal.' 'Lohengrin' will be the next production, after which 'The Nibelung's Ring' will be revived.

SIR ARTHUR SULLIVAN's opera 'The Yeomen of the Guard' has been well received at the Gaertnerplatz theatre in Munich.

CONCERTS, &c., NEXT WEEK.

- MON. Royal College of Music Orchestral Concert, 8, Princes' Hall.
- Berlioz's 'Faust,' 8, Hampstead Conservatoire Hall.
- Popular Concert, 8.30, St. James's Hall.
- TUES. Concert for the Benefit of Madame Arabella Goddard, 9, St. James's Hall.
- WED. London Ballad Concert, 8, St. James's Hall.
- Westminster Orchestral Society, 8, Westminster Town Hall.
- Mrs. Alice Shaw's Concert, 9, Princes' Hall.
- THURS. Church of England Temperance Society's Concert, 8, St. James's Hall.
- Philharmonic Concert, 8, St. James's Hall.
- Mr. Coenen's Pianoforte Recital, 8, Princes' Hall.
- SAT. Popular Concert, 8, St. James's Hall.
- Crystal Palace Concert, 3.
- Irish Ballad Concert, 8, St. James's Hall.

DRAMA

GLOBE THEATRE.—Sole Lessee and Manager, Mr. F. R. HENSON.—F. R. HENSON'S SHAKESPEARIAN COMPANY EVERY EVENING at 8 (Thursdays and Fridays excepted), in Shakespeare's Fairy Comedy, with the Mendelssohn Incidental Music.

'A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM.'
No Fees.—MATINEES of 'A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM' every SATURDAY and WEDNESDAY. Doors Open at 2; Commence 2.30.—'HAMLET' THURSDAY and FRIDAY EVENINGS at 8, and every THURSDAY and FRIDAY until further notice. MATINEES of 'HAMLET,' THURSDAY, March 13, at 2.15.—GLOBE.

A Study of Ben Jonson. By Algernon Charles Swinburne. (Chatto & Windus.)

(First Notice.)

WHEN the Rev. John Foster said "there is no such thing as unbiased opinion," he little thought that his words would ever be degraded to the "base uses" of dramatic criticism. Yet, when speaking some time ago of Shakspeare in relation to his contemporary dramatists, it was to such base uses that we ventured to degrade them. We said on that occasion that, although it has become more and more the fashion of late for students of English literature to wax fervid about Elizabethan drama, the amount of unbiassed opinion upon the subject has in no way increased, but rather has diminished, since the appearance of Lamb's 'Specimens.' Learning on the subject there is in plenty—far more than there was in Lamb's time; but learning is a very different thing from opinion untrammelled by the authority of great names. We even went so far as to hint that to call this age of ours an age of criticism seems to the critic of the dramatic critics one of those delightful and brilliant paradoxes which Matthew Arnold advanced at his own sweet will. Yet assuredly we meant no offence to those fervid students who have discovered so many things after Charles Lamb discovered them, and after the later discoveries of Mr. Swinburne, such, for instance, as the transcendent genius of Marlowe. To do them justice, there is not one of them who has not discovered that transcendent genius. Nor is there one of them who cannot laugh heartily at Hawkins for printing with much reluctance in a note, as being "foisted in the play by the players," the now famous additions to 'The Spanish Tragedy.' Nor, again, is there one of them who cannot laugh heartily at Gifford, who in his edition of Ben Jonson passed over with a single and contemptuous reference these same marvellous additions to Kyd's play. But then they laugh—these fervid ones—under the best authority. In the early years of the century their laughter would have been just as hearty as it is now; but it would have been with Messrs. Hawkins and Gifford, not at them. We say this advisedly, and after much respectful meditation upon their attitude towards certain Jonsonian plays upon which the voice of authority has been either silent or dubious, such plays, for instance, as 'The Staple of News' and 'The New Inn.' Because Dryden in a loose and reckless sentence stigmatized as "dotages" all the later plays of Jonson, and because 'The Staple of News' is found among those later plays, have not critics one and all found it the correct thing to pass this remarkable comedy by as worthless? And would not the same subservience to Dryden's authority have been displayed in regard to 'The New Inn' but for the fact that it was considered to be, although another of the banned later plays, under the protecting wing of a greater authority still—Charles Lamb's? Suppose that Lamb had not quoted from it the only two fine scenes in the play (that where Lovel discloses his passion for the Lady Frances, and that other where Lovel in the presence of the lady gives his definition of love), and suppose that Lamb had not appended to them his words about the undoubted excellence of these extracts—we wonder what the critics would have then had to say about 'The New Inn.' A greater authority than even Dryden's had spoken in favour of 'The New Inn'; but if it had not so spoken would any critic have been found with sufficient penetration and independence of judgment to see that a worse comedy, as a whole, was scarcely ever written than the play which Lamb brought prominently forward, while he altogether neglected 'The Staple of News'? For this reason we fell into a mood of pensive expectation in regard to the dramatic criticism of the future on coming across the following passage in Mr. Swinburne's brilliant essay:—

"The scheme of his last preceding comedy had been vitiated by a want of coherence between the actual and the allegorical, the fantastic and the literal point of view; and the result was confusion without fusion of parts: here, on the other hand, we have fusion without confusion between the dramatic allegory suggested by Aristophanes, the admirably fresh and living presentation of the three Pennyboys, and the prophetic satire of the newsmarket or Stock Exchange of journalism. The competent reader will be divided between surprise at the possibility and delight in the perfection of the success achieved by a poet who has actually endowed with sufficiency of comic life and humorous reality a whole group of symbolic personifications; from the magnificent Infanta herself, Aurelia Clara Pecunia, most gracious and generous yet most sensitive and discreet of imperial damsels, even down to little 'blushet' Rose Wax the chambermaid. Her young suitor is at least as good a picture of a generous light-headed prodigal as ever was shown on any stage: as much of a man as Charles Surface, and very much more of a gentleman. The miserly uncle, though very well drawn, is less exceptionally well drawn: but Pennyboy Canter, the disguised father, is equally delightful from the moment of his entrance with an extempore carol of salutation on his lips to those in which he appears to rescue the misused Infanta from the neglectful favourite of her choice, and reappears at the close of the play to rescue his son, redeem his brother, and scatter the community of jeerers: to whose humour Gifford is somewhat less than just when he compares it with 'the vapouring in "Bartholomew Fair":' for it is neither coarse nor tedious, and takes up but very little space; and that not unamusingly. As for the great scene of the Staple, it is one of the most masterly in ancient or modern comedy of the typical or satirical kind. The central 'Office' here opened, to the great offence (it should seem) of 'most of the spectators'—a fact which, as Gifford justly remarks, 'argues very little for the good sense of the audience,'—may be regarded by a modern student as representing the narrow little nest in which was laid the modest little egg of modern journalism—that bird of many notes and many feathers, now so like an eagle and now so like a vulture: now soaring as a falcon or sailing as a pigeon over continents and battle-fields, now grovelling and groping as a dunghill kite, with its beak in a very middenstead of falsehood and of filth. The vast range of Ben Jonson's interest and observation is here as manifest as the wide scope and infinite variety of his humour. Science and warfare, Spinola and Galileo, come alike within reach of its notice, and serve alike for the material of its merriment. The invention of torpedos is anticipated by two centuries and a half; while in the assiduity of the newsmongers who traffic in eavesdropping detail we acknowledge a resemblance to that estimable race of tradesmen known to Parisian accuracy as 'intervieweurs.'"

But let us return to the attitude of criticism in regard to the additions to Kyd's 'The Spanish Tragedy' attributed by external evidence to Ben Jonson. We do not at the present moment recall any contemporary critic of the Elizabethan drama, save Mr. J. A. Symonds, who shows himself to be conscious of the infinite importance of these verses in the study of Ben Jonson—their infinite importance, indeed, in the study of the entire cycle of Elizabethan drama. How is criticism to treat external evidence which says emphatically that these additions were written by the one poet who, according to all laws of internal evidence, could not possibly have written them—the tragedian of "the flat sanity and smoke-dried sobriety of 'Catiline' and 'Sejanus'?" If they were indeed written by him—if we do really get in these interpolations Ben marvellously translated, but still the veritable Ben—what was the overmastering power and influence at work which could so translate and transfigure that sturdy and self-willed artificer of plays? And having been once so translated and transfigured, how could Ben possibly be retranslated into the smoke-dried tragedian? Do we here exaggerate the magnitude of this literary crux? We think not. America will some day produce—must some day produce—a cryptogrammatist ready to prove that 'The Ring and the Book' was written by Lord Tennyson; and when this comes to pass nothing but his ignorance of all literature will prevent the cryptogrammatist instancing the parallel case of 'The Spanish Tragedy'—the case in which the author of 'Catiline,' 'Sejanus,' and those other dreary exercises of a pedantic intellect abetted by a fettered imagination, had been previously the writer of those vital scenes interpolated in Kyd's play—scenes written to order—in which occur one of the most splendid representations of a parent driven mad by the loss of a child, and one of the most splendid representations of the defiant fearlessness that comes to the soul when grief has done its worst, that can be found in English poetry or in any other.

If we were to discuss fully this question—the question whether he who wrote the magnificent speech we give below (the speech of the bereaved father Hieronimo before the threatening king) could afterwards set himself deliberately to manufacture some of the most lifeless tragedies of the seventeenth century—we should be opening up the entire question of the two different tribes of poets: the "tribe of Ben," a tribe far older than Ben himself—as old, indeed, as literature—and that other tribe (descended from the gods) whose best work, perhaps, was done before literature was:—

VICEROY. O damned devil! how secure he is!

HERON. Secure! why dost thou wonder at it?

I tell thee, Viceroy, this day I've seen Revenge,

And in that sight am grown a prouder monarch

Than ever sate under the crown of Spain.

Had I as many lives as there be stars,

As many heavens to go to as those lives,

I'd give them all, ay, and my soul to boot,

But I would see thee ride in this red pool.

Methinks, since I grew inward with revenge,

I cannot look with scorn enough on death.

KING. What! dost thou mock us, slave? Bring tortures forth.

HERON. Do, do, do; and mean time I'll torture you.

You had a son as I take it, and your son

Should have been married to your daughter: ha!

was it not so?

You had a son, too, he was my liege's nephew.

He was proud and politic—had he lived,

He might have come to wear the crown of Spain:

I think 'twas so—'twas I that kill'd him;

Look you—this same hand was it that stabb'd

His heart—do you see this hand?

For one Horatio, if you ever knew him—

A youth, one that they hang'd up in his father's garden—

One that did force your valiant son to yield, &c.

And yet the external evidence that he who wrote these lines was really he who stands in the forefront of "the tribe of Ben" is so strong that the critic who would challenge it on account of the power of the poetry must attribute these interpolations to Shakspeare or to Webster or to Cyril Tournour, or else, perhaps, to the unknown author of 'Arden of Feversham.' Perhaps, however, the general reader may need to be reminded how the case stands. According to the excellent authority of Heywood, Thomas Kyd was the author of 'The First Part of Jeronimo' and its sequel 'The Spanish Tragedy.' As early as 1594, indeed earlier, 'The Spanish Tragedy' passed into print, for it had become immensely popular. Like other popular plays it was altered and added to by some working dramatist or dramatists connected with the theatres, and in 1602 appeared an edition of the play enlarged, with "new additions of the painter's part and others." By whom were those additions made? In Henslowe's 'Diary' occur the following entries:—

"Lent unto Mr. Alleyn, the 25 of September, 1601, to lend unto Bengemen Johnson, upon his writtings of his adicions in Geronymo, the some of xxxs."

"Lent unto Bengemy Johnson, at the apoyntment of E. Alleyn and Wm. Byrde, the 24 of June, 1602, in earneste of a booeke called Richard Crockbacke, and for new adicyons for Jeronymo, the some of xli."

Do these entries refer to the additions as we find them in the version of 1602? Or do they refer to other additions given by the actors, but supplanted in the printed version by the additions known to us—additions made by some poet unknown? Had verses of an ordinary kind been attributed by external evidence to any particular writer, it would have been mere pedantry to inquire further into the matter. But these are not verses of an ordinary kind. Although the main body of Kyd's play without these additions (as we get it in the edition of 1599) is not, we venture to think, so poor a production as Lamb and Coleridge deemed it to be, the additions are in poetic quality very far above anything that Kyd is known to have written. Moreover they transcend the very highest poetic flights of Ben Jonson. Nor is this all; they are so essentially unlike the style and temper of all his other plays that it seems almost impossible that they could have come from him—almost impossible that they could have come from any poet who did not work with that free imagination the absence of which from Jonson's acknowledged writings is so depressing to the reader of his plays.

For, as we have before said when speaking of Marlowe, this is the difference between writers "sealed of the tribe of Ben" and writers of the other tribe: in the case of the one tribe the artist is always seen sedulously working his imagination; in the case of the other tribe the imagination is always seen working the artist. Hence in drama, while the characters of the one tribe are ex-cogitated, the characters of the other tribe are projected. Now, if this is really so, what wonder that Jonson's right to the authorship of these additions has on internal evidence been disputed by those three poets and students of English dramatic poetry whose opinion upon such a question is of special importance—S. T. Coleridge and Charles Lamb and Mr. Swinburne? What wonder that, in order to find a poet capable of producing them, Coleridge had to turn to Shakspeare himself, and Lamb and Mr. Swinburne to Webster?

But why do we dwell upon all this? Because in the discussion of Ben Jonson's genius it is, as we are going to show, the one point of paramount importance. Understand this, and you understand Ben himself and the Jonsonian art. In temper and in method the very opposite of everything Ben Jonson wrote, both before 1602 and afterwards—if the external evidence in favour of these additions having been written by him is to be accepted, the incredible conclusion is forced upon us that there was a brief and almost a momentary period in his life when his imagination was as free as Marlowe's and Webster's, and almost as vigorous as Shakspeare's own. Then is Ben Jonson's case one of the most marvellous instances of acquired methods conquering native impulse—one of the most marvellous instances in all literature of the way in which the wings of genius may be clipped by the shears of doctrine and clogged by the cobwebs of conventional prescription? Or was that momentary light an accidental flash from heaven? Not 'Arden of Feversham' itself is so great a puzzle as these additions to 'The Spanish Tragedy.' Indeed, the two cases are scarcely parallel. There is a difference, and a fundamental one, between the mental attitude of the critic who, without the support of external evidence, attributes (as in the case of 'Arden of Feversham') an anonymous play to the greatest of poets on the ground that no other could have written it, and the mental attitude of the critic who (as in the case of these additions) refuses, in the teeth of the most positive and direct external evidence of authorship, to ascribe verses to a poet, on account of internal evidence alone. Indeed, the true parallel of the crux presented by 'The Spanish Tragedy' additions is not that presented by 'Arden of Feversham,' but that presented by 'Titus Andronicus.' Nay, we will go further, and say that as many poets besides Ben Jonson probably made additions to a play so extremely popular as 'The Spanish Tragedy,' the entry in Henslowe's diary is not so conclusive, or nearly so conclusive, as to Jonson's authorship as is Meres's direct statement about 'Titus Andronicus' coupled with Heminge and Condell's editorial authority in including it in the Shakspeare folio of 1623, and that he who rejects the external evidence as to the authorship of 'Titus Andronicus' may very consistently reject the external evidence as to the authorship of 'The Spanish Tragedy' additions. Coleridge and Lamb, while disputing Jonson's authorship of them on the ground of internal evidence, offer nothing of even an inferential kind that bears upon external evidence. Mr. Swinburne, however, makes the following acute observation:—

"No student will need to be reminded of what is apparently unknown to some writers who have thought fit to offer an opinion on this subject—that different additions were made at different dates, and by different hands, to certain popular plays of the time. The original 'Faustus' of Marlowe was altered and re-altered, at least three times, by three if not more purveyors of interpolated and incongruous matter: and even that superb masterpiece would hardly seem to have rivalled the popularity of Kyd's tragedy—a popularity by no means unmerited."

Mr. Saintsbury, too, has hinted that besides Jonson probably others were employed from time to time to freshen up the play; and it should be borne in mind that although the 1602 edition of 'The Spanish Tragedy' declares itself to be "newly enlarged, with new additions of the painter's part and others," and although it is known from Henslowe's 'Diary' that Ben Jonson was certainly paid for making "new additions," and although in 'Cynthia's Revels' he seems to allude to some additions to this play made by him, the conclusion that Ben's new additions are the same new additions we find in the printed copy is by no means so inevitable as at first may appear. And if they are not Ben's, what known poet's style do these puzzling additions most resemble? That of the author of 'The Revenger's Tragedy,' perhaps—though Mr. Swinburne inclines in his 'Study of Shakspeare' to follow Lamb in tracing Webster.

And now as to the question why these passages form (in our opinion at least) the greatest riddle in dramatic criticism—a riddle which not even Coleridge and Lamb and Mr. Swinburne have fully confronted. In speaking of Marlowe once we divided poets into two great tribes: the poets who are "of imagination all compact," such as Homer, Æschylus, Sophocles, Chaucer, Shakspeare, Cervantes, Rabelais, Marlowe, Webster, Walter Scott, and, indeed, all those who may for convenience be designated the tribe of nature's children, and "the tribe of Ben"—a tribe which, taking its origin long before Ben was born—taking its origin, indeed, in a very early stage of literature—has produced many members, though two of them tower above all the others: the author of 'The Fox' and the author of the 'Comédie Humaine.' As to these two, indeed, so great are they that in importance they may be ranked with all but the most colossal members of the other and older tribe. Yet with the members of that other tribe, whom we have ventured, for comparison's sake, to call the tribe of nature's children, the writers "sealed of the tribe of Ben" must not, and indeed cannot, ever be confounded. Brilliantly and subtly as they depict human life, their "specimens" are characters of induction, whereas the other tribe know nothing of any characters of induction—know nothing of any characters save those of spontaneous projection. The characters of the tribe of Ben say this and do that because by induction the dramatist knows what they ought to say and do. Hence it is not with nature that the tribe of Ben live, but in fanciful chambers of their own—chambers

Carved so curiously,
Carved with figures strange and sweet,
All made out of the carver's brain.

And this is why they see those carvings and nothing else, though the world is in truth full of figures that are not "made out of the carver's brain"—figures carved not quite so curiously as these of the tribe of Ben, but carved by nature and revealed by her to poets of the other tribe. There is no need to exemplify the difference between the two kinds of figures, but if there were we should only have to take the characters in 'The Silent Woman,' or 'Every Man in his Humour,' or 'The New Inn' and set them beside Chaucer's figures in the prologue to 'The Canterbury Tales.' That millers of Chaucer's is as modern as the miller of Tennyson's idyl; and yet no subtle induction has gone to the making of him. By the side of that miller how old-fashioned and how dead seem Jonson's most vital characters! In inductive rightness, however, how perfect Jonson's figures are! how round and plump is every limb! In the carving of them there is, in 'The Alchemist' at least, scarcely a stroke too little or a stroke too much. Nature, the most modest and unobtrusive of sculptors, pretends to no such inductive rightness as these figures display; and as to her logical power, that has always been so shaky that innumerable theologies, mythologies, and cosmogonies have had to be invented in order to explain it. In an illogical and perhaps half-conscious way she, like Homer and Shakespeare and Chaucer, projects her characters, turns them out as entire organisms, and then leaves them to justify themselves. Here, indeed, is where nature is so charming that she never dreams of justifying her work, and yet she is justified of all her children. Never entirely right and logical are her characters, as are Ben's characters, and as are the characters in the 'Comédie Humaine' and in all the works of all the tribe of Ben; but they are alive—that is all the difference, these characters are alive. From head to foot we believe in them. The credence we give to them is different altogether from the credence we give to those curious figures moulded by the tribe of Ben. Hence their vitality is for all time. It is governed by no fashion, depends on no shifting web of circumstance, as does the vitality of the figures "made out of the carver's brain." Was Ben conscious, we wonder, of the evanescence of figures thus made when he told Charles I. that already the "less poetic boys" judged part of him decayed? "The less poetic boys" indeed! Had he said "the more poetic boys" he would only have been prophesying the temper of Prince Posterity towards all figures "made out of the carver's brain"—that incorruptible and puissant prince who for one of those "thousand" Shakespearean "lines" which Jonson wished had been "blotted" would cheerfully barter away a thousand of Ben's own loaded lines, where, alas! the literary energy quells all poetic life. Yes, the literary energy does the mischief always with the tribe of Ben. Carlyle sneered at the paucity of literary qualities in Scott's novels. Such literary critics as he do well to sneer at Scott. And yet Carlyle professed to admire Shakespeare, not knowing that he who does not admire Scott should carefully keep his mouth closed about Shakespeare. Had Shakespeare lived in later days and written novels would his method have been Balzac's or Scott's? Perhaps his method would have been Richter's or Goethe's, according to Carlyle. Perhaps he would have given us not a 'Guy Mannering' or a 'Bride of Lammermoor,' but a 'Titan' or 'Wilhelm Meister,' until, indeed, he had sufficiently ripened in literary qualities to give us a 'Sartor Resartus.' But as to Jonson, had he lived in the nineteenth century and written novels instead of plays, we can easily guess the style of novel he would have adopted; we can easily guess how assiduously he would have set to work to stifle such endowment of real imagination as he possessed by arranging his novels in a pseudo-scientific classification, and calling them the human comedy.

Grammatical Gossip.

AN adaptation by Mr. Robert Buchanan of 'The Relapse' of Sir John Vanbrugh is promised by Mr. Thorne at afternoon representations at the Vaudeville. A play more strongly imbued with the spirit of Restoration comedy, and more difficult to fit to modern requirements, cannot easily be found, and success in this experiment will open a new mine to managers and a new vista to lovers of the stage.

ON Monday Mr. Hermann Vezin appeared at the Grand Theatre in 'The Man of Airlie,' Mr. Wills's adaptation of Von Holter's 'Lorberbaum and Bettelstab,' first produced at the Princess's Theatre on the 20th of July, 1867. He was supported by Miss Stettith.

AMONG forthcoming novelties at the Comedy is 'The Favourite of the King,' a new historical play in blank verse, by Messrs. Jocelyn Brandon and F. S. Boas, to be given for the first of a series of afternoon representations on Tuesday next, with a cast including Misses Dorothy Dene, Louise Moodie, and Annie Rose, Messrs. Royce Carleton, Bassett Roe, Crauford, and Beaumont. On the 17th Miss Olga Brandon, supported by Misses Beatrice Lamb and Agnes Thomas, Messrs. Leonard Boyne, Cyril Maude, Waller, and Alfred Bishop, will give at the same theatre, also on an afternoon, 'Corisande,' a four-act play by Mr. Hoyte, an Australian author.

'NUMBER TWO,' a modern comedy, and 'Andromeda,' a poetical tragedy in one act, will be given by Mr. Leonard Outram at the Vaudeville on March 24th and 25th.

'MEADOW SWEET,' a one-act comedieta by 'Terra Cotta,' has been added to the bill at the Vaudeville, and constitutes a lever de rideau at once sparkling and sympathetic. It shows the misbehaviour of a young yokel who, having had a taste of London life, which has only rendered more prominent his inherent baseness and vulgarity, brings to the country home, of which he is ashamed, friends who learn to rate him at his true value, and reject him with merited scorn. This trifle is acted with much spirit, Mr. Cyril Maude and Mr. F. Thorne being especially good. The former artist gave a surprisingly clever rendering of the bumpkin whose affectations are ridiculed, and who in the end loses all his privileges. Mr. Blythe, Mr. Gillmore, Miss Ella Banister, and Miss Hanbury were also in the cast.

ON the occasion of Mr. Alexander's first appearance in 'Dr. Bill' at the Avenue Theatre on Saturday next, a one-act comedieta, entitled 'Miss Cinderella,' will be given for the first time.

THE first of the recitations by Mr. Irving and Miss Terry, of which we have previously spoken as in contemplation, is fixed for the 25th of June at the St. James's Hall.

THE run of 'The Middleman' at the Shaftesbury Theatre is approaching an end, the reason advanced being the contract of the management to produce during its occupation of the house a drama by Mr. Arthur Law.

AT the Grand Theatre on Easter Monday Mr. William Terris will, with Miss Millward, make his first appearance since his return from America. He will play his original character in 'Harbour Lights,' and, at an afternoon representation, Claude Melnotte in 'The Lady of Lyons.'

THE first representation of 'Hamlet' was given at the Globe on Thursday, with Mr. Benson as Hamlet and Mrs. Benson as Ophelia.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—F. H. W.—J. H. M.—R.—E. K.—W. C. B.—G. B. of C.—J. P.—A. W.—W. H. Q.—C. B.—F. H. W.—L. & C.—received.

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

POETRY of the ANTI-JACOBIN, comprising the Celebrated Political and Satirical Poems, Parodies, and Jeux-d'Esprit of Canning, Wellesley, J. H. Frere, Ellis, Gifford, Carlisle, Pitt, and others, with Explanatory Notes, &c. By CHARLES EDMONDS. Entirely New Edition, with additional matter, and 6 Plates by James Gillray. Ordinary Edition, crown 8vo. cloth extra, 7s. 6d.

An Edition de Luxe of 250 copies, for England and America, numbered and signed, printed on hand-made paper, crown 4to. cloth extra, One Guinea nett. Full Prospectus on application.

The Quarterly Review said of the original edition:—"These sparkling gems of wit have stood the test of more than half a century, and still their brilliancy is undimmed; nor, indeed, is their lustre likely to be tarnished by age. Mr. Edmonds, the editor, has acquitted himself ably of his task."

FORCE as an ENTITY. With Stream, Pool, and Wave Forms; being an Engineer's or a Practical Way of Explaining the Facts ascertained by Science, and their Relation to each other. By Lieut.-Colonel W. SEDGWICK, R.E., Deputy Consulting Engineer to the Government of India for Railways; Author of 'Light, the Dominant Force of the Universe,' &c. Crown 8vo. cloth, illustrated, 7s. 6d.

OLIVER CROMWELL, the PRO-

TECTOR. An Appreciation based on Contemporary Evidence. By REGINALD F. D. PALGRAVE, C.B., Author of 'The Chairman's Handbook,' &c. Small demy 8vo. cloth, 10s. 6d.

SOLDIERS THREE. By Rudyard

KIPPLING, Author of 'Plain Tales from the Hills,' 'The Godsby,' &c. 8vo. sewed, 1s.

NEW NOVELS AT ALL THE LIBRARIES.

The NEW PRINCE FORTUNATUS.

By WILLIAM BLACK, Author of 'A Princess of Thule,' 'In Far Lochaber,' 'A Daughter of Heth,' &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo. cloth, 31s. 6d.

"A remarkably easy book to read."—Saturday Review.
"A very pretty book indeed, and will help to pass as pleasant an hour as any novel of the season."—Truth.

KIT and KITTY: a Story of West

Middlesex. By R. D. BLACKMORE, Author of 'Lorna Doone,' 'Clara Vaughan,' 'Springhaven,' 'Cripps the Carrier,' &c. THIRD EDITION. 3 vols. crown 8vo. cloth, 31s. 6d.

"Kit and Kitty" is a manly book, with a sort of fine, open delicacy of sentiment, thoroughly wholesome and pleasing. Few recent novels have maintained so high a standard of excellence throughout."—Athenæum.

New Additions to Low's Standard Novels.

SIX-SHILLING SERIES.

The PENANCE of JOHN LOGAN,

and OTHER STORIES. By WILLIAM BLACK, Author of 'A Princess of Thule,' 'A Daughter of Heth,' &c. Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

AGNES SURRIAGE. By Edwin

LASSETTER BYNNER, Author of 'Damen's Ghost,' 'Penelope's Suitors,' &c. Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

The MAKING of a GREAT

MAGAZINE: being an Inquiry into the Past and the Future of Harper's Magazine. With special illustrations and a partial analysis of the Contents in recent years. Demy 8vo. paper covers, 3d.

Now ready, price One Shilling.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE for March.

Contents.

JOHN RUSKIN: an Essay. ANNE THACKERAY RITCHIE. 6 illustrations. From an Etching by Hubert Herkomer, A.R.A., by permission of the Fine-Art Society London, and Drawings by Harry Kenn, after Photographs by Rutcliffe, London.

THE ARMY of the UNITED STATES. Illustrated. General Wesley Merritt, U.S.A.

THE SHADOW of a DREAM. A Story. Part I. William Dean Howells.

VENETIAN BOATS. Elizabeth Robins Pennell. 10 illustrations.

Drawn by Joseph Pennell.

&c. &c.

London:

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON, SEARLE & RIVINGTON

(LIMITED),

St. Dunstan's House, Fetter-lane, Fleet-street, E.C.

THE
R
THE AN A LADY
NOV
OUR
MR. I
K
P LITTE
SCIE
FIN
B
C
MUS
W DRAM

Corr
lia
L
W
of

At f spon Lieu rema but degr of th main carry impo inter for p prop busin mate betw
char Rutl life o
And restr inter word

In Duke
he sh ment
the those by th men doom Rutl bring other bring Rutl lishin not v diffic his p
"S
the Gratt
Mr. F thoug
ing co
my g
The l
the co preju spirit

SATURDAY, MARCH 15, 1890.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
THE CORRESPONDENCE OF PITT AND THE DUKE OF
RUTLAND	333
THE SOURCE OF 'THE ANCIENT MARINER'	335
AN ARABIC-ENGLISH DICTIONARY	336
LADY ARABELLA STUART	336
NOVELS OF THE WEEK	337
OUR LIBRARY TABLE—LIST OF NEW BOOKS	338-340
MR. RIDER HAGGARD'S ASSAILANTS; THE FAULES OF
Kuβionys ; THOMAS GUY AS A PUBLISHER; UN-PUBLISHED VERSES BY COLERIDGE; THE SPRING
PUBLISHING SEASON; MR. JENNINGS	340-342
LITERARY GOSSIP	342
SCIENCE—SOCIETIES; MEETINGS; GOSSIP	343-344
FINE ARTS—THE TUDOR EXHIBITION; MINOR EXHIBITIONS; BRONZE SHIELDS; SALES; NOTES FROM
CYPRUS; GOSSIP	345-347
MUSIC—THE WEEK; GOSSIP; CONCERTS, &c., NEXT
WEEK	348-349
DRAMA—THE WEEK; LIBRARY TABLE; GOSSIP	349

LITERATURE

Correspondence between the Right Hon. William Pitt and Charles, Duke of Rutland, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, 1781-1787. With Introductory Note by John, Duke of Rutland. (Blackwood & Sons.)

At first sight it is surprising that the correspondence between Pitt and his first Lord Lieutenant should have been suffered to remain unpublished for more than a century; but this apparent oversight is in a great degree explained by the fact that the years of the Duke of Rutland's viceroyalty were mainly occupied in an abortive attempt to carry a commercial measure of very great importance at the time, but of ephemeral interest, and in the discussion of a scheme for parliamentary reform which was never proposed. The letters, too, are entirely business letters; and though they are animated by the cordial relations that existed between the writers, they reveal little of the character or disposition of either Pitt or Rutland, and give no insight into the social life of the time or the condition of Ireland. And even their business references are restricted: on many topics of the utmost interest they are silent, passing without a word all matters that concerned Ireland only.

In a brief introductory note the present Duke of Rutland promises the reader that he shall find in these pages a heavy indictment against Grattan's Parliament; but in the nature of things it is inevitable that those who hope to settle the Irish Question by the correspondence of two Tory statesmen who wrote a century ago should be doomed to disappointment; and, moreover, Rutland never brought, nor attempted to bring, against the patriot party charges other than those which every public man brings against his opponents. The Duke of Rutland has done well and wisely in publishing a correspondence of very genuine, if not very thrilling historic interest, but it is difficult to understand to what he refers in his preface when he writes:—

"So much has been said and written during the discussions on Home Rule in praise of Grattan's Parliament, and in condemnation of Mr. Pitt's conduct in abolishing it, that I have thought it right to give to the public the following correspondence between that statesman and my grandfather, the fourth Duke of Rutland. The letters of the latter throw a vivid light on the conduct of the Irish Parliament, and on the prejudicial effect the factious and self-seeking spirit of its members had on the fortunes of the country. Mr. Montgomery Martin, indeed, nearly half a century ago, called attention to some of the more salient proofs of that misconduct; but his work is now not very accessible, and the story of Grattan's Parliament during these important years is best told in the confidential correspondence between the Prime Minister and the Lord Lieutenant."

This is as if one were to say that the story of Mr. Balfour's administration is best told in the confidential correspondence of Mr. Parnell and Mr. Timothy Harrington, and from the point of view of interest, if not of calm impartiality, we admit that a good deal is to be expected; but disappointment awaits us. There are in all only a dozen of the Viceroy's letters, and more than half of these deal with subjects quite disconnected from the doings of the Irish Parliament—the hobble that Rutland had got himself into on the subject of the Prince of Wales's establishment, the Whitby interest, and patronage—always patronage. Patronage is the subject to which both Premier and Viceroy are irresistibly attracted. "You have a Parliament more manageable than ours," writes Pitt; and Rutland recommends a person for a pension of 300*l.* yearly on the sole plea that "a decayed gentleman, and particularly if a member of Parliament [the italics are his own], is surely a proper object for such a provision."

Pensions, peerages, steps in the peerage, governorships, colonelcies were showered around. Posts and offices of all kinds rewarded those who were fortunate enough or mercenary enough to vote with the Government. The correspondence practically commences at the time of Rutland's appointment, early in 1784, and ceases in September, 1787, a month before his death; and in this brief period, and in a correspondence of less than two hundred pages, we find the claims of the following persons not merely alluded to, but discussed, pushed, pitted one against the other:—Fitzherbert, Shelburne, Molloy, Fawcett, Mr. Miles, Lord Mornington, Lord Camden, Lord Temple, Mr. Gardiner, Robert Stewart (Castlereagh), Sir C. Maude, Mr. O'Callaghan, Mr. Francis, Mr. Yorke, Lord Mulgrave, Lord Glerawley, Lord Longford, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Fitzgibbon, Mr. Pole, the Provost, Mr. Foster, Mr. Beresford, Lord Shannon, Lord Tyrone, Lord Clifden, Lord Hillsborough, Lord Antrim, Lord Drogheda, Dr. Ekins, Lord Bellamont, Sir Sampson Gideon, "Sir Lucius," Lord Luttrell, "A Jew of my own name (Jack Manners)," Major Hobart, Major Dalrymple, General Cunningham, Mr. Eden, Mr. Orde, Pulteney, George Sutton, and others. The atmosphere of self-interest, place-hunting, bribery, and corruption hangs over the whole correspondence; and its unconscious cynicism, its frank acceptance of the theory that an appeal to the pocket is invariably successful, is truly remarkable when we bear in mind that Pitt was only just over twenty and Rutland still under thirty when they took office. Rutland never betrays any sign of young ardour, Pitt only three or four times, and, indeed, the correspondence, both in what it tells and in what it omits, is of extraordinary maturity and discretion.

Whatever these young gentlemen may have been in private life, they were staid and serious-minded statesmen in even their most confidential correspondence. From the first page to the last there is no levity and as little chivalry, no gossip, and no mention of any subject of which the writer had cause to be ashamed. Their silence is as eloquent as their words. A most surprising instance of this discretion is that in all the pages filled with the question of patronage there is not on either side a single reference to the vexed question of the Irish Pension List, or to that agitation against its scandalous increase which was at this time the chief weapon in the hands of the opposition. Viceroy and Prime Minister alike ignore this ugly sore in their administration; they trade upon the avarice of human nature without shame and without scorn—accepting it as quietly as we all accept our pollution of the air we breathe. Neither one nor other even refers to this shady side of patronage, and though its abuse was the topic of the day, their correspondence contains no hint that during Rutland's administration the Irish Pension List reached the enormous total of 94,000*l.*—four thousand pounds greater than that of England—and that during the final year of his viceroyalty alone it was augmented by 8,750*l.* In the Dublin Parliament this was a burning question, but it is ignored in Rutland's correspondence. Neither are the tithe oppression and the exaction of hearth-money mentioned until the summer of '86, when, however, the duke writes to Orde, in a letter that shows good feeling throughout, hoping that "the Legislature will in the next session take the grievances of the poor into their consideration, and, if possible, give them redress. The two great points which press are the tithes and the hearth-money."

Pitt too, in a curiously characteristic letter, expresses a wish to redress these wrongs, "being persuaded that Government... can never make its stand effectually till it gets upon right ground."

But in the history of the international relations of England and Ireland these were minor matters. The great difficulty of ministers, and the chief subject of this correspondence, was the regulation of the trade and commerce of the two countries, and only second to this was the pressing question of parliamentary reform. Both Pitt and Rutland had already a project of union in view (a state of mind very natural when we remember that at the time of Rutland's appointment the recognition of American independence was but a few months old), and both appear to have feared that with an independent Parliament Ireland would not long continue a part of the empire; indeed, though a measure for union is but distantly alluded to in this correspondence, there can be no doubt that it was the aim of both Pitt and Rutland, and that wherever differences of policy occurred these were prompted by the desire to render that measure more practicable either through the popularity of England or the subserviency of the Irish Parliament. But Ireland was the sole policy and interest of the Viceroy, while she had but a share of the thoughts of the Prime Minister; and thus we find that in the matter of the commercial treaty Pitt was desirous of getting the best terms possible for England, while Rutland hoped "that the learned in trade may be able to strike out such regulations as may appease and conciliate the spirit of dissatisfaction and discontent which has obtained in this country.For my part [he continues], I pretend not to be competent to enter into any detail of the kind; but of this I can judge, that the circumstances and claims of Ireland are matters which at least require serious investigation."

The whole of this letter, written six months after Rutland's appointment, is so interesting that we regret that its length prevents us from giving it in extenso, for it sets before us most clearly the difficulties that the Viceroy had to face. It was an age of change and revolution, and Rutland's task of steering between English public opinion and the demands of the Irish volunteers was no easy one. We must at least give his views on parliamentary reform:—

"The question of reform, should it be carried in England, would tend greatly to increase our difficulties, and I do not see how it will be evaded. In England it is a difficult question, but in this country it is difficult and dangerous to the last degree. The views of the Catholics render it extremely hazardous; and though Lord Charlemont and Mr. Flood seem to exclude them from their ideas of reform, yet in some late meetings, and in one particularly held lately in this city, the point entirely ran on their admission to vote, which was carried with a single negative. Your proposition of a certain proportionable addition of county members would be the least exceptionable, and might not perhaps materially interfere with the system of Parliament in this country, which though it must be confessed it does not bear the smallest resemblance to representation, I do not see how quiet and good government could exist under any more popular mode."

Pitt, however, is still eager for reform. "Parliamentary reform," he writes, "I am still sure, after answering all you have stated, must sooner or later be carried in both countries"; and again he expresses a hope that he may be able "to give real efficacy and popularity to Government by acceding (if such a line can be found) to a prudent and temperate reform of Parliament which may guard against or gradually cure real defects and mischiefs, may show a sufficient regard to the interests and even prejudices of individuals who are concerned, and may unite the Protestant interest in excluding the Catholics from any share in the representation or the government of the country."

Later on the same day Pitt writes again in a more urgent and, for him, singularly youthful strain:—

"Could there be any way of your confidentially sounding Lord Charlemont, without any danger from the consequences?.....I am aware you may have seen local difficulties which may discourage you in this whole subject of reform.....but let me beseech you to recollect that both your character and mine for consistency are at stake.....and to recollect also, that however it is our duty to oppose the most determined spirit and firmness to ill-grounded clamour or factious pretensions, it is a duty equally indispensable to take care not to struggle but in a right cause."

Unhappily Rutland's answer is not given; but apparently this, the most ardent of all Pitt's share of the correspondence, did not shake his convictions, for some months later Pitt again writes: "Whatever is to be wished (on which, notwithstanding numerous difficulties, I myself have no doubt), it is, I believe, at least certain, that if any reform takes place here, the tide will be too strong to be withstood in Ireland." But the measure, which might have spared so much misery to Ireland and shame to England, was never passed, and Pitt had no better fortune with his Act for the regulation of commerce—a masterly solution of one of the most difficult problems of his time. Unlike his grandfather, the present Duke of Rutland lays all the blame of the failure of this scheme upon the "misconduct" and "factious and self-seeking" spirit of the Irish Parliament; but the Coalition Party in England, and Fox in particular, must share at least equally with Ireland the responsibility of the failure of Pitt's cherished scheme, which forms the staple subject of this correspondence.

Now that commercial restraints and protective duties have ceased to exist as between England and Ireland, the details of such a measure are necessarily uninteresting, and Pitt's long and extremely thoughtful letters throw no new light upon its secret history. Briefly stated, the facts of the case are these. Chief Secretary Orde, acting under Pitt's inspiration, introduced the basis of a commercial treaty between the two kingdoms into the Irish Parliament in February, 1785. The Bill, which was drafted in the form of eleven resolutions, ordered the admission of foreign articles through Ireland to England, or vice versa, as if directly imported; the abolition of prohibitions between the two countries and the equalization of duties, the regulation of internal duties in due proportion, and the abolition of bounties on goods intended for either country except food stuffs. The last and eleventh proposition provided that whenever the hereditary revenue of Ireland (during peace) produced more than the sum of 64,000*l.*, the surplus should be devoted to the support of the Imperial navy.

Rutland was extremely apprehensive lest this clause should wreck the Bill, which, from its absence of protective duties, was only moderately popular in Ireland; but, notwithstanding adverse petitions from the Chamber of Commerce, it passed the Irish Parliament, and all would have gone well had not Fox, North, and others raised an agitation in England against it for purely party purposes. Pitt was compelled to make numerous alterations, three of them of a very fundamental character. It was stipulated that all trade or navigation laws passed by the English Parliament should ipso facto be enacted by the Irish; that none save colonial produce should be transhipped through Ireland into Great Britain (a proviso that would have put an end to the carrying trade with America); and that Ireland should be debarred from dealing directly with any country whatsoever beyond the Cape of Good Hope and the Straits of Magellan so long as the British Parliament protected the monopoly of the East India Company dealing through the port of London.

The objections of Fox were by no means met by the alterations. "I will not barter English commerce for Irish slavery," he exclaimed; and the changes were so unpopular in Ireland that Rutland found his majority reduced to one-half. Commercially, the restraints would have been inimical to the growing industry of Ireland, and they were bitterly resented as an attempt to undermine the newly-acquired liberty of that kingdom. Rutland at once perceived the impossibility of carrying such a Bill, and, when writing to congratulate Pitt on his majority in the English Parliament, added:

"But I must fairly tell you that the alterations which (in compliance, I suppose, with the prejudices of England) you have found it expedient to make from the original form of the adjustment, will render it very unpalatable to Ireland.....I have not yet considered the different alterations.....But on one point.....I mean that which relates to the perpetuity of the laws for the collection of the revenue, I will not attempt to deceive you, but at once pronounce it impossible to be carried. Be assured Mr. Orde would enter the house with scarce a man to support him on such a question; and when you are convinced of its failure you will scarcely judge it wise to persist in an odious measure.....without the smallest probability of success."

Pitt, however, was still sanguine as to the "manageable" nature of the Irish Parliament, and wrote that the amendment regarding the revenue collection appeared to him "absolutely indispensable," and "essential to the success of this measure." Rutland, thus pushed, sought an interview with Grattan, "but found him impracticable in a degree scarcely credible," and, after detailing a number of defections from the Government party, implored Pitt "to produce such a system as it will be lunacy in Ireland to refuse."

But in reply Pitt protests his inability to "go an inch further," and after the introduction of the Bill Rutland has to report a further list of defections:—

"We had many truants.....Mr. Daly, very unlike himself.....Mr. Cuffe, though written to, and who is at the head of the Barrack Board, never appeared. The Ponsonbys.....declared they could not support beyond the printing. Their connexion is very large, and would have turned the poise of the business."

Situated thus, the Government was compelled to let the measure drop; but from the Viceroy's own letters we gather that the opposition was by no means of the purely factious nature the Duke of Rutland would have us suppose. The grievance was a real one, and in the light thrown by subsequent events, and by the private correspondence between the Prime Minister and the Lord Lieutenant, Flood's apprehension lest the four propositions added in the Parliament of Great Britain should prove "destructive of the liberties and constitution of Ireland" appears well founded. But the fate of his favourite measure disgusted Pitt with Ireland; and although this correspondence continued for more than two years after this fiasco, he never recovered from his disappointment sufficiently to bring forward a scheme of anything like the same importance, and it is probable that this experience of the difficulty of divided rule confirmed his thoughts in the direction of a union.

Pitt's letters form the staple part of the volume, although, either from his greater leisure or more personal acquaintance with Irish affairs, those of the Duke of Rutland are of at least equal interest, and it is to be regretted that while the whole of Pitt's correspondence has been published, that of the Viceroy is represented merely by a selection.

The Source of 'The Ancient Mariner.' By Ivor James. (Cardiff, Owen.)

NOTHING could well be more unpractical than the way men calling themselves "practical" have of neglecting the poets. Even men of science, as a rule, fail to recognize that it is the poet lurking in them that makes all the great discoveries—that crucibles and lenses are vanities unless when directed by the imagination. For nearly a century it has been known to all men, save only the members of the geographical societies, that the Ancient Mariner demonstrated the practicability of the passage from Behring's Straits to the Atlantic by sailing through it at great speed, and so presumably meeting with no hindrance. Yet here is Capt. Nansen at this time of day ignoring the record, possibly because he never heard of it, but more probably because it was written by a poet, demonstrating (on paper) that the passage is practicable, and determined to undertake it with no better guide than an empty pair of oilskin breeches drifted from the wreck of the Jeannette to the south-west coast of Greenland!

Coleridge left his Mariner anonymous, and the secret might have been kept for ever had not Mr. Ivor James met with his namesake's well-known account* of his voyage, and convinced himself of the identity of the two mariners, notwithstanding the poet's cunning reversal of routes, and importation of albatrosses, tropical seas, and angelic powers, all foreign to the experiences of the original. It is hardly probable that Mr. James will carry any of his readers within measurable distance of his conclusion, but it must be allowed that he has established the extreme probability of Coleridge having read Capt. James's narrative, and that a little of the local colour of the great poem is reflected from it. Mr. James's assumption that Coleridge had read the actual copy now in the Bristol Free Library would not have been adopted had he seen the book, but that is a trifle on which he has expended a needless amount of ingenuity. Capt. James's voyage was a Bristol adventure, and in one form or another the account of it must have been easily accessible to Coleridge in 1794–1798. It is a most remarkable narrative, the work of a man possessed of great, though untrained literary faculty, whose incidental verses are distinctly poetry, and presented in a manner perhaps only less convincingly veracious than 'Robinson Crusoe.' The Hakluyt Society is at present reprinting it, but it is to be hoped that it may be revived in a more popular form. If Coleridge read the book he must inevitably have been fascinated, and there are some correspondent details in narrative and poem which render this extremely probable:—

And now there came both mist and snow,
And it grew wondrous cold:
And ice, mast-high, came floating by,
As green as emerald.

The ice was here, the ice was there,
The ice was all around:

It crack'd and growl'd, and roar'd and howl'd,
Like noises in a swound.

The ice did split with a thunder-fit;
The helmsman steer'd us through.

So sang the Ancient Mariner; and thus reports Capt. James: "All day and all night, it snow'd hard" (ed. 1633, p. 11); "The nights are very cold; so that our rigging freezes" (p. 15); "It proved very thicke foule weather, and the next day, by two a Clocke in the morning, we found ourselves incompass'd about with Ice" (p. 6); "We had Ice not farre off about us, and some pieces as high as our Top-mast-head" (p. 7); "The seventeenth.....we heard.....the rutt against a banke of Ice that lay on the Shoare. It made a hollow and hideous noyse, like an over-fall of water, which made us to reason amongst our selves concerning it, for we were not able to see about us, it being darke night and foggie" (p. 8); "The Ice.....crackt all over the Bay, with a fearfull noyse" (p. 77); "These great pieces that came a grounde began to breake with a most terrible thundering noyse" (p. 12); "This morning.....we unfastened our Ship, and came to saile, steering betwixt great pieces of Ice that were a grounde in 40 fad., and twice as high as our Top-mast-head" (p. 14).

There are many similar expressions, but here, perhaps, are more than enough to show that the correspondences are not accidental, especially as most of the contemporary Arctic explorers measured their icebergs by fathoms and not by their masts. Per contra, while Coleridge's mariner saw his ice "green as emerald," Capt. James saw it blue—"some of the sharpe blue corners [of the great pieces of ice] did reach quite under us" (p. 6).

Mr. James's endeavours to establish the substantial identity in character of the two mariners are occasionally ingenious, but, generally speaking, too fanciful and shadowy to invite serious discussion; but, oddly enough, the most significant passage in the 'Voyage' has been overlooked by him:—

"What hath been long agoe fabled by some Portingales, that should have comne this way out of the South Sea: the meere shadowes of whose mistaken Relations have comne to us: I leave to be confuted by their owne vanitie. These hopes have stirred up, from time to time, the more active spirits of this our Kingdome, to research that meereley imaginary passage. For mine owne part, I give no credit to them at all; and as little to the vicious, and abusive wits of later Portingals and Spaniards: who never speake of any difficulties: as shoalde water, Ice, nor sight of land: but as if they had been brought home in a dreame or engine."—P. 107.

The last clause is not italicized by Capt. James, but it would not escape the eye of Coleridge, and it may well have inspired "Part VI." of 'The Ancient Mariner,' afterwards elucidated in the gloss: "The Mariner hath been cast into a trance: for the angelic power causeth the vessel to drive northward faster than human life could endure."

The flames of Coleridge's imagination were at all times fed largely by omnivorous reading as well as by his keen observation of his surroundings, and in such a poem as 'The Ancient Mariner' it is but natural that the evidence should have been more easily traceable than in most of his compositions. Mr. James is unquestionably right in giving much weight to Wordsworth's statement as to the inception and composition of the poem, but he is probably quite wrong in supposing that Wordsworth contributed anything beyond a few characteristic incidental details—as far wrong as in taking seriously certain statements made by De Quincey on the subject. It is quite certain that the albatross came from Shelvocke; we have Wordsworth's own statement that he suggested the supernatural navigation of the ship, and that the skeleton-ship was a dream of Cruickshank's. Add the technical hints from Capt. James's 'Voyage,' and what does it all amount to? Nothing more than the carbon which goes to produce a diamond. The incident of the angelic navigation of the ship is more likely to have been suggested by the fourth-century legend in Bishop Paulinus's Epistle, translated in the Gentleman's Magazine for October, 1853, and cited in Brandl's 'Life of Coleridge'; and if the idea were really furnished by Wordsworth he may have got it from Paulinus, though such literature lay much more in the way of Coleridge's reading than of his own. It is certain that Wordsworth did not, for at least a long time, think very highly of 'The Ancient Mariner.' He did not commit himself so grievously as did Southey, who, both in a review and in private letters, called it "a very Dutche attempt at sublimity" (for which misdeemeanour he was pulled up sharply by Lamb); but Wordsworth tried to convince himself and his friends that 'The Ancient Mariner' was mainly responsible for the ill success of the volume, and blamed, not the critics, but the poem, for this result. This flattering view no doubt reached the ears of Coleridge directly or indirectly, and caused him to beg that the offending member might be cut off; for when the second edition appeared in 1800 Wordsworth inserted a note quite sublime in its complacent uncensiousness that he had misinterpreted Coleridge's meaning, and that he was patronizing and apologizing for a poem which was worth all the rest of the volume put together, saving only, perhaps, his own lines on revisiting the Wye. Patient merit may learn in time to take calmly the spurs of the unworthy, but it is harder to bear the wounds received in the house of a friend, and it says much for the good nature of Coleridge that no rupture followed. It is to Wordsworth's credit both as a friend and as a critic that this literary curiosity was never reprinted; and as the original is rare, and has not attracted the notice of any of Wordsworth's or of Coleridge's editors, it may be given here:—

"Note to the Ancient Mariner.—I cannot refuse myself the gratification of informing such Readers as may have been pleased with this Poem, or with any part of it, that they owe their pleasure in some sort to me; as the Author was himself very desirous that it should be suppressed. This wish had arisen from a consciousness of the defects of the Poem, and from a knowledge that many persons had been much displeased with it. The Poem of my Friend has indeed great defects; first, that the principal person has no distinct character, either in his profession of Mariner, or as a human being who having been long under the controul of supernatural impressions might be supposed himself to partake of something supernatural; secondly, that he does not act, but is continually acted upon: thirdly, that the events having no necessary connection do not produce each other; and lastly, that the imagery is somewhat too laboriously accumulated. Yet the Poem contains many delicate touches of passion, and indeed the passion is everywhere true to nature; a great number of the stanzas present beautiful images, and are expressed with unusual felicity of language; and the versification, tho' the metre is itself unfit for long poems, is harmonious and artfully varied, exhibiting the utmost powers of that metre, and every variety of which it is capable. It therefore appeared to me that these several merits (the first of which, namely, that of the passion, is of the highest kind) gave to the Poem a value which is not often possessed by better Poems. On this account I requested of my Friend to permit me to republish it."

* 'The Strange and Dangerous Voyage of Captaine Thomas James, in his Intended Discovery of the Northwest Passage into the South Sea.' London, 1633. Reprinted 1740, and included in Churchill's and in Harris's collections of voyages. As suggested by Mr. J. Taylor in his letter (Athen. No. 3254) Mr. James may have been attracted to the subject by reading Mr. J. F. Nicholls's 'Bristol Biographies,' No. II.—Captain Thomas James and George Thomas, Bristol, June, 1870.

To revert to Mr. James, he may possibly remain unconvinced that he is amenable to the charge of being wise above that which is written, but there are a few faults which he will discover for himself when revising his interesting little pamphlet for a second edition. The most important, perhaps, is a misreading of the text of Capt. James. On the passage home he says:—

"Amongst these several and hourly dangers, I overheard the men murmur; and say that they were happy I had buried; and that if they had a thousand pounds they would give it, so they lay fairly by them; for we (say they) are destined to starve upon a piece of Ice. I was faine to endure all this with patience: and to comfort them up againe, when I had them in a better humour."

Mr. James paraphrases this passage thus mistakenly:—

"The captain heard from among the men the whispered wish that he had been buried before he had induced them to tempt Fate, which seemed now, they said, to have destined them all to starve on a piece of ice."

The same kind of inaccuracy, though happily not to the same degree, attends Mr. James in a large number of his numerous quotations, and many of his references are inadequately given. But the booklet is worth reading by lovers of 'The Ancient Mariner,' and who is not?

An Arabic-English Dictionary on a New System. By H. Anthony Salmoné. 2 vols. (Trübner & Co.)

THERE can be no doubt of Prof. Salmoné's object in the preparation of his dictionary, and many scholars will wish him success in the course he has adopted. We have here no attempt to assist the authors of modern vocabularies and handbooks in supplying, by virtue of a certain number of lessons, so much of bare "colloquial" knowledge as will suffice for the passing needs of residents or travellers in a Semitic country, who remain as ignorant of the etymological character of the words supplied as are the drivers, donkey-boys, or other natives with whom they converse. Nor are means offered to the student for attainment of his goal by any but a straight and lawful road. The author, it is true, has endeavoured to simplify the study of Arabic, but it is of classical or literary Arabic, and in pursuit of his aim he naturally ignores the slipshod method of instruction which rests contented with a parrot-like acquirement of sounds. In short, his theme is a noble Semitic language, not the mere jargon of the street and bazaar, whether in Cairo or any other centre of Arab town life.

The great care bestowed upon the production of the work, the minute research of which it is the outcome, the time occupied and labour expended in putting its several parts together—all these self-evident truths, though they may not disarm criticism in estimating practical results, cannot fail to impress the critic favourably on a first inspection of Mr. Salmoné's pages. In respect of outer form, moreover, there can be no diversity of opinion on the merits of the dictionary. It is portable and exceptionally well "got-up." The type, Arabic and English—especially the first—is excellent; and as for the small accompanying volume for English and Arabic, nothing could be more compact or convenient. The whole publication is highly creditable to the printer, M. Drugulin, already well known for his successes in Oriental typography.

Whether the system so elaborately worked out by the inventor is one which will "facilitate the study to the beginner," as confidently inferred in the preface, yet remains to be proved. Ingenious and practical as it is, it presupposes a certain amount of knowledge of the subject which is not always attained without long and assiduous apprenticeship. To the Arabist the bearings of the question will at a glance be apparent. For the non-Arabist, it may suffice to explain or recall the fact that in the structure of the Arabic language words must be regarded as the expression or development of ideas of which the origin—for instance, love, fear, grief, &c.—is a root of three letters; that certain specified letters, called servile, are set apart to be added to the radicals in such a manner as to expand or modify the original meaning; but that the application of these, as regards number, position, and punctuation, so as to form new and intelligible words in themselves, is regulated with mathematical precision by laws and precedents of the most binding nature. Thus the triliteral root itself is the first conjugation, and each of the twelve or fourteen conjugations which follow is an expansion or modification of the first. One form is that of intensity, one of desire, one of reciprocity; but study and practice are imperative for due comprehension of details. In English the changes might be represented by adverbs or expletives; or love might become adoration, craving, mutual affection, and so on. Now, as the dictionary under notice is essentially one of roots, no student can avail himself of it, in the ordinary course of reading, who is not able to divest the word, of which he seeks the interpretation, of any servile letters it may chance to possess. This done, he must trace it out from the root to its own particular form by means of a table which, though exceedingly ingenious and simple enough when understood, may well perplex the "beginner" of scientific Arabic, however fluent he may be in his acquired colloquial. But Mr. Salmoné doubtless means that his beginner will be driven—or should be driven—to relieve himself of perplexity by mastering those first principles of grammar which are as necessary to the serious student as a knowledge of anatomy is to the surgeon. We read in the preface:—

"An alphabetical Arabic Dictionary, or anything like a successful attempt at it, is, as every one who is in the least acquainted with the language knows, an impossibility. For even in the so-called alphabetical Dictionaries the beginner has to look for many words under their respective roots, although they may be quite as perplexing as others which are given in alphabetical order—and, indeed, in many instances they are far more so. Moreover, as it is quite impossible to give all the persons of all the tenses of the verb, this system can never be consistent with itself. Hence, the assistance given to the student is more apparent than real."

There is much force in the argument put forward, for no knowledge of the principles which rule the formation of Arabic derivatives can be considered thorough if imparted only by the unmethodized and unexplained illustrations of an "alphabetical" dictionary. But Freytag and his Arab authorities have done something also in a right direction, and it is to be observed that Mr. Salmoné acknowledges the assistance he has received from Lane and Butros Bustany. Dr. Steingass, in the introduction to his comparatively recent work, admitted the necessity of "finding a golden mean between a merely alphabetical arrangement and a strictly etymological disposition under roots," the latter of which might, he feared, embarrass the reader. Richardson's is practically a dictionary of Arabic in its relation to Persian, and consequently, in spite of a copious vocabulary, its uses, to a student of Arabic only, are somewhat restricted. But with all its defects and shortcomings, it is only fair to state that in the absence of more systematic works, the huge old quarto, known first as Richardson's and afterwards as Johnson's Persian and Arabic Dictionary, has been in its way very serviceable to learners of the latter as well as of the former language.

The author of this new dictionary must have experienced some difficulty in reducing within reasonable limits the number of interpretations forthcoming, on good authority, for his respective roots. He explains the first meaning shown to be "invariably the most important one, and the one that generally runs throughout the other conjugations and the various forms of the same." M. Renan has well said: "On éprouve une sorte de vertige à la vue de ces sens divers et presque contradictoires, qui, dans les dictionnaires arabes, se présentent sous chaque mot"; and cites in a foot-note the instance of a native lexicographer who asserted that he had found in his language no fewer than twelve million three hundred thousand and odd words! Under the head abû, father, Freytag supplies more than two hundred and twenty-five examples in which the use of this word as a prefix implies a special idiomatic signification. Mr. Salmoné gives seven only, all of which are in Freytag, though one of them, abu jâbir, bread, has to be looked for under a separate letter. By the way, why does he not transliterate his word at the close of p. xvii, Explanatory Notes, "Muslim" instead of "Mussulman"?

Life of the Lady Arabella Stuart. By E. T. Bradley. 2 vols. (Bentley & Son.)

MISS BRADLEY has spared no pains in producing a readable biography of the most unfortunate of all the ladies belonging to the house of Stuart. She has had access to manuscript letters and papers denied to previous writers, and it seems doubtful, although Miss Bradley is sanguine on the point, whether any further light will be shed hereafter on the mysteries of the Lady Arabella's career. All the advantages which good type, paper, and binding bestow on books, Miss Bradley's two volumes possess in full measure. The work is embellished by two neatly executed portraits, and an interesting facsimile of an autograph letter. Miss Bradley has appended to the memoir an imposing collection of pieces justificatives and an exhaustive list of portraits, which must give her book a permanent place in every historical library.

Lady Arabella died at the age of forty. To summarize her career in a sentence, we may say that the accident of birth forced her into an embarrassing public position, which her personal character and training disabled her from filling satisfactorily. As third cousin to Queen Elizabeth and first cousin of James I. of England, she was so closely connected with the succession to the English throne that it was impossible to allow her all the liberty of action congenial to her self-willed and exuberant temperament. Very little wisdom was shown in the policy pursued towards her by her kindred, and the failure of her life is largely due to their misfortunes and mistakes. Her youthful father, Charles Stuart, Earl of Lenox (Darnley's brother), died before she was two years old. She lost her mother, a sister of the first Earl of Devonshire, before she was seven. Her maternal grandmother was her guardian for the greater part of her life. This lady was singularly ill-fitted for the office. She was the far-famed heiress—known in her youth as "Bess of Hardwick"—who married four times, her second husband being Sir William, the founder of the Cavendish family, and her last husband being George Talbot, sixth Earl of Shrewsbury. Imperious by nature, she ruled her numerous children and step-children with an unsympathetic rigour which led to perpetual wrangling in her household. It was in that uneasy environment that Arabella was brought up. She enjoyed all the advantages of a good literary education, but she and her grandmother were by nature antipathetic, and the girl was in consequence subjected to irritating restraints, which developed the worst traits in her character. Scheming politicians sought to turn her kinship with the sovereign to their own ends, and her name in the time of Elizabeth was offensively paraded as that of the rightful successor to the throne. The queen never favoured her claims. Influential suitors were suggested for her hand, but their suits obtained no official recognition. Dynastic considerations led Elizabeth to encourage the old countess in treating Arabella as a child after she had reached woman's estate. That policy led to a tragic result. When twenty-seven years old the Lady Arabella was, for the first time, suspected of having a lover. Elizabeth's reign was nearing its close, but the queen had life enough left to punish with characteristic severity the indiscretions alleged against a member of her family, who was regarded by some of her subjects as her possible successor. Miss Bradley has dwelt in detail on the Lady Arabella's sorrows while Elizabeth lay dying, and has given more information about the episode than was accessible before; but the name of Arabella's lover is nowhere mentioned. There seems, however, good reason for accepting (with Miss Bradley) the popular rumour that in 1602 Arabella was, or pretended to be, infatuated with William Seymour, then a boy of fourteen. In other words, the harsh restraints imposed on Arabella had at length produced a condition of mind bordering on hysteria. Happily Arabella recovered from her aberration, and under James I. she secured a position of independence hitherto denied her. Her kinship with the new king continued to make her the object of revolutionary plots, but she was so conspicuously innocent of political ambition that she never personally incurred James's suspicion. Possessed of an income of her own, she indulged an extravagant taste for dress, ran into debt, and shared with Queen Anne the honours of the masques performed at court. But the effects of her early training were ineradicable. Her intimacy with Seymour recommenced in 1609, when she was thirty-four and he twenty-one, and it ended in a secret marriage. James I. was as indignant as Queen Elizabeth could have been at this disregard of the royal authority in disposing of his kindred in marriage. Arabella's imprisonment and her adventurous attempt at escape followed, and they were succeeded by her madness and death.

It is this romantic story that Miss Bradley has succeeded in telling with praiseworthy clearness and sympathy. There is no element of greatness in Arabella's character or career. Politically her life presents few points of interest. But its domestic pathos appeals to all. Arabella's gossipy letters, written to her kinsfolk from James's court, possess a charming simplicity, and suggest how happy a life she might have led had she been born to lower estate.

We trust Miss Bradley's biography may reach a second edition. In that case she might supply an additional note or two on Arabella's relations with the literary men of the day. A sonnet to Arabella appears in the early issues of Chapman's translation of Homer, and it might be worth quoting. We should also like to know more of a play on the subject of Arabella's tragic fate, which the Deputy-Keeper of the Records told us a year or two ago was noticed in the despatches of the Venetian ambassador transcribed by Rawdon Brown. Miss Bradley's book is laudably free from misprints or errors. It is, however, hardly fair to describe William Fowler, Queen Anne's secretary, as "a ridiculous personage, at once simpleton and buffoon," without mention of his poems which are preserved in the library of the University of Edinburgh, and were presented by Drummond of Hawthornden, Fowler's brother-in-law. The leading conspirator in the "Bye Plot" was not Lord Brooke, but simply George Brooke, younger son of the seventh Lord Cobham. It is not quite accurate to describe "Clarenceux the herald" as attending the funeral of the Countess Dowager of Lenox. The official intended was Clarenceux king-of-arms. But these are trifles, and their triviality is a testimony to Miss Bradley's careful accuracy.

NOVELS OF THE WEEK.

- By Woman's Favour.* By H. Erroll. 3 vols. (Bentley & Son.)
William Orleigh. By Esmé Hope. 2 vols. (Remington & Co.)
Old Crusty's Niece. By J. Jackson Wray and T. Jackson Wray. (Nisbet & Co.)
Mrs. Danby Kaufman of Bayswater. By Mrs. Mark Herbert. (Digby & Long.)
Craythorne: a Waif. By W. S. Tratman. (Roper & Drowley.)

THE ease and lightness, not to say slightness of touch, with which 'By Woman's Favour' is written, leave a critic with the impression that Mr. Erroll could do more with his material were he so inclined. The effects are produced without elaboration and in a very few words. The best is the sordid yet fairly respectable London lodging-house "run" by a third-rate music-hall manager, his poor little French wife, and their daughter Lucy. Lucy Mellon, the commonplace heroine of humble life, is perhaps the most lifelike and typical of the triplet of women who, in different ways, forward the fortunes of Mr. George Collins (poet), who, with an eye to worldly advantage, deserts his home in the North and appears in London. His sudden and surprising successes are, however, more the result of man's than woman's favour, at first at least.

'William Orleigh' does not only exist to bore the reader; the destruction of Robert Elsmere's ghost is also a cause of its being. Nor is the author's task destructive only; she kindly undertakes to set poor old Christianity on its legs again, and to prove a vast deal, in the theological line chiefly, though there is really no burning question of the day she does not, in some measure, "tackle." One thing she preves with inexpressible dreariness, and that is that the effect of 'Robert Elsmere' is not yet "worked out" in fiction. Such a fuss as is made by William and his friends about their religious convictions or the lack of them never was heard. No one meets friend or neighbour without "a little conversation on graver topics" immediately ensuing; especially strong are they on the "testimony" question; or else some one brings his own particular theological views to bear on a weaker brother, "who," we are told, "soon became completely exhausted." As to William himself, he is simply "collecting evidence" all the time, generally with, but sometimes without, his note-book, and always in a cold-blooded and officious manner. He keeps a diary, too, from which extracts are freely given. "Having learnt the value of the Socratic Dialogue," he from the first holds his own with the gloomy atheists and fairly cheerful agnostics who surround him. He is not always an unmixed joy to his relatives and friends, however. In a conversation with him somebody was once considerably nettled, and handed him an album of Italian views to draw him off. But with subtlety and guile William revenged himself later on by proposing a game of bagatelle just as his opponent was scoring a point in an argument. A certain Abbé, called Monsieur Le Abbé, without replying to his remarks, "looked pityingly at him for about five minutes." But this did not daunt nor distract him from his fell designs on the peace of mind of the poor Abbé and other people.

To Orleigh senior (theist and socialist combined) he grew into a species of moral Frankenstein. The father on one occasion "haughtily" bade him "to let him be," and even bound him over for six months to keep the peace, so weary was he of William and the Socratic method. Even more depressing than William's sprightly priggishness is the spectacle of a blighted being called Charles Stuart. From having been one of the fairly cheerful agnostics of the story, he became as one having "not a single fixed opinion." He even "doubted his own identity," so far had Mr. Orleigh and William combined managed to befuddle his intellect. "Had my early training only been better," mused this spiritless person, "Mr. Orleigh could not have made of me the spiritual wreck I am." Everything comes out right notwithstanding. As children work through their necessary diseases (only with infinitely more noise and fuss) so does William pass through the various stages of fashionable "unbelief" till, by means of a luminous cross, two handsomely bound copies of 'In Memoriam' and 'The Christian Year,' and the sight of his mother's tomb, he (with others of the story) emerges, and with his usual "moderation in all things" appears as "a monthly communicant" at St. something or other's.

'Old Crusty's Niece' is better fitted to meet the requirements of the village lending library than to adorn any other position of usefulness we can imagine. It is stamped with the hall mark of the sterling British workman (a somewhat ideal character, perhaps). A man's a man for a' that may be said to be the predominating sentiment of the story, but there are others of a kindred nature. In it figure a stalwart carpenter and his widowed mother, addicted, in their hours of ease, to the quoting of poetry, a strong "cup o' tea," and "a good wash." Of course these and others of the same make have a manifest advantage over the young squireen with his artificially curled locks, lilac gloves, and shooting jacket. We do not say that the picture of these people and their conversation (or attire) strikes us as being exactly lifelike, but it does not matter. With the exception of the young squire (who is, of course, beneath contempt) and one or two more (not belonging to the noble army of the proletariat) all are of the sort whose hearts are in the right place, though their h's and their grammar are anywhere.

If any reader is led to expect something rather piquant and highly flavoured from the title of Mrs. Herbert's story, he or she will, we believe, be woefully disappointed. There is something in a name after all, and Mrs. Herbert's title is somehow suggestive of amusement, which is just what it does not afford. It is really a silly, badly written, vulgar little tale. Mrs. Danby Kaufman (why of Bayswater? there is no flavour of that locality, nor, indeed, of any other) is the lady who is the cause of "this anguish," so to speak. There are, however, so many reasons for blaming her that one counteracts the other, and we neither praise nor blame, nor, indeed, weigh her in the balance at all. She wrote a skit on her family she had better have left unwritten; she married her scapegrace brother, clandestinely, to a rich young heiress (a minor); she also neglected her child and household generally, and did a variety of other reprehensible or inexplicable things (in which, the latter at any rate, other people seem to have joined pretty freely); but not one of these things excites the slightest interest in the reader.

Mr. Tratman lacks judgment, and the power to construct a strong story, rather than ability to write a simple and straightforward tale. The first twenty or fifty pages of 'Craythorne' go well enough, and the reader would be content to follow his guide through ten times as many, for the sake of a fair development of the characters to whom he has been introduced. But in proportion as the plot thickens and the sensations are multiplied, the interest of the novel gradually wanes. The more Mr. Tratman elaborates his machinery, and the more vehemently he jerks the strings of his puppets, the more it is manifest that he has allowed his little drama to get beyond his control. His ambition to soar too high has marred what might have done him credit as a humble flight.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

WE have received from Mr. Fisher Unwin Russia, by Mr. Morfill, a well-written volume, chiefly on the history of Russia—accurate and complete. There is not much in the book about the present position of the Russian empire; but there is a list of works relating to the country, from which, however, some of the most valuable seem to have been omitted. Still, treating the book as a work on Russian history, it is excellent, and it is illustrated by some most interesting prints of portraits and portrait medals. The only real fault that we have to find with the book is that the title rather implies a general work upon the empire. The volume, however, forms one of the series known as "The Story of the Nations," which is an historical series, and in such a series it well holds its place. There is a geographical and ethnological introduction, which is somewhat brief and slight; and the chapter upon the institutions of Russia which is promised in the introduction hardly seems forthcoming at the close of the book, for the chapter entitled "Social Condition of Russia before and after the Time of Peter the Great" and the chapter upon "Political and Literary Landmarks—Authorities" can scarcely be said to give a picture of the institutions of Russia at the present time. The reader must understand that if he wants more than history he must turn to the volumes of Sir Donald Mackenzie Wallace or to some other modern book.

THERE reaches us from Mr. Walter Scott a translation, by Mr. Eastman, of a Danish work by Dr. Georg Brandes, called Impressions of Russia, which differs greatly from the volume of which we have just written, inasmuch as there is no history, except a little literary history, in the Danish book. We cannot recommend this work as in the least replacing the books of Sir D. Wallace and of M. Anatole Leroy-Beaulieu—except so far as literature is concerned; but upon all Russian literary questions Dr. Brandes is an excellent guide. Nowhere that we know of is it possible to find an equally full description of the Russian literature of our time; and the analysis of the works of the modern novelists of Russia is complete. The account of the origin of Bazarof in 'Fathers and Sons' is extremely interesting. It appears that Tourguénief had met, when on a journey in 1860 in a railway carriage, a young Russian physician who gave him his Bazarof. The author began to keep "Bazarof's Diary," that is to say, each time that he read an interesting book or met a person who had much to tell him that was new, he criticized the book or the person in his diary, not from his own point of view, but from that which his Bazarof would have taken. The result was the production of a masterpiece which has given both a name and a form to a school of thought which has, since the appearance of 'Fathers and Sons,' pervaded Russian letters. In contrast to Tourguénief we have Dostoyevski:

"Look at this countenance! half the face of a Russian peasant, half the physiognomy of a criminal, with flattened nose, small, piercing eyes, under eye-lashes which tremble with nervousness, long, thick, untidy beard, and light hair; add to this the forehead of a thinker and a poet, large and shapely, and the expressive mouth, which, even when closed, speaks of tortures without number, of ingulfing sadness, of unhealthy desires, enduring pity, sympathy, passionate envy, anxiety, torture! Look at this body, which is nothing but nerves, small and slender, round-shouldered, and tenacious of life, from his youth up subject to epileptic fits and hallucinations! This exterior, at first sight plain and vulgar, on closer examination stamped with weird genius, thoroughly morbid and wholly extraordinary, speaks of Dostoyevski's epileptic genius, of the depths of mildness which filled his soul, of the billows of almost insane acuteness which frequently mounted into his head."

The author describes at length the conviction of Dostoyevski for high treason; his life in a Siberian house of correction; the horrible corporal punishments to which he was subjected; his death to literature for ten years; his return from Siberia with his nervous system destroyed, but with marvellous knowledge of the New Testament—the only book that he had been allowed—and its extraordinary results upon his character and life; how revolt was quenched in his soul; how he had discovered with what little knowledge of men he had tried to reform the world, and to what extent, in his meekness and humility, he found his horrible punishment just, and was even grateful to his Government:—

"In the next place he had obtained a thorough knowledge of the inner life of the Russian people. His fate had opened to him an insight into that which is generally regarded as the sewer of humanity; and there he found in every one, even in those who had sunk the deepest, something of value in spite of all their depravity. At the same time that he had lost all faith in the use or possibility of a political revolution, he had found the faith in a moral revolution, starting from the bottom, in the spirit of the gospel. Thus he returned as the philanthropist among the Russian authors, as the author of the helpless pariahs."

There is no fact in literature more extraordinary than that, in old age, a man who had gone through such horrors should have become the first novelist of his country and one of the greatest of the world; and if we had no other reasons for commending 'Impressions of Russia' to our readers, the account of Dostoyevski's work would be a sufficient one.

AFTER two books on Russia we come to two books on Italy, of which the first, which reaches us from Mr. Fisher Unwin, is Italian Characters in the Epoch of Unification, by the Countess Cesaresco. This handsome volume contains interesting articles upon most of the best-known statesmen of young Italy, except Cavour, Mazzini, and d'Azeglio. There are chapters, among others, upon Ricasoli, upon Daniel Manin, the Poerios, Bixio, and the Cairoli. We can especially commend the chapter upon the last-named statesmen as giving an excellent picture of two of those patriots who have made Italy what she is.

A BOOK of a very different kind, also in some measure a work on Italy, is Mr. Stead's The Pope and the New Era (Cassell & Co.). The author had intended in leaving England to find or to make the Roman Catholic Church world-wide, and in writing from Rome, as he does in the letters here reprinted with additions, he admits that it is, too much for his wishes, an Italian institution at the present time as regards its government. This is throughout the work his theme—what the Pope might do if he would fill the Church with Anglo-Saxon cardinals, as contrasted with what he does, carefully retaining an Italian majority, and providing for the election of a succession of Italian Popes.

In The New Spirit (Bell & Sons) Mr. Havelock Ellis is very severe on Carlyle. He thinks Carlyle's essay on Diderot "old-fashioned" (alas! who knows whether even "The New Spirit" may not seem old-fashioned, as our ancestors would have said, one of these odd-come-shortlies?); and he speaks regretfully as a very aged man (how aged may be judged from the fact that he looks on those who read the 'Origin of Species' in 1859 as an interesting, but far removed generation) of "some who looked on Carlyle as a prophet in their youth." Nevertheless, it so happens that Mr. Carlyle described, as it seems to us, Mr. Havelock Ellis himself with great exactness in the person of a certain biographer of Voltaire, "an inquiring, honest-hearted character, many of whose statements must have begun to astonish even himself." Mr. Ellis must be very "inquiring," for we have seldom met with one who knows so many things that other people do not know. "The rise of women to supreme power in the near future," says Mr. Ellis, "is certain." Not "likely" or "possible," but "certain." The proud male is doomed. "The destinies of nations shape themselves before" Mr. Ellis's "eyes with singular clearness. Within a measurable period of time France will have become a beautiful dream; all Frenchmen will be Belgians or Italians." Mr. Ellis, it will be observed, knows this. It is not his opinion, not his prophecy even; there is no doubt or chance about it. He knows likewise all about "that everlasting gospel which from the time of Joachim of Flora downwards has always gleamed in dreams before the minds of men as the successor of Christianity." This kind of writing is very common nowadays, and classes itself very easily in the experienced reader's mind. Let us say, to Mr. Ellis's credit, that he is far from being an offensive exponent of panting modernity. He seems to be much more sorry for than angry with the poor old fossils who could read in 1859. He does not propose to abolish all the past; he thinks we really must make a religion; he speaks most handsomely of Shakspeare and Goethe and Aristotle; he praises most liberally "the sane and lofty sensuality of Boccaccio." His is clearly the most amiable side of the New Spirit. The prophets of that spirit dealt with by Mr. Ellis are five—Diderot, Heine, Whitman, Ibsen, and Tolstoi. As for Ibsen and Tolstoi, we suppose that no sane and lofty human being, after the infinite amount of chatter that there has been about them in the last two or three years, wants to hear another syllable; and very much the same may be said of Mr. Whitman. The Boers of South Africa are not a literary folk, but one of their practices is highly worthy of literary imitation. When a spot of ground becomes too much infested by the common herd they trek. It would be an insult to the reader to work out the parallel. As to Diderot and Heine, they are too old to be stale, and it is interesting to know that Mr. Ellis thinks Diderot singularly fertile in ideas, and Heine full of humour. Both things are undeniably true, though perhaps it was hardly reserved for the New Spirit to inform us of them. But that is the way with your new spirits; and for our parts we could be well content that they should sometimes tell us what is not exactly new rather than labour solely to tell us what is not exactly—the rhyme to "new." In short, to drop irony, Mr. Havelock Ellis is a fresh example of one of the commonest and not the least pathetic of the fallacies incident to the human intellect—the belief that there is something new under the sun. But we have known exponents of that belief who were far more ignorant and far less amusing. Only we should like him to inform us what he means by this sentence: "A great wave, with Luther on its crest, swept across Europe, reached at last the coast of England, and left on its shores, as a dreary monumental symbol, St. Paul's Cathedral." Did Luther set London on fire a century and more after his death? Is this charge a late reparation for that on "London's pillar"?

WE have received from Messrs. Ward & Downey An Artist's Tour in North and Central America and the Sandwich Islands, by B. Kroupa, with illustrations, a work which is a little disappointing. It has no great value as a book of travel, and the illustrations are not of much merit. The best part of the volume is that which describes life among the Navajo tribe of Red Indians.

ANOTHER volume of American travel is Dr. Blaikie's Summer Suns: a Holiday Trip to the Pacific Slope, published by Messrs. Nelson & Sons. It is such a book as may interest the Presbyterian congregations in Scotland and in Canada, to which Dr. Blaikie is well known.

BARON DE MALORTIE sends a greeting from Cairo to his English friends in the shape of "a medley of typical stories," under the title of Twist Old Times and New (Ward & Downey), which are partly reminiscences and partly traditions, rescued from the borderland of history and private biography. The writer draws on the experiences of his forefathers for several generations, as well as on his own; and this latitude enables him to include scenes from the lives of the great and little Napoleons, of the Jérômes and the Bernadottes, of Maximilian and the Mexicans, of Bismarck and Thiers, of the continental Rothchilds, and so downward to many an unnamed or pseudonymous actor on the crowded stage of his reminiscences. The Mexican chapters appear to possess a certain historical value, and, at any rate, they throw some new side-lights upon the lamentable story of the Mexican expedition. But the reader of Baron de Malortie's pleasant pages will not ransack them for historical materials. He will find them crammed with details of familiar, convivial, military, or diplomatic life, with incident and anecdote accumulating through a varied and eventful career, and will obtain no more than the kaleidoscopic view of men and things which the author undertakes to provide. There is, perhaps, nothing in the whole book that is more touching, more amusing, or more characteristic of the epoch of change from old to new, in the last-surviving feudalism of North Germany, than the account of a visit to the castle of the worthy Freiherr von Schreckenbourg. The baron is a barbarian of the old régime of Hanover, prouder than the most polished outcome of the newer civilization, who would not dream of selling a single stick which he had inherited, but does not hesitate to melt down his heirlooms, or to cover his cattle with Gobelin tapestries.

What might have been expected, by Mr. Frank R. Stockton (Allen & Co.), appears to be a children's book, but from the author of 'Rudder Grange' one would expect something which would also, if not primarily, amuse grown-up people. It is possible that Mr. Stockton's meaning lies too deep, and an apology perhaps should accompany the confession that the story appears to be for children only. It is an account of the labours of two children who determined to support an old negro woman and save her from being sent to an almshouse. Mr. Stockton is so clever in the art of narration that he can always avoid dullness, but his store of fun has hardly been equal to the duty of making his book lively. The illustrations are depressing enough to add a good deal to the difficulties with which he has had to contend.

FROM Messrs. Gordon & Gotch there reach us The Australian Handbook for 1890 and a little pamphlet written for 'The Australian Handbook' and called Early Struggles of the Australian Press, by Mr. James Bonwick. The 'Handbook' is equal to its predecessors, which is high praise; and it is invaluable to all who have to do with Australasia, including under that term New Guinea and Fiji. We are tempted to ask how the map at p. 347 can fairly be described as a "Railway Map of West Australia," and we might also complain, were we inclined to hypercriticism, of the colony of Western Australia being called "West Australia" throughout the book; but 'The Australian Handbook' is too well known for such trifles to affect its fame. The little pamphlet by Mr. Bonwick, sent out with 'The Australian Handbook,' contains a good deal of interesting anecdote upon the birth of the Australian press, and many of the quotations from the early journals of Australia are full of excellent jests.

WE have also received from Messrs. Gordon & Gotch two divisions of the New South Wales Railway Tourists' Guide, published by authority through the Government printer at Sydney. These guides to the chief beauties of New South Wales scenery in the Blue Mountains, the National Park, and others of the loveliest portions of the colony resemble in form the paper-covered guides which are sold on all the railways of the United States, but which in this country are somewhat wanting, although they were attempted on a large scale in the early days of railways by the late Sir Henry Cole, and have been revived in recent years for some of our chief lines.

MR. JOHN MURRAY has published a fourth edition of his Handbook for Travellers in Algeria and Tunis, edited by Sir R. L. Playfair. This new edition follows at only three years' distance the third edition, which has been thrown out of date by the opening of the railway from Algiers to Tunis, and extraordinary extension of railway development in Algeria. The 'Handbook' is fully up to the most recent dates, and is one of the best of an excellent series.

MR. BURDETT's admirable work Burdett's Official Intelligence (Spottiswoode) contains this year chapters on the National Debt, supplying the complete figures of Mr. Goschen's conversion, on the colonial and municipal loans, on Indian finance, &c., all treated in a clear and judicious manner.—The Mining Manual of Mr. Skinner has reached its third year of publication, and contains a large number of facts in a convenient shape.—The London Diocese Book, issued by Messrs. Griffith & Farran, is a highly useful handbook, supplying a great variety of information, and may be highly recommended. A few changes might have been noted on a fly-leaf. Dr. Cuthbertson, for example, is dead, and Mr. Heard has left Westminster for Fettes.

Folk-lore (Nutt), the new quarterly which has arisen from the ashes of the Archæological Review and the Folk-lore Journal, has made an excellent start. Prof. Haddon's 'Legends from Torres Straits' is a specially interesting article. The bibliography deserves decided praise.—We have also received the new number of the interesting Revue Félibréenne.

WE have received the catalogues of Mrs. Bennett, Messrs. Garratt & Co. (fairly interesting), Mr. Gray (topography), Mr. Harding (topography and theology), Mr. Haigh Hartley, Messrs. Jarvis & Son, Mr. May, Mr. Nutt (good catalogue of historical works), Mr. Reader (fairly good), Messrs. Sotheran, and Mr. Spencer (rather good),—also those of Mr. Downing, Messrs. Conway & Co. (good catalogue of autographs), Mr. Thistlewood, and Mr. Wilson of Birmingham, Mr. Toon of Brighton (some interesting books and MSS.), Mr. Murray of Derby, Mr. Rooney of Dublin (fairly good), Mr. Common of Exeter, Mr. Teal of Halifax, Mr. Howell and Messrs. Young & Sons of Liverpool (both rather good), Mr. Scott of Sheffield, and Mr. Iredale of Torquay. Messrs. Luzac & Co. have forwarded the first number of their Monthly List. M. Charavay has sent us a catalogue of valuable autographs he is going to sell next Friday. Catalogues have also reached us from M. Lissa (French literature) and M. Stargardt of Berlin, and M. Twietmeyer (French literature) of Leipzig.

We have on our table The Makers of Modern Italy, by J. A. R. Marriott (Macmillan).—Our Norway Cruise, by J. Young (Glasgow, Strathern & Freeman).—Moffatt's Outlines of English History (Moffatt & Paige).—P. Vergili Maronis Georgicon, Lib. I., edited by T. E. Page (Macmillan).—The Pronunciation of Greek, by E. A. S. Dawes (Nutt).—University College, Dundee, Calendar for 1889-90 (Dundee, Leng).—Moffatt's Outlines of Geography (Moffatt & Paige).—The Physiology of Industry, by A. F. Mummery and J. A. Hobson (Murray).—The Prevention of Measles, by C. Candler (Kegan Paul).—Draughts and Backgammon, by "Berkeley" (Bell).—The French and English Birthday-Book, compiled by K. D. Clark (Low).—The Music of the Poets, a Musician's Birthday-Book, edited by Eleonore D'Esterre-Keeling (Scott).—An Honest Hypocrite, by E. S. De Grote Tompkins (Cassell).—The Devil is Dead, by "Real People" (Gilbert & Rivington).—Three People's Secret, by G. M. Fenn (Simpkin).—Desborough Hold, by an Old Boy (Digby & Long).—The Bairns Annual, edited by A. Corkran (Field & Tuer).—Miss Peggy O'Dillon, by V. Walda (Dublin, Gill).—Hold Fast by Your Sundays, by the Author of 'Deepdale Vicarage' ('Home Words' Office).—My Rectors, by a Quondam Curate (Skeffington & Son).—Our Boys and Girls, Vol. 1889 (W.M.S.S.U.).—Our Sunday Book of Reading and Pictures, edited by T. Archer (Griffith & Farran).—Scribner's Magazine, Vol. VI. (Warne).—A Daughter of the South, by C. A. Sherard (Griffith & Farran).—Fairy Rosebud, by A. Whynates (Dean & Son).—The Exile's Return, by E. H. B. (Cambridge, Palmer).—The Historic Relation of the Gospels, by the Rev. J. J. Halcombe (Smith & Innes).—Pictures of the Childhood of Jesus (Nelson & Sons).—The First and Second Books of Samuel, with Map, Introduction, and Notes by the Rev. A. F. Kirkpatrick (Cambridge, University Press).—Burning Questions, by W. Gladden (Clarke & Co.).—Occasional Thoughts of an Astronomer on Nature and Revelation, by the Rev. C. Pritchard (Murray).—The Bible true from the Beginning, by E. Gough, Vol. II. (Kegan Paul).—Why We Suffer, by H. Hayman, D.D. (Allen & Co.).—Die Universitäten Englands im 16. Jahrhundert, by A. Zimmermann (Freiburg, Herder).—Za Apeninami, by S. Belza (Cracow, Gebethner).—and Hartmann von Aue als Lyriker, by F. Saran (Halle, Niemeyer). Among New Editions we have Coleridge, by H. D. Traill (Macmillan).—The Congregation in Church (Mowbray).—The Cardinal Archbishop and the Invincible Armada, 1588, by Col. Colomb (Allen & Co.).—The Elements of Physiology, by J. J. Prince, Part II. (Heywood).—and A Far Look Ahead; or, the Diothas, by I. Thiussen (Putnam).

LIST OF NEW BOOKS.

ENGLISH.

Theology.

Forbes's (J.) The Servant of the Lord in Isaiah xl.-lxvi., 5/
Ryan's (T.) The Apocalypse considered as the Final Crisis of the Age, cr. 8vo. 3/6
Smyth's (J. P.) Old Documents and the New Bible, 2/6

Lavo.

Harris's (E.) A Table showing at a Glance the Incidence of the English Death Duties, cr. 8vo. 2/6

Poetry.

Carleton's (W.) City Ballads and City Legends, 12mo. 2/6 cl.
Fisher's (F.) Poems and Notes descriptive of Killarney, 2/
Leighton's (W.) Poems, Complete Edition, illustrated by J. Leighton, cr. 8vo. 3/6
Moore's (T.) The Epicurean, a Tale, and Alciphron, a Poem, cr. 8vo. 2/6 bds.

History and Biography.

Bell's (H. G.) Life of Mary, Queen of Scots, 2 vols. 12mo. 6/
Ferguson's (R. B.) History of Cumberland, 8vo. 7/6
Noyer (Madame du), Correspondence of, translated and edited by F. Layard, 2 vols. 8vo. 3/6
Parkinson's (Rev. T.) Yorkshire Legends and Traditions, Second Series, 7/6
Thornton's (P. M.) The Stuart Dynasty, Short Studies of its Rise, Course, &c., roy. 8vo. 12/
Trelawny's (E. G.) Adventures of a Younger Son, with an Introduction by E. Garnett, 8vo. 5/

Philology.

Milton's Samson Agonistes, with Introduction and Notes by H. M. Percival, 12mo. 2/6

Science.

Bartholomew's (J. G.) Pocket Atlas and Gazetteer of Canada, edited by J. W. Harper, 32mo. 2/6 cl.
Gray's (John) Electrical Influence of Machines, cr. 8vo. 4/6
Hughes's (A. W.) Nerves of the Human Body, 4to. 7/6
Kearton's (W.) Birds' Nests, Eggs, and Egg Collecting, 5/ cl.
Sedgwick's (W.) Force as an Entity, with Stream, Pool, and Wave Forms, cr. 8vo. 7/6 cl.

General Literature.

Berdie's (E.) Browning's Message to his Time, his Religion, Philosophy, and Science, cr. 8vo. 3/6
Besant's (W.) The Holy Rose, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.
Blackie's Modern Cyclopaedia, ed. by C. Annandale, Vol. 5, cr. 8vo. 6/
Blackie's (J. S.) Essays on Subjects of Moral and Social Interest, cr. 8vo. 5/
Carmarthen's (K.) A Lover of the Beautiful, cr. 8vo. 6/
Carter Harrison's Dollis Brooke, cr. 8vo. 6/
Crack County (A.), by Mrs. E. Kennard, 12mo. 2/ bds.
Davidson's (H. G.) The Queen of the Black Hand, cr. 8vo. 6/
Fenn's (G. M.) The Mynns Mystery, 2/ bds.
Foster's (B.) A Queen of Roses, cr. 8vo. 6/
Garden (The) as considered in Literature by Certain Polite Writers, with Critical Essay by Howe, 18mo. 2/6
Green's (E. E.) Dorothy's Vocation, cr. 8vo. 2/ cl.
Greenwood's (J.) Prince Dick of Dahomey, cr. 8vo. 3/6
Homeric Birthday Book, Gems from the Iliad and Odyssey of Homer, selected by V. E. G., 32mo. 3/6
Hutchinson's (H. G.) Golf, 10/6. (The Badminton Library.)
Oliphant's (Mrs.) The Duke's Daughter and the Fugitives, 3 vols. cr. 8vo. 25/6 Sheba, a Study of Girlhood, by Rita, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.

FOREIGN.

Theology.

Bratke (E.) Wegweiser zur Quellen- u. Litteraturkunde der Kirchengegeschichte, 6m.
Ewald (F.) Das Hauptproblem der Evangelienfrage, 6m. 80.
Hartel (W. v.) Patristische Studien, Part 1, 1m.

Fine Art and Archaeology.

Altarschrein (Der) v. Hans Memling im Dom zu Lübeck, 25m.
Goldschmidt (A.) Lübecker Malerei u. Plastik bis 1630, 25m.
Kloster Maulbronn (Das) in Württemberg. Part 1, 2m. 40.
Schmid (M.) Die Geburt Christi in der Bildenden Kunst, 4m. 50.

Philosophy.

Guyau (M.) La Genèse de l'Idée de Temps, 2fr. 50.

Political Economy.

Roswag (C.) L'Argent et l'Or, Vol. 1, 25fr.
Say (L.) Le Socialisme d'Etat, 5fr. 50.

History and Biography.

Mémoires du Baron Hyde de Neuville, Vol. 2, 7fr. 50.
Pellet (M.) Variétés Révolutionnaires, Third Series, 3fr. 50.
Plantet (E.) Correspondance des Deys d'Alger avec la Cour de France, 1579-1833, 2 vols. 30fr.

Philology.

Darmesteter (A.) Reliques Scientifiques, 2 vols. 40fr.
Wentzel (G.) De Grammaticis Græcis Quaestiones Selectæ, I., 3m.

Science.

Ledieu (A.) et Cadat (E.) Le Nouveau Matériel Naval, Vol. 2, 30fr.

General Literature.

Malot (H.) Paulette, 3fr. 50.
Mendes (C.) Métophile, 3fr. 50.
Montépin (X. de) Marat, Second Series, 2 vols. 6fr.
Renard (G.) Les Princes de la Jeune Critique, 3fr. 50.

MR. RIDER HAGGARD'S ASSAILANTS.

39, Paternoster Row, March 11, 1890.

IN an article in the Fortnightly Review for March Mr. Runciman brings a charge against Mr. Rider Haggard of ungentlemanly conduct towards Mr. E. F. Knight. His statement is briefly this:—

1. That Mr. Haggard borrowed his story of the great crabs in the valley of the subterranean river in 'Allan Quatermain' from Mr. Knight's 'Cruise of the Falcon' without due acknowledgment.

2. That Mr. Knight himself subsequently published a story in Cassell's Saturday Journal in which he used the same incident.

3. That Mr. Knight was accused of plagiarizing from 'Allan Quatermain.'

4. That Mr. Haggard was asked to clear the reputation of Mr. Knight.

5. That instead of writing a letter to the press acknowledging his debt, and clearing Mr. Knight's reputation, he put a fly-leaf at the end of "a new edition" of 'Allan Quatermain,' in which "he presumes to make game of the clever gentleman whom he had exposed to ridicule."

The facts are very simple, and are as follows:—

1. Mr. Haggard did take the idea of the great crabs in the valley of the subterranean river, with due acknowledgment, from a review of a book of travels, which book he only knew through this review, but which was undoubtedly the 'Cruise of the Falcon.'

2 and 3. Mr. Runciman is presumably correct in these statements; but Mr. Haggard has never seen Mr. Knight's story in Cassell's Journal.

4. Mr. Haggard never heard from Mr. Knight on the subject, and was unaware that any charge of plagiarism had been brought against Mr. Knight. The only intimation he ever had on the matter was incidentally contained in a letter, still in his possession, received in October, 1888 ('Allan Quatermain' having been published in June, 1887), from a friend, who told him, on Mr. Runciman's authority, that Mr. Knight was vexed because he fancied that Mr. Haggard regarded his crabs as "mere blague." To this letter Mr. Haggard replied, stating his regret, and asking his friend to tell Mr. Runciman that he fully believed in the crabs, and had not the slightest intention of hurting Mr. Knight's feelings.

5. The explanation which Mr. Haggard is accused of putting into "a new edition of 'Allan Quatermain'" is not to be found in the new edition. It was dropped in the new edition as having served its purpose. It was, on the other hand, published in the first edition, in order to prevent a repetition of the false charges which were brought against Mr. Haggard in connexion with 'She.' Any one of the twenty thousand people who possess a copy of the first edition of 'Allan Quatermain' can verify this fact for himself.

The charge that Mr. Haggard was guilty of "a petty little sneer, a petty little evasion," was based on the following words (published in the first edition of 'Allan Quatermain'): "But if I remember right, the crabs in the book, when irritated, projected their eyes quite out of their heads. I regret that I was not able to 'plagiarise' this effect, but I felt that although crabs may, and doubtless do, behave thus in real life, in romance they 'will not do so.'" By this Mr. Haggard meant no sneer at Mr. Knight, but merely implied that there were things in nature so strange that they would hardly be believed if introduced into fiction.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO.

THE FABLES OF KYBIΣHΣ.

ONE can never hope to convince Dr. Neubauer by any suggestion made in the wide field of Semitic scholarship which he has taken under his protection. He is a confirmed sceptic in such matters with regard to hypotheses proposed by others, and I often wonder what would happen if he applied the same rigorous criticism to the many brilliant and hazardous conjectures which he himself pours forth in such profusion. However, on the present occasion he performs the function of advocato del diavolo with all the mildness customary with that official. At any rate, I see nothing in his triad of objections which invalidates my equation כובסים = Kyβισms.

(1) The fact that some "early" (i.e., late mediæval) texts read כובסים does not affect the question more than the fact that the earliest text of the complete Talmud (that of Munich of the fourteenth century) reads כובסים. In both cases an attempt was made to get some meaning out of a proper name the significance of which had naturally been forgotten after a thousand years. I do not think the meaning thus arrived at, "fables of washermen," is a very satisfactory one, nor is Dr. Neubauer's suggested "fables of date-skins" (in the literal, or a less modest sense) much of an improvement on the guesses of the mediæval rabbis.

(2) "The Greek κ is invariably transliterated in Hebrew writings by פ, and not by כ," says Dr. Neubauer. I am surprised that a professed philologist should have committed himself to such a statement. I could mention dozens of examples to the contrary, but it will probably suffice to refer to the etymological equations כפלין = κεφαλαίον, כרן = κήρυξ, כרברן = καρ-χρδών. Curiously enough, when the rabbis had occasion to speak of the Greek letter itself, they made use of δ not ρ : "ΝΕΨ (κῶππα) in Greek means twenty" (Midr. rab. on Lamentations, s.v. 'רבת'). The New Testament equations $\kappa\eta\phi\acute{\alpha}\varsigma$ (John i. 43)= $\nu\iota\phi\acute{\alpha}$ $\sigma\iota\kappa\epsilon\pi\alpha$ (Luke i. 15)= $\nu\iota\phi\acute{\alpha}$, to which Dr. Neubauer has himself called attention ('Studia Biblica,' 56), show that the equivalence of κ and δ was recognized in transliterating Hebrew into Greek, as well as vice versa.

(3) Dr. Neubauer cannot admit "that the rabbis could have known the Libyan fables..... and certainly not the name of their author, who has been unearthed by modern research." But modern research did not invent Kybises, who is expressly mentioned by four Alexandrine authorities as the father of Libyan fable, while Babrius puts him on the same level as Æsop. If the Alexandrines knew him so familiarly, there is no reason why the rabbis of Jabne, with their close connexion with Alexandria, should have been ignorant of him. Certainly, notwithstanding Dr. Neubauer's denial, they were acquainted with the "Libyan" fables associated with Kybises's name. For, as I have shown for the first time by a minute analysis of the Talmudic fables, of the thirty extant fables in the Talmud and Midrash, nineteen can be traced to India, of which thirteen are also to be found in Hellenic fable, for the most part only in Babrius, who himself refers to Kybises. It was only after working out these results that I ventured to transpose Roth's rather wild suggestion that the $\mu\acute{\iota}\theta\omicron\iota$ $\kappa\upsilon\beta\iota\omicron\rho\upsilon\varsigma$ was a "Greek transcription of the title 'Mishle Kob-sim,'" and to suggest the exact contrary, viz., that $\mu\acute{\iota}\theta\omicron\iota$ $\kappa\upsilon\beta\iota\omicron\rho\upsilon\varsigma$ with the almost imperceptible change of δ into ρ was a Hebrew version of $\mu\acute{\iota}\theta\omicron\iota$ $\kappa\upsilon\beta\iota\omicron\rho\upsilon\varsigma$. I see nothing in Dr. Neubauer's objections that should cause me or others to doubt the probability of the identification.

JOSEPH JACOBS.

THOMAS GUY AS A PUBLISHER.

THE career of Thomas Guy, the founder of Guy's Hospital, as a bookseller and publisher, has hitherto been very obscure. In Maitland's 'London' we learn that he at first dealt in Dutch-printed Bibles, and afterwards contracted with the University of Oxford for their privilege to print Bibles, in which he did "a very great trade for divers years." Beyond this, only two books have been recorded as published by him, viz., 'Jacob's Ladder,' by J. Hall, B.D., ninth edition, 1698, and 'Death's Vision,' a sacred poem, 1709; and it has been accepted that his imprint is very rare, simply because no one has ever attempted seriously to investigate his life. In making researches for a biographical history of Guy's Hospital and its founder, in which Dr. Wilks, F.R.S., who has special knowledge of the modern history of Guy's Hospital, has joined me, I have found much material about Guy's publishing career hitherto unknown, a brief account of which I will with your permission lay before your readers. His imprint is not specially rare, he certainly was a very considerable publisher, and the history of his connexion with the University of Oxford is both interesting and essential to a right understanding of the history of Oxford printing.

The most extensive collection of books printed by Guy is now, strange to say, in the Howley Library at Canterbury Cathedral, to which it has been presented, together with the rest of the late Archdeacon Harrison's library, by his widow. The archdeacon was son of the second Benjamin Harrison, who was treasurer of Guy's Hospital from 1797 to 1847, and who had collected all books he could obtain bearing Guy's imprint. To his endeavours we are indebted for the largest collection of Oxford-printed Bibles of 1675-91 that can probably be found anywhere, more than two dozen in number, and various other books published by Guy. There is an unequalled collection of the successive editions of James Howell's 'Familiar Letters, Domestic and Forren,' which give such important information about the early Stuart period. The fourth and three subsequent editions were published by Guy, the dates extending between 1673 and 1705; and the eighth edition, though the title-page does not bear his name, contains the same frontispiece as before, marked "sold by Thomas Guy," while the ninth edition, 1726, was sold by, among others, J. Osborn, Guy's intimate friend in late life. The Harrison collection includes no fewer than three copies of the fifth edition (the British Museum having two, and the Bodleian one, while the British Museum also has the sixth and seventh editions). Next in interest is John Ogilby's translation of Virgil, with thirty-two plates and notes. In one edition without date the notes are printed in the margin and at the foot in a very crowded page; in another, a third edition, dated 1675, of which there are two copies in the Bodleian, they are printed separately at the end of each section of the book, which is dedicated to the Princess Mary, daughter of the Duke of York, afterwards James II. This was printed by the author for Peter Parker and Thomas Guy. Then we have a small Horace, 1678, a reprint of John Bond's edition; and in this I found a brief catalogue of great interest, entitled "School-Books printed at the Theatre in Oxford; and are to be sold by Peter Parker and Thomas Guy in Cornhill, against the Royal Exchange." In this list of Oxford-printed books are editions of Pliny, the Iliad, Theocritus, Herodian, Lydiat's 'Chronology,' Justin, Nepos, Sallust, Quintilian, and Maximus Tyrius, giving evidence of much active work at Oxford at this early date. Then comes a list of books printed in London, including the following: Elisha Coles's Dictionary, English-Latin and Latin-English, and his English Dictionary, explaining difficult terms, &c.; Erasmus's 'Colloquies,' the Latin Phrase-Book of Winchester School, Godwin's 'Antiquities,' complete, Martial's Epigrams, Quintus Curtius, Lucius Florus, Valerius Maximus (Latin and English editions of each), Caesar in Latin, Mantuan's Eclogues in English, Sleiden's 'Four Empires,' Juvenal's Satires and Lucan's 'Pharsalia' in English, as well as Ogilby's Virgil and Howell's 'Letters' already mentioned. There are numerous details of interest about these books which I must leave for my full life of Guy. I find also mention of a 'Nomenclatura Trilingua; or, a Short Vocabulary of English, Latin, and Greek,' with a collection of proverbs; and of 'Colloquia Trilingua,' published by Guy; and a copy of Beza's Greek Testament, 1705, published by Guy, is at Canterbury.

A careful examination of R. Clavell's 'Catalogue of Books printed in England, 1666-1695,' in the British Museum, gave me the following additional titles of books published by Guy: under "Divinity," in folio, Robert's 'Key of the Bible'; octavo, Ellis's 'Catechism'; 'Goodwill towards Men: a Treatise of the Covenants, New and Old'; 12mo, Ellis's 'Christianity in Short; or, the Way to be a good Christian,'—under "History," in folio, 'Cleopatra, the most famed Romance, in Twelve Parts'; 'Ibrahim; or, the Illustrious Bassa'; Ligon's 'History of the Barbadoes';—under "Miscellanies," quarto, 'Case of Interest; or, Usury as to the Common Practice Stated and Examined,'—and under "Poetry," Ogilby's 'Paraphrase on Virgil.' Several of these are also stated to be published by Peter Parker, who, as we shall see, was Guy's great ally and alter ego in publishing, and there is reason to believe that many of the books under his name alone were issued jointly with Guy. Clavell, I may add, does not give the names of the publishers of sermons, discourses against Popery, plays, and some other classes of books, among whom Guy might also have figured considerably.

Finally, in looking at the imprint of the edition of Coles's Latin Dictionary, 1677, at the Bodleian, I found that it was printed "for Peter Parker..... and Thomas and John Guy....." thus discovering what has never been known before, that Thomas Guy had his brother John in partnership with him at that date. The important details about Guy's connexion with the University of Oxford I must leave for another article.

G. T. BETTANY.

UNPUBLISHED VERSES BY COLERIDGE.

I FOUND the following verses in a volume of miscellaneous tracts, bound up apparently by Southey, and now in the Forster Library at South Kensington. They are printed in a fragment of what appears to have been a privately printed autobiographical sketch of Miss Matilda Betham, the cherished friend of the Southseys and the Lambs. The fragment is probably unique, for Miss Betham's distinguished niece and biographer, Miss M. Betham-Edwards, informs me she was unaware of the existence of anything of the kind, and that she is unable to identify the "Boughton" of the verses.

Although these are not expressed, as a whole, in Coleridge's happiest vein, I think them well worthy of preservation for the sake of not a few fine and characteristic lines. Among these I should be unwilling, perhaps, to claim a place for

The Almighty, having first composed a Man,
Set him to music, framing Woman for him;

but they are interesting for the courage with which they announce as a fait accompli something which our Poet Laureate ventures only to hope for in the far future when the stones of Girtton and Newnham shall have become grey with lichen,—

Till at the last she set herself to man
Like perfect music unto noble words.

J. D. C.

One of our most celebrated poets, who had, I was told, picked out and praised the little piece 'On a Cloud,' another had quoted (saying it would have been faultless if I had not used the word Phabus in it, which he thought inadmissible in modern poetry), sent me some verses inscribed 'To Matilda Betham, from a Stranger'; and dated 'Keswick, Sept. 2, 1802, S. T. C.' I should have guessed whence they came, but dared not flatter myself so highly as satisfactorily to believe it, before I obtained the avowal of the lady who had transmitted them.

Matilda! I have heard a sweet tune play'd
On a sweet instrument—thy Poésie—
Sent to my soul by Boughton's pleading voice,
Where friendship's zealous wish inspir'd,
Deeper'd and fill'd the subtle tones of taste:
(So have I heard a Nightingale's fine notes Blend with the murmurs of a hidden stream.)
And now the fair, wild offspring of thy genius,
Those wanderers whom thy fancy had sent forth
To seek their fortune in this mortal world,
Have found a little home within my heart,
And brought me as the quirent of their lodging,
Rosebuds, and fruit blossoms, and pretty weeds,
And timorous laurel leaflets half-disclos'd,
Engarlanded with gauding woodbine tendrils!
A coronel, which, with undoubting hand,
I twine around the brows of patriot HOPE!

The Almighty, having first composed a Man,
Set him to music, framing Woman for him,
And fitted each to each, and made them one!
And 'tis my faith, that there's a natural bond
Between the female mind and measur'd sounds,
Nor do I know a sweeter Hope than this,
That this sweet Hope, by judgment unprov'd,
That our own Britain, our dear mother Isle,
May boast one Maid, a poetess indeed,
Great as th' impression'd Lesbian, in sweet song,
And O! of holier mind, and happier fate.

Matilda! I dare twine thy vernal wreath
Around the brows of patriot HOPE! But thou
Be wise! be bold! fulfil my auspices!
Thou sweet thy measures, stern must be thy thought,
Patient thy study, watchful thy mild eye!
Poetic feelings, like the stretching boughs
Of mighty oaks, pay homage to the gales,
Toes in the strong winds, drive before the gust,
Themselves one storm of fluttering leaves;
Yet, all the while, self-limited, remain
Equally near the fix'd and solid trunk
Of Truth and Nature in the howling storm,
As in the calm that stills the aspen grove.
Be bold, meek Woman! I but be wisely bold!
Fly, Osirich-like, firm land beneath thy feet,
Yet hurried onward by thy wings of fancy
Swift as the whirlwind singing in their quills.
Look round thee! look within thee! think and feel!
What nobler meed, Matilda! canst thou win,
Than tears of gladness in a BOUGHTON'S eyes,
And exultation even in strangers' hearts?

THE SPRING PUBLISHING SEASON.

MESSRS. HODDER & STOUGHTON'S spring list includes the following: 'Joints in our Social Armour,' by Mr. J. Runciman; 'The Christian Ministry: its Origin, Constitution, Nature, and Work,' by the Dean of Norwich; 'The Voices of the Psalms,' by the Bishop of Ossory; 'The New World of Central Africa,' by Mrs. Grattan Guinness; 'Prof. W. G. Elmslie, D.D., Memoir and Remains,' by Dr. Robertson Nicoll; 'My Lady Nicotine,' by Mr. J. M. Barrie, author of 'A Window in Thrums'; 'Rescuers and Rescued: Experiences among our City Poor,' by the Rev. James Wells; 'Veni Creator: Thoughts on the Holy Spirit of Promise,' by the Rev. H. C. G. Moule; 'The Makers of Modern English,' by Mr. W. J. Dawson, author of 'The Threshold of Manhood'; 'Until the Day Break, and other Hymns and Poems,' by the late Rev. Horatius Bonar, D.D.; 'Nunnery Life in the Church of England; or, Seventeen Years with Father Ignatius,' by Sister Agnes, with introduction by the Rev. W. Lancelot Holland; 'Ecce Venit,' by Dr. A. J. Gordon; and the following volumes of 'The Expositor's Bible': Dean Chadwick on the Book of Exodus; the Rev. Dr. Monro Gibson on St. Matthew; the Rev. G. A. Smith on 'The Prophecies of Isaiah,' Vol. II.; and the Rev. Prof. G. T. Stokes on the Acts of the Apostles.

Messrs. Sonnenschein & Co.'s announcements include a second series of 'Home Rule Speeches,' by the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, M.P.; 'Godwin's 'Essay on Property,' from his 'Political Justice,' edited, with notes and introduction, by Mr. H. S. Salt; 'The Promotion of General Happiness,' by Mr. Michael Macmillan; 'The Redemption of Labour; or, Free Labour upon Freed Land,' by Mr. C. B. Phipson, Vol. II.; 'Story of the French Revolution,' by Mr. Belfort Bax; 'Bismarck and German Socialism,' by Mr. W. H. Dawson; 'A Dictionary of Classical Mythology, Religion, Literature, Art, and Archaeology,' edited from the German of Prof. O. Seyffert by Prof. H. Nettleship and Dr. Sandys; 'The Letters of Froebel,' translated and edited by Mr. Keatley Moore and Madame Michaelis; 'A Volapük Dictionary,' by Mr. Krause; 'The Student's Greek Tragedians,' adapted from the German of Dr. Munk, by Dr. Verrall; a new edition in one volume of the 'History of the Renaissance of Italy,' by J. G. Burckhardt, translated and edited by Mr. S. G. C. Middlemore; a second edition of 'Through the Wordsworth Country,' by Prof. W. Knight; a new edition of Mr. Sonnenschein's 'Classified Bibliography of the Best Books in all Departments of Literature,'—'From Handel to Hallé: including Autobiographical Sketches by Herbert Herkomer and Prof. Huxley,' by Mr. Louis Engel; 'The Uncollected Writings of De Quincey,' with preface and annotations by Mr. James Hogg; 'The Diary and Correspondence of Samuel Pepys, F.R.S.,' with a life and notes by Lord Braybrooke, reprint of the third edition, 1848, in 3 vols.; 'Schopenhauer's 'Wisdom of Life' and 'Counsels and Maxims,' translated by Mr. T. B. Saunders; 'Practical Plant Physiology,' by Prof. Detmer, translated and edited by Mr. S. A. Moor; 'A Dictionary of Medicine,' by Dr. F. R. Walters; new volumes of 'The Young Collector Series': 'Book Collecting,' by Mr. J. F. Slater; 'Monumental Brasses,' by Mr. H. W. Macklin; 'Pond Life: Plants,' by Mr. J. Spencer Smithson; 'Grasses,' by Mr. F. Tufnail; 'An Introduction to Zoology,' by Mr. B. Lindsay; 'Chess Problems,' by Mr. E. W. Rayner; and 'British Ferns,' by Mr. E. J. Lowe; 'Confirmation Papers,' by the Rev. W. Bellars; 'The Wages of Sin,' by Lucas Malet, author of 'A Council of Perfection'; 'Short Stories,' by Miss Annie Thomas; 'Six-Shilling Series': 'Young Mr. Ainslie's Courtship,' by Mr. F. C. Phillips; 'A Conspiracy of Silence,' by Mr. G. Colmore; and 'For so Little,' by Mr. H. Davis; 'School Boy Truth and Honour,' by A. H. B., in the "Three-and-Sixpenny Series"; and in the "Two-Shilling Railway Series": 'The Dead Leman, &c.,' by Mr. Andrew Lang and Paul Sylvester; 'One of the Forty,' by M. Daudet; and various works by Capt. Mayne Reid.

MR. JENNINGS.

THE death is announced of Mr. Hargrave Jennings, the author of a work on 'The Rosicrucians: their Rites and Mysteries,' originally issued in 1870, of which a third and enlarged edition has recently appeared. Mr. Jennings was engaged a short time back in writing his reminiscences, but we do not know if he finished them. He was for many years secretary to Col. Mapleson in the management of the Italian Opera. It is supposed that he was the original of the character of Ezra Jennings in Wilkie Collins's story 'The Moonstone.' He claimed to be the first explorer in the fields of forgotten and mythical learning since exploited by the Society of Psychical Research, the Theosophic Society, and the Esoteric Buddhists. His writings include 'My Marine Memorandum Book,' 3 vols., 1845; 'The Ship of Glass, and Atcherley,' 1846; 'St. George: a Miniature Romance,' 1853; 'Curious Things of the Outside World,' 1861; 'Live Lights or Dead Lights, Altar or Table,' 1873; 'One of the Thirty,' a story of the thirty pieces of silver received by Judas for the betrayal of Jesus, 1873; 'The Indian Religions; or, Results of the Mysterious Buddhism'; and a book on 'Ancient Phallic Worship,' published lately.

Literary Gossip.

WE understand that Mrs. Sutherland Orr is engaged on a biographical and critical account of Mr. Robert Browning and his works, with the authority and assistance of Mr. Browning's family.

THE forthcoming volume of the 'Dictionary of National Biography,' to be published on the 26th inst., extends from Glover to Gravet. Mr. Joseph Knight writes on Mrs. Glover, the actress; the Rev. Alexander Gordon on Godiva; the Rev. William Hunt on Earl Godwin; Mr. Leslie Stephen on Mary and William Godwin and Oliver Goldsmith; Col. Vetch, R.E., on Gordon of Khartoum; Mr. G. F. Russell Barker on George Hamilton Gordon, Earl of Aberdeen, on Henry Goulburn, and on Grattan; Mr. G. C. Boase on Lady Duff-Gordon, on Mrs. Gore, novelist, and on the Rev. C. G. Gorham, of the Gorham case; Mr. W. R. Morfill on Patrick Gordon, the friend of Peter the Great; Mr. Fuller Maitland on Sir John Goss; Mr. Edmund Gosse on Philip Henry Gosse; Mr. H. Manners Chichester on Lord Gough and Graham, Lord Lynedoch; Mr. Thompson Cooper on Richard Gough and the Rev. James Granger; Mr. G. T. Bettany on Gould the ornithologist; Mr. Sidney Lee on the poet Gower; Mr. S. Rawson Gardiner on James Graham, Marquis of Montrose; the Rev. Prof. Creighton on Sir James Graham; Mr. T. F. Henderson on John Graham of Claverhouse, Viscount Dundee; Mr. R. E. Graves on Sir Francis Grant, P.R.A.; Col. Knollys, R.A., on Sir James Hope Grant; Mr. W. P. Courtney on Richard Graves, author of 'The Spiritual Quixote'; and Prof. J. K. Laughton on Admiral Thomas, Lord Graves.

It is reported from Simla that Col. Hammond has been instructed by Sir Frederick Roberts to prepare for publication an abridged and expurgated edition of the 'History of the Second Afghan War,' which was compiled by Capt. S. Pasfield Oliver, R.A., under the orders and supervision of the late Sir Charles MacGregor, when that officer was Quartermaster-General in India, at least six years ago. It will be remembered that the original history was printed in six volumes by the Intelligence Branch of the Quartermaster-General's department at Simla and Calcutta, but was suppressed; and it was made official, and marked "strictly confidential."

THE annual general meeting of the shareholders in Messrs. Chapman & Hall, Limited, will be held on Thursday next. The gross profits for the past year amounted to 13,746l. 4s. 3d.; the expenses were 6,457l. 11s.; leaving, with the amount 71l. 9s. 6d. brought forward from last year, 7,360l. 2s. 9d. to be dealt with. The directors propose a dividend at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum on the preference capital, and a dividend at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum on the ordinary capital. They recommend that 500l. be written off the goodwill; that 100l. be added to the bad debt reserve; and that the balance of 117l. 3s. 7d. be carried forward.

THE title of Mr. William O'Brien's novel which we mentioned last week is to be 'When We Were Boys.' It will be issued as a six-shilling volume. A French translation from advanced sheets is to be brought out by Calmann Lévy.

MR. E. SIDNEY HARTLAND has edited a volume of 'English Folk-Tales' for the "Camelot Series." This will form the May volume. The April volume will be Ross's translation of Sadi's 'Gulistan,' including the introduction by Ross, a note upon whom is prefixed by Mr. Charles Saylor.

IT is reported that Mrs. Pitt-Byrne, who is favourably known as the author of 'Flemish Interiors,' is busy on a volume of her early social and literary recollections.

MR. HARRY FURNISS has just completed the illustrations for a new humorous story, which will be published next month in one volume by Messrs. Ward & Downey. It is entitled 'Perfervid: the Career of Ninian Jameison.'

IT is a pity that the Trustees have so far yielded to the memorial lately addressed to them as to allow telegrams and foreign letters to be delivered to readers at the British Museum; but we may be thankful that they stopped short of allowing the delivery of letters from the United Kingdom. The tendency to treat the Reading-Room as a club which exacts neither entrance fee nor subscription is already marked, and needs no further encouragement.

'TRUTHS TO LIVE BY' is the title of a new book which Archdeacon Farrar is now seeing through the press. It is intended as a companion volume to 'Every-Day Christian Life,' and will be published early next month by Messrs. Isbister.

SO rapid has been the development of the public library movement that Mr. Greenwood has found it necessary to rewrite the whole of his book on 'Free Public Libraries' in preparing for a third edition, which is now passing through the press.

SOME time ago the sum of 5,000l. was offered anonymously towards the formation of a free library at Brechin, in the north of Scotland, on the understanding that the inhabitants would adopt the Free Libraries Act. A poll has just been taken, when 620 votes were given in favour of the adoption, and 459 against it.

THE Society for the Preservation of the Irish Language in its annual report prints some statistics supplied by the Commissioners of National Education, showing the progress of the study of Irish in the national schools. Irish is taught in forty-five national schools, and the number of pupils who passed has risen from twelve in 1881 to over five hundred in 1889. With reference to intermediate education the Council have also to report highly satisfactory progress. The results of the recent examinations show that the number of boys who passed in Irish amounted to 273, while in 1883 it was under fifty.

MR. WALTER MONEY, F.S.A., the historian of Newbury, will shortly publish a history of the adjacent parish of Speen. Considerable attention is to be given to the disputed question of the sites of the Roman stations of Spine and Calleva.

"AULD WILL RITSON," of Wastdale Head (perhaps the most famous of story-tellers, though he never wrote a line of fiction), died last week in his eighty-third year. Through a quarter of a century he kept the most popular hostelry in the Lake country, and drew great numbers of visitors to the wild shores of Wastwater by his reputation as a story-teller alone. "Auld Will's" "cracks" and "teals" and "lees" were well known to the curious in every corner of the kingdom, and while most of them concerned the ways and whims and superstitions of the dalesfolk, some of them related to the famous men of letters—Wordsworth, the Coleridges, Southey, De Quincey, Scott, the Arnolds, and Clough—who lived or visited in Cumberland and Westmoreland. He had known some of these writers personally, and claimed to have known them all, and never let their good names fall flat for lack of a little amiable improvisation of personal "recollection." With Christopher North he had often wrestled, and he loved to tell of how he "put down the girt Professor with the cross-buttock." The genial old humourist will not soon be forgotten by lovers of North Country folk-lore.

MESSRS. CHATTO & WINDUS have in the press a new and cheap edition of the first series of Mr. Walford's 'Tales of Great Families,' which originally appeared in the Queen newspaper.

MESSRS. BELL & SONS are following up their successful reprint of Arthur Young's 'Travels in France' with a new edition of the same author's 'Tour in Ireland,' which is to appear in unabridged form, with introduction and notes by Mr. Arthur W. Hutton, librarian of the Gladstone Library at the National Liberal Club. It will form two volumes in "Bohn's Standard Library."

WE owe an apology to Mr. Thiselton Dyer for having accused him (Athen. No. 3252) of having in his recent book, 'The Loves and Marriages of some Eminent Persons,' made Mrs. Siddons announce her own death to her friends. On looking at the volumes again we find we had misread the passage, and entirely misrepresented Mr. Dyer.

THE death is announced of Dr. Solomon Schiller-Szinessy. Mr. Schiller-Szinessy was a German Jew who came to this country many years ago, and was a rabbi of a synagogue at Manchester, if we remember rightly. He was invited to Cambridge to catalogue the Hebrew manuscripts in the University Library, a task he has left unfinished, and was appointed for three years Teacher of Talmudic and Rabbinical Literature in 1866, a post transformed subsequently into a permanent readership. His knowledge of Rabbinical Hebrew was enormous, but he had little appreciation of modern critical methods, and clung to the traditional beliefs of his co-religionists. He was a pious, kind-hearted man, but somewhat quick-tempered, and became in consequence more than once involved in personal controversies. The decease of another Orientalist of note, Professor Gildemeister, of Bonn, has to be recorded.

WE ought not to omit to mention the death, at an advanced age, of Mr. J. F. Smith, who for many years, although unknown to Mr. Mudie's subscribers, was the writer of fiction most widely read in this country. Through the London Journal and similar periodicals he reached a much wider number of readers than even Dickens, and it is to his credit that, if his work was too slapdash to have literary merit, he never abused his influence, and it is impossible to deny him the faculty of invention. Had he had more ambition he might have produced more lasting work; but he would have had fewer readers.

THE principal Parliamentary Papers this week are Poor Relief, England and Wales, Statement of the Amount expended for In-maintenance and Outdoor Relief during the Half-year ended Michaelmas, 1889 (4d.); Navy Estimates for 1890-91 (1s. 6d.); Army Estimates for 1890-91 (1s. 10d.); Army Estimates, Explanatory Statement (3d.); Army, Volunteer Corps, Return (4d.); and Zululand, Further Correspondence (3d.).

SCIENCE

SOCIETIES.

ROYAL.—March 6.—The President in the chair.—The Secretary read the list of candidates for election into the Society.—The following papers were read: 'On a Second Case of the Occurrence of Silver in Volcanic Dust, namely, in that thrown out in the Eruption of Tunguragua, in the Andes of Ecuador, January 11th, 1886,' by Prof. J. W. Mallet; 'On the Tension of Recently Formed Liquid Surfaces,' by Lord Rayleigh; and 'On the Development of the Ciliary or Motor Oculi Ganglion,' and 'The Cranial Nerves of the Torpedo,' Preliminary Note, by Prof. J. C. Ewart.

BRITISH ARCHÆOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION.—March 5.—Mr. C. H. Compton in the chair.—Mr. E. Way exhibited some remarkable greybeard jugs found in Southwark, ornamented with coats of arms, and having Dutch inscriptions as well as the usual head and beard of Cardinal Bellarmine.—Mr. Davis described a candlestick of stone of small size found among some rubbish removed from a Gloucestershire church. It is circular in form and about 3 inches in height. Mr. Davis also produced a rubbing of a brass in Newlands Church, Forest of Dean, where a miner is depicted holding his candlestick in his mouth. It occurs on the brass called that of Sir R. Baynham. A rubbing of a brass in Wandsworth Church was also shown, dated 1420, in which a knight is represented with a mace at his girdle.—Mr. Saunders described the key of Portsmouth town, which was thrown into the harbour by Col. Goring on the surrender to the Parliamentary army. It is now in Mr. Saunders's possession, having been recovered in 1811.—Mr. Oliver exhibited one of the well-known forgeries of the celebrated traders in spurious antiquities known as "Billy and Charley." He did so as a warning to antiquaries, and the occasional exhibition of these articles will do a good deal to keep a record of their fabrication.—A paper, illustrated by a large collection of rubbings of the objects referred to, which occupied one side of the hall, was read by Mr. R. Allen on the pre-Norman sculptured stones of the West Riding of Yorkshire. In the comparatively limited district under review twenty-six different localities occur in which sculptured stones have been found in churchyards or in relation to churches, mostly in the valleys. The greatest number are found within a radius of twenty miles of Leeds. After dwelling upon the historical data, especially with regard to the introduction of Christianity in the seventh century, the lecturer referred to the style of ornamentation, which agrees in peculiarities of detail with what is found in other parts of the north of England, Lindisfarne probably being the centre of the art. The stones are covered with interlaced patterns, and consist of shafts and heads of crosses. Eleven inscribed stones have already been noted, one of which appears to relate to Osbert, killed in 867. Figure subjects occur not unfrequently, and at Bingley is an inscribed font, a photograph of which was exhibited.

ARCHÆOLOGICAL INSTITUTE.—March 6.—Earl Percy in the chair.—Mr. Oliver read a paper 'On the Brass of Roger Thornton in All Saints' Church, Newcastle-upon-Tyne.' This is the only Flemish brass of the fifteenth century in this country.—Mr. J. Park Harrison communicated the first part of a paper 'On Anglo-Norman Ornament compared with Designs in Anglo-Saxon Manuscripts.' He said that Mr. Thomas Wright, in the first number of the Archæological Journal, drew attention to the importance of studying architectural details in early illuminated manuscripts for the purpose of identifying Saxon remains. Examples derived from the Cottonian MS., Claudius, B. IV., in the British Museum, and Cadmon's 'Paraphrase' in the Bodleian Library, both dating from about the end of the tenth century, were shown by the above Saxon scholar to resemble very closely work in early churches like Deerhurst and Stopham. Mr. Harrison had carefully re-examined the above and other Saxon manuscripts, illustrated with architectural designs, in the two libraries, as well as the admirable reproductions of pre-Norman illuminations and pictures in Prof. Westwood's great work, derived from sources less accessible. Numerous details were mentioned showing that there certainly were buildings of a superior type to the majority of the churches now styled Saxon. The result, in fact, supported the later views of Mr. John Henry Parker regarding Saxon architecture, namely, that it was more ornamented and advanced than Norman was at the time of the Conquest. The absence of ornament, however, which characterized the new work appears to have been for many years enforced, though in time the native love of ornament reasserted itself, and combining with grander proportions produced the style which French archæologists rightly designate "Anglo-Norman." The paper was illustrated by diagrams and numerous sketches, showing that English churches in pre-Norman times possessed many features which archæologists in Normandy admit were not introduced into the two abbey churches at Caen, or into Normandy much before the middle of the twelfth century, and then apparently from England. An accurate drawing of a capital in the choir of Oxford Cathedral, by Mr. H. G. W. Drinkwater, was exhibited by Mr. Harrison. There were features in it that are met with in illuminated manuscripts of the tenth century, and it may, therefore, possibly have formed part of Ethelred's church.—Earl Percy exhibited a silver crescent-shaped object, probably of the fifteenth century. It was found about a year ago near Newnham Station, Northumberland. It was doubtful for what purpose this ornament had served, but as the crescent is the well-known badge of the Percy family, it was thought probable it might have been used as a badge for some retainer.

LINNEAN.—March 6.—Mr. Carruthers, President, in the chair.—Mr. S. Lithgow was admitted, and Messrs. J. Lowe, E. R. Waite, and G. F. Elliott were elected Fellows.—Mr. T. Christy exhibited a dried specimen of Pierantia antidesma, the plant from the bark of which a medicine known as Cas-cara amara, a useful alternative in diseases of the blood and skin, is believed to be prepared.—Mr. J. E. Harting exhibited a series of horns of the American prong-buck (Antilocapra americana) to illustrate the mode in which the shedding and new growth of horn is effected in this animal.—A paper was read by Mr. D. Morris on the production of seed in certain varieties of the sugar cane Saccharum officinorum. It was pointed out that, although well known as a cultivated plant, the sugar cane had nowhere been found wild, nor had the seed (caryopsis) been figured or described, it being the generally received opinion that, having been propagated entirely by slips or cuttings, it had lost the power of producing seed. Spikelets, however, received at Kew had been carefully examined and the seed found, which was now for the first time exhibited by Mr. Morris. He anticipated that by cross-fertilization and selection of seedlings the sugar cane might be greatly improved, and much importance was attached to the subject, as it opened up a new field of investigation in regard to sugar-cane cultivation.—Mr. J. G. Baker and Mr. Christy concurred.—A paper was read by Mr. S. Moore on the true nature of callus: Part I. 'The Vegetable Marrow and Ballia callitricha.' It was shown that the callus of sieve tubes of the vegetable marrow gives marked proteid reactions, and since it is dissolved in a peptonizing fluid there can be no doubt of its being a true proteid, and not a kind of starchy mucilage as is usually supposed. The "stoppers" of Ballia also yield proteid reactions, but inasmuch as they resist gastric digestion the substance cannot be a true proteid, and may perhaps be allied to lardacein. Mr. Moore maintained the view of Russow, Strassburger, and others, that callus is deposited upon the sieve, to be correct in the case of the vegetable marrow, since a peptonizing fluid clears the sieve plates and leaves them in their pristine condition, which would not be the case if callus were formed by a swelling up of the sieves.—A discussion followed, in which Dr. F. W. Oliver, Dr. D. H. Scott, Prof. J. R. Green, and Mr. G. Murray took part.

ZOOLOGICAL.—March 4.—Prof. W. H. Flower, President, in the chair.—The Secretary read a report on the additions to the menagerie during February.—Mr. F. E. Beddard exhibited and made remarks on some living specimens of an Indian earthworm (Pericheta indica) obtained from a greenhouse in Scotland.—Mr. A. Thomson exhibited a series of insects reared in the insect-house during the past year, and read a report on the subject. Particular attention was called to specimens of a South African mantis (Harpax ocellata) and of a Canadian stick-insect (Diapheromera femorata).—Mr. H. Seebohm read a paper on the classification of birds, being an attempt to diagnose the sub-classes, orders, sub-orders, and some of the families of existing birds. The characters upon which the diagnoses were based were almost entirely derived from points in the osteology, myology, and the pterylosis of the groups diagnosed.—A communication was read from Mr. T. D. A. Cockerell on some galls from Colorado, of which specimens were transmitted for exhibition.

ENTOMOLOGICAL.—March 5.—Capt. H. J. Elwes V.P., in the chair.—Mr. G. H. Kenrick and Lord Rendlesham were elected Fellows.—Mr. C. G. Barrett exhibited a number of specimens of Dianthea carophaga, Bork., bred by Mr. W. F. H. Blandford from larvae collected near Tenby on flowers of Silene maritima, and remarked that the series included a number of forms intermediate between D. carophaga and D. capsophila, thus establishing the fact that the latter is only a local variety of the former.—Messrs. W. H. B. Fletcher, W. F. H. Blandford, and M. Lachlan took part in a discussion as to the identity of the supposed species.—Mr. Barrett further exhibited a specimen of Dianthea luteago, var. barrettii, Db., also bred by Mr. Blandford from a larva found at Tenby, and he remarked that the species had not previously been taken in England; also a long series of forms intermediate between Catoptria scopiolana, Hw., and its small variety parvulana, Wilk., collected in Sussex, the Isle of Wight, and Pembrokeshire; also a specimen of Botys mutabilis, Zell., a species widely distributed in Asia and Africa, taken by Mr. C. S. Gregson near Bolton.—Mr. H. Goss exhibited several abnormal specimens of Arctia caja, bred last December. The object was to show the effect produced by forcing the larvae, and subjecting them to unusual conditions. It was stated that the peculiarity of the colour of the hind wings of the female parent had not been transmitted to any of the offspring.—Mr. Blandford referred to two specimens of a species of Cardiophorus from Tenby, which he had exhibited at the August meeting of the Society as Cardiophorus cinereus, and stated that subsequent investigation had led him to hand them to Mr. Champion for determination. Mr. Champion was of opinion that they did not belong to the same species; that one of them was C. asellus, Er., and the other probably C. guisetti, Hbst., a species new to this country.—The following papers were read: 'New Longicornia from Africa and Madagascar,' by Mr. C. J. Gahan; 'On a New Species of Thymara and other Species allied to Himantopterus fuscineervis, Wesm.,' by Capt. Elwes; 'On some Water Beetles from Ceylon,' by Dr. Sharp, and 'Notes on Lepidoptera from the Region of the Straits of Gibraltar,' by Mr. J. J. Walker.—Mr. F. Merrifield, Mr. B. G. Nevinston, Capt. Elwes, and Mr. G. Lewis took part in the discussion which ensued.—It was announced that papers had also been received from Mr. E. Meyrick, Prof. Westwood, and Mynheer P. C. T. Snellen.

CHEMICAL.—March 6.—Dr. W. J. Russell, President, in the chair.—The following were elected Fellows: Messrs. F. A. Anderson, P. Babington, G. R. Beardmore, R. Berncastle, B. Blount, K. F. Blake, H. H. Bunting, W. Burton, P. A. Cobbold, J. Dennant, F. Gossling, J. C. Jackson, J. S. Lumsden, A. E. Macintyre, F. Mills, I. Moore, J. Myles, R. R. Rothwell, E. Sergeant, and B. W. Valentin.—The President announced that the senior secretary would attend the meeting to be held in Berlin on March 11th, to celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of Prof. Kekulé's benzene theory, and would present an address from the Society.—The following papers were read: 'Some Crystalline Substances obtained from the Fruits of various Species of Citrus,' by Messrs. W. A. Tilden and C. R. Beck; 'Reduction of α -diketones,' by Mr. F. R. Japp and Dr. F. Klingemann; 'Studies on Isomeric Change, No. IV.: Halogen-derivatives of Quinone (First Notice),' by Mr. A. R. Ling; 'Note on a Phenyl Salt of Phenylthiocarbamic Acid,' by Dr. A. E. Dixon, and 'Contributions to the Chemistry of Thiocarbamides: Interaction of Benzyl Chloride and of Allyl Bromide with Thiocarbamide, Phenyl- and Diphenylthiocarbamides,' by Mr. E. A. Werner.

SOCIETY OF ARTS.—March 8.—The first lecture of a series of popular afternoon lectures was delivered by Prof. V. Lewes 'On the Atmosphere,' and was fully illustrated by experiments.

March 11.—Sir J. Linton in the chair.—A paper 'On the Claims of the British School of Painting to a Thorough Representation in the National Gallery' was read before the Applied Art Section by Mr. J. Orrock.

March 12.—Sir F. Bramwell in the chair.—A paper 'On the Chemin de Fer Glissant, or Sliding Railway,' was read by Sir D. Galton, and was followed by a discussion.

PHYSICAL.—March 7.—Prof. W. E. Ayrton, President, in the chair.—Sir H. Mance and Messrs. L. R. Shorter, C. Thompson, and A. D. Waller were elected Members.—Mr. S. P. Thompson described Bertrand's refractometer, and exhibited the capabilities of the instrument before the Society.—Mr. H. Tomlinson's paper 'On the Villari Critical Point in Nickel' was postponed.—Prof. Dunstan described an apparatus for distilling mercury in a vacuum devised by himself and Mr. W. Dymond, and showed the working of the arrangement.—Prof. S. U. Pickering read a paper 'On the Theory of Osmotic Pressure and its Bearing on the Nature of Solution.'

SHORTHAND.—March 5.—Mr. A. W. Kitson in the chair.—Mr. W. T. Hitchens was elected a Fellow.—Dr. Westby-Gibson read a paper 'On Simon Bordley, author of "Cadmus Britannicus," the first Script System of Shorthand, published 1787.' Only five copies of this work are at present known, and one of these has been destroyed to produce Mr. MacCaskie's facsimile publication of one hundred copies. Nothing had hitherto been known of the author, but Dr. Westby-Gibson has discovered that he was a Roman Catholic priest employed in missions in Lancashire. His father was a staunch Catholic, and an ancestor was one of the three hundred gentleman-companions of Edward II. Born in 1709, Bordley learned, at fourteen years of age, Mason's shorthand, then in vogue. He was educated at Douai, which place he left in 1735 to commence his work in Lancashire. After a long and active life, extending to ninety years, he died in 1799.—A discussion followed, chiefly on the old debatable question whether the popular German script systems had been influenced by prior publications of the kind in England.

MEETINGS FOR THE ENSUING WEEK.

- Mon. London Institution, 5.—'The Beginnings of Modern Europe,' II., Rev. Canon Benham.
- Aristotelian, 8.—Symposium, 'The Relation of the Fine Arts to One Another,' Messrs B. Bonquet, E. W. Cook, and D. G. Ritchie.
- Society of Arts, 8.—'Some Considerations concerning Colour and Colouring,' Lecture I., Prof. A. H. Church (Contor Lecture).
- Institute of British Architects, 8.
- Tues. Royal Institution, 3.—'The Post-Darwinian Period,' Prof. G. J. Romanes.
- Statistical, 7.—'Marriage-Rates and Marriage-Ages, with special reference to the Growth of Population,' Dr. W. Ogilvie.
- Society of Arts, 8.—'Brazil,' Mr. J. W. Wells.
- Civil Engineers, 8.—'Lough Erne Drainage,' Mr. J. Price, Jun.
- Zoological, 8.—'South American Canids,' Dr. Mivart; 'Revision of the Genera of Scorpions of the Family Buthidae, with Descriptions of some New South African Species,' Mr. R. I. Pocock; 'Some Points in the Anatomy of the Condor,' Mr. F. E. Beddard.
- Wed. Meteorological, 7.—'Photography in relation to Meteorological Work,' Mr. G. M. Whipple; 'Application of Photography to Meteorological Phenomena,' Mr. W. Marriott.
- Microscopical, 8.—'Variations of the Female Reproductive Organs, especially the Vagina, in different Species of Uropea,' Mr. A. D. Michael.
- Society of Arts, 8.—'Commercial Geography,' Mr. J. S. Kettle.

- Wed. British Archaeological Association, 8.—'The Seal of the "Dean of Newbury," 1422,' Mr. W. Money.
- Thurs. Royal Institution, 3.—'The Early Developments of the Forms of Instrumental Music,' Mr. F. Nicols.
- Royal, 4.
- London Institution, 6.—'The Beginnings of Modern Europe,' III., Rev. Canon Benham.
- Numismatic, 7.
- Electrical Engineers, 8.
- Linnean, 8.—'External Morphology of the Lepidopterous Pupa, Part II., The Antennae and Wings,' Mr. E. B. Poulton; 'The Intestinal Canal of the Ichthyopsidæ, with special reference to its Aerial Supply,' Prof. G. B. Howes.
- Chemical, 8.—'The Evidence afforded by Petrographical Research of the Occurrence of Chemical Change under Great Pressure,' Prof. Judd.
- Historical, 8.—'Frederick the Great's Invasion of Saxony and the Prussian Mémoire Raisonné, 1756,' Mr. A. R. Hopes.
- Antiquaries, 8.
- Fri. United Service Institution, 3.
- Physical, 5.—'The Villari Critical Point of Nickel,' Mr. H. Tomlinson; 'Bertrand's Idiosyncrasy of Nickel,' Prof. S. Thompson.
- Civil Engineers, 7.—'Economy Trials of a Compound Mill-Engine and Lancashire Boilers,' Mr. L. A. Legros (Students' Meeting).
- Philologists, 8.—'Albanian, Modern Greek, Gallo-Italic, Provençal, and Illyrian still (1889) in use in the Neapolitan and Sicilian Provinces of Italy,' Prince L. L. Bonaparte.
- London Institution, 8.—'Ruskin and Reynolds, their Theories of Art,' Mr. W. G. Collingwood.
- Royal Institution, 9.—'Electro-Magnetic Radiation,' Prof. G. F. Fitzgerald.
- Sat. Royal Institution, 3.—'Electricity and Magnetism,' Lord Rayleigh.
- Botanic, 3.—'Election of Fellows.'
- Society of Arts, 5.—'The Atmosphere,' Prof. V. Lewes (Popular Lecture).

Science Gossip.

THE tide of competition for the Fellowship of the Royal Society has again this year overflowed high-water mark, the number of candidates for the fifteen vacancies being no fewer than seventy-five. This increase has taken place within the last seven years; for at least thirty years before that the average was stationary at fifty.

It is proposed to hold a special meeting of the Chemical Society on Thursday, May 8th, for the exhibition of new interesting apparatus or specimens.

DR. SYMES THOMPSON will shortly publish, through Messrs. Percival & Co., a revised edition of his late father's 'Annals of Influenza,' formerly published by the Sydenham Society. The new edition will contain, besides a history of previous epidemics, a full account of the severe outbreak of 1847 as well as of the present epidemic.

THE Camera Club will hold its fourth annual conference on Thursday and Friday next, under the presidency of Capt. Abney, F.R.S. Papers will be read by Capt. Abney, Lord Rayleigh, C. H. Bothamley, Mr. A. A. Common, F.R.S., Mr. Lyonel Clark, Mr. Dallmeyer, Mr. Rossi, and Mr. W. T. Wilkinson.

THE forthcoming volume of the "Contemporary Science Series" will be 'The Village Community,' by Mr. G. L. Gomme, the Director of the Folk-lore Society. This volume will treat of the village community with special reference to its survival in Britain. It will contain several maps and plans.

INTELLIGENCE has just reached us of the death of Miss Lucy E. Sewall, M.D., of Boston, U.S. She was the daughter of the late Samuel E. Sewall, of Boston, a well-known abolitionist, who died aged eighty-nine about two years ago. A Correspondent writes:—

"Though her father was wealthy, she determined at a very early period in her life to adopt the medical profession. She began her studies with Dr. M. E. Zakrzewska, and was one of the first women who took a medical degree in the United States. She afterwards studied at Boston, London, Paris, Vienna, and in Belgium. For many years she had a very large practice at Boston and in the neighbourhood, and was for some time the resident physician of the New England Hospital for Women and Children. She continued one of the regular attending physicians of the hospital until about three years ago, when she was chosen a member of the Advisory Board. In a private letter, written last October to the writer of this notice, she said, 'Five years ago I broke down completely, and since then I have not been able to visit any patients, and am shut up in the house nearly all the winter.' Miss Sewall was a frequent visitor to this country, and had attached friends in many parts of England. Her gentle manners and sweet, soft voice will long be remembered by those who had the pleasure of her friendship."

THE scientific results of the German expedition to the Pacific, carried out under the command of Freiherr G. von Schleinitz, captain of the Gazelle, in the years 1874-76, almost simultaneously with the Challenger, will shortly be published by the Hydrographic Bureau of the Admiralty at Berlin in five volumes. The first will give an account of the voyage; the second will be devoted to the physical and chemical results; the third to zoology and geology; the fourth to botany; and the last to the meteorological observations. The work will be profusely illustrated.

FINE ARTS

THE TUDOR EXHIBITION, NEW GALLERY.

(Third Notice.—The Holbeins continued.)

Few pictures have such an important bearing on the history of art in England as the portrait belonging to the Queen, Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey (No. 73), a striking whole-length, life-size figure, somewhat awkwardly designed, and more quaint than beautiful. The earl wears a dress of pure red, and stands with his feet wide apart in Henry VIII's manner (a curious instance of an imitative fashion which was flattery of the monarch); but the legs are lean and curiously unlike the king's. It was painted, no doubt, during that period of warm attachment between the two Henrys which preceded the downfall of the earl, who evidently "dressed after" his master. The confusion in which the history of pictures at the period is involved is illustrated by the fact that the work has been variously ascribed to Holbein, to G. Stretes, and to the artist of the Duke of Norfolk's 'Earl of Surrey' (51), which, we have already said, is in all probability due to Girolamo da Treviso—to whom a portrait of Sir Thomas Gresham in Gresham College (R.A. 1880, 165) has been on good grounds assigned by Mr. Scharf. The probabilities are in favour of Stretes; yet we do not recognize in No. 73 the handiwork of the painter of the portrait of Edward VI. which was at the Manchester Art Treasures in 1857, or of any other pictures of that monarch, such as the Christ's Hospital version, which Dallaway attributed to Stretes. Nor can we see any technical likeness between No. 73 and No. 101, Henry VIII. and his Family, which is also ascribed to Stretes. The former, indeed, may be the work of a Low Country artist, but the latter seems to be essentially Italian. Among the charms of No. 73 are its brilliancy, the richness of the red costume, and the very strong impression it produces of having been painted in the open air—a quality rare in ancient portraiture. J. Gough Nichols was probably right in suggesting that it is No. 1474 in Chiffinch's catalogue of King James's pictures, described as by Holbein and "King Henry VIII. when he was prince, at length, in red."

Sir Nicholas Poyntz the Younger (79), a young man with a beak-like nose, is an excellent Holbein, of which in No. 493 we have the master's original drawing on a smaller scale. This circumstance has, we think needlessly, led some to doubt the genuineness of the picture, although the draughtsmanship is of the choicest kind. The flesh painting is identical with that of 'John Reskemeer' (72), the 'Duke of Norfolk' (91), and the 'Duchess of Milan' (92). The picture is a fine replica of the portrait lent as No. 246 by M. De la Rozière to the Alsace-Lorraine Exhibition, Paris, 1874 (see Athen. No. 2432, p. 770). The Portrait of a Man (82), lent by the Duke of Devonshire, is an ordinary German work, not at all like a Holbein, to whom, on the strength of Waagen's notice, it is attributed in the Catalogue. Is not the drawing styled Sir Nicholas Poyntz (500) really a likeness of his relation John Poyntz, of North Wokendon, Essex, ob. 1558? and does not No. 562 represent the same person? There is no authority for ascribing to Holbein such a work as Queen Anne Boleyn (81) or Mary Tudor, Dowager Queen of France (83), which latter belongs to Earl Brownlow. It may be by a French miniaturist trained in the school of Clouet, and is not like the queen. It depicts a fat woman of at least thirty-five. This work must have been painted c. 1532, in which case the costume is against its being a portrait of the queen. Technically speaking, its modelling and drawing are fine and exhaustive, and evince the wondrous patience of the artist, who worked exquisitely and without finching on the pearls and jewellery of a highly interesting picture. Mr. Butler's Earl of Surrey (84) is not by Holbein, and does not resemble his work, but is an inferior German picture of a German gentleman. The Rev. Hugo Price (86), lent by Jesus College, Oxford, is one of those pictures which it makes critics angry to see attributed to Holbein. It is not even of Holbein's school. The portrait of Sir Anthony Denny (88) is interesting on other grounds than the Catalogue mentions; he was the Keeper of the King's Pictures, and he was intimate with Holbein, who designed for him the famous clock which was given in 1545 to Henry VIII. as a New Year's gift by Sir Anthony. Sir Anthony was Keeper of the King's House, and as such prepared a most valuable catalogue of 'Stuff and Implements at Westminster.' Sir H. Guldeford (90), a genuine Holbein, but much injured (its surface is greatly chilled), was at Manchester in 1857, at the National Portrait Exhibition in 1866, at Leeds in 1868, and at the Academy in 1880. In the background is the branch of vine which occurs in the Darmstadt 'Madonna,' the 'Dietrich Born' at Windsor, in 'Reskemeer' (72), and other Holbeins. The excessive brownness of the carnations and their hot shadows are not, as Dr. Woltmann thought, due to a peculiarity of the statesman's complexion (he was undoubtedly of a very bilious habit), but to deterioration of the picture. The stern, energetic character of the man is visible in his resolute eyes, which seem blood-shot, his thin, compressed lips and knitted brow. His dress of cloth of gold superbly embroidered under a black surcoat lined with fur, his black cap with an enseigne in it, his large frame, and the firm and masculine hands (as is characteristic of all fine Holbeins), enable us to realize the splendid appearance of Sir Henry, and make the visitor quite believe him to have been that "whipunto the Frenchmen" Holinshed said he was. This picture was finely engraved by Hollar in 1647, and successively by Vertue, Bartolozzi, and Richardson. The much-rubbed drawing for the picture, and equal to it in character, is No. 491.

The finest Holbein in this collection is the Duke of Norfolk's Christina, Duchess of Milan (92), about whom the absurd story is told that she declined to succeed Jane Seymour as King Henry's wife because she had only one neck. The fact is she was quite willing to run the risk, and her family backed her ambition. This picture was painted in 1538-41. Wornum's 'Holbein' gives a full account of the history of the picture. It is mentioned in Sir A. Denny's Catalogue of Henry VIII's pictures at Westminster as "Item, a greute Table with the picture of the Duchyess of Myllayne, beinge her whole stature." This was in 1542. In 1574 Federigo Zuccherò saw it in Lord Pembroke's collection at London, and said he had not seen anything so fine in Rome. Afterwards it belonged to the Earl of Arundel, and was at Tart Hall, and has since remained with the Howards. Vertue saw it at their mansion in Soho Square. The duchess as a child figures in the Mabuse unhappily styled 'Three Children of Henry VII.' now at Hampton Court, which Mr. Scharf (Archæologia, xxix. 245) has proved represents the children of Christian II., King of Denmark. An inferior version is No. 19 on these walls. No. 92 was No. 177 at the Academy in 1880. It has suffered but little from time or the restorer. Less fortunate in this respect, but injured only in the darker shadows of the face and throat, is Mr. E. Huth's Sir T. More (94), dated 1527, which doubtless was the first picture Holbein painted in England. The original drawing, from Windsor, is No. 512, and the work—in this resembling 'Sir H. Guldeford,' which is dated in the same year, and was probably Holbein's second portrait in this country—strongly reminds us of his continental work of early dates, such as the 'Erasmus' in the Louvre and the 'Dead Christ' at Basle. As a reading of character it equals the 'Duchess of Milan,' and it brings out what Walpole aptly called "the piercing genius of More." There can be no doubt that it is one of the pictures by Holbein which King Henry admired when he visited More at Chelsea. It is an incomparable portrait, and was much admired at the National Portrait Exhibition, 1866, and at the Academy in 1870 and 1881. More is clean shaven, although at his execution in 1535 his beard was so long that he put it aside, remarking that, as it had done no treason, it ought not to suffer. The expression of the drawing is sterner than that of the picture. Baldinucci mentions a strange legend that there was at Whitehall a portrait of More, which, on the day of his execution, and after the king had reproached her, Anne Boleyn encountered, and, deeply piqued by the steady gaze of the picture, dragged it from the wall and threw it out of the window, where it was carried off to Rome by a passer-by. Of this story Wornum, in 1867, gave a spirited account. In our columns, June 19th, 1886, Dr. A. Jessopp repeated a version of the same tale from the papers of Roger North. North says the portrait was a Holbein, and that the king himself flung it away. The picture before us belonged to Mr. Farrer, who sold it to the late Mr. L. Huth. The Duke of Orleans had a Sir T. More ascribed to Holbein. On the 15th of February, 1649, Evelyn saw at Sir T. Ducie's "some excellent things in miniature and in oil of Holbein's: Sir Thomas More's head, and a whole-length figure of Edward VI." Sir John Cheke (95), whose portrait is here ascribed to Holbein, is the person who is said to have written the names of their subjects on some at least of the Queen's Holbein drawings, Nos. 491-573, which add so much to the charm of this exhibition. The picture is not by Holbein. The same may be said of No. 96, William, Lord Paget, Katherine of Aragon (98), and A Spanish Nobleman (99), all lent by the Duke of Manchester. They are by a member of the school of which Holbein was the ablest representative. No. 98 wears a German costume, and is not in the least like the queen. No. 97, Henry VIII., lent by the same owner, is also no Holbein, but belongs to the Warwick Castle type of the king's portrait—see No. 126, which is the best of a somewhat numerous class painted after Holbein's death. No. 97 is flat, shadowless, thin, and timid, i.e., in all those respects quite different from the master's style.

The Earl of Pembroke's so-called Sir John More (100) is a noble portrait. At one time it was denied that it was a genuine ancient picture, and we are not sure it is a Holbein. In the first place, Holbein painted the More family in 1529, when Sir John was seventy-six years of age, and the figure which bears his name in the Basle drawing, as well as in all the versions of the marvellous group of which it is the prototype, shows the venerable age of the judge, who died in the next year. Now the face of Lord Pembroke's picture not only differs radically from that of Sir John in the group in respect to the inalterable forms of the skull and harder features (to say nothing of the expression, which alters only in degree, and not even in advanced age wholly), but it represents a man of not more than fifty-three years; therefore, if Sir John sat for it, he must have done so in 1506, when Holbein was eleven years old. Even if we allow that the picture represents a man of sixty, it does not come near the limits of Holbein's career. Apart from this, the dramatic character of this portrait, which is indicated by the action of holding a paper in one hand, and holding up the other with the forefinger extended, is very unlike anything Holbein ever attempted in his portraits. Holbein's drawing for Judge More's portrait is No. 509 in the West Gallery, and refers to that "Family picture" which, we have no doubt, was never finished by Holbein, but, having been carried out by another hand, remains at Lord St. Oswald's, as described in "The Private Collections of England, No. LIX., Nostel Priory." In favour of No. 100 being by one of Holbein's school, if not by him, the technique, draughtsmanship, and peculiar elements of the background, especially the piece of drapery supported by architectonic statues, may be mentioned, together with the brownness of the shadows (see 'Sir H. Guldeford') and the quality of the carnations. On the other hand, the modelling of the somewhat flabby and relaxed flesh, the questionable foreshortening of the right hand, and the bad drawing of its index finger, as well as the somewhat weak and loose outlining of the eyelids and lips, are all against its claims to be a Holbein. If it is his we must ascribe it to the period of the Darmstadt 'Madonna,' c. 1520, before the master came to England, and agree to think it is a portrait of a German dignitary. That it represents a judge is disproved by the costume of a crimson, fur-lined vest, fastened with gold buttons and showing a white shirt.

MINOR EXHIBITIONS.

At Messrs. Agnew's may be seen one of the valuable series of fine English water-colour drawings for which the Old Bond Street Galleries are renowned. The collection illustrates the progress of the art during the past and current generations, beginning with Turner and Girtin, and well deserves a visit, the profit of which would have been enhanced if the examples had been hung in chronological order. As this has been neglected, we may notice the following in the order of the Catalogue. No. 11, De Wint's On the Yare, is a characteristic example, less simple in its composition than most De Wints.—William Hunt's Flower-Seller (20) is of his best time, and the colour is admirable.—Prout's Nuremberg (25) depicts the porch of St. Sebald's in that clever and dexterous draughtsman's best way; the same may be said for his Belgian Town (89).—Minthead (28), a fine panorama by De Wint, is excellent; the atmosphere is capital. There is a great deal of dignity about his Norwich Bridge (35); Kenilworth (80) is worthy of the fine print taken from it.—A capital example of its kind is Mr. A. Powell's Clearing after Rain, Ulleswater (53).—The Spring (44) of F. Walker is the choice drawing of a girl gathering primroses in a hazel copse, which Mr. R. W. Macbeth is engraving. It differs in some respects from most Walkers. Its rusticity is peculiarly happy, and the draughtsmanship is capital.—The best of several David Coxes is Crossing the Bridge (91), which is firm, pure tinted, and brilliant. We care less for Snowdon (112); still, it is worthy of the painter.—The drawing which Mr. F. Powell calls A Freshening Breeze (121) is first rate, spontaneous, and fine in movement and taste.—Mr. Poynter's Moorish Garden (134) we have already admired.—Bossiney Bay (137) is a representative specimen of Mr. S. P. Jackson's pathos and mannerisms. To enjoy it the visitor must be in a mood in harmony with its motives.—Waiting for the Tide (175) is a bright drawing by Mrs. Allingham, and Surrey Cottage (222) is charmingly fresh and rural.—The Industrious Maiden (169) is a pretty specimen of genre by Mr. A. F. Hughes; and so are Dora (181) and Pamela (201), by Mr. G. D. Leslie. The last is full of demure grace.—Turner's Amphitheatre at Verona (234) is one of his admirable studies of light and colour.—Very good is the representative Evening Time of G. Barret; though mannered and a hackneyed subject, it is poetic.—The Wounded Cavalier (242) is a version of the chief figures in a picture belonging to Mr. A. Wood of Conway, 'The Puritan,' painted by Mr. W. S. Burton, which created a great sensation in 1852. We are glad to hear, notwithstanding reports to the contrary, which were due doubtless to his long abstention from exhibitions, that this artist is still in the land of the living.—The Cavalier in Waiting of M. E. Meissonier, a soldier at the gate of a barrack in sunlight, looking eagerly upwards at some one behind us, is a fine, solid, and thoroughly firm and finished drawing.—Turner's St. Michael's Mount (287) is the original of a capital plate in 'England and Wales.'—The First Swallow (278) has been, we are told, etched by M. E. Gaujean; it is one of Frederick Walker's sweetest idylls.—Other excellent drawings are Near Keswick (5) of De Wint, and his Harvest in the Midlands (14), a well-known instance; F. Walker's Autumn (38); Mr. H. G. Hine's Swanage (60); Dodgson's Whitby Abbey (126); the massive and pearly High Torr, Derbyshire (136), of De Wint; a group of German, French, and Italian subjects by Mr. B. Foster, No. 174 to No. 207; Mr. G. Frapp's Haymaking (209); G. Chambers's bright and airy Northfleet (245); Turner's Bridge of Sighs, engraved in Byron's 'Works' (279); and Sir J. E. Millais's Martyr of the Solway (267), which is not, of course, his best work.

BRONZE SHIELDS.

Bottesford Manor, Brigg.

BRUMBY is a hamlet in the parish of Frodingham, in the wapentake of Manley, Lincolnshire. But a few years ago its very name was unknown beyond the immediate neighbourhood, except to a few students of history who were aware that some people had guessed that this was the spot where the battle of Brunanburh was fought in 937 (see 'Anglo-Sax. Chron.' sub anno), for no reason whatever, as far as I can see, except that the two places both begin with the letter B. Now it has become an important member of the great North Lincolnshire iron field.

In a district in Brumby known as the East Common the iron-stone lies very near the surface; it is, indeed, only covered by a thin layer of sand and peat. Some little time ago, I think in the early part of November, the workmen engaged in baring the stone discovered the bronze coating of an ancient shield, probably Celtic. Very few of these shields have ever been found in Britain, and I believe that they are almost unknown on the Continent. Mr. Evans's 'Ancient Bronze Implements' contains an account of all that were known when his book was published. The Brumby example is not quite like any of those described by him. Unhappily the workmen injured it with their picks, but it is still a very fine specimen. It is 2 ft. 2 in. in diameter, and is ornamented with 63 concentric circles, about three-sixteenths of an inch wide. The bronze is very thin. It is quite certain that it must have been mounted on something. The older antiquaries were of opinion that these thin sheets of ornamental metal-work were intended to be affixed upon a wooden foundation. It seems, however, more probable that a thick circle of ox hide was the material employed. It may be well to note that a few days after the discovery of the shield a large bronze spearhead of late Celtic type was found near the same place.

In 1843 one of these bronze shields was found in Burringham moors, three or four miles from the spot where the Brumby shield was discovered. It had only 19 concentric circles, which were ornamented by many small knobs or studs.

I have been at some trouble to make out, as far as possible, the conditions under which shields of this character have been found. It seems probable that most of those that have come down to us have not been lost in battle, but have been hidden in the ground for safe keeping.

EDWARD PEACOCK.

SALES.

MESSRS. CHRISTIE, MANSON & WOODS sold on the 7th inst. the following drawings: J. Hardy, jun., The Keeper's Daughter, 52l. J. M. W. Turner, Zurich, 69l. E. W. Cook, Wordsworth's

Walk, 81l. R. Thorne Waite, Christchurch, Hampshire, 84l.

The same auctioneers sold on the 8th inst. the following pictures: Mrs. Anderson, The Story-Book, 157l. H. Dawson, Early Morning, 115l.; Lancaster, 126l.; Hastings, 131l.; Lincoln, 204l.; The Houses of Parliament and Westminster Abbey from the River, 425l.; The Retaking of the Hermione, 152l.; York, 241l.; Ely Cathedral, 278l.; Windermere, 168l.; St. Paul's, 630l.; The Tower of London from the River, 357l. F. H. Henshaw, A Forest Scene, 201l.; The Forest of Arden, 162l. Hublin, Orpheline, 106l.; The Mendicants, 115l. A. Johnston, The Turning Point, 126l. B. W. Leader, A Lock on the Thames, 141l.; Tintern Abbey, 141l.; On Dartmoor, 152l.; On the Lugwy, 441l. G. B. O'Neill, Sympathy, 110l. A. J. Woolmer, Romeo and Juliet, 100l. J. Brett, Gurnsey, 120l. Vicat Cole, Spring, 420l. G. Smith, The Last Scene in the Gambler's Home, 178l. T. Webster, The Pedlar, 220l.

NOTES FROM CYPRUS.

Salamis, Feb. 15, 1890.

SINCE our last report the excavations here have progressed favourably. The results continue good, and the promise for the future is excellent. Only one hindrance has been met: rain has stopped the digging for three days out of the twelve, but from now up to the second week of March we need expect little further interruption of the kind.

Practically our efforts have been confined this fortnight to our third site, that close to the most conspicuous ruin of Salamis, the building known to the villagers as the λουτρόν. The site is a long depression, 750 ft. by 205 ft., and is terminated at the northern end by the Loutron, at the southern by a hillock which, as our excavations seem to show, is composed almost entirely of loose earth and debris, and represents but a slight natural rise in the ground. This depression is occupied by a double colonnade of large limestone pillars, marking out a parallelogram, so far as we have yet excavated, of 680 ft. by 110 ft. The columns are plain, of Roman work, probably about the time of Hadrian, with a pedestal of 3 ft. 6 in. upper diameter, and a capital 2 ft. 4 in. high, 4 ft. 9 in. in diameter, and 6 ft. 9 in. in diagonal measurement. The style is Roman Corinthian, the device folia relieved by bunches of grapes, and with high volutes at the corner. The height of the columns we have not as yet been able to determine, but their base diameter is 3 ft. Beyond the row of columns there was probably an outer wall, forming a closed colonnade. This wall is as yet not determined. On either side the columns there would seem to have been a tessellated marble pavement, several sections of which we have already opened. The mosaics referred to in our last report—and we have now found a third—were probably later additions when the colonnade wall began to be used by later builders as a foundation for private houses and similar erections.

So far as the present position of the excavations is concerned, the eastern colonnade wall has been laid open for almost its entire length, the western for half that distance. Many bases and podia have been found, and the intercolumniation is fairly fixed at 16 ft. The south-east, north-east, and north-west angles are also, in all probability, ascertained; but the south-west presents a difficulty, as the colonnade seems here to continue beyond its natural limit. This, with many other problems, remains to be solved by further excavation. At the north end there may have been a front of a double row of columns; all indications so far point that way.

The question remains what was this site, which above ground is at once the largest and the finest in Salamis. Fortunately we have found portions of an inscription which seems to throw a much-needed light on the point. Unluckily for us, this inscription—and there is a second of the same character—is not graven in the stone, but was formed of huge bronze letters (no longer, of course, remaining) soldered on to large marble blocks. From the traces still left, in the shape of socket-holes and shallow grooves, the word FORUM may, almost with certainty, be read, together with probably the title PROFATOR of the restorer of this fine site, which was therefore, at least in Roman times, the Agora of Salamis.

As regards our two other sites previously mentioned, the first may now be considered as definitely abandoned. The second—that of a temple buried in the sand—has been inevitably idle pending the arrival of wheelbarrows, which at the time I write this, I am happy to say, have just reached us. The two days' work which, during this fortnight, the temple site has received, resulted in the discovery, among other things, of a statue of Hades seated, with the triple-headed snake-entwined Cerberus by his side. The statue is in dark blue marble, the flesh surfaces being given in white, a combination which recalls in some degree the famous Sarapis of Bryaxis. Of other finds I may mention more especially a series of five inscribed statue-bases which were found in a cement floor, apparently of an olive-press, on the outside of the Agora site. One of these formerly carried a statue of the Empress Livia. Many fragments, greater and less, of other inscriptions have been found. These five are, however, certainly the most important. A most interesting point arising out of our work on the Agora site is that of the intention of the large building of late Roman times already referred to, the so-called Loutron. We have opened now three large subterranean water-channels, which it is probable will render possible the settlement of the vexed question how far the Loutron deserves its name.

H. A. TUBBS.

Fine-Art Gossip.

THE Winter Exhibition of the Royal Academy will be closed to-day (Saturday).

ONE of Sir John Millais's landscapes which we described last week, and probably a new landscape by Mr. Hook, will go to the New Gallery Exhibition, to which gallery Mr. Alma Tadema has promised one of his loveliest minor paintings, a love scene.

THE Society of British Artists contemplates a new departure during the ensuing summer. It will hold a special exhibition of sketches and studies, including designs of a decorative character. Apart from the desire to exhibit studies and sketches, as distinct from finished pictures, the Society feels that purely decorative art is every year interesting a greater number of persons, as an increasing number of distinguished painters devote themselves to it. There exists at present no exhibition in which adequate representation is given to the higher forms of decorative design. Examples will be received at the Society's gallery on the 12th of June next, and may include oil and water colours, drawings in monochrome, pastels, models and sculptures in bas-relief, and decorative designs of a pictorial character, not those which are simply ornamental or made for manufacture. Sketches and studies must be framed with white mounts.

We are at liberty to state that Sir Frederic Leighton will not admit visitors to see his pictures to-morrow (Sunday). In fact, he has at present no pictures to show.

ON the 18th inst. Messrs. Christie, Manson & Woods will sell the numerous and curious collection of sale catalogues and the art library of Mr. George Redford, whose knowledge of picture sales, picture histories, and pedigrees is quite unparalleled and has often been tested. On this occasion the auctioneers will dispose of that body of rare catalogues used by Mr. Redford in compiling his elaborate 'Art Sales,' which we noticed at length some time ago. Most of these records are marked with the prices obtained for the works sold. Immediately after the dispersion of these examples Messrs. Christie will sell the books of the late Mr. T. O. Barlow, R.A., as well as some publications of the Etching Club, including etchings by Messrs. J. C. Hook, Calderon, Pettie, and Hodgson, and Sir John Millais.

AMONG the collections of T. O. Barlow, to be sold by Messrs. Christie, Manson & Woods on the 20th, 21st, 22nd, and 24th inst., are many interesting pictures and relics. There is an impression of the 'Nightmare,' in which Mr. F. Sandys satirized the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood and Mr. Ruskin; rare prints of the 'Liber Studiorum,' Cousin's, Barlow's proofs of the 'Huguenot,' 'First Sermon,' and 'Effie Deans,' after Sir J. Millais; drawings by Mulready, Phillip, Landseer, S. Cousins, Bonington, Mr. J. C. Hook, E. Landren, and Sir J. Millais; and pictures, including the 'Fortune,' by which Mr. Hook got the Academy Painting Medal, his very brilliant finished study for 'Luff, Boy!' and 'Song and Accompaniment,' J. Phillip's portrait of Sir J. Millais at thirteen years old, and other works of his, Mr. Pettie, John Linnell, Constable, Landseer, Nasmyth, W. Hunt, Oakes, S. Bough, and a beautiful Leslie called 'A Lady in a Dutch Dress' (R.A. 1884). On the 22nd inst. also will be sold thirteen works of Mr. G. F. Watts, the property of the late Mr. W. Carver, including 'The Red Cross Knight and Una,' 'Love and Death,' the horses of the Apocalypse (four pictures), 'Hope,' 'Cupid,' and 'The Dove that returneth no More.'

"By special desire" it has been decided that the Tudor Exhibition shall remain open until the 13th of April, instead of being closed on the 6th of that month, as originally intended.

THE receiving days for the spring exhibition of the New English Art Club are Monday and Tuesday next. The club has secured the use of the galleries comprised in Humphrey's Mansions, Knightsbridge. The private view is fixed for Saturday, March 29th.

A CORRESPONDENT calls attention to the inscription quoted in the Catalogue of the exhibition at Burlington House as borne by No. 88, a 'Landscape with Cattle,' to which we lately referred as possibly a work of Paul Potter, 'Paulus Potter, 1657, fecit.' It is unfortunate that M. T. van Westreheene in his 'Paulus Potter, sa Vie et ses Œuvres,' 1867, p. 72, states that the register of the Administration of the Orphans of the Chapelle, or Lieu Saint, records that Paulus Potter, painter, of the Old Sheep Market, near the Tower of the Réguliers, Amsterdam, was interred on the 17th of January, 1654. On the margin of this document is a note to the effect that Adriana Balckeneynde, the widow of Potter, produced his will, executed on the 2nd of January, 1653, before the notary Salomon van Nieuland. The date of his birth is uncertain, but unquestionably he was baptized on the 20th of November, 1625, at Enkhuizen, which place his father, Pieter Potter, quitted for Amsterdam, where he was admitted a burgess on the 14th of October, 1631; he lived in the Breestraat, near Rembrandt, then residing in the same street.

THE obituary of the 4th inst. records the death, in his eightieth year, at Hambleden, Henley-on-Thames, of Mr. John Sebastian Gwilt, architect, one of the sons of Joseph Gwilt, architect and compiler of the 'Encyclopædia of Architecture,' for which he prepared illustrations and otherwise assisted his father and elder brother Joseph, with whom the deceased was associated in a project for a new National Gallery.

MR. G. D. LESLIE's pictures intended for the Royal Academy are two. He will send one to the New Gallery. The most important work is a landscape, called 'The Monks of Abingdon,' and partly real, partly ideal. The studies for it were made in a backwater of the Thames near Abingdon, close to the place where the ancient monastery stood; the building he restored on his canvas from Dorchester Abbey Church, a few miles off. It is an evening scene, and represents two Benedictine monks, in their black raiment, fishing in the river, while the daylight fades from out the sky. Mr. Leslie's other picture for the Academy shows a girl in a blue dress, sitting on a stone bench placed on the terrace of an English garden, and musing while the evening twilight gathers. Beauty of its coloration and tonality are the chief things aimed at. The name by which the picture is to be known will be settled by-and-by. The little painting intended for the minor gallery represents two girls, the artist's daughters, watering their home garden. The elder is pouring water out of her own larger can into the toy can of her younger sister, which is emptied instantly, as children's cans usually are. It will be called 'Quite Happy.'

MR. CALDERON has nearly finished for the next Academy exhibition an unusually important picture, representing 'Hagar in the Wilderness,' seated on a natural bench of stone, part of a group of huge rocks on the margin of a hollow in an immense desert, of which we have a partial view extending to the broken horizon, which is sharply defined against the sunset sky. The shadow of evening is slowly closing on the scene. Hagar, who leans sideways with her clasped hands pressed upon the bench, is brooding over the injustice of her fate, and her face tells her story. She is dressed in white. Besides this work Mr. Calderon has in 'Lady Betty' painted a genre subject, being the life-size, three-quarters-length figure of a comely lady seated sideways in a chair, and, with chin on hand, looking over her shoulder with a serene and musing expression, as if her mind was occupied with far-away thoughts. Good colour has been made with the complexion, the red dress and dark grey fur of the day-dreamer. In addition the Keeper of the Royal Academy will probably send for exhibition a life-size bright and expressive 'Portrait of Miss Evelyn Maud.'

THE Messrs. Vokins have fixed to-day (Saturday) for the private view of an exhibition to be held in their gallery, Great Portland Street, of a body of drawings by Mr. E. Wake Cook, entitled 'Two Years in the Sunny South.' The public will be admitted on Monday next. The same days have been chosen by the Fine-Art Society, Mr. Mendoza, Mr. T. McLean, and Messrs. A. Tooth & Sons in the like manner. The first exhibits 'Sketches of London,' by Mr. H. Marshall; the second, Mr. G. D. Giles's 'The House of Commons Point to Point Steeple-chases'; the third 'Cabinet Pictures,' and the fourth 'High-Class English and Continental Pictures,' including 'A Story of a Battle,' by M. P. Joanowitz. The private view of the Thirty-seventh Exhibition of Pictures by Continental Artists, French Gallery, Pall Mall, is appointed for to-day (Saturday). The public will be admitted on Monday next.

AT a meeting of the Society for the Preservation of the Monuments of Ancient Egypt, held on the 4th inst., the Earl of Wharfedale being in the chair, many speakers strongly called to notice the prodigious amount of mischief daily and hourly inflicted. Modern facilities for travelling in the valley of the Nile have carried countless tourists where, till lately, even learned travellers were seldom seen. The increased numbers of popular museums, which, somehow or other, must needs be filled, and the avidity of dealers and of those for whom they ramscak the most recondite sites, have all combined to create a desire for fragments such as can only be obtained by wrecking monuments, tombs, and public works which Time, war, the elements' devastating chances, have spared during thousands of years till now. The appointment of an official inspector of ancient monuments in Egypt, whose sole duty it should be to look after these remains and see that respective guardians thereof do their duty, and to whom all discoveries should be reported as soon as made, was again brought before the committee of the Society, and it is hoped that there is a fair prospect of the matter being settled according to the views of the Society. Mr. E. J. Poynter, R.A., 28, Albert Gate, S.W., the honorary secretary of the Society, will willingly afford to lovers of antiquity and art any information concerning the Society which may be required.

THE pieces of sculpture found during the recent clearances around the Parthenon have been the object of the study of Dr. Sauer, of the German School, and he thinks he has discovered amongst them a fragment belonging to one of the two statues of Minerva that graced the façades.

THE "First National Swiss Art Exhibition" is to be opened on May 1st in the Art Museum at Berne, and to close on June 12th. The Swiss are anxious that the world should know how many able artists, such as Böcklin and Girardet, who are taken to be Germans or Frenchmen, are good Switzers. Works by foreign artists living in Switzerland are admissible.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—Saturday Concerts: Mr. Hamish MacCunn's 'Bonny Kilmeny,' &c.

PRINCES' HALL.—Royal College of Music Orchestral Concert.

ST. JAMES'S HALL.—Concert for the Benefit of Madame Arabella Goddard.

WE probably owe the publication and performance of Mr. Hamish MacCunn's early cantata 'Bonny Kilmeny' to the interest aroused by the young composer's more mature works. Whether it was wise to put before the world what is emphatically the work of a clever student is a matter open to question. Neither in subject nor in illustration can 'Bonny Kilmeny' be pronounced particularly interesting. James Hogg's poem is too spiritual and meditative to admit of vigorous musical treatment, and the condensation and additions made by "J. M. C." have weakened its force and beauty. The elegiac verses on a lovely girl by Dr. Moir which serve as epilogue are appropriate as regards sentiment, but not in keeping with the literary style of the original poem. Mr. MacCunn's music is curiously deficient in that strength of character which marks his more recent utterances. It is for the most part smooth, placid, and dreamy, as becomes its subject, and there are few traces of inexperience. But it is open to the charge of monotony, the majority of the movements being in slow time, while the studious simplicity of their construction prevents the hearer from feeling any interest in the music regarded from its technical side. Now and then there are indications of latent power, and a vein of refined melody permeates the work. This is the most that can be said in its favour, and last Saturday's Crystal Palace audience followed it with coldness until the close, when they called the composer to the platform, as a compliment, doubtless, to his unquestionable ability. Madame Agnes Larkcom, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Norman Salmond rendered full justice to the solo parts, and the easy duties of the choir and orchestra were, of course, satisfactorily accomplished. The cantata was preceded by Mr. MacCunn's overture 'Land of the Mountain and the Flood,' and followed by Schubert's Unfinished Symphony in B minor. The last item in the programme was the closing scene of 'Die Meistersinger,' in the performance of which some violence was done to Wagner's intentions. That the part of Beckmesser is scarcely suitable to the concert-room may be admitted, but without it the scene is meaningless. Mr. Lloyd was, of course, perfect as Walter, but Mr. Albert Fairbairn, who had undertaken the part of Hans Sachs at short notice, was quite unable to render it justice.

A most ambitious programme was provided at the orchestral concert of the Royal College of Music at the Princes' Hall on Monday. It is questionable whether at this and kindred institutions too much time and attention are not given to modern music, to the consequent neglect of the older classics. For example, the choice of such a work as Brahms's Pianoforte Concerto in B flat was scarcely wise. It is of enormous length and difficulty, and demands for its interpretation not only physical, but intellectual powers which no student can possess. Miss Polyxena Fletcher wrestled well with her herculean task, but she would have been better employed on a concerto by Mozart, Beethoven, or Mendelssohn. There was a great deal of merit in the performances of Schumann's Symphony in D minor, Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's ballad 'La Belle Dame sans Merci,' and the Overture to 'Oberon,' albeit the violoncellos of the orchestra are not of good quality. The choral class, under the direction of Mr. John Foster, sang some unaccompanied pieces with precision and refinement. A duet from an opera entitled 'Messalina' and a madrigal 'To Chloris,' both by Mr. Godfrey Pringle, show rich promise. Prof. Villiers Stanford conducted the concert, which was, on the whole, a great success.

It is, of course, impossible in this place to discuss the points at issue between the relatives of Madame Arabella Goddard and those who, doubtless with the best intentions, organized a benefit concert in her behalf. Enough that Mlle. Janotha, a foreign musician, too young to remember Madame Goddard as a public artist, generously undertook the organization of a performance designed to relieve the necessities of one who once occupied a most prominent position in the musical world, and that a large number of charitably disposed people readily seconded her efforts, probably without inquiring too narrowly into the merits of the case. The incident has its pleasant and its unpleasant features, but it is simply from an art standpoint that we have to deal with the concert of Tuesday evening. At any rate it afforded an opportunity for hearing Beethoven's rarely performed Triple Concerto, the last performance of which, if memory may be trusted, took place as far back as 1882. The work is in the composer's first style, though it dates from 1804, after the 'Waldstein' Sonata, and immediately before 'Fidelio,' and it certainly cannot compare in interest with Beethoven's later concertos, nor even with the earlier works in B flat and C. The execution by Mlle. Janotha, Herr Joachim, and Signor Piatti was, of course, admirable. The three artists named played solos, the pianist giving Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor, the violinist two movements from Bach's Suite in B minor, and the violoncellist two movements by Ariosti. The vocalists who took part in the concert were Mrs. Mary Davies, Miss Liza Lehmann, Madame Patey, Madame Sterling, Madame Semon (formerly known as Fräulein Redeker), and Mr. and Mrs. Henschel. The Royal Amateur Orchestral Society would have rendered more justice to themselves had Mr. George Mount adopted a less feeble and uncertain beat.

Musical Gossip.

THE following are some of the arrangements made by the Philharmonic Society. At the next concert, on the 27th inst., M. Benoit will conduct a selection of his music to 'Charlotte Corday,' and M. Isay will play Spohr's D minor Concerto; on April 24th Dvorák will conduct his new Symphony in G, and Sapellnikoff will play Henselt's Concerto; on May 8th Mr. Borwick will play Schumann's Concerto and Signor Mancinelli will conduct his suite 'Scene Veneziani'; on May 22nd Herr Ondrick will play Dr. Mackenzie's 'Pibroch'; on June 5th Moszkowski will conduct his new orchestral suite; and at the final concert on June 28th Beethoven's Choral Symphony will be performed.

THE prospectus of the Richter Concerts came to hand just too late for notice last week. The management claims that it shows a spirit of eclecticism, and the claim may be allowed to some extent; but greater prominence than ever will be given to the music of Wagner. This will continue to be the case until the master's works are produced in their proper form in a theatre. Among the new selections are the second scene of the first act of 'Tannhäuser,' the beautiful fourth scene from the second act of 'Die Walküre,' the fine though sombre scene between Wotan and Erda from the third act of 'Siegfried,' and the chorus of Gunther's followers from the second act of 'Götterdämmerung.' The novelties by other composers include a concerto for flute, violin, and clavier by Bach—doubtless the work in D, a very refined and pleasing example of the composer's instrumental writings; Dvorák's new Symphony in G, which will be heard for the first time at the Philharmonic Concerts; and an overture by Mr. Waddington. Symphonies by Beethoven, Brahms, Liszt (the 'Dante'), Mozart, Schubert, and Schumann will be included. The concerts will be given on Monday evenings between May 12th and July 14th.

THE programme of last Saturday's Popular Concert included Beethoven's Quartet in C, Op. 59, No. 3; Bach's Chaconne; and Schumann's Pianoforte Quartet in E flat, Op. 47. Miss Geisler Schubert was heard at her best in some trifling pieces by Schubert and in Brahms's Rhapsodie in G minor, Op. 79, No. 2. Mr. Reginald Groome was the vocalist.

ON Monday Madame Néruda and Herr Joachim gave a performance of Bach's Concerto in D minor for two violins, which may be fairly described as unsurpassable. The accompaniments were rendered on the piano by Mlle. Olga Néruda. The other concerted works in this programme were Mozart's Quintet in D, and Schumann's 'Phantasietücke,' Op. 88. Mlle. Janotha rendered Chopin's Polonaise in F sharp minor, Op. 44, a work that suits her exceedingly well. The Moscow vocalist, Madame de Swiatlowski was more successful in a Russian song by Dargomijski than in an air from Handel's 'Rodelinda.' Her voice is of beautiful timbre, but in florid passages it does not appear to be under perfect control.

AN excellent performance of Berlioz's 'Faust' was given under the direction of Mr. Geaussen at the Hampstead Conservatoire Hall on Monday. Miss Macintyre, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. Henschel were the principal vocalists.

THE deputation of musicians that waited on Lord Knutsford last week relative to the degrees granted "in absentia" by a Canadian college made out an excellent case. There can be no doubt that the Canadian institution has exceeded the powers conferred upon it by its charter. Its degrees were only intended for those within the diocese of Toronto, and it will be seen at once that in granting them to English musicians it is exercising authority not given to any university at home. The failure of some who have taken the Toronto diplomas to pass the easy examination for associateship in the College of Organists emphasizes the necessity for an inquiry into the whole matter.

THE forthcoming Edinburgh International Exhibition is to include an historic musical collection on nearly the same lines as that in the Albert Hall in 1885. The organization has been entrusted to Mr. Robert A. Marr.

A CHAMBER concert was given by Madame de Llana (pianist) and M. Henri Seifert (violinist) on Thursday last week at the Steinway Hall. Rubinstein's Sonata in a minor for piano and violin, Op. 19, was the only important item in the programme. Miss Fillunger contributed Lieder by Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, and Brahms.

A TRIAL performance has taken place at Prague of Dvorák's new Symphony in G, composed for the Philharmonic Society, and it is spoken of in the highest terms by the musicians present.

SIR CHARLES HALLE brought his Manchester concerts to a conclusion on Thursday evening, the programme containing Haydn's Symphony in D minor, No. 49, a work very rarely heard; Mendelssohn's 'Meerestille' Overture, and that of Cornelius to 'Der Barber von Bagdad,' for the first time; and Beethoven's Concerto in E flat.

FOUR Edinburgh musicians have formed themselves into a combination to be termed the Edinburgh Quartet. The names of the players are Messrs. Daly, Dambmann, Laubach, and Hamilton. At the first concert, when quartets by Haydn and Mendelssohn were given, the performers gave promise of an excellent ensemble.

THE Parisian journals continue to complain in the strongest terms of the way in which MM. Ritt and Gailhard manage the Opéra. During a performance of 'L'Africaine' recently the chorus became so flat that Signor Vianesi signalled for the orchestra to cease playing, and the prayer "O grand Saint Dominique" was given without accompaniment. The explanation afforded was that the chorists were over-fatigued by the rehearsals of 'Ascanio,' the only novelty with which they have been concerned for some years.

A NEW 'Musiker-Lexikon,' by Herr Robert Musiol, will shortly be published at Stuttgart. It will chiefly be a practical book of reference for the general public, giving a brief account of the lives and works of the most distinguished musicians.

THE projected concert for the Beethoven House Fund has been postponed until next season, as it was found impossible to fix a date that did not clash with Herr Joachim's engagements.

SCHUMANN'S 'Genoveva' has been revived with much success at Cologne. Great praise is bestowed on Herr Götz and Frau Saak, who interpret the principal parts.

BARON FRANCHETTI's opera 'Asrael' has been produced for the first time on a German stage at Hamburg, and has secured a favourable reception.

THE remains of Paisiello are to be removed from Naples to Tarento, where the composer was born.

CONCERTS, &c., NEXT WEEK.

- MON. Borough of Hackney Choral Association, Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater,' &c., 8, Shoreditch Town Hall.
 — Irish Concert, 8, Albert Hall.
 — Popular Concert, 8.30, St. James's Hall.
 — Strolling Players' Concert, 9, Princes' Hall.
 TUES. Mr. Marmaduke Barton's Pianoforte Recital, 8.30, The Lothians, Fitzjohn's Avenue.
 — Mr. Leonard Forbes-Robertson's Concert, 8.30, Princes' Hall.
 WED. London Hallé Concert, 8, St. James's Hall.
 — Miss Dorothy Hanbury's Concert, 8, Steinway Hall.
 — Miss Florence May's Concert, 8, Princes' Hall.
 THURS. Mr. E. Wharton's Concert, 8, Princes' Hall.
 — Clapham Philharmonic Concert, Schumann's 'Requiem,' &c., 8, Clapham Assembly Rooms.
 SAT. Crystal Palace Concert, 3.
 — Miss F. R. Taylor and M. Teresa Augier's Concert, 3, Princes' Hall.
 — Henry Louis Röyer's Pupils' Concert, 3, Steinway Hall.
 — Orchestral and Choral Performance by the London Sunday School Choir, 6, Albert Hall.

DRAMA

GLOBE THEATRE.—Sole Lessee and Manager, Mr. F. R. BENSON.—F. R. BENSON'S SHAKESPEARIAN COMPANY EVERY EVENING at 8 (Thursday and Friday excepted), in Shakespeare's Fairy Comedy, with the Mendelssohn incidental music.

A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM.
 MATINEES OF 'A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM' every SATURDAY and WEDNESDAY. Doors Open at 2; Commence 2.30.—'HAMLET' THURSDAY and FRIDAY EVENINGS at 8, and every THURSDAY and FRIDAY until further notice.—No Fees.—GLOBE.

THE WEEK.

GLOBE.—'Hamlet.'

It is a well-known saying in theatrical circles that 'Hamlet' never fails. What has been accepted as a truism is now, however, disproved. The Globe 'Hamlet' is a failure, not, perhaps, in the view of a portion of the audience it attracts, but from any standpoint poetical or histrionic. It is scarcely, after the first act, entitled to rank as intelligent, which is somewhat of a surprise after Mr. Benson's previous experiments. In an exhibition of dreamlike beauty Mr. Benson's company is seen to some advantage, and in farce it is not much more extravagant than other English companies. For tragedy it exhibits, however, no qualification, and the fact that the majority of those taking part in the representation are amateurs becomes painfully evident.

Looking at the 'Hamlet' from the point of conception and that of execution, it is alike disappointing. A species of aggravating realism is substituted for poetry, new and perplexing readings are introduced, and prosaic details are obtruded with most disenchanting effect. We are sorry to be severe upon an effort that we regard as honourable, and believe to be earnest, but a less convincing performance of 'Hamlet' we cannot recall. Mr. Benson, indeed, seems to realize neither the character nor the play. Not only has his Hamlet no fatefulness; it has no congruity, it may almost be said no continuity. Vacillation and uncertainty are ordinarily assigned Hamlet, but Mr. Benson seems to possess a chameleon-like power of adaptation, and to be the man of whatever circumstances arise. He has on emergency some fire, and is best when he is most wrathful. He adopts, moreover, unfamiliar attitudes, and is much on the ground, on his knees or half recumbent. These things matter little. But he is also loquacious, and does not seem to have any distinct knowledge of his own mind. Absolute bewilderment is produced in the playgoer when Hamlet, while repudiating all love for Ophelia, is seen to be wooing her to the very best of his ability, unable apparently to keep his hands off her. His advice to her to go to a nunnery is in one case spoken while she is in his arms with her head nestling on his neck. While Hamlet's words are those of repulse, the attitude of the two to each other is that of affianced lovers impatient of restraint. In other respects we find slowness when we seek for impetuosity, as in the slaying of Polonius, and action all but overt and decisive when, as in the closet scene, the words spoken indicate irresolution. Mrs. Benson as Ophelia lends herself to the new reading, and by her "coming on disposition" detracts from the value of her performance. Mr. Phillips is a fairly good Ghost, and Mr. Cartwright a picturesque, but not very convincing King. Miss Ada Ferrar as the Queen fails only in looking too juvenile.

Most of Mr. Benson's new business we regard with dislike. No reason presents itself for bringing on the body of the drowned Ophelia in the fourth act; and the depositing of the real Ophelia, in the presence of the audience, in the grave into which her brother jumps, we resent as little short of an offence. 'Hamlet' is taken, moreover, in very slow time, and a performance which began at eight was not over until long after midnight.

Ragged Robin, and other Plays for Children. By Arthur M. Heathcote. (Allen & Co.)—The one merit claimed for these plays in the preface, that they are actable, may be conceded them. They are also written pleasantly and with some amount of spirit.

Elocution made Easy. By Edith Heraud. (Dean & Son.)—Since her retirement from the stage, on which she distinguished herself in tragedy as an elocutionist, Miss Edith Heraud has obtained remarkable success in the teaching of her art. She has now published in a volume an explanation of her method, and an essay on the nature, use, and value of the elocutionary pause. It is a sound and practical work. What is said concerning emphasis, the art of taking breath, and impediments of speech is of special importance. A closing chapter is on "Bible Reading and the Liturgy."

THE Théâtre de la Jeunesse of Mrs. Hugh Bell (Longmans & Co.) contains twelve short plays, generally for two or three characters, which, simple as they are, are well written, and have some well-directed satire.

Dramatic Gossip.

MR. BENSON promises at the Globe Theatre revivals of 'Othello,' 'Twelfth Night,' 'The Merchant of Venice,' and 'The Merry Wives of Windsor.' We shall be glad to hear that the notion of giving 'Othello' is abandoned.

MR. HERMANN VEZIN appeared on Monday at the Grand Theatre as Shylock; Miss Olive Stettith, his pupil, was Portia. At the same house on Monday Miss Minnie Palmer will appear in 'My Sweetheart.'

'PEDIGREE,' a three-act comedy by Messrs. Bowring and Court, will be produced by Mr. W. H. Vernon at Toole's Theatre at an afternoon performance.

THE last weeks of 'A Man's Shadow' are announced at the Haymarket, at which house at Easter Mr. Grundy's new play is to be produced. This will be given by Mr. and Mrs. Tree, Miss Norreys, Miss Rose Leclercq, Mr. Fernandez, and Mr. F. Terry. Miss Julia Neilson will not appear, but she will remain a member of the Haymarket company, and will have a prominent part in the new drama of Mr. Robert Buchanan which is to be subsequently given.

MISS OLGA BRANDON, Mr. Alfred Bishop, and Mr. Elwood have been added to the company at the Shaftesbury for the purpose of taking part in the new play, as yet unnamed, of Mr. Arthur Law.

THE new Richmond Theatre will open at Easter under the management of Mr. Horace Lennard, with Lady Monckton and Mr. Arthur Dacre in their original rôles in 'Jim the Penman,' by the late Sir Charles Young.

'THE FAVOURITE OF THE KING,' an historical play in four acts and in blank verse, by Messrs. F. S. Boas and Jocelyn Brandon, was given on Tuesday afternoon at the Comedy Theatre. It is prolix and not very well constructed. The blank verse was not of very high quality, nor was it very well spoken. Miss Dorothy Dene, Miss Louise Moodie, Miss Annie Rose, and Messrs. Royce Carleton, Bassett Roe, Crauford, and Beaumont took part in a performance that was received with favour. The play has, however, no element of enduring vitality.

A PORTRAIT of Molière has been bequeathed to the museum of the Comédie Française by Dr. Gendrin. The picture is attributed to Coppel, and is well known by the engraving of Lépicié, executed for the edition of the poet's works by Boucher, published in 1734. Molière is represented musing, with a pen in his hand and his left arm resting upon two octavo volumes. This portrait has also been engraved by Friquet without any indication as to its origin.

The closing of the German theatre at St. Petersburg has now been definitively fixed for June 1st. The French theatre will continue as before.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—S. K.—R. S.—D. L.—F. R.—C. M.—J. B. F.—S. C.—received.
J. R.—Please send address.
No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

THE UNIVERSAL REVIEW.

COUNT TOLSTOY'S UNPUBLISHED NOVEL.
THE KREUTZER SONATA.

The Universal Review for March 15th will contain a paraphrase of the above-mentioned work, accompanied by extracts, translated from the Author's Revised MS. and with his express sanction. This is the only authoritative account of 'The Kreutzer Sonata' which has as yet been published. With it will be given a reproduction in Colours of the celebrated Picture by the Russian artist Repin, 'Count Tolstoy at Home,' and also Two Portraits of the novelist taken in 1876 and 1886 respectively.

This Number will also contain Mr. Alfred East's Account of his Japanese Trip, illustrated by many Original Full-Page and other Drawings.

THE UNIVERSAL REVIEW.

MARCH 15th, 1890, price 2s. 6d.

Contents.

1. THE KREUTZER SONATA: Count Tolstoy's unpublished Novel (Illustrated.) E. J. Dillon.
2. SIR CHARLES DILKE on the PROBLEMS of GREATER BRITAIN. Frank Hill.
3. A TRIP to JAPAN. (Illustrated.) Alfred East, Harry Quilter.
4. THE GOSPEL of WEALTH. J. O'Connor Power.
5. KIT MARLOWE'S DEATH: an Unacted Play. W. L. Courtney.
6. MUSINGS in an ENGLISH CATHEDRAL. (Illustrated.) The Very Rev. H. D. M. Spence, D.D., Dean of Gloucester.
7. POETRY and SCIENCE. George Barlow, Author of 'The Pageant of Life.'
8. A REMINISCENCE of ROSSINI. W. M. Hardinge.
9. VERLAINE. Ed. Dujardin, Directeur de la Revue Indépendante.
10. THE WAGES of SIN. (Illustrated.) Lucas Malet.
11. THE WORLD in MARCH. The Editor.

Illustrations.

COUNT TOLSTOY at HOME. Reproduction in Colours from the Original Painting by Repin.

PORTRAITS of COUNT TOLSTOY 1876 and 1886. From Photographs.

SCENES in JAPAN. 7 Full-Page Heliogravures from Paintings. Alfred East.

INITIAL and TAILPIECE (Facsimiles of Original Drawings). Alfred East.

IN GLOUCESTER CATHEDRAL. (10 Original Drawings.) C. A. Channer.

THE WAGES of SIN (5 Designs for). A. Sacheverell-Coke, Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colours.

CONVENTIONAL JAPAN. Frétillo.

ARNE. J. P. Donne.

And Initials and Tailpieces by F. Bertie, C. A. Channer, Louis Bradford, F. Charlot, T. D. Mackenzie, and Harry Quilter.

Swan Sonnenschein & Co.

LIGHT: a Journal of Psychological, Occult, and Mystical Research.

The Medium of Communication between Students of the Occult, and especially of the Higher Spiritualism. Edited by 'M. A. (Oxon.)' Price 2d. weekly. (Specimen Copy, 2d. post free.)

2, Duke-street, Adelphi, W.C.

NOTES AND QUERIES.

THE VOLUME, JULY to DECEMBER, 1889,

WITH INDEX.

Price 10s. 6d. cloth boards,

IS NOW READY.

Published by John C. Francis, 22, Took's-court, Cursitor-street, E.C.

KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRÜBNER & CO.'S LIST.

NEXT WEEK,

1 vol. crown 8vo. cloth, price 6s.

THE WORKS OF LEWIS MORRIS.

WITH PORTRAIT.

New Edition, crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

IMPERIAL GERMANY: a Critical Study of Fact and Character. By SIDNEY WHITMAN.

"I have read your study on Germany with great interest.....In the midst of mighty neighbours, we believe that we need a strong monarchy, and I am glad that you do full justice to the anciently founded 'paternal government of the Hohenzollerns.'"—Letters to the Author from COUNT VON MOLTKE.

Demy 8vo. 21s.

INDIA, PAST and PRESENT. Historical, Social, and Political. By JAMES SAMUELSON, Author of 'Roumania, Past and Present,' 'Bulgaria, Past and Present,' &c. Illustrated with a Map, Explanatory Woodcuts and Collotype Views, Portraits, Archaeological and Ethnological Subjects.

Large post 8vo. with Map, 15s.

ENGLISH INTERCOURSE with SIAM in the SEVENTEENTH CENTURY.

By JOHN ANDERSON, M.D., LL.D., F.R.S., Author of 'Mandalay to Momieu,' &c. [Trübner's Oriental Series.]

Crown 8vo. 6s. bound in buckram,

RUPERT of the RHINE: a Biographical Sketch of the Life of Prince Rupert, Prince Palatine of the Rhine, Duke of Cumberland, &c. By Lord RONALD GOWER. With 3 Portraits.

2 vols. post 8vo. 38s.

AN ARABIC-ENGLISH DICTIONARY. On a New and Unique System. Comprising about 120,000 Arabic Words, with an English Index to the same. By H. A. SALMONE, Arabic Lecturer at University College, London. Dedicated, by Special Permission, to her Majesty the Queen.

Fcap. 8vo. 5s.

SELECT GLOSSARY of ENGLISH WORDS used formerly in SENSES DIFFERENT from the PRESENT. By RICHARD CHENEVIX TRENCH, D.D., Archbishop. Seventh Edition, Revised by the Rev. A. L. MAYHEW.

Demy 8vo. 9s.

THEOLOGY and PIETY ALIKE FREE: from the Point of View of Manchester New College, Oxford. A Contribution to its Effort, offered by an OLD STUDENT.

Crown 8vo. 5s.

ONEIROS; or, Some Questions of the Day. By CHRISTOPHER

YELVERTON.

Small crown 8vo. 6s.

CAUSE. By MICHAEL DOYLE.

Fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

ELEGIES and MEMORIALS. By A. and L., Authors of

'Gemma of the Isles,' &c.

Crown 8vo. 4s.

A LEGEND of the MIDDLE AGES; and other Songs of the Past and Present. By JOHN CODD.

By MAXWELL GRAY.

WESTMINSTER CHIMES; and other Poems. By the Author of 'The Silence of Dean Maitland,' 'The Reproach of Annesley,' &c. Small crown 8vo. 5s.

Elzevir 8vo. 5s.

A NEW PILGRIMAGE; and other Poems. By WILFRID

SCAWEN BLUNT.

"Not a little admirable verse."—Spectator.

"Noticeable for a preface in which he explains his views upon the sonnet and its capacity as a form."—Morning Post.

Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

The LAST DAYS of OLYMPUS: a Modern Myth. By

C. S. H. BRERETON.

Small crown 8vo. 5s.

TALES of a TENNIS PARTY. By BLANCOR DASH.

"The stories are good in themselves and are capitally told."—Manchester Examiner.

London: KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRÜBNER & CO. LIMITED.

SATURDAY, MARCH 22, 1890.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
NOVELS OF THE WEEK	365
THE CATHOLIC BISHOPS UNDER ELIZABETH	366
OLD COUNTRY LIFE	367
TAVERNIER'S TRAVELS IN INDIA	368
OUR LIBRARY TABLE—LIST OF NEW BOOKS	370
THOMAS GUY; THE SOURCE OF 'THE ANCIENT MARINER'; THE SUPPOSED UNCIAL CODEX OF THE NEW TESTAMENT; THE ORIENTAL CONGRESS; SALE; MR. GLADSTONE'S MODEL LIBRARY	371-372
LITERARY GOSSIP	373
SCIENCE—CHEMICAL NOTES; GEOGRAPHICAL NOTES; SOCIETIES; MEETINGS; GOSSIP	374-375
FINE ARTS—THE INSTITUTE OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS; MR. J. R. HERBERT, R.A.; THE DISCOVERIES AT LYCOSURA; SALES; GOSSIP	376-378
MUSIC—THE WEEK; DR. WYLDE; GOSSIP; CONCERTS, &c., NEXT WEEK	378-379
DRAMA—SWINBURNE ON BEN JONSON; THE WEEK; GOSSIP	379-382

LITERATURE

NOVELS OF THE WEEK.

The Duke's Daughter, and The Fugitives. By Mrs. Oliphant. 3 vols. (Blackwood & Sons.)

John Vale's Guardian. By D. Christie Murray. 3 vols. (Macmillan & Co.)

The Holy Rose, &c. By Walter Besant. (Chatto & Windus.)

Lady Baby. By Dorothea Gerard. 3 vols. (Blackwood & Sons.)

Claire Brandon. By Frederick Marshall. 3 vols. (Same publishers.)

A Heavy Reckoning. By E. Werner. 3 vols. (Bentley & Son.)

A Daughter's Sacrifice. By F. C. Philips and Percy Fendall. 2 vols. (White & Co.)

Dick Chichester; or, the Wooing of the County. By E. M. Roach. (Bristol, Arrowsmith.)

La Bête Humaine. Par Émile Zola. (Paris, Charpentier.)

Une Gageure. Par Victor Cherbuliez. (Hachette & Co.)

'THE DUKE'S DAUGHTER' is a story of English life, and of very high life indeed, since it tells of the Duke of Billingsgate, head of the house of Altamont, and of his daughter, Lady Jane. Lady Jane falls in love with a man of inferior rank—wealthy, and a thorough gentleman, but not up to the mark of what the duke thinks fitting for his only daughter. There is another duke in the story, and duchesses, and lords and ladies, and just a glimpse of a royal personage. Mrs. Oliphant rejoices in the portrayal of these exalted people; and it is needless to say that they are all instinct with life and verisimilitude, being as remote from the colourless phantasms of the professedly fashionable novelist as they are from the crude monstrosities of the incompetent tyro in fiction. Since the death of Anthony Trollope we have had no one who could so faithfully and appreciatively depict in words the pompous, overweening, intractable duke, who, subject to the common and vulgar lot of humanity, worships the fetish of his own extravagant pride even at the moment when it is shattered and pulverized. The ruined duke has come to be a not uncommon personage in English fiction, and his Grace of Billingsgate reminds the reader now and again of the central figure in 'Court Royal.' But Mrs. Oliphant has not elaborated the same features as Mr. Baring Gould selected for his especial study. It is Lady Jane Altamont with whom her story is mainly concerned, and the relations of father and daughter are drawn with a skilful hand. In 'The Fugitives' there is a quieter, though perhaps a more ingenious plot; but the former of these novelettes is unquestionably the stronger.

'John Vale's Guardian' is in some respects the best novel Mr. Christie Murray has yet produced. He has improved in style, and shows a good deal of appreciation of the niceties of his craft. His literary judgment and his power of applying it are now well matched, and at the same time he has not lost in vigour. His studies of boys and men in rural England are discriminating and lifelike, and the French people he introduces among them are not too conventional. If the latter part of the book were as good as the earlier part the whole would deserve very high praise, but as it stands the unsatisfactoriness of the plot is sadly apparent. Stories which run over a good number of years are always comparatively difficult to manage; and when the lapse of time is necessary only on account of the nature of the incidents, and not for the development of character, a story is apt to lose some effect and has to support the weight of a chronicle. In 'John Vale's Guardian' time is really not of the essence of the story; it does not increase the interest of the main study. Some event less probable than the discovery of a coal seam and less carefully traced out in its results would have served the author's purpose as well, and would have intensified the interest.

Mr. Besant has collected between one pair of covers five stories of varying length, quality, and intention—perhaps it ought to be added, of varying merit. 'The Holy Rose' is a tale of French émigrés in England some ninety years ago, and of self-sacrifice on the part of a chivalrous youth, who devotes himself to death in the place of a rival. The circumstances are not originally conceived nor very originally treated; but to say that the narrative is told freshly and with abundance of interest is only to say that the author has not fallen much below his standard. In 'The Last Mass' Mr. Besant goes back for his subject as far as the Spanish Armada, and colours his story with a somewhat superfluous display of archaism. 'The Inner House' is a fantasy of science, pitched in the year 1896, when Dr. Schwarzbaum announces in the theatre of the Royal Institution his great discovery of the prolongation of vital energy. This is the cleverest, if not the most interesting story of the collection. The inversions of thought and desire which take hold of the inhabitants of the House of Life are cunningly imagined and well sustained. There is abundance of interest in Mr. Besant's book, which contains as much reading, and certainly as much romance, as any three-volume novel.

Miss Gerard generally writes well and gracefully, frequently in a deeper and more thoughtful vein, and may always be relied on to please a number of readers. And this in spite of a something which, for lack of a better word, we may call a suspicion—no more—of the amateur. This slight flaw is apparent once or twice in 'Lady Baby,' which, delightful as it is, would not, we think, be the worse for a very little judicious cutting. One feels that something may possibly have been thrown in, against the author's better judgment, to swell the volumes to the conventional number. This were a pity, especially in novels of so pretty and delicate a style as Miss Gerard's—a style, too, more easily lost than found. Lady Baby is interesting enough as a heroine, and her people and surroundings are well and skilfully drawn. Yet the reader may be inclined to think that Maud Epperton (who is quite of another kidney) would have filled the part of heroine as well or better. On Maud hangs much of the interest of the story. She has a good deal of uncertainty in her composition, which is in itself piquant, also potentialities of other sorts than the "artistic possibilities" which are so constantly recurring in Sir Peter's conversation. The loss of Lady Baby's fortune and the events that spring from it are a little spun out and also a little confused. On the whole, however, the book is singularly pleasant, and to a certain extent lifelike.

'Claire Brandon' is a curious and unaccountable piece of work. The first few chapters are perfectly rational—an epithet which becomes steadily more inapplicable as the story progresses; they also contain lifelike and humorous touches, all traces of which are doomed to a speedy disappearance. The reader's interest and attention are no sooner aroused than he is abandoned to a series of emotional whirlwinds, the causes of which are often mysterious, and generally out of all proportion to the violence of their expression. Conversations or soliloquies become paroxysms of brief utterance or even single words, all separated from one another by dotted lines, but continuing for successive pages, a system which soon ceases to be either instructive or amusing. The writer then appears to grow breathless, which is scarcely surprising, and proceeds to relate his story in gasps; at any rate, this is the effect produced by an endless series of short clauses, each placed in a separate line. They may be culled at random, a page at a time, in the third volume:—

"A shadow filled it [i. e., the door]. Arms seized her.

"There was a cry, 'Claire!'

"Faintly she echoed, 'Conrad!'

"They did not need to speak.

"They saw and knew," &c.

The reader who is less understanding has probably ceased to ask questions by this time. He is likely, however, to be haunted by curiosity as to the reason of Mr. George Brandon's overwhelming remorse for proceedings which appear to the ordinary mind not only legitimate, but necessary, and will probably hope to the end that he may have had a hand in his dead brother's servant's opportune disappearance or murder. He certainly ought to have had to account for his extreme discomfort. But, if any questions are to be asked, a final one arises regarding over two-thirds of the whole book which would prove fatal to its existence.

The reader's first thought on getting to the end of 'A Heavy Reckoning' is "All's well that ends well"; but on second thoughts he will feel doubtful whether all can be said to end well when two of the principal chaacters among the dramatis personæ of the story have to meet with a terrible and tragic fate in order to fit in with the requirements of the general affinities and natural selections which form the basis of the story. In any case E. Werner's latest romance is an able and vigorous work, written with force, power of imagination, and a good command of language. The characters are drawn with a firm hand and possess a marked individuality. The plot is, perhaps, a little too intricate, as is apt to be the case with German novels, and the reader becomes a little confused amid the many cross-purposes and loves and hatreds. Still they hold his attention, and the courageous dénouement deserves laudation. A large part of the interest of the work, however, is derived not so much from the characters as from the gigantic conflict which the practical science of our day must wage when with steam and iron it invades the regions which once belonged to the chamois, the eagle, and the Alpine hunter. The book appears to refer to the construction of some of those mighty railroads that now penetrate the Alps in all directions and have destroyed their barrier character.

If anything were wanting to prove the possession in Messrs. Philips and Fendall of a certain quality of literary dauntlessness, and the impossibility of their being rebutted by the disagreeable and painful side of life, 'A Daughter's Sacrifice' would clinch the matter. The "cold hard world" as presented by them is very cold and hard indeed. With the truth of the aspect in moderation we are not inclined to quarrel, but when it comes to pushing it beyond measure, the result is not only depressing, but inartistic. The material and main facts of the story are in themselves unpleasant, and some things that happen are natural enough, yet seem withal and in the telling inhuman and cold-blooded. The authors have spared neither their creatures nor the reader one iota; whenever an unpleasant effect was obtainable, they straightway seem to have "gone for it" with unflinching zest. Another grievance is there being absolutely no one to like—not, perhaps, an uncommon experience with readers of Mr. Philips's clever and exciting novels. This one certainly contains strong and dramatic situations, and, admitting the natures and conditions of those concerned, some of these situations are not only possible, but probable, not to say inevitable. But the picture is so hard, unsympathetic, and matter of fact, and at the same time so startling, exaggerated, and wanting in all relief, that it is more disagreeable than harrowing. Just where it should succeed it fails, and palls where it should rouse. Surely, too, there is less quickness and sparkle about it than one might fairly expect, and too much brusquerie in some episodes of the drama. The career of one Helen de Tesles is the point of interest. She has from first to last no rest nor pause; yet even in the overwhelming moment when she is betrayed and unmasked to her son, and his lifelong respect and affection fall for ever at the blow, it is not so much sympathy one is conscious of as a shrinking distaste and repugnance. We may mention in passing that however much of a rascal the Black Mailer (her persecutor) may be—and no rascality seems beyond him—the mere vulgarity of the man is more unaccountable; and he is not the only offender in this respect. If anything in the way of a moral is intended, it is the insistence on the utter and absolute hopelessness (for a woman) of recovering a lost place in society (or indeed, for the matter of that, anywhere else), and the cruel kindness it is to her children to attempt to bring them up in a "respectable environment" at all. But if anything this rather cuts the other way—so one might opine, at least.

The author of 'Dick Chichester' is, consciously or unconsciously, a disciple of the school of Anthony Trollope. Fernlandshire as depicted by Mr. (or Miss? or Mrs.?) Roach—we are entirely in the dark as to the sex or status of the writer, and the title-page affords no clue—is a type of that rural England of which Barsetshire is the most famous example, and out of its politics and society and love-making a very pleasant though somewhat placid story has been evolved. The presence of but one villain would have lent animation to the plot, for as it stands the only obstacles in the way of the happiness of the principal characters are put there by themselves. The author is great on Church and State, and has evidently a profound veneration for Lord Beaconsfield. But there can be no question of the genial and wholesome optimism which pervades the book.

'Murder' should have been the title of M. Zola's new book. In the first fifty-six pages we find preparations going on for no fewer than three brutal assassinations, two by the knife and one by poison, committed for three different reasons by three distinct sets of persons. Of the four chief characters in the book, one commits a horrible murder for which he goes unpunished, but long afterwards is sent to penal servitude for life for the murder of his wife, of which he is innocent. The wife, who has originally helped him in the first-named murder, is afterwards stabbed to death by her lover. The young hero of the novel also commits a terrible throat-cutting of the same kind, and lets two other men, who are innocent of the crime, go to lifelong hard labour for it. He is afterwards murdered himself. The fourth and last leading person in the plot, a beautiful girl, deliberately wrecks an express train, causing the loss of fifteen lives, and then kills herself. At the end of the work it may be said that all the characters in the book have been murdered except two, and that these two are left in prison without any hope of ever coming out, and that for a crime which they did not commit. What we have described is not art and is not nature. It is not true to life to describe a society found haphazard in the administration of one of the greatest railway companies in the world, and including directors, station-masters, assistant station-masters, guards and drivers, and their families, in which there is no good woman and only one good man, who is introduced apparently as a foil to the others, who is a labourer finding temporary employment upon the line, and who himself has "done" several years' imprisonment for manslaughter. Yet, in spite of all that we have said, there is art in the volume, although not in its main features. The study of the railway system—the descriptions of the stations, of railway glories, and of railway horrors—is greater than a study by Balzac, and its perfection only increases the regret we feel at the manner in which M. Zola plays with talents so considerable.

The author of the literary "chestnut" or "Joe Miller," "I prefer Valbert to Cherbuliez," was right. "M. Valbert" is one of the greatest political essayists of our time. M. Cherbuliez, the same person under a different name, is not one of the greatest of living novelists, and he does not improve. 'Une Gageure' is charmingly written, but is perhaps a trifle dull.

The True Story of the Catholic Hierarchy deposed by Queen Elizabeth. With fuller Memoirs of the last two Survivors. By Rev. T. E. Bridgett and the late Rev. T. F. Knox. (Burns & Oates.)

No sovereign ever succeeded to a throne amid greater perils than Elizabeth. The means taken to secure her position have long been subjects of fierce controversy, nor does there seem any ground for hoping that the days of partisanship are numbered. The new queen on her accession found the see of Canterbury vacant, as well as several other important English bishoprics; but the bishops in possession of sees were of far less elastic material than those with whom her father had had to work. When Henry broke with Rome, Fisher alone was prepared to resist to the bitter end. When his Protestant daughter succeeded, one only of the whole episcopal confraternity—Anthony Kitchen of Llandaff—could be induced to take the oath of supremacy. The change that had occurred in a few years seems marvellous. It is, however, easily accounted for. The bishops who so docilely followed Henry in his changes thought that the faith and ceremonial of the old worship could be practised as well under the authority of the king as of the Pope. The proceedings in the reign of the boy king Edward made it clear that if the Catholic worship was to be retained the Pope must be the head of the hierarchy. Whatever the private opinions of the Marian bishops were as to the limits of Papal prerogative, their conduct showed, when the time of trial came, that they had no thought of surrendering to the temporal power. As far as we can call to mind there had never before occurred such a scene as that of the whole hierarchy of a Church, with one exception, being deposed and their places filled by new men who sought consecration from Edwardian Protestants. It must have required a high degree of daring on the part of Elizabeth and her advisers to venture on such a course; but they gauged the feelings of the English people rightly. The years of religious controversy had done their work. A bishop was not now the object of reverence such as he had been before Henry began his war on the Church.

The history of the Reformation, though seldom told without partisan colouring, has always been a subject of great interest. It is, therefore, not a little surprising that we should have had to wait for more than three hundred years for the lives of the last prelates of the old Church. Though we do not wish to speak severely of any part of the volume before us, it is only the lives of the last two prelates in the book—Watson and Goldwell—that deserve the name of biographies. The others are far too short and meagre to convey much instruction. From the posts they filled, and the trying position in which they were placed, it is much to be regretted that Father Bridgett has not treated the lives of all with the amount of attention which has been given to the Bishops of Lincoln and St. Asaph. It is difficult to make out why he has been thus chary of details. There is ample material at hand for one who knows, as Father Bridgett does, where to look for it and how to use it. That he has failed to make the full use of his opportunities is the more to be regretted as the book may be said, in a certain sense, to represent the Roman Catholic view of the case.

The life of Thomas Goldwell, Bishop of St. Asaph, is from the pen of the late Father Knox, a learned member of the Brompton Oratory. It is pretty nearly all that can be wished for. Goldwell escaped to the Continent, and in due time, to Elizabeth's disgust, sat as a member of the Council of Trent. That she was bitterly annoyed at one of the bishops of her dominions having a place there is clear from the way in which she speaks of him, in a letter dated March 21st, 1562, to Mundt, her envoy in Germany. The passage is worth reproducing:—

"We think it may be that one Goldwell, a very simple and fond man, having in our late sister's time been named to a small bishopric in Wales, called St. Asaph, though never thereto admitted, flying out of the realm upon our sister's death, is gone to Rome as a renegade, and there using the name of a bishop, without order or title, is perhaps gone in the train of some Cardinal to Trent, and so it is likely the speech hath arisen of a bishop of England being there."

It is impossible for the queen to have believed that during the primacy of such a man as Pole an unconsecrated person would have been permitted to hold the see, and of the fact that in January, 1556, Goldwell received plenary restitution of the temporalities there is no doubt whatever. No record has been found of his consecration in this country, and it is affirmed in the last edition of Le Neve's Fasti that he was probably consecrated during the time that Archbishop Cranmer was in prison. Father Knox, however, says that he was consecrated in Italy, and refers to the Annales of Raymundus in proof. Though the fact of Goldwell's consecration does not admit of doubt, there will always be persons found to call it in question until the original record of it is forthcoming. It would be well if some one who has access to the Papal records would give the world the entry from the register. If any additional proof were required that Goldwell was in episcopal orders, it is furnished by the fact that at the time of her death Mary was about to translate him to Oxford, and that another person, Thomas Wood, had been chosen for the Welsh diocese. These facts are given by Le Neve or his editor from entries to be found in the Patent Rolls.

Goldwell never returned to England after his escape. His time seems to have been mainly spent in what he believed to be the service of his country, in doing what he could to help forward the restoration of the Roman Catholic religion in England. He died on the 3rd of April, 1585. Watson, the Bishop of Lincoln, had died the year before; thus with the death of Goldwell the old Roman Catholic hierarchy became extinct.

The life of Thomas Watson, the deposed Bishop of Lincoln, is given at commendable length. It was his misfortune to have lived through the whole period of the Reformation conflict and to have acted at one period in direct contradiction to his after life. He was a Cambridge man, and in 1534 took, with others, the oath of succession, which for the clergy included the doctrine of the royal supremacy. It is therefore certain that, as far as the Papal claims were concerned, he was a Protestant; but this by no means proves that he rejected the other distinctive doctrines of the Roman Church. He seems, indeed, to have been a personal friend of Gardiner and probably shared his opinions. Gardiner spent nearly the whole of the reign of Edward VI. in the Tower. Presently Watson, too, was imprisoned; what the reason was is not quite clear; possibly it was that he had spoken strongly against the popular preachers who were teaching doctrines of the Genevan type. The Fleet Prison seems to have been chosen as the place of his confinement for the purpose of separating him from Gardiner.

When Edward VI. died Watson was in the prime of life—about forty years of age. He had come to the conclusion that it was not possible to maintain in England the old beliefs and practices without also accepting the Papal claims, and from that time forward seems to have been what Foxe would have called a zealous Papist. He was soon elected Master of St. John's, Cambridge, and in the Lent of 1554 preached two sermons before the queen, which were afterwards printed by Cawood. In the same year he was one of the divines sent to Oxford to dispute with Cranmer, Latimer, and Ridley, but does not seem to have taken any active part in this useless and cruel exhibition. He was promoted to the see of Lincoln by a Papal bull dated March 24th, 1557, and consecrated on the following Feast of the Assumption. He did not hold the see long. Another change came on the accession of Elizabeth. On June 25th, 1559, he was deprived of his bishopric, and a Protestant of advanced views, Nicholas Bullingham, put in his place. Lincolnshire was then a land of meres and wild wastes of fen, highly dangerous to all except the natives. Watson at the time of his deprivation was suffering severely from ague; he had not entirely recovered when he was committed to the Tower. The treatment he underwent there was by no means cruel; indeed, nearly everything seems to have been done for his comfort consistent with the determination of the authorities that he should not escape to the Continent, as Goldwell had done. In 1563 Watson was transferred to the custody of Grindal, Bishop of London, and afterwards removed to the care of Coxe, Bishop of Ely. It seems to have been a common practice to make the Protestant bishops gaolers of the men of the old hierarchy. They were, as far as we know, treated with personal kindness, but it must have been very galling to have to live in the families of those whom they held to be the chief enemies of religion. We cannot follow step by step Watson's imprisonments. At length he was removed to Wisbech Castle, a place especially set apart for the imprisonment of Roman Catholics. From what we gather it must have been a miserable den, and Elizabeth and her ministers have been blamed not a little for their cruelty in submitting to such an unhappy fate those who were guilty of no other crime than that of refusing to accept the religion provided by the State. This is not altogether just. The prisons everywhere throughout Europe were in those days horrible places, and Elizabeth cannot in justice be censured for not being before her time. Watson died September 27th, 1584, aged seventy-one. The register of the parish church of Wisbech thus records his burial: "1584. 27 September, John Watson, Doctor, Sepultus." Thus, if there be no mistake, he was buried on the day of his death. No memorial was ever erected to his memory, or if one was it had perished before 1748, when Cole, the zealous antiquary and note-maker, looked for it in vain.

Old Country Life. By S. Baring Gould. With Illustrations by W. Parkinson, F. D. Bedford, and F. Masey. (Methuen & Co.)

MR. BARING GOULD has written many books, and unkind critics have called him a book-maker. At any rate, he is by no means a man of one idea, but it is obvious to those who have made acquaintance with his works that he is fonder of striking situations and personal details than of abstractions. The 'Lives of the Saints' is his most voluminous work. There Mr. Baring Gould is to be seen at his best and at his worst. The holy men and women who had the happiness to do picturesque actions, or even to dwell among attractive scenery, have more sympathy shown them than the less happy mortals who lived in dull ages among commonplace surroundings. We by no means feel called upon to enter a protest against this; the worship of the commonplace is an enfeebling superstition which much of our current literature has a tendency to spread. Mr. Baring Gould's books are a protest—whether conscious or unconscious we know not—against this deadening form of misbelief.

The present volume seems to have been written hurriedly, but the author has enjoyed some advantages which he has lacked in many of his other books. His hand has been free. The world—the English world that is—has been before him, and he has been able to turn his back on any subject which did not appeal to his fancy. A topographer or an historian cannot do this. The former, if it comes within his boundaries, must tell his readers something concerning the Bedford Level; the latter, if writing on French history, may not "cut" the era of Louis XV.; but 'Old Country Life' need only tell just so much as is pleasant to the narrator. Books of this nature do not cover the ground that ought to be occupied by more serious works, but they have a place of their own to fill.

The West Country has been conservative in the matter of houses. Stone is plentiful, and they have in many cases been permitted to sink peacefully into decay, when, had they been in less favoured spots, they would have been pulled down to build rows of tenements for farm hands or to repair the highways. In no part of England have the old houses been cared for as the churches have been, but we may be thankful when we compare England with other countries that so much has been spared to us. We have never had a war of class against class here as there has been in France. The losses we have suffered have arisen from carelessness and greed, not from hate. The English aristocracy have destroyed the memorials of their own past splendour; they have not been reft from them by the detestation of tenants whom they had oppressed.

Mr. Baring Gould has the same sort of delight in an old mansion which some of us feel in the sea. It evidently stimulates all the imaginative side of his nature. It is to him not so much stone or brick with carving of this or that date inside, furnishing "bits" for the artist and studies for the architect, but something to which, almost without any effort of the will, he can restore its old dignity and splendour. The terraces and trim fences once more surround the old place. The merry laugh of children who have been dust for centuries again resounds from the old walls. The grave Puritan and Royalist men and women again hold sad converse under the limes, little dreaming that their goodly dwellings will be deserted by their successors, turned into farmhouses, or suffer the far sadder fate of needless and unsparing restoration. Our forefathers were not architectural antiquaries, but it would seem that a knowledge of the art of building was far more common among them than it is among their successors, and Mr. Baring Gould has done uninformed readers a service in impressing on them how preferable tapestry and panelling are to paint and paper. The former add to the warmth of a room, the latter detract from it. This is obvious when explained, but few of the general public have ever thought about the matter, though every one must have known of it two hundred years ago. Old houses are often spoken of as badly built because the walls, though very thick, are found to be filled with loose stones. This must have resulted from ignorance or carelessness, we are told, but Mr. Baring Gould points out, as has been done before, that the reason was a very good one. The hollows in the middle kept out the damp. Let such a wall be kept dry at the top and it will last for ever. We are sometimes asked why modern wainscot does not look so well as that of former days, and fantastic reasons have been invented to account for it. The reason is on the surface—we have no intention of perpetrating a pun—if men would look for it. New wainscot is reduced to the desired thickness by the saw; the old was riven and planed down, consequently the pattern in the wood appears to much greater advantage. There is but one argument in favour of the modern practice: it is much more economical.

We have discoursed enough on one topic. We cannot, however, part company with Mr. Baring Gould and omit saying how excellent are his papers on "Old Portraits" and the "Hunting Parson." Even yet grand old portraits of men and women of Tudor and Stuart times are turned out of houses to make room for modern gimcracks without a history; and we fear the hunting parson has almost everywhere been forced to give way to beings sleeker, but not more devoted to their people. Such a parson did not pretend to have read the Fathers—might not know whether Alexander of Hales was a nominalist or a realist, or what were the names of Archbishop Parker's consecrators; but he was not uncommonly a better classic than his successor, and then he lived his life among the people—knew every soul in his own and the adjoining parishes, and not them only, but their horses, kine, and every family pet that belonged to them. The hunting parson will soon be as extinct as the begging friar, but it is well that those who have known him should not let his memory be forgotten while that of far less noble creatures is trumpeted in all the newspapers.

Travels in India. By Jean Baptiste Tavernier, Baron of Aubonne. Translated from the Original French Edition of 1676, with a Biographical Sketch of the Author, Notes, Appendices, &c., by V. Ball, LL.D., F.R.S. 2 vols. (Macmillan & Co.)

THE interest aroused of late years in the factory period of the history of the British Indian Empire was certain at last to lead to a general demand for revised and critical editions of the works of those English and French travellers of the seventeenth century who did so much to spread in Europe a knowledge of the great wealth of the modern trade with the East, founded by the Portuguese, and first organized on thoroughly commercial principles by the Dutch. Chief among these seventeenth century travellers were the Englishmen, Edward Terry, appointed "Chaplain to the Right Hon. Sir Thomas Row, Lord Ambassador to the Great Mogul," in 1614-15; Thomas Herbert, who went out with the East India Company's fleet to Surat in 1626; John Fryer, who sailed, as surgeon on the London, with the fleet of 1672; and John Ovington, another of the Company's chaplains, who sailed to Surat in 1689,—and the far better known Frenchmen, Jean Baptiste Tavernier, who travelled in Turkey, Persia, India, and the Indian archipelago almost continuously from 1631 to 1666; François Bernier, who travelled in India and other Oriental countries between 1654 and 1670; Jean de Thevenot, who sojourned in the East between 1655 and 1664; and "Sir John" Chardin, who visited Persia and India between 1664 and 1670, and again between 1671 and 1681, in which last year he was knighted by Charles II., and settled in London, where he remained until his death in 1713. Of these men Tavernier alone had received what is nowadays called a technical training, as a jeweller and dealer in gems, and in consequence he was ever on the alert to gather information not only regarding the Indian traffic in precious stones, but about all the sumptuary industries of the East, then still in their perfection, although doomed to be soon extinguished by the competition of the modern mechanical manufactures of the West. Hence the superior value attached by students of the history of Indian commerce and art to the records of his picturesque peregrinations left us by Tavernier, as compared with those of any other contemporary European traveller.

Fryer, who was a Doctor of Medicine of Cambridge, and took a keen and learned interest in the innumerable drugs, condiments and spices, dyes and tans, and oils and oil seeds, that have ever formed so large a part of the exports from India, is after Tavernier the most acceptable authority on the trade of the English East India Company during the factory period; and this is chiefly due to his having closely followed his illustrious predecessor's methods of observation.

But Tavernier's 'Nouvelle Relation de l'Intérieur du Serrail du Grand Seigneur,' first published in 1675, and his 'Six Voyages, faits en Turquie, en Perse, et aux Indes,' published in 1676, proved also of the highest importance in quite another way. Unlike Bernier (who was also a Doctor of Medicine), Chardin, Thevenot, and the rest, Tavernier was not a man of any literary or scientific culture; but, owing to his thorough knowledge of the business in which he had been brought up, and his eagerness in the prosecution of it, down to the very day of his death at Moscow in 1689, he succeeded in giving such reality to his descriptive notes of the various commodities of the affluent merchandise of the East, that he at once powerfully excited the imagination of the peoples of the West, and stimulated the statesmen not only of France, but of Prussia and Russia also, to seek a participation in that commerce with India which, from the earliest ages, had endowed every country successively engaged in it with renewed national life and the highest worldly prosperity. Indeed, among the various influences that at length led the French to contest the empire of India with us in the eighteenth century, and down to the final overthrow of Bonaparte in 1815, the effect of the writings of Tavernier on the minds of his gifted countrymen cannot be overlooked. As an example of his power, through his professional grasp of detail, in impressing his readers, we would refer to the chapters in the 'Nouvelle Relation' giving an account of the "Treasures" and the "Secret Treasures" of the Sultans of Turkey, about which so much has recently been written in ignorance.

It was with genuine satisfaction, therefore, that the announcement was some time ago received of the intention of Messrs. Macmillan to publish a fresh edition of Tavernier's 'Travels in India,' translated direct from the French text by Dr. Valentine Ball, formerly of the Geological Survey of India, and the author of 'Jungle Life in India' and 'The Economic Geology of India'—two admirable works, affording ample proof of Dr. Ball's competence to edit a merchant traveller whose speciality is his intimate knowledge of the traffic of the seventeenth century in precious stones. And as regards the particulars in which it was anticipated that Dr. Ball would excel, we may at once say that he has fulfilled our expectations, and that nothing could be better than his treatment of chapters xii. to xvi. inclusive, dealing with diamonds and the diamond mines of Golconda, pearls, rubies, and other coloured gems, and with the general articles of Indian sumptuary merchandise, and the frauds practised in their manufacture. Also his six appendices, on the Koh-i-nor diamond and the Indian diamond mines, the ruby mines of Burmah, and the sapphire mines of Ceylon, are invaluable contributions to our knowledge of these attractive subjects. But after all this has been admitted, it must be added, however reluctantly, that Dr. Ball's translation is marred by one great literary defect, which detracts from the full satisfaction it would otherwise have given, and this even in the chapters we have indicated as models of scientific editing. Instead of reproducing the mannerisms, or at least the spellings of the names of places and persons, of his author, as he was bound to do in the case of an old-established favourite like Tavernier, he has rendered all the proper nouns of the original according to the new system of the transliteration of Oriental names adopted by the Government of India; and this official canker, eating as it does into every page of Dr. Ball's volumes, has effectually effaced from them every trace of the typographical physiognomy of the seventeenth century, which a more sympathetic translator would have insisted on most scrupulously preserving. An editor who has committed this enormity cannot be expected to adopt an English style of writing equivalent to that of the original French; and, in fact, Dr. Ball has simply rendered the French of Tavernier into his own plain, straightforward English; with the consequence that his translation altogether fails in beguiling us back two centuries in the course of time, and reads from its first page to the last as if it were a recent publication of the Revenue and Agricultural Department of the Government of India. Thus, instead of translating the heading of the first chapter "The Road from Ispahan to Agra through Gomron; where is particularly shown the manner of Sailing from Ormuz to Surat," Dr. Ball translates it, "Route from Ispahan to Agra by (way of) Gom-broon, where particular mention is made of the Navigation from Hormuz to Surat." To write Hormuz for Ormuz, and again, as at p. 5, Bassora for Balsara, is utterly unpardonable. Of course there is no arbitrary rule in such matters. But neither is there such a thing as the right spelling of any word, what is called right spelling being no more than the wrong spelling of the majority, and wrong spelling the right spelling of the minority. Nothing detracts so much from the picturesqueness of a printed page as the mechanical uniformity of spelling that marks the nineteenth century; and certainly such forms as Ormuz and Balsara, since they have become consecrated by long use in poetry and romance, until they seem as if irradiated with a glamour of their own, should never be departed from except in official gazetteers and trade circulars.

During the thirty-seven years covered by Tavernier's travels he made six journeys into the East; and of these all except the first extended to India, where he altogether spent thirteen years. He always went to and from India by way of Bunder Abas, except in his last journey, when he returned home by the Cape of Good Hope. He was keenly interested in everything he saw in India, and in reading his minute descriptions of the life and labour of the country one cannot but observe how little they have changed, in spite of all the political and commercial revolutions it has undergone in the past three hundred years, and notwithstanding the slowly destructive opposition its ancient co-operative civilization has had to endure, since the withdrawal of the East India Company's commercial monopoly in 1834, from the competitive system of Western civilization. The economic changes under British rule have been the most marked; and yet all the great centres of Indian manufacture—Buranpur, Dacca, Broach, Ahmedabad, Surat, &c.—mentioned by Tavernier are still the seats of the identical manufactures for which they have always been famous; and although greatly depressed after 1834, they have since 1878 experienced something of a revival, which it is to be hoped may prove permanent, of their ancient industrial activity and opulence.

Indeed, one of the greatest stumbling-blocks in the way of the progress of the English and Germans in the East is the great difficulty they have in realizing how little it has changed. Tavernier sums up his eighth chapter, giving an account of his successful dealings at the Mogul Court, and of the means through which he prospered in them, with these pregnant words:—

"So true is it that those who desire to do business in the Courts of the Princes in Turkey as well as in Persia and India, should not attempt to commence anything unless they have considerable presents ready prepared, and almost always an open purse for divers officers of trust of whose offices they have need."

This passage was some years ago quoted to a great financier who wished to obtain an important concession in Constantinople. But although repeatedly advised that nothing would be effected unless the preliminary interchange of presents, after the immemorial manner of the Turks, was made, he obstinately refused to condescend to such corrupt practices, as he held them to be, and consequently not only failed in his purpose, but died of vexation at his lack of success. Throughout the East the interchange of presents is an essential introduction to any important transaction between men, as without it they are not sure of enjoying each other's confidence; and complaints are never heard against the magistrate who takes a present from both the litigants before him, but returns it to the one against whom he decides. Such a one is the ideal "just judge" in Oriental eyes still. The bribe, as we stigmatize these gifts, is really of the nature of "fees paid into court," and is not so much meant to affect the result as to make it surer. The suitor who loses is certain that all that was possible has been done for him, and submits with greater content, therefore, to the decree of Providence.

It is in the eighth chapter of the second book of his Indian itinerary that Tavernier gives his famous account of "the Peacock Throne of Delhi," now at Teheran, and nothing can be more careful and clear than Dr. Ball's translation of it:—

"The principal throne, which is placed in the hall of the first court, is nearly of the form and size of our camp beds; that is to say it is about 6 feet long and 4 wide. Upon the four feet, which are very massive, and from 20 to 25 inches high, are fixed the four bars which support the base of the throne, and upon these bars are raised twelve columns, which sustain the canopy on three sides, there not being any on that which faces the court. Both the feet and the bars, which are more than 18 inches long, are covered with gold inlaid and enriched with numerous diamonds, rubies, and emeralds. In the middle of each bar there is a large balass ruby cut encabuchon, with four emeralds round it, which form a square cross. Next in succession, from one side to the other along the length of the bars there are similar crosses, arranged so that in one the ruby is in the middle of four emeralds, and in another the emerald is in the middle and four balass rubies surround it.....I counted the large balass rubies on the great throne, and there are about 108, all cabuchons, the least of which weighs 100 carats, but there are some which weigh, apparently, 200 and more. As for the emeralds there are plenty of good colour, but they have many flaws; the largest may weigh 60 and the least 30 carats. I counted about 116.The underside of the canopy is covered with diamonds and pearls, with a fringe of pearls all round; and above the canopy, which is a quadrangular shaped dome, there is to be seen a peacock, with elevated tail, made of bluesapphires, and other coloured stones, the body being of gold, inlaid with precious stones, having a large ruby in front of the breast, from whence hangs a pear-shaped pearl of 50 carats or thereabouts, and of a somewhat yellow water. On both sides of the peacock is a large bouquet of the same height as the bird, and consisting of many kinds of flowers made of gold inlaid with precious stones. On the side of the throne which is opposite the court there is to be seen a jewel consisting of a diamond of from 80 to 90 carats weight, with rubies and emeralds round it..... But that which, in my opinion, is the most costly thing about this magnificent throne is that the twelve columns supporting the canopy are surrounded with beautiful rows of pearls, which are round and of fine water, and weigh from 6 to 8 carats each."

Tavernier says the throne was reputed to have cost about 12,000,000*l.* of our money. Bernier reduces this to 4,500,000*l.*, and Mr. S. G. W. Benjamin, in his volume on 'Persia' in the "Story of the Nations" series, to about 2,600,000*l.* No doubt it has been subject to ceaseless dilapidation from the time of its completion by Shah Jehan; but even now it remains the grandest object of sumptuary art ever devised by man.

In Batavia Tavernier notices the drinking habits of the Dutch. Their greatest joy was when vessels came from Holland, for they brought all kinds of strong drinks, and the whole town turned to festivity. Their especial craving was for English beer, and "that which they call mom, which comes from Brunswick."

At the date of Tavernier's travels the European commerce with the East was in the hands of the Dutch, and the Mogul Empire in India was at the plenitude of its power; Persia, as reconsolidated by Abbas the Great, was still, all through the reigns of his successors, Shah Sufi and Abbas II., a leading Asiatic monarchy; Turkey, under Amurath IV. and Mahomet IV., had reached its utmost extension; and France, under the "Grand Monarque," was the first state of Christendom. England, on the other hand, had sunk to the lowest depths of national weakness and humiliation. Yet at this very time the few obscure Englishmen who, in the service of "the Governor and Company of Merchants of London trading into the East," had established themselves as "factors" all round the coasts of India, were in this humble office, by their natural force of character, slowly and surely laying the foundation of that commercial supremacy in the East which, under the prescient direction given it by Sir Josiah Child, redeemed the future of England at the very moment when Charles II. was ready to betray it for the favours of Louise de Querouaille. The success of the English East India Company was the first step in the prodigious political development of England during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, and eventually led to our present mercantile and naval preponderance. It was the possession of India, of the wealth we drew from India, that enabled us to successfully resist and break down the European coalition formed against us at the beginning of the nineteenth century by Bonaparte; and the possession of India still offers the best guarantee we could hold of the continued unity and prosperity of the British Empire. All our colonies, as well as the United States of America, have a common interest in our peaceful retention of India, inasmuch as they are thereby secured an undisturbed free trade with that country; and it is the growing importance of this commercial connexion to them that will at last bring about their Imperial Federation with the mother country, which for the present is no more than an aspiration of a few high-souled Englishmen here and in America and our other colonies.

In conclusion, we trust that the favour with which Dr. Ball's translation of Tavernier's 'Travels in India' is sure to be received will encourage the publishers to bring out annotated editions of other French and English travellers of the seventeenth century; and in such case they could make no better selection for their next issue than John Fryer's 'New Account of East India and Persia.'

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

MR. BESANT'S Captain Cook, in the "English Men of Action" Series (Macmillan & Co.), is so good that we can but wish it were a little better. The story of Cook's boyhood has been carefully worked out, with an abundance of interesting and picturesque detail, but the author's painstaking humour seems to have slept whilst he was writing of his hero's early life in the navy, and in his account of that almost every detail is incorrect. Cook did not enter for the Eagle in May, 1755, but on the 17th of June; he joined the ship on the 25th of June, and on the 24th of July was rated master's mate. The captain of the Eagle was not John Hamer, but Joseph Hamar. The Eagle had no part in the North American campaigns of 1755-6-7, but was employed on the home station. On the 30th of June, 1757, Cook was appointed master of the Solebay in the North Sea. This was apparently only by an "acting order," and he was discharged to the shore at Leith on the 7th of September, 1757. The next twenty months are, indeed, blank, and at present it is impossible to say whether he passed them on board a king's ship or not; he certainly did not return to the Eagle, nor did he join the Shrewsbury with Palliser in 1758. But all this Mr. Besant might, and we think should, have inquired into. The mere fact that Cook was an acting master as early as July, 1757, is surely of interest in tracing the career of such a man, and Mr. Besant has himself set so high a standard of work and accuracy, that he must be judged by it. None the less, the book as a whole is admirable, and will be read with pleasure and enthusiasm by every Englishman who is proud of the part which England played in the march of geographical discovery. The account of the death of Cook is not, indeed, new, but it differs considerably from the story as related by Englishmen who were present. It is very probably founded on fact; but it is easy to attach too much value to native tradition.

FROM M. Calmann Lévy we have received L'Europe et l'Avènement du Second Empire, by M. Rothan, in which the author had gone back to earlier dates than those with which in his other books he had concerned himself. The confidences of M. Rothan have always been interesting, although they are indiscreet, and the present book is no exception to the rule. It is contrary to English ideas that a diplomat should relate the secrets with which he has become acquainted in the course of his career; but the public are to some extent the gainers when it has been done. On the other hand, the present volume is a mere collection of interesting gossip without any real governing idea, and might have better gone under the title of 'Memoirs, 1846 to 1853.' The volume contains, among other curious matter, an interesting sketch of Persigny.

IN Dod's Parliamentary Companion for 1890 some of the mistakes of last year's edition have been corrected, but there are some left uncorrected. A book of so great a reputation ought to be an absolutely safe book of reference; but if the mistakes we have come across in using it indicate the average accuracy of the work, it is not wholly trustworthy. A reference to 'Dod's Peerage' shows that the compiler of the 'Parliamentary Companion' could have set himself right without going far, but, on the other hand, the 'Peerage' is not always correct. In the 'Companion' the Brougham peerage is said to have been created in 1830. The year should be 1860. Lord Cromartie's name is given as "Francis Sutherland-Levison-Gower," instead of Leveson. The 'Peerage' says "Francis Mackenzie." The 'Companion' gives "Halwood" as Lord Derby's well-known residence at the edge of Keston Common, where Wilberforce made up his mind to attack the slave trade. It should, of course, be Holwood. Knowsley is near Prescot, not "Prescott." Lord Rothschild's name is Nathan Meyer, not "Mayer." Sir J. Puleston's place is Ffynogion, not "Ffynogivn." The book evidently wants revision.

WE have received the issue for 1890 of that admirable book The Colonial Office List, a work in which we have never found a real mistake. The map of South Africa is hardly up to the necessities of the times, and as regards Bechuanaland is singularly defective. The record of public services is decidedly inferior to that given in the 'Foreign Office List.' We could understand the inclusion of all persons who have served directly under the Colonial Office, and exclusion of all except the most distinguished colonial servants who had not so served; but we do not find the name of Mr. Salmon, who, if we mistake not, has served much under the Colonial Office. On the other hand, we find biographies of many undistinguished persons, such as a gentleman who began as a non-commissioned officer on the West Coast of Africa, was afterwards a warder, and is now an inspector of nuisances in Honduras—to whom ten lines are devoted; while that distinguished man Dr. Cockburn, Prime Minister of South Australia, has only three lines. Mr. Fysh, Prime Minister of Tasmania, Mr. John Foster Vesey Fitzgerald, a former Prime Minister of Victoria, and many others we might name who have occupied very important positions in the colonies, or still occupy them, appear to be omitted; and altogether the 'List' needs careful revision.

WE have on our table a number of new editions, among them one of that entertaining book, William George Ward and the Oxford Movement (Macmillan), by Mr. Wilfrid Ward, which contains a much-needed index,—a handsome edition, rewritten, of Prof. Goodwin's standard work, Syntax of the Moods and Tenses of the Greek Verb (Macmillan),—a neat edition, in one volume, of Mr. Sturgis's pleasant Comedy of a Country House (Murray),—and a similar reprint of Mr. Crawford's Sant' Ilario (Macmillan). The sixpenny edition of Two Years Ago has also reached us from Messrs. Macmillan.—New editions of Every Man's Own Lawyer (Crosby Lockwood) follow one another so rapidly that we can do no more than chronicle their appearance.—Mr. Nettleship's thoughtful volume, Robert Browning, Essays and Thoughts (Elkin Mathews), may perhaps be classed with new editions, as a good deal of it appeared in his well-known 'Essays on Robert Browning's Poetry.' It is a suggestive book, and one of the best aids to the study of the poet.—A welcome addition to the "Carisbrooke Library," edited by Prof. Henry Morley, is Fairfax's translation of Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered (Routledge), with a brief introduction and glossary.

WE have on our table The Republic as a Form of Government; or, the Evolution of Democracy in America, by J. Scott (Chapman & Hall),—The Reconstruction of Europe, by H. Murdock (Longmans),—A Working Handbook of the Analysis of Sentences (Blackwood),—Practical Exercises in Commercial French, by W. E. Bayles (Relfe Brothers),—The Histories of Tacitus, Books III., IV., and V., with Introduction and Notes by A. D. Godley (Macmillan),—University College of North Wales, Calendar for 1889-90 (Manchester, Cornish),—Middle-Class Cookery Book (Macmillan),—The Art of Housekeeping, by Mrs. Haweis (Low),—Tatters and Jennie's Schooldays, by L. Pethybridge (W.M.S.S.U.),—Driven to Suicide! by C. H. Semir (Scott & Montague),—Bound by Love; or, the Lost Ring, by E. V. D. (Bristol, Arrowsmith),—Prince Goldenblade, by Sir Gilbert Campbell, Bart. (Ward & Lock),—Linda's Task, from the French by Mary Fidelis (Burns & Oates),—The Boys' and Girls' Companion, 1889 (C.E.S.S.I.),—Our Own Magazine, Vol. X. (The Children's Special Service Mission),—The Line of Beauty, by E. Marshall ('Home Words' Office),—Prose Writings of Thomas Davis, edited by T. W. Rolleston (Scott),—Parodies of the Works of English and American Authors, edited by W. Hamilton, Vol. VI. (Reeves & Turner),—The Yule Log, by R. H. Thorpe (Walker),—The Poet's Purgatory, and other Poems, by H. J. D. Ryder (Dublin, Gill),—Wordsworth's Grave, and other Poems, by W. Watson (Fisher Unwin),—Sacred Songs, by the Rev. G. Matheson (Blackwood),—Lessons on Bible and Prayer-Book Teaching (C.E.S.S.I.),—The Gospel according to St. Matthew, edited by the Rev. A. Carr (Cambridge, University Press),—The Light of Reason, by S. S. Wynell-Mayow (Kegan Paul),—The Bible and Modern Discoveries, by H. A. Harper (A. P. Watt),—Judges and Ruth, by the Rev. R. A. Watson (Hodder & Stoughton),—The Church Sunday School Magazine, Vol. XXV. (C.E.S.S.I.),—Studien zur Griechischen Mythologie, by G. Goerres (Williams & Norgate),—Étude sur l'Argot Français, by M. Schwob and G. Guieysse (Paris, Bouillon),—and G. A. Bürger et les Origines Anglaises de la Ballade Littéraire en Allemagne, by G. Bonet Maury (Hachette).

LIST OF NEW BOOKS.

ENGLISH.

- Theology.*
Carpenter's (E.) The First Three Gospels, their Origin and Relations, cr. 8vo. 3/6
Chadwick's (Very Rev. G. A.) The Book of Exodus, cr. 8vo. 7/6 (Expositor's Bible) Hymns from the German, trans. by F. E. Cox, 12mo. 2/6
Lefroy's (W.) The Christian Ministry, its Origin, Constitution, Nature, and Work, 8vo. 14/
Martineau's (J.) The Seat of Authority in Religion, 8vo. 14/
Rig Veda Americanus, Sacred Songs of the Ancient Mexicans, edited by D. G. Brinton, 8vo. 12/
Ryan's (Rev. A.) St. Patrick, Apostle of Ireland, cr. 8vo. 2/
Ryan's (Rev. A.) Sermons, 1817-1851, cr. 8vo. 5/
What is Truth? a Consideration of the Doubts as to the Efficacy of Prayer, by Nemo, cr. 8vo. 5/

Law.

Public Health Act, 1875, Rivers' Pollution Prevention Act, &c., with Complete Index by F. Stratton, 5/6

Fine Art and Archaeology.

Millar's (A. H.) The Historical Castles and Mansions of Scotland: Perthshire and Forfarshire, 8vo. 15/

Poetry.

Barry's (A. F.) "A Singer in the Outer Court," a Collection of Songs and Verses, cr. 8vo. 3/6
Garden's (W.) Sonnets and Poems, cr. 8vo. 5/
Goethe's Reineke Fox, &c., trans. in the Original Metres by A. Rogers, 12mo. 3/6 (Bohn's Standard Library.)
Johnston-Brown's (A.) Rejected of Men, and other Poems, an Easter Poem, 12mo. 3/6
Mackay's (E. A.) Lover's Litanies, and other Poems, 12mo. 3/6 cl. gilt. (Lotos Series.)
Morris (L.), The Works of, cr. 8vo. 6/
Tollmache's (B.) Engelberg, and other Verses, 12mo. 6/
Young Folks' Song-Book, written and composed by H. B. Score, 4to. 2/6 cl.

History and Biography.

Allcroft (A. H.) and Mason's (W. F.) History of Sicily, 491-289 B.C., cr. 8vo. 3/6
Dante and his Early Biographers, by E. Moore, cr. 8vo. 4/6
Diaries of Sir Moses and Lady Montefiore, their Life and Work, edited by Dr. L. Loewe, 2 vols. 8vo. 42/
Shelley (Mrs.), by L. Rossetti, cr. 8vo. 3/6 (Eminent Women Series.)
Wood (Rev. J. G.), his Life and Work, by Rev. T. Wood, 10/6

Geography and Travel.

Carstensen's (A. R.) Two Summers in Greenland, 8vo. 14/
Lawson's (W. R.) Spain of To-day, with a Full Account of the Rio Tinto Mines, cr. 8vo. 3/6
Ritchie's (J. E.) An Australian Ramble, or a Summer in Australia, cr. 8vo. 5/

Philology.

Lucian, the Dialogues and Somnium, translated by R. Mongian and J. A. Front, 12mo. 2/6 swd.
Macmillan's Latin Course, Part 3, by A. M. Cook, 12mo. 2/8
Meyer's (K.) German Grammar for Schools, Parts 1 and 2, Accidence and Syntax, 3/ (Parallel Grammar Series.)

Science.

Elmer's (Dr. G. H.) Organic Evolution, trans. by J. S. Cunningham, 8vo. 12/6
Hasluck's (P. R.) Watch and Clock Jobbing, illus. cr. 8vo. 3/6
Hill's (M. B.) The Bermuda Islands, a Contribution to Physical History, &c., of the Somers Archipelago, 18/
Hill's (M. B.) Chronic Urethritis, and other Affections of the Genito-Urinary Organs, 8vo. 3/6
Mackenzie's (W. C.) Home Medicine and Surgery, 2/6
Nevill's (J. H.) The Biology of Daily Life, 8vo. 3/6
Watt's (A.) The Art of Paper-making, cr. 8vo. 7/6

General Literature.

Allen's (G.) The Devil's Die, a Novel, 2/ bds.
Bendall's (G.) Ivy and Passion Flower, 3/6
Bynner's (E. L.) Agnes Surriage, cr. 8vo. 6/
Clouston's (W. A.) Flowers from a Persian Garden, and other Papers, cr. 8vo. 6/
Coleridge's (Hon. S.) The Sanctity of Confession, a Romance, cr. 8vo. 5/
Crawford's (F. M.) Paul Patoff, cheap edition, cr. 8vo. 3/6
Cumberland's (S.) The Vasty Deep, a Strange Story of To-day, cr. 8vo. 2/ bds.
Curtin's (J.) Myths and Folk-lore of Ireland, cr. 8vo. 9/
De Quincey (T.), Uncollected Writings of, Preface and Annotations by J. Hogg, 2 vols. cr. 8vo. 12/
Fox's (C.) The Pilgrims, Allegory of the Soul's Progress from the Earthly to the Heavenly State, cr. 8vo. 5/
In her Earliest Youth, by Tasma, 3 vols. cr. 8vo. 31/6
Irwin's (D. H.) War Medals and Decorations from 1588 to 1889, cr. 8vo. 7/6
John Orlebar, Clk., by the Author of 'Culmsire Folk,' &c., cr. 8vo. 2/ swd.
Kingsley's (C.) The Hermits, cheap edition, cr. 8vo. 3/6
Lee's (V.) Hauntings and Fantastic Stories, cr. 8vo. 6/
Littlehales's (H.) Pages in Facsimile from a Layman's Prayer Book in English about 1400 A.D., 4to. 3/6
Miller's (W. H.) On the Bank's Threshold, or the Young Banker, cr. 8vo. 2/6
My Friends' Thoughts, an Illustrated Album for recording the Opinions, &c., of my Friends, 3/6
Norris's (W. E.) Misadventure, 3 vols. cr. 8vo. 31/6
Ogilvie's (The), by the Author of 'John Halifax,' cr. 8vo. 3/6
Robinson's (F. W.) A Very Strange Family, cr. 8vo. 3/6
Russia Japhet, or the Muscovite, the Cossack, and the Mongol, by Oxonian, 8vo. 5/
Sevenfold Trouble (A.), by Pansy and her Friends, cr. 8vo. 2/
Stickney's (A.) The Political Problem, cr. 8vo. 4/6
Veitch's (S. F. F.) The Dean's Daughter, cr. 8vo. 5/
Walford's (L. B.) Pauline, cheap edition, cr. 8vo. 2/6
Walley's (T.) Practical Guide to Meat Inspection, cr. 8vo. 8/6
Wells's (Rev. J.) Rescuers and Rescued, Experiences among our City Poor, cr. 8vo. 3/6
Weyman's (S.) The House of the Wolf, cr. 8vo. 6/
Wood's (Mrs. H.) The Unholy Wish, and The Foggy Night at Offord, cr. 8vo. 3/6
Younghusband's (Capt. G. F.) Polo in India, cr. 8vo. 2/

FOREIGN.

Theology.

Koenigsberger (B.): Die Quellen der Halachah, 2m. 50.

Fine Art and Archaeology.

Arneaud (A.): Traité de Perspective Linéaire, 8fr.
Lehner (H.): Die Athenischen Schatzverzeichnisse d. 4 Jahrh., 3m.

Music.

Gallay (J.): Un Inventaire sous la Terreur, 25fr.

History and Biography.

Daudet (E.): Colbert, 1789-1793, 6fr.
Deloume (A.): Les Manieures d'Argent à Rome, 9fr.
Goncourt (E. de): Mademoiselle Cléon, 3fr. 50.
Stockmar (Fhr. E. v.): Ludwig XVI. u. Marie Antoinette auf der Flucht nach Montmedy, 4m.
Sybel (H. v.): Die Begründung d. Deutschen Reiches, Vol. 3, 7m. 50.

Bibliography.

Kayserling (M.): Biblioteca Española-Portuguesa-Judaica, Dictionnaire Bibliographique des Auteurs Juifs, 6m.

Philology.

Körting (G.): Lateinisch-Romanisches Wörterbuch, Part 1, 2m.

General Literature.

Barrière (M.): L'Œuvre de H. de Balzac, 7fr. 50.
Hennequin (E.): Quelques Écrivains Français, 3fr. 50.
Neukomm (E.): Berlin tel qu'il Est, 3fr. 50.
O'Monroy (R.): La Solitude Parisienne, 3fr. 50.
Pouvillon (E.): Chante-Pleure, 3fr. 50.

THOMAS GUY.

Wynfrid, Clevedon, March 17, 1890.

A LITTLE old book is in my hand, which seems to have belonged to Thomas Guy, having, inside the cover, what I consider to be his autograph signature: "Thomas Guy's Booke 1708." On the title-page is another signature: "Henry Guy's booke, deceased." The last word apparently added by Thomas Guy.

The book is 'The Prerogative of Primogeniture,' &c., by David Jenner, B.D., Prebendary of Sarum, and Rector of Great Warley, in Essex, 1683. 8vo. Vindicating the succession of James, without regard to his religion.

On the title is also the autograph of Mr. Sergeant Merewether, 1828.

I have had the book lying about for some years, thinking to propose it for acceptance of the Governors of Guy's Hospital, but hesitated, by doubt if their archives had refuge for such strays, and whether the business of such an institution should be interrupted by the consideration of so unpractical a trifle. Your having started the subject suspends any such scruple as I might have had to write to you upon it.

THOMAS KERSLAKE.

THE SOURCE OF 'THE ANCIENT MARINER.'

University College of South Wales and Monmouthshire, March 13, 1890.

MR. JOHN TAYLOR, of the Bristol Central Library, in the Athenæum of March 8th in part accurately quotes and in part misquotes from a proof copy of my booklet.

I am glad to learn from him that "there is indisputable reason to show" that the copy of Capt. James's "Strange and Dangerous Voyage," 1633, in the Bristol Central Library "was acquired between 1856 and 1868" by the gentleman whom he names; and I regret to find that I wrote my note from information which, though it came to me from a quarter that seemed to be authoritative, turns out to have been unreliable.

The coincidences between 'The Ancient Mariner' and James's journal have been known to me for many years, in truth since I first read Capt. James's book in the British Museum somewhere between 1871 and 1876. A year or two ago it occurred to me that I might be able to discover facts at Bristol about both James himself and his narrative. I therefore communicated with Mr. Taylor and others, and also visited the Bristol libraries. Mr. Taylor was good enough to answer some questions I put to him, and he also sent me a copy of Mr. Nicholls's pamphlet, of the existence of which I had no previous knowledge. On p. 76 I certainly observed the statement, which is contained in some forty-three words, that "it is very likely indeed that S. T. Coleridge" derived "his marrow-chilling scenes" from the 'Voyage.' In writing the note for the printers, about three months ago—I was citing from memory—I overlooked what no doubt is the main point of the passage, to which, nevertheless, it will be seen, I directly referred. I collected from Nicholls two facts, (1) that James's book was in the old Bristol library, and (2) the probable date of the settlement of James's family at Bristol. Beyond what this last sentence implies, I made no use of Mr. Nicholls's pamphlet in writing my essay; indeed, the argument had been developed in part before I read the pamphlet or knew of its existence.

The readers of the essay have, no doubt, noticed that Mr. Taylor proves that, whatever may be true of the first edition of James's book, there were two eighteenth century reprints on the shelves of the Bristol Library in 1794-8. I never thought of the collections of Churchill and Harris, and I suppose no one else thought of them.

IVOR JAMES.

March 15, 1890.

YOUR resuscitation of Wordsworth's long-forgotten apology for 'The Ancient Mariner,' in the notice of Mr. Ivor James's pamphlet on 'The Source' of that poem, in to-day's Athenæum, clears up some doubtful allusions in an important letter of Charles Lamb to Wordsworth—that dated "January, 1801," and numbered "LXXVII." in Canon Ainger's edition. Without previous knowledge of the printed apology, Lamb's admirable criticism, traversing Wordsworth's main objections to the poem, loses some of its significance, as seeming to refer merely to some passing remarks contained in the letter he is acknowledging. The fallacies of the apology and their exposure can now be read together and both be better appreciated.

I have read Mr. James's pamphlet, and am a little surprised he should not have made himself acquainted with the date of the glosses to 'The Ancient Mariner,' which, it would have been easy to ascertain, were added in 'Sibylline Leaves' (1817), and repeated in every subsequent edition. Their mention tempts me to commit a serious indiscretion, no less than to venture on a "conjectural emendation" of the text of one of them. It is that placed over against the stanza—

And now the storm-blast came, and he Was tyrannous and strong;
He struck us with o'ertaking wings,
And chased us south along,— and runs thus: "The ship drawn by a storm toward the south pole." I suggest that Coleridge wrote driven, and not the weak and inappropriate "drawn." Whether written or printed, the two words may readily be mistaken the one for the other. Coleridge no doubt squeezed in his glosses for the printer in a minute hand on the margins of a sheet of the 'Lyrical Ballads,' and the printer had to use a minute type. He misread the MS., and his misreading was overlooked by the poet. Subsequent editions no doubt were set up from printed sheets, and nothing being checked but pen-corrections, the error has been perpetuated. Were any other consideration needed to bolster up my contention I should point out that, as a matter of fact, the ship was driven, and not drawn, and in all four texts issued previous to the gloss the line ran thus:—

Like chaff we drove along.

But at the same time I maintain that the later (and inferior) text, as printed above, is good enough for my argument.

There are more, and more reliable, "sources" for 'The Ancient Mariner' than Mr. Ivor James or its editors wot of. One is supplied by Coleridge himself:—

With throats unslaked, with black lips baked,
Agape they heard me call:
Gramercy! they for joy did grin,
And all at once their breath drew in
As they were drinking all.

In the same conversation in which Coleridge scornfully dealt with the critics who bewailed the absence of probability and moral in his ballad of "pure imagination," he mentioned that he "took the thought of 'grinning for joy' from poor Burnett's remark to him when they had climbed to the top of Plinlimmon, and were nearly dead with thirst." "We could not speak from the constriction, till we found a little puddle under a stone. He said to me, 'You grinned like an idiot!' He had done the same" ('Table Talk,' May 31st, 1830).

As regards another famous stanza,—

Still as a slave before his lord
The ocean hath no blast;
His great bright eye most silently
Up to the moon is cast,— it is not improbable that Coleridge borrowed the first two lines from himself, and the other two from Sir John Davies. In 'Osorio,' written a month or two before 'The Ancient Mariner,' Coleridge had put these words into the dying speech of the villain who gave his name to the play:—

OSORIO (with great majesty). O woman!
I have stood silent like a slave before thee.

In Sir John Davies's 'Orchestra' is to be found this passage, the parallelism of which with the lines in 'The Ancient Mariner' has been pointed out by Mrs. Humphry Ward ('English Poets,' 1880, i. 550):—

For lo! the Sea that fleets about the Land
And like a girdle clips her solid waist;
Music and measure both doth understand;
For his great crystal eye is always cast
Up to the Moon, and on her fixed fast.

That Coleridge knew Davies's poems is certain, and, indeed, his adaptation (in his 'Biog. Literaria') of some verses from Davies's 'On the Soul of Man' to illustrate the working of the poetic imagination deserves the serious attention of all victims of the "localizing craze," whether tourists, students of voyages and travels, or keen-scented detectors of "plagiarism":—

Doubtless this could not be, but that she turns Bodies to spirit by sublimation strange,
As fire converts to fire the things it burns,
As we our food into our nature change.

J. D. C.

THE SUPPOSED UNICAL CODEX OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

Beyrout, Syria, Feb. 20, 1890.

I WAS especially interested in Mr. Lambros's letter in the Athenæum of February 1st, relating to the account of the library in Damascus published by Mr. Papadopoulos, of Cyprus, in the Συγγρ. of January and February, 1889. It was this latter account which led me in late December to visit Damascus for the express purpose of looking up the Scripture codex (including part of the Hermas) which Mr. Papadopoulos says that he discovered, and which he likens to the Codex Sinaiticus.

On arriving at Damascus I called on a lawyer who belongs to the Greek Church, and who I knew had seen the Συγγρ. article. It seems that he had been very eager to obtain the book. He had gone to the library, and was refused permission to ransack the shelves; he was shown only a few shelves, which I recognized as being those shown to visitors, having seen them myself on a previous visit. The lawyer then applied to a Moslem of influence, who took him to the library on the plea of taking an inventory of the books. He told me that they went for five days, taking down book by book, but without finding the Greek codex. As the lawyer was so positive, not only that the book was not in the library, but that it never had been, I would probably have given up the quest had I not promised a friend in America to do my best to find the codex.

The next day I was calling on an influential Christian, and was talking with him about the book, when in came Sheikh Saleh el Numayyar, one of the 'Ulema. As I know Arabic I could join in the conversation. Presently my friend turned to the Sheikh and said carelessly, "By the way, do you happen to know who has charge of the Melek el Dahir Library?" "Of course I do," the Sheikh promptly replied; "and I know the talk about the book which you are doubtless going to inquire about. There is no such book—other people have been after it before." My friend pressed the matter. "How do you know there is no such book? have you searched yourself?" The Sheikh replied, "My friend, it was I who organized the library and I who catalogued it, and I tell you there is no such book." Before leaving, Sheikh Saleh turned to me and said, "If this gentleman cares to visit the library some day I will take him there, sending him word beforehand." The Sheikh's manner was so simple and direct that I could not suspect him of concealing anything.

I waited eight days before the Sheikh's message came, but meanwhile the Governor-General of Damascus had died, and I knew that the Sheikh was otherwise busy. Accordingly I went with him to the library; he seemed in a hurry and left me with the custodian, charging him to treat me as he would the Sheikh himself. The custodian was a simple old man who remembered my former visits. First we examined the books in the shelves I had seen before. These shelves are in the wall. Among these books are some fragments in Greek and Latin, bound up together with Arabic fragments. In this section I handled every book except some Korans on the top shelf, but the custodian opened one or two, not allowing me to touch. In the mean time I had let him know for what I was looking. He said he was always there, but could remember no stranger finding the book I had described. "Why," said he, very simply, "if I saw a stranger looking pleased over a book, don't you suppose I would hide it and then show it to visitors for bucksheesh?" I then asked to look at the shelves to the left of those I had been examining. These he opened, declaring them all to be Arabic law. I gave them a general examination, finding them to be paper. As the books are piled upon each other, paper outward, such an examination is simplified. I then asked to see the other shelves in the wall. The old man began to grow impatient, but acceded, and I made a similar search, opening any book of suspicious shape and bulk, and passing my hands over the faces of others. It was then time for the custodian to go to prayers, and I left.

Two days afterwards I returned to finish the search. There remained a great square case with books on the four sides in the centre of the room. These were the books, the custodian said, Sheikh Saleh had catalogued. He was at first averse to opening, but I had brought a friend with me who engaged him in pleasant conversation, and soon he gave me keys and step-ladder, and let me examine everything at my leisure, except a few Koran shelves. I made a careful examination of the four sides—again opening suspicious volumes. I found one pile of unbound MSS., over which I spent much time and care, returning to the search for fear I might have overlooked something; but nowhere in the library did I find the wanted codex. I looked to see if any books had slipped behind, but the arrangement is singularly neat. Every book (I remember no exception) has a green slip of paper hanging from it with its number. I left the library fully convinced that the book was not there.

My disappointment at my failure has recently been somewhat mitigated by hearing in a letter from Cyprus of various disappointments experienced by others who have in the past endeavoured to verify accounts of discoveries traceable to the same source.

FREDERICK JONES BLISS.

 We have received another letter from M. Lambros, which we must hold over till next week.

THE ORIENTAL CONGRESS.

DR. LEITNER has addressed the following letter to the Delegates of the next Oriental Congress, to be held in London:—

DEAR SIR AND HONOURED COLLEAGUE.—I beg to forward for your earnest consideration, and for such action as you and the supporters of the original principles of our Oriental Congresses may desire to take, the admissions contained in the enclosed extract from a published letter signed 'Carlo Landberg,' and which more than confirm the statements of our Appeal to Orientalists and of the Declaration of Paris dated October 10th, 1889, already signed by 230 colleagues. It will be seen that the person who still signs himself as General Secretary of the Congress has put aside the Paris statutes of 1873, which were adopted by the International Assembly of Orientalists, and which have hitherto served as the basis of our congresses. He has even framed new statutes, of which we know nothing, and he has actually presented them to his king as valid till, at least, the next meeting, and as if that monarch could, if he would, decide such a matter. The intention of converting our free international gatherings with their unofficial constitution into a close official body, and the project of creating a permanent Institute in connexion therewith—which was rejected by two-thirds of the delegates at Christiania—are evidently being carried out, in order, inter alia, to regulate the admission to future congresses. Under these circumstances, it appears to me that Orientalists of whatever country are equally interested in resisting these encroachments of an individual or clique on the republic of Oriental letters. At any rate, I have ventured to bring them to your notice. Believe me yours truly,

G. W. LEITNER, LL.D., &c.

Extrait, traduit en français, d'une lettre, signée "Carlo Landberg, Kongressens generalsekretäre," dans le journal suédois Svenska Dagbladet du 6 Mars, 1890:—

"Nous n'avons jamais proposé ni le Caire ni Constantinople, mais j'ai arrangé que ces deux villes se sont prononcées d'une manière affable. Si un Institut, formé de 40 membres orientalistes vraiment, sera créé, c'est une affaire qui regarde les 40 membres et laquelle n'a aucun rapport aux intrigues des opposants.

"Les statuts du premier Congrès privé à Paris n'ont jamais été acceptés par les 4 Congrès officiels, et ne peuvent même pas l'être. Du reste ils ont été unanimement reconnus par le Congrès de Christiania comme hors d'état de servir. Ce fut là que se réunit le Congrès, invité par le gouvernement suédois-norvégien, qui ne pouvait naturellement pas se plier à des statuts érigés à la hâte par quelques personnes privées. C'est pourquoi des statuts conformes à ceux des 4 Congrès officiels ont été composés par moi et présentés au premier chef de l'état, lequel était aussi l'auguste protecteur du Congrès. Par cause ils sont valables jusqu'au Congrès prochain."

SALE.

MESSES. SOTHEBY, WILKINSON & HODGE sold by auction the library of the late Mr. John Jesse, of Llandbedr Hall, last week. The following books sold well:—Dickens, Master Humphrey's Clock, with Sibson's etchings inserted, 1840, 16l. 5s. Ackermann, Microcosm of London, 3 vols., 11l. 10s. Hakluyt, Early Voyages, edited by Woodfall, 1809, 12l. 10s. W. Combe, English Dance of Death and Dance of Life, 1815-1817, 3 vols., 16l. Seymour, New Readings of Old Authors, 1841, 16l. 5s. Sowerby, English Botany and Supplement, 1831-49, 18l. Thackeray, Paris Sketch-book, 1840, 9l. 10s. Westmacott, English Spy, 2 vols., 1825, 19l. 10s. Sir J. Reynolds, Engravings from his works, 3 vols., 20l. 10s. Lodge, Portraits of Illustrious Personages, 4 vols., large paper, 1821, 50l. The two days' sale realized 1,098l. 1s. 6d.

MR. GLADSTONE'S MODEL LIBRARY.

I HAVE waited expecting to see some remarks from professional librarians on Mr. Gladstone's article in the March number of the Nineteenth Century on 'Books and the Housing of Them.' Mr. Gladstone does not give details as to the number of shelves and "uprights" for supporting the shelves in his library, or the number of inches which he allows for the average height of folio, 4to., and 8vo. shelving. But it is evident that he must have made some serious error in calculating the number of books which can be shelved in a room 40 ft. long by 20 ft. on shelving such as is shown in the diagram drawn to scale which accompanies his article.

The Astronomical Society's library is 40 ft. long by 20 ft. broad, and there is more than 18 ft. of height above and below the gallery devoted to shelving, whereas Mr. Gladstone gives the height of the shelving in his model library as only 9 ft.; yet a year ago, before an additional room was taken for storing books, the shelves of the Society's library were full to overflowing with 9,000 volumes.

From the details given in Mr. Gladstone's paper and the scale below the diagram it is pos-

* This is not correct. The Paris Congress had more members, both national and foreign, than any of the subsequent seven congresses. There was no difference between so-called official and non-official congresses, for they were all based on the Paris statutes, with, of course, local regulations. I was a member or delegate of all the congresses, and the number of members at each, to the best of my knowledge, is as follows: Paris (1873), 1,064; London (1874), 310; St. Petersburg (1876), 511; Florence (1878), 127 present, number of others not found; Berlin (1881), 290; Leyden (1883), 454; Vienna (1886), 424; Stockholm-Christiania (1889), 713 members, including tourists.—G. W. LEITNER.

sible to make a fairly good approximation to the number of feet of shelving. Making the generous estimate that the shelving below the windows is 3 ft. high, and neglecting the thickness of the standards or "uprights" which are necessary to support the shelving, I make out that in Mr. Gladstone's ideal library there would be 132½ ft. of 8vo. shelving, 9 ft. high, and 41½ ft. of 4to. or folio shelving, also 9 ft. high. But in the Astronomical Society's library, which is lighted by only four windows, instead of eight as in Mr. Gladstone's library, there is an area of shelving equivalent to 204 ft. of shelving 9 ft. high. The R.A.S. library should, therefore, be capable of containing fully an eighth more books than the library pictured by Mr. Gladstone's imagination; for, unless I have misunderstood the article, I do not understand him to say that he has 20,000 volumes stored in his library at Hawarden. To take another example. In the library at Lincoln's Inn, which is 130 ft. long, 40 ft. wide, and 60 ft. high, there are only about 50,000 volumes. Yet judging by the surface of shelving in its sixteen bays, or compartments, this library ought to be capable of holding, according to Mr. Gladstone's estimate, over 200,000 volumes. In other words, Mr. Gladstone's shelving would only hold 8,000 volumes, packed as they were packed in the Astronomical Society's library, and only 5,000 volumes if stored as they are arranged in Lincoln's Inn Library. And this is on the assumption that Mr. Gladstone's lowest row of books stands on the floor—an arrangement which careful librarians strive to avoid, for the books are then liable to be damaged by the feet and by housemaids in dusting, and the titles when so low down are very difficult to read without removing the volumes from their places. It is also on the assumption that Mr. Gladstone's projecting cases are full up to the wall, though it would be impossible to remove books in Mr. Gladstone's model library within 6 in. of the wall without taking others out, as the space allowed in front of the books is only 4 in. to the ends of the cases with their backs against the wall. I fear also that such bookcases, not opposite to a window, would be found to be very badly lighted.

Mr. Gladstone's estimate seems to be founded on the assumption that the average thickness of an 8vo. volume is one inch, and that the average height of 8vo. shelving, including the thickness of the shelf, is only 9 in., an assumption which is altogether at fault. Such shelving would only hold the two smaller sizes of octavos, posts and crowns, which are much less numerous than demy 8vo. I find that the average height of the 8vo. shelving, including the thickness of the shelf, in the Astronomical Society's library is over 12 in., and the average height of the 8vo. shelving in Lincoln's Inn Library, including the shelf, is 14 in. The average thickness of 8vo. books seems to differ greatly in different classes of literature. Thus the average thickness of the modern legal text-books in Lincoln's Inn Library is 1½ in., while the average thickness of the 8vo. books on the shelving devoted to science and mathematics in the same library is 1½ in., and the average thickness of the 8vo. volumes in the general literature department is 1½ in.

A. COWPER RANYARD.

Literary Gossip.

THE story on which Mr. Rider Haggard and Mr. Andrew Lang have been working jointly is to be published in the New Review, and will run through some nine numbers. Its title will be 'The World's Desire,' and its publication will commence in the number for April.

MR. ARCHIBALD GROVE, the editor of the New Review, intends to start in April a new halfpenny weekly paper, supported by contributions from eminent persons and well printed on good paper. It will contain many extracts; but a first-class serial story will run through it by Mr. G. R. Sims, and an original article on the current topics of the day will be given each week, to which the following writers have promised to contribute: Prof. Max Müller, Mr. A. J. Mundella, M.P., Justin McCarthy, M.P., Lord Charles Beresford, Sir John Lubbock, M.P., Mrs. Jeune, Mr. Besant, Mrs. Lynn Linton, Lord Randolph Churchill, the Earl of Pembroke, and Prof. Ray Lankester. Mr. Gladstone has promised an article.

MR. RUDYARD KIPLING, who has just completed a three-volume novel, will have an article in the form of a dialogue in the next Fortnightly Review.

MR. WILLIAM BLACK is making rapid progress with the story he is writing for Messrs. Tillotson & Son's newspaper syndicate. The title will be 'Stand Fast, Craig-Royston.' The opening scenes are in London. Several Scotch characters are introduced, together with one or two representatives of the United States. The novel will appear simultaneously as a serial in England, America, and the colonies.

WITH reference to a paragraph which appeared in our last issue mentioning that Mrs. Sutherland Orr was engaged on a biography of Mr. Robert Browning, we are requested to say that Mrs. Sutherland Orr would be glad to receive letters or extracts from letters of Mr. Browning containing really interesting matter, not mere personal details. Such letters may be addressed to Mrs. Sutherland Orr, to the care of Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W. The letters will be returned to the senders.

WHEN Mr. Rider Haggard's new novel, now running in some of the newspapers, is finished it will be published in book form by Messrs. Longman & Co. It is entitled 'Beatrice.' The heroine is a highly accomplished girl, entertaining atheistical views, the daughter of an impecunious Welsh clergyman.

DURING the first week in April will appear 'Hereward the Wake,' the sixth and concluding volume of the sixpenny edition of Charles Kingsley's novels. No fewer than one million volumes of this series have been printed, and in most cases the entire edition has been absorbed within a day or two of publication. Messrs. Macmillan are preparing for publication in May a sixpenny edition of 'Tom Brown's School Days' in the same form, but with fifty-eight illustrations.

THE book by M. A. Daudet on a translation of which Mr. Henry James is at work concludes, it is rumoured, the adventures of Tartarin, who becomes bitten with the colonizing mania, and settles down as a colonist. An illustrated edition of the work is to be published, we hear, at the same time in London and Paris.

MR. CLARK RUSSELL has been commissioned by Messrs. Methuen & Co. to write a life of Admiral Lord Collingwood, the famous second in command at the battle of Trafalgar.

DURING Mr. Alfred Austin's absence in Italy the National Review will be edited by Mr. Hodgson, who is already known as a writer in the heavy reviews and in weekly papers.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. will shortly publish, in two volumes octavo, 'The Golden Bough: a Study in Comparative Religion,' by Mr. J. G. Frazer, Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. The book is an attempt to explain the rule of succession to the priesthood of Diana at Aricia. The method of investigation is the comparative one, and in the course of the inquiry the author tries to throw light on some obscure or neglected facts in primitive religion, especially the early religion of the European Aryans. The book is divided into four chapters, 'The King of the Wood,' 'The Perils of the Soul,' 'Killing the God,' and 'The Golden Bough.'

MISS PONTNER, whose delightful story 'My Little Lady' is familiar to novel-readers, is bringing out a new work styled 'The Failure of Elizabeth.' It will be published by Mr. Bentley in London and Mr. Lovell in New York. Miss Rosa Mackenzie Kettle is going to bring out at Easter a larger story than any of her previous works of fiction. It is called 'The Old Hall among the Water-Meadows.' The scene is laid in Wiltshire at first and at the close, but the more romantic and active part takes place on the borders of Connemara, where a portion of the writer's youth was spent. It is not exactly a tale of the day, but the conditions of life are still much the same in the wild districts where "boycotting" took its rise.

Blackwood for April will contain another of those skits on current politics for which Maga has always been famous. The subject will be Scottish Home Rule.

MR. FREDERIC SEEBOHM is writing a new book on the Celtic open-field system of tillage. A lecture which he delivered before the Honourable Society of Cymmrodorion on the same subject will be incorporated in the work. The customs of Brittany, recently investigated by Mr. Seebohm, are laid under contribution to furnish proof of the Celtic origin of the system.

WE regret to announce the death of Archdeacon Gray at the comparatively early age of sixty-two. Archdeacon Gray is best known in connexion with his long residence in Canton. From 1852 to 1878 he continuously resided in that city, where he filled the office of consular chaplain. But while "in his duty prompt at every call," he threw his superfluous energies into making himself acquainted with the habits, thoughts, and surroundings of the natives, and was thus enabled to gain detailed and intimate knowledge of the every-day life of the people. To European visitors to Canton he was a most invaluable guide, philosopher, and friend. No one knew what was worth seeing in the city so thoroughly as he did, and with untiring courtesy he placed his information at the disposal of any one who chose to ask it of him. In 1867 he was appointed Commissary of the Diocese of Victoria and Archdeacon of Hongkong. Soon after his return to England in 1878 he was appointed Rector of Hunsdon, Herts, which preferment he resigned in 1884. Archdeacon Gray was the author of an invaluable and now rare work, entitled 'Walks in the City of Canton'; he also published 'Arabia and its Faiths,'

'A Journey round the World,' and two volumes on 'China.'

The Clifton Antiquarian Club are engaged in fixing commemorative tablets on interesting houses and places of Bristol and Clifton. Robert Southey, a native of Wine Street, has been already thus honoured, and it is proposed to inscribe houses similarly or in other ways related to Hannah More, Sir Thomas Lawrence, P.R.A., Chatterton, Bowdich, the Ashantee traveller, T. L. Beddoes (author of 'The Bride's Tragedy,' &c.), Mary Carpenter, Thomas Eagles, S. T. Coleridge, and other eminent natives or residents of the past. Roman camps and roads of the neighbourhood are likewise to receive annotations on their respective sites.

THE Law Quarterly Review for April will contain articles by Mr. Kenelm E. Digby on 'The Law of Criminal Conspiracy in England and Ireland'; on registration of title and land transfer, by Mr. H. Greenwood and by Mr. H. W. Challis; on 'The Law of Maintenance and Champerty,' by Mr. A. H. Dennis; on American legislation on employers' liability, by Mr. William M. McKinney; on 'The Rio Tinto Case in Paris,' by Mr. Malcolm McLlwraith; and on 'The Antiquities of Dartmoor,' by Mr. C. Elton, M.P.

MR. FRANK MURRAY, of Derby, has in preparation a new edition, to be printed privately, of 'The Cupid: a Collection of Love Songs.' It will be a verbatim reprint of the original edition of 1736. There will be no copies for general sale after publication, the supply being limited to those who have recorded their names as subscribers. The book is expected to be ready early in the ensuing summer.

THE next volume of the "English Men of Action" Series will be 'Havelock,' by Mr. Archibald Forbes, which will appear early in April.

It is said that Colburn's United Service Magazine has virtually passed into new hands, and that the April number is to be practically the first of a new series, with several fresh contributors.

MESSRS. LONGMAN write:—

"In your 'Literary Gossip' of last week you state that Mr. O'Brien's novel will be published by us here and by Scribner in New York. This is an error, as we shall be the publishers both here and in the United States through our New York house. The date of publication here will be the 21st of April."

In the "Cameo Series," of which three volumes have been published, Mr. T. Fisher Unwin will include the following works named in the proposed order of publication: 'Iphigenia in Delphi,' with translations from the Greek by Dr. Garnett; 'The Poems of Robert Surtees,' with an introduction by Mr. E. Peacock, F.S.A.; and 'Mirêio: a Provençal Poem,' by Frederic Mistral, translated by Harriet W. Preston.

MR. O. M. EDWARDS, of Lincoln College, Oxford, is editing a popular series of Welsh books, entitled "Cyfres y Werin." The first two volumes, by the editor himself, are accounts of tours in Italy and Brittany. The third volume, which is in the press, is a collection of Pennillion usually sung to the harp, with an introduction by Mr. J. Morris Jones, Welsh Lecturer at the North Wales College. Among the other announcements are a volume by Prof. Rhys, called 'Geiriau Llanw,' presumably dealing with the "literary padding" of Welsh alliterative poetry; 'The Poets of Cardiganshire,' by the Rev. R. Williams, Welsh Lecturer, St. David's College, Lampeter; a work on Plato, by Mr. Edward Anwyl, of Oriel College; translations of Ruskin's 'Ethics of the Dust' and 'Crown of Wild Olives'; and handbooks of the history and the literature of Wales. The publisher is Mr. E. W. Evans, of Dolgelly.

MR. H. SPURR writes:—

"The writer of the obituary notice of the late Mr. Hargrave Jennings omitted from his list of published writings of the deceased author 'The Obelisk: Notices of the Origin, Purpose, and History,' &c., 1877, a little work which is exceedingly scarce; and a volume published by Vizetelly some six or seven years ago, entitled 'The Childishness and Brutality of the Age.' The exact title of the book on Phallic worship is 'Phallicism, Celestial and Terrestrial, Heathen and Christian: its Connexion with the Rosicrucians and the Gnostics, and its Foundation in Buddhism. With an Essay on Mystic Anatomy,' and it was issued to subscribers in 1884 by Mr. George Redway. It has been for the last two or three years quite out of print, and commands in open market at least double the published price of 21s. Speaking with Mr. Jennings quite recently upon the subject of his reminiscences, he told me that he had the MS. already by him. In the hands of a competent editor we might look for some curious and instructive reading."

MR. HALL CAINE has written a short article on fiction for the Contemporary Review.

THE death is announced of Prof. Mangold, of Bonn, a theologian well known in Germany; also those of Canon Butler, formerly Principal of the Liverpool College and author of several school-books, and of the Rev. Dr. Brette, French master at Christ's Hospital and author of various elementary manuals.

A COLLECTION of the accounts published of the doings of the Oriental Congress at Stockholm has appeared in Swedish at Upsala. Among the contributors are Dr. Rost, Mrs. Max Müller, Prof. de Goeje, Dr. Nestle, and Prof. Weber.

THE chief Parliamentary Papers of the week are Civil Service Estimates, 1890-91, in sections,—for example, for Education, Class IV. (8d.), for Foreign and Colonial Services, Class V. (5d.), for Non-Effective Services, Class VI. (4d.), Miscellaneous, Class VII. (3d.), Index (2d.), General Abstract (2d.), Statement as to Rearrangement of Votes (2d.), and Memorandum on the Civil Service Estimates (2d.); Revenue Departments, Estimates for 1890-91 (1s. 3d.); Report of the Meteorological Society for 1889 (6d.); East India, Correspondence as to the Indian Service Commission (10d.); and Public Accounts, Minutes of Evidence, &c., to First Report of Select Committee (5d.).

SCIENCE

CHEMICAL NOTES.

M. SPRING has recently revived the theory that there exists at the free surface of any liquid a layer which has a greater chemical activity than has the rest of the liquid. Amongst other experiments he quotes one in which a prism of calc spar was immersed for about half its length in hydrochloric acid, when the surface action was so vigorous that the prism was cut completely in two and the lower half sank in the liquid. Beechhold has, however, shown that these experiments can be easily explained on a far simpler assumption, namely, that the liquid at the surface on dissolving some of the crystal becomes denser and sinks in the solution down the sides of the crystal, thus protecting the lower portion of it from the action of the solvent. That this explanation is probably correct, and, in any case, that the surface action of the liquid has nothing to do with the result, is shown by a simple experiment:—The upper portion of a prism of calc spar is coated with wax, and the entire prism immersed vertically in acid, when the prism will be cut in two at the boundary of the wax coating, although this is far below the free surface of the liquid.

Prof. J. P. Cooke, of Harvard College, has redetermined the densities of hydrogen and carbonic anhydride. In these experiments all possible precautions suggested by earlier determinations were adopted, and the results may be considered to be the most accurate yet obtained. The mean results obtained were, for hydrogen, 0.06960; for carbonic anhydride, 1.52855, taking air as unity; or taking hydrogen as unity, and using Regnault's number for the density of oxygen on the air scale, oxygen has a density of 15.8865, and carbonic anhydride of 21.964.

M. Moissan is continuing his researches on fluorine. Amongst the more interesting results he has obtained may be mentioned the fact that whilst fluorine in small quantities appears to be colourless, yet when examined in a platinum tube 50cm. in length, with plane ends of colourless fluorspar, it is seen to have a distinct yellowish green colour, paler and decidedly yellower than that of chlorine. The determination of the density of fluorine in platinum flasks of about 100cc. capacity gave the number 1.265; the value calculated from the atomic weight is 1.316. Platinum tetrafluoride is obtained by passing fluorine over bundles of platinum wire heated to dull redness. It forms a deep red mass or chamois-yellow crystals, and when heated yields fluorine and crystals of metallic platinum. When thrown into a small quantity of water, it is decomposed with formation of hydrogen fluoride and platinum dioxide. Very dilute solutions are more stable; but even in these the same decomposition takes place if the solution is heated.

M. Besson finds that arsenic trichloride solidifies at -18°, forming white, nacreous needles. Several very ingenious methods were tried to convert it into a higher chloride by treatment with liquid chlorine at low temperatures, but in all cases without there being the slightest sign of chemical combination; it therefore seems pretty certain that arsenic does not form a pentachloride. Stannic chloride solidifies at -33°, and forms small white needles.

Dr. Hodgkinson recently brought forward some evidence tending to show that the blackening of silver chloride on exposure to light was due to the formation of a silver oxychloride. This view is combated by Cary Lea, who quotes instances where the blackening occurs when oxygen is not present; for instance, pure silver chloride was melted and poured into refined petroleum, in which it solidified; when exposed to light under the petroleum it immediately blackened. Similarly the black photoidide of silver was obtained by the action of iodine on pure silver under petroleum.

By the analysis of samples of albumin free from ash, Harnack has obtained numbers which agree well with those obtained by Lieberkuhn and by Loew. The latter author suggested for albumin the very complex empirical formula $C_{210}H_{320}N_{50}O_{66}S_8$, the probability of which is to some extent affirmed by the present work.

GEOGRAPHICAL NOTES.

THE fate of Dr. Peters's expedition is still shrouded in mystery. Herr Borchert reached Dr. Peters's camp in Korkoro, on the Upper Tana, on Christmas Eve, and found everything intact there. Even the German flag was still flying. Soon after his arrival Herr Borchert was surrounded by a crowd of hostile Gallas, and as he had only six men with him, he thought it advisable to retire down the river, without having obtained a single scrap of information as to the fate of his leader. Subsequently to Herr Borchert's return to the coast it was reported at Lamu that Dr. Peters had succeeded in pacifying the Gallas, whose villages he had wasted, and that they had escorted him to the border of the Masai country. Herr Weiss, who forwards this intelligence, describes it as trustworthy. To us it seems worthless.

The Scottish Geographical Magazine publishes a remarkable essay on 'The Evolution of Climate,' by Prof. James Geikie, which is illustrated by five maps of the world, exhibiting the areas of continental plateaus occupied by the sea in paleozoic, mesozoic, and tertiary times, the areas of dominant depression and elevation, and the geological features. In the same periodical will be found a paper on 'The Physical Basis of Political Geography,' by Mr. H. J. Mackinder, and an obituary notice of Col. Yule, with an excellent portrait.

In Petermann's Mitteilungen will be found an instructive paper on the ethnography of the Peloponnesus, by Dr. A. Philippson, with a map. The author shows that the Slav immigrants have in course of time become completely hellenized, and that the number of Albanians, who still retain their language, hardly exceeds 90,000 souls, or 12 per cent. of the total population, the bulk of them being found in Argolis and Corinthia. The gipsies have adopted the Greek language, whilst the supposed "Walachians" of the Peloponnesus are in reality nomadic herdsmen, or "Vlakhos," who speak Greek, but whose origin is still a matter of uncertainty. The final conclusion at which the author arrives is this, that the bulk of the Greek-speaking inhabitants of the Peloponnesus is a conglomerate of Greeks, Slavs, and Albanians. Of the Romans, Jews, Goths, Vandals, French, Italians, Spaniards, Arabs, and Turks, who at various epochs settled in the country, no traces remain at the present day.

The scientific results of the travels undertaken by the Hungarian Count Béla Széchenyi in East Africa during the years 1877-80, in company with several scholars, will be published in two large volumes, the first of which has just made its appearance. The work, originally written in the Hungarian language, will shortly be translated into English, German, and French. Besides containing numerous illustrations, a political and geographical atlas will be added, which has been executed in the military geographical institution of Vienna.

The forthcoming St. Nicholas will contain a narrative entitled 'Six Years in the Wilds of Central Africa,' by one of Stanley's pioneer officers, with a picture of Stanley telling the story of his fight with the Bengals.

Mr. Stanford sends us a Map of Jamaica, "prepared in the Public Works Department by Colin Liddell," and published on a scale of three miles to the inch. The map abounds in topographical detail, but although the hills are shaded, not a single altitude is given.

Topics in Geography, by W. F. Nichols (Boston, U.S., Heath), is a book intended for teachers, and deserves commendation in several respects. The author has apparently had much experience in the teaching of geography, and here presents us with "topics" sufficient to fill up a good many lessons, arranged in eight grades. Of course he approaches his subject from an American point of view, and this will have to be taken into account by English teachers who may consult his book. We have but little fault to find with the manner in which he deals with his subject. Occasionally, however, his conciseness may mislead, as when he says, "The United States was discovered by Sebastian Cabot." The list of books recommended for "geographical reading" leaves very much to be desired.

SOCIETIES.

ROYAL.—March 13.—Sir H. E. Roscoe, V.P., in the chair.—The following papers were read: 'On the Organization of the Fossil Plants of the Coal-Measures,' Part XVII, by Prof. W. C. Williamson, and 'The Nitrifying Process and its Specific Ferment,' Part I, by Prof. P. F. Frankland and Grace C. Frankland.

GEOLOGICAL.—March 12.—Mr. J. W. Hulke, V.P., in the chair.—Mr. G. Sweet and Mount Ratnavélacharia were elected Fellows.—The following communications were read: 'On a Deep Channel of Drift in the Valley of the Cam, Essex,' by Mr. W. Whitaker, 'On the Monian and Basal Cambrian Rocks of Shropshire,' by Prof. J. F. Blake, 'On a Crocodilian Jaw from the Oxford Clay of Peterborough,' and 'On Two New Species of Labyrinthodonts,' by Mr. R. Lydekker.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.—March 7.—Dr. J. Evans, President, in the chair.—This being an evening appointed for the election of Fellows, no papers were read.—The following gentlemen were elected Fellows: Prof. Pelham, Revs. E. Owen, A. F. Smith, E. S. Wilson, and J. M. Guilding, and Messrs. C. E. Peek, E. H. Freshfield, L. L. Duncan, C. A. Markham, R. Birkbeck, and E. M. Beloe.

March 14.—Dr. J. Evans, President, in the chair.—Lady Charlotte Schreiber, through Mr. Franks, exhibited the silver seal of the Provost's Court of Monte Falcione, Italy, to which was attached by a silver chain the small counterseal.—Dr. A. S. Murray exhibited a cast of a fragment of a Tabula Iliaca from Southern Italy, and communicated some remarks descriptive of it.—Mr. Rider Haggard, through the President, exhibited a glass bottle of the Roman period from Cyprus, with the singular feature of five threads blown within it from round the base to the junction of the neck.—The President suggested that these were made by first blowing a small bulb, and while hot, pushing up with a wire portions of the glass, as slender tubes, as far as the base of the neck. The bulb was then reheated and blown to a larger size, converting the slender tubes into fine threads with little trace of their original tubular form.—In illustration of the President's remarks, Mr. Powell and Mr. C. V. Boys exhibited specimens of similar bottles with internal threads formed from tubes, which they had independently made according to the method suggested by the President after examining the original bottle that afternoon.—Mr. Boys said it was clear that the bottle could have been formed in no other manner than that so ingeniously suggested by the President.—Sir J. C. Robinson exhibited a fine example of a copper-gilt chalice with silver parcel-gilt bowl, in which, during recent repairs, an inscription had been found recording its gift by the Jews of the town of Anghari, in Italy, in 1572, in commutation of a racing prize given by them annually.—Rev. C. Wordsworth communicated a paper on the inventories of plate, vestments, and jewels belonging to the cathedral church of Lincoln.

STATISTICAL.—March 18.—Dr. T. G. Balfour, President in the chair.—The paper read was 'Marriage-Rates and Marriage-Ages, with Special Reference to the Growth of Population,' by Dr. W. Ogle.—A discussion followed in which Mr. F. Hendriks, Mr. H. M. Paul, Mr. S. Bourne, Dr. G. B. Longstaff, Sir R. W. Rawson, Mr. A. E. Bateman, Rev. I. Dosey, Mr. J. B. Martin, Major Craigie, and the President took part.

SOCIETY OF ARTS.—March 14.—Sir C. Turner in the chair.—A paper 'On Agriculture and the State in India' was read before the Indian Section by Mr. W. R. Robertson.

March 15.—Prof. V. Lewes delivered the second lecture of his course of popular lectures 'On the Atmosphere.'

March 17.—Prof. Church commenced a course of three Cantor Lectures on 'Colour and Colouring.' The lecture was illustrated by experiments.

March 18.—Mr. Hyde Clarke in the chair.—A paper 'On Brazil' was read before the Foreign and Colonial Section by Mr. J. W. Wells.

March 19.—Sir F. Abel in the chair.—A paper 'On Commercial Geography' was read by Mr. J. Scott Keltie, and was followed by a discussion.

MATHEMATICAL.—March 13.—Mr. J. J. Walker, President, in the chair.—The following communications were made: 'Perfect Numbers,' by Major P. A. Macmahon, 'The Relation of Distortion in Prismatic Images to Dispersion,' by Dr. J. Larmor, 'On the Satellite of a Line relatively to a Cubic,' and the President (Prof. Greenhill in the chair), and 'An Approximate Relation connecting Successive Terms of the Expansion for t and x ,' by Mr. G. Heppel.

HUGUENOT.—March 12.—Mr. R. Hovenden in the chair.—A paper was read 'On Huguenot History in Venetian Archives,' by Sir H. A. Layard, being an abstract of the contents of nearly one hundred hitherto unedited letters of Marc Antonio Barbaro preserved among the MSS. in the Marciana at Venice. These letters, which Sir H. Layard has transcribed and translated for publication by the Huguenot Society, were written by Barbaro during his residence in France as Ambassador of the Republic in 1562 and 1563, and give many interesting details concerning important events then occurring, the principal being the siege and capture of Rouen, the capitulation of Dieppe, the death of Anthony of Navarre, the battle of Dreux, the negotiations for peace between the Huguenot and Roman Catholic leaders carried on by Catherine de' Medici, the capture and imprisonment of Condé, the assassination of Guise, the fall of Havre, and the attempts of the English Government to regain possession of Calais.—It was announced that the Society's summer conference would be held in July at Bristol.

MEETINGS FOR THE ENSUING WEEK.

- MON. London Institution, 5.—'The Beginnings of Modern Europe,' V. Key Canon Benham.
— Surveyors' Institution, 8.—Adjourned discussion on Mr. Wheeler's Paper 'Batterments.'
— Society of Arts, 8.—Some Considerations concerning Colour and Colouring, Lecture II., Prof. A. H. Church (Cantor Lecture).
— Geographical, 8.—North American Trans-Continental Pathways, Old and New, Mr. A. A. Hayes.
TUE. Horticultural, 1.—Popular Lecture, 3.
— Royal Institution, 3.—The Post-Darwinian Period, Prof. G. J. Romanes.
— Society of Architects, 7½.—The Influence of Material upon Design, Mr. G. A. T. Middleton.
— Society of Arts, 8.—Engraving in Wood, Old and New, Mr. W. J. Linton.
— Anthropological Institute, 8.—Exhibition, by Mr. I. Spielman, of a Skull dredged up on the Manchester Ship Canal (ris; 'The Old Briton' 'Fibron,' or 'Hornpipe,' and its Affinities, Mr. H. Balfour; 'The Ancient Peoples of Ireland and Scotland Considered,' Mr. H. Macdonald.
— Folk-lore, 8.—Notes on the Folk-lore of Bees, Mr. W. P. Kirby.
— Civil Engineers, 8.—Further discussion on Mr. Price's Paper on 'Lough Erne Drainage,' Harry Dock and Railways, Mr. J. Robinson.
WED. United Service Institution, 3.—The Sanitation of Barracks, Surgeon-Major J. L. Nott.
— Society of Arts, 8.—Carriage Building and Street Traffic in England and France, Mr. G. N. Hooper.
— Literature, 8.—The Ethics of Homer and Aristotle as reappearing in the Characters of Trollope and Meredith in Shakespeare, Dr. J. F. Palmer.
— Geological, 8.—New Species of Cypraspis from the Carboniferous Rocks of Yorkshire, Miss Gougeon; 'Composite Spherulites in Obsidian from Hot Springs near Little Lake, California,' Mr. F. Rutley; 'Monograph of the Brezozia (Polypora) of the Hunanian Red Chalk,' Mr. G. H. Vine; 'Evidence furnished by Quaternary Glacial-pool Moraine Deposits of Pennsylvania, U.S.A., for a similar Mode of Formation of the Permian Breccias of Leicestershire and South Derbyshire,' Mr. W. S. Greley.
THURS. Royal Institution, 3.—The Early Development of the Forms of Instrumental Music, Mr. F. Niecks.
— Chemical, 4.—Anniversary Meeting; Election of Office-bearers and Council.
— Royal, 4½.
— London Institution, 6.—Medieval Commerce, Dean of Winchester.
— Electrical Engineers, 8.—Alternate & Continuous Currents in relation to the Human Body, Mr. H. N. Lawrence and Dr. A. Barnes.
— Antiquaries, 8½.—Portrait of Queen Elizabeth found in Sussex, Mr. G. Schaff, with remarks by Mr. F. M. O'Donoghue; 'A Late-Celtic Cemetery at Aylesford, Kent,' Mr. A. J. Evans.
FRI. United Service Institution, 3.—Infantry Training, Col. J. H. A. Macdonald.
— Civil Engineers, 7½.—Deflection of Spiral Springs, Mr. A. E. Young (Students' Meeting).
— Royal Institution, 9.—Fossils, Lord Rayleigh.
SAT. Royal Institution, 3.—Electricity and Magnetism, Lord Rayleigh.
— Society of Arts, 8.—'The Atmosphere,' Prof. V. Lewes (Popular Lecture).

Science Gossip.

THE members of the Chemical Society and their friends will dine together at the Whitehall Rooms, Hôtel Métropole, on the evening of the anniversary meeting, next Thursday, at 7 o'clock for 7.30.

THE death is announced of Dr. Macpherson, the author of 'The Baths and Wells of Europe.'

ANOTHER small planet, No. 288, was discovered by Prof. Luther at Düsseldorf on the 20th ult. It was observed by Dr. W. Luther at Hamburg on the 24th, and by Prof. Abetti at Padua on the 26th. Prof. Luther's first planetary discovery dates as far back as April 17th, 1852, when he discovered No. 17, afterwards named Thetis.

Nos. 2956-7 of the Astronomische Nachrichten contain the results of another series of observations of double stars (including 62 pairs newly discovered) which have been measured by Mr. S. W. Burnham with the great telescope of the Lick Observatory in California.

An observatory has been established in Madagascar on a hill about 4,400 feet in height, situated a short distance to the east of Tananarivo. It was founded by the Catholic mission with the concurrence of the French Government, and already possesses an equatorial, a meridian refractor, and all instruments necessary for meteorological observations; and a photographic telescope for solar observations will shortly be provided.

The new observatory of the Vatican includes in its scheme meteorological, magnetical, seismological, and astronomical observations. The last will consist principally of celestial photography in its different departments. The observatory of the Capitol will probably not be continued.

FINE ARTS

THE INSTITUTE OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS.

THERE are fewer drawings in this exhibition than in its forerunners, and that is in itself an advantage, but unfortunately there is no improvement in the quality of the collection. We have examined the drawings several times, and find that only forty-one appear to be worth serious criticism. Among a crowd of commonplace and incompetent works fewer than twenty are first-rate. The number of specimens of pretty and accomplished workmanship is, of course, very much greater, yet, admitting these, the whole of the drawings that would pass muster in the eyes of a lenient connoisseur would not be more than enough to fill the largest of the three rooms in Piccadilly. We shall first criticize the best drawings, and then deal more briefly with those which, if less admirable, are still commendable.

The Waiting (No. 441) of Sir J. Linton seems to be one of the most pleasing of his contributions. The attitude of the pretty damsel who is waiting for her lover is graceful and natural, and her expression well considered and genuine; the whole is painted with force, it charms us by its rich and strong coloration, and evinces the artist's obvious desire to paint more softly and broadly than he has hitherto done. In the last respect other drawings of his are still more successful. Chloris (373) is very tasteful, harmonious, and inspired by poetic sympathy. Decidedly the best of his drawings is Miss Ashbee (16), a comely and elegant brunette in deep rose, with long brown gloves—a manifest improvement on those ambitious works we have seen of late years in this place.—We admire very much another scholarly and tasteful work, Mr. H. Ryland's

If music be the food of love, play on,

No. 234, a charming figure of a damsel to which the motto seems to us ill suited. Although the anatomy of her figure is rather difficult to understand, and the colour of her face might be purer, we can praise the elegance of the girl, the grace of her attitude, the tastefulness of her bright draperies, and the delicately harmonious colouring of the whole drawing.

Mr. Couldery's Sent out for Punishment (707) is full of spirit, character, and veracity, and is in no respect technically deficient. The pedagogue is somewhat of a caricature, and Mr. Couldery has designed his culprits with a zest which seems intense enough to be cruel; but his whipped boys who whimper, his child pleading with a pitiful grace to be let off, and the undogged scamps who hope to escape, all of them show undeniable humour.—There is, of course, neither pain, passion, nor humour in the specimens of still life Miss K. M. Whitley selected with taste and painted with exquisite skill in the group of Ammonite, Agate, and Fluor Spar (652), minerals she has delineated with marvellously delicate finish, solidity, colour, light, and all the other best qualities of draughtsmanship per se. Not even M. Desgoffe ever surpassed the painting of the play of light in the substance of the piece of Blue John, the splendid colouring of the agate its neighbour, or the pencilling of each specimen. It is difficult to guess why Miss Whitley did not combine them in a group, so as to give to the whole a higher pictorial character, unity, and chiaroscuro.—Mr. W. A. Ingram's High Noon, near Sidmouth (558), is a bold, yet refined and impressive drawing, one of the few original seascapes in the gallery, and it is strong enough and fine enough to deserve the utmost care and thorough finishing. At present it is not much more than a noble sketch with a new and majestic motive.—Less original, but not less impressive, and amply finished withal, is Mr. B. Evans's large panoramic view of Byland Abbey, in the Vale of Mowbray (545), in which from a lofty woodland hollow we overlook the great plain, the distant hills that bound it, the ruined church, and fields flecked with the shadows of a hot autumnal afternoon. The shadows of the foliage, the herbage, and the verdant meadows in the front are too black, and the greenery in general is heavy in colour and tone, yet the whole is marked by a noble sentiment and true greatness in style. Mr. Evans's other drawings here do not equal this one, and, while betraying the influence of the lamp, are not so dignified and reticent.

Although measurable by inches only, H.M.S. Devastation and Rodney (235), by Mr. W. L. Wyllie, is a masterpiece in its way, and is as broad as it is sober and brilliant.—Mr. J. Fulleylove's S. Maria del Popolo, from the Pincian, Rome (296), is, notwithstanding its flat, home-made sky, which has little light and no form, a fine and spirited drawing.—One of the most imposing and attractive drawings in the Institute owes not a little of the unusual sensation it has made to the large dimensions it has pleased the artist, Mr. H. G. Hine, to work in. Mr. Hine, who produced the noble panorama Fittleworth Common, Sussex (317), has often painted as well, and not seldom much better, on paper one-fifth the size of this ambitious work, which, it seems, has at last compelled the public to recognize the extraordinary merit of his art, and that poetic inspiration which imparts at least half their charms to his studies among the South Downs. No. 317 is a grand view over hill-sides clad with sward and smooth valleys, where the pearly shadows of the sunset grow longer while bright day still crowns the summit and glows on the distant plain. A test for the artist's powers has been found in the roughness of the front of the scene, which must have been the more difficult to manage because he seldom deals with anything of the kind. The painter's View near Harting, Sussex (379), rich, delicate, sober, and fine in sentiment and style, proves to be a worthy companion to the best of those admirable drawings the Athenæum has long delighted to praise.—The Yorkshire Village (99) of Mr. W. F. Stocks, a true and sympathetic picture of misty, sunlit morning, very soft and harmonious, is the last of the landscapes comprised in the above-named group of twenty first-rate examples.

An architectural subject of merit is Mr. E. Bale's The Convent Terrace, Florence in the Distance (15), a skilful piece, very tender and broad in its choice greyness, its softened sunlight, and true distance.—The Portrait of a Guarnierius Violin (46) will attract attention to the care and skill, the taste and excellent draughtsmanship of Mr. S. C. L. Slocombe, and his ability as a colourist.—Among the genre pictures none excels Mr. C. Green's portrait of John Gilpin (282), a portly champion Fencible of old days, attired in regimentals. The hero's figure is nicely drawn, and animated and solid enough to be quite stereoscopic in the picture, which is altogether bright and good.—Miss K. Greenaway's Boy with a Basket of Apples (295) is the last, but by no means the least pleasing, fresh, and finely painted, of our score of selections. The Stothardian figure of the boy is bright, natural, and ingenuous, and the fruit he carries is painted with honourable research and finish, and its textures and colours are beautiful. The flesh seems to have been painted indoors, for its shadows are brown, and the lights devoid of greys reflected from the sky. We hope Miss Greenaway will in future paint out-of-door subjects out of doors.

We may now turn to less noticeable contributions by the same artists and others, and begin with No. 7, a clever and natural drawing of Ben Varen, distinguished by its true atmosphere and clever representation of the rough herbage of the foreground. It is by Mr. F. Walton, who does not often give us the pleasure of praising his works.—The Freshness of Morning (35), a bright picture by Mr. G. C. Kerr, in which water is excellently painted, is promising.—The Apple O! (65) of Mr. J. White, a village street in full bright sunlight, is a desirable novelty from his hands.—In the Capture of French Guns (71) Mr. W. B. Wollen has provided an "illustration" par excellence, and given animated figures with deft draughtsmanship, and in groups calculated to explain the subject. But the groups are disconnected, the effect is so scattered that it may be said to be invisible, and the work loses simplicity because its local colours and tones are not massed so as to form what may be called chiaroscuro. These are the characteristic defects of illustrations.—Much more artistic in its solidity, brilliancy, and breadth is the Puente San Martin, Toledo (75), distinguished by the fine clearness of its pearly shadows. The artist, Mr. A. B. Donaldson, never did anything so good before.—The Port of Padstow (80), by Mr. N. Dawson, is actually the ground plan of a work of art, to be filled in with colour, searching draughtsmanship, and the solid fruits of studies the painter is quite competent to undertake, and ought not to neglect.—The North Entrance to Brantwood (83), if it were more sincere, brighter, and more solid, would do credit to the taste of Mr. A. Severn and his sympathy with reality; but he never goes quite deep enough into his subjects, and, being content with whatever is superficial in nature, is always unjust to himself. Of course, from an amateur no more is required than appears here; but it is not learned art.—There is far more art, sincerity, grace, and taste in Mr. Margetson's pretty and ingenuous figure of Mistress Dolly (121), clad in red and walking alone in a sunlit autumnal wood, although it is but a sketch measured by inches, than in the showy panorama of hills and lakes as seen from Mr. Ruskin's house.—Miss K. Greenaway's Portrait of a Little Boy (145) is charmingly fresh and natural.—Mr. K. Halswelle's Royal Windsor (245), a landscape, is rather woolly, mannered, and, for him, unusually weak.—High in the second rank of his brilliant, solid, and veracious landscapes is Mr. W. L. Wyllie's The Shah arriving at Gravesend (254), a sober and broad picture of a silvery grey sea.—The Rose Garden (275), parterres enclosed by clipped box hedges and glowing in clear sunlight, is so clever and sympathetic that it is impossible not to wish it were more solid and sincere. It is by Mr. G. S. Elgood.—In the Mother and Child (284) Mr. T. Green has, as usual, produced a pretty and delicate work, possessing no excess of strength of any kind.—Mr. C. Earle's Capri, from the Piazza d'Armi (294), deserves to be praised for several artistic qualities.—Nearly equal to the already-mentioned instance by the same patient and accomplished painter is the Nautilus and Minerals (292) of Miss K. M. Whitley.

The Hawks Abroad (303) of Mr. F. Dadd is a somewhat disappointing picture to come from so good a designer and excellent a draughtsman. The leading figure is neatly drawn and deftly painted, but the design is commonplace, its motives are hackneyed and transpontine. The work is decidedly too grey, and, as a whole, lacks strength and colour.—We have seen too many "illustrations" of the highwayman in art to care much for Mr. J. C. Dollman's "Hawks dinna pike out hawks' een" (427). Very clever, obvious, and slight, this dashing sketch is unworthy of Mr. Dollman, who used to be more ambitious.—The Mother (312) of Mr. J. A. Fitzgerald, a group of sheep and lambs attended by fairies, is full of playful fancies and most delicately painted. It is the best work of the artist, whose "dainty devices" are too often overlooked, and, indeed, are seldom so pretty as this.—No. 347 gives Chelsea Church, Early Morning, as Mr. C. J. Smart has seen its dark brick tower rising above white mists creeping low, and softly lit by a bright dawn. A capital piece of nature has been delineated with skill and fine taste.—

Not wholly in the busy world, nor quite Beyond it, blooms the garden that I love.

is the apt motto of Mr. C. Earle's pure, bright, and tender picture (422) of an old-fashioned flower-garden, crowned with splendid blossoms and glowing in soft morning sunlight; there is plenty of true and graceful sentiment in it.

If Mr. J. Scott had done himself justice in his ambitious Claudia and her Ravens (497), and drawn the chief figure with proper refinement and care, and desire for a fine style, he might have grappled successfully with a choice subject and artistic opportunities such as Mr. Alma Tadema ought to have monopolized long ago. But Mr. Scott's Claudia would be intolerable even if he did not provoke comparison with the best mood of the modern master of classic themes. The huge sable birds are the only materials of which he has made proper use. His Claudia has an ill-drawn face and a stupid expression; besides her arms are out of proportion.—Mr. Hugh Carter's Therefore my age is as a lustrous winter—frosty, but kindly (591) resembles a very inferior Israëls.—In Sheltered Vale (639), by Mr. J. Knight, is in every respect what he has done not ten, but thirty times before, rich in colour, woolly in texture, and mannered throughout, while its sentiment is threadbare.—The Dancing Lesson (678) of Mr. C. M. Grierson is clever, slight, and animated, but both here and abroad the subject is an intolerable bore.—We may name with general praise the Raspberries (18) of Miss R. Wallis; At Aldborough (34) of Mr. E. M. Wimperis; The Market Place, &c. (49), by Mr. R. P. Spiers; Mr. W. H. Millais's bright October on the Brann (120); Mr. Aumonier's Spring (123); Mr. Fulleylove's Greenwich Hospital (127); Mr. Wollen's In Reserve (141), soldiers; Mr. G. S. Elgodd's Warwickshire Village (178); Mr. Orrock's broad and artistic Common in Essex (184); Mr. E. J. Gregory's Esthetic Amenity (302), which is by no means his best work; and Mr. H. Goodwin's Morning Room, Dixton Manor (363).

MR. JOHN ROGERS HERBERT, R.A.

THIS aged artist, who had been the doyen of the Academy since the death of Mr. Webster, expired on the 17th inst. after a long illness. He was born January 23rd, 1810, at Maldon, Essex, where his father held an appointment in the Custom House, and at Maldon he was educated. He came to London, and in 1826 was admitted a student in the Royal Academy, then domiciled in Somerset House. His first exhibited picture was "272, Portrait of a Country Boy," at the Academy of 1830. He continued to paint portraits for some years, varying the monotony of the occupation by producing book illustrations and romantic pictures, chiefly of the Byronic sort, which were sent to the British Institution. The most meritorious of these, representing 'The Appointed Hour,' was at that gallery in 1834, and secured the painter a reputation. An admirable piece of its kind, it depicted with grace, considerable beauty, and some passion, a Venetian lover lying assassinated at the foot of a staircase down which his mistress is hurrying to an assignation. The success of this picture, which was engraved and has since been reshowed at the Academy, justified the artist in going to Italy, where he found the materials he required for similar subjects, such as 'The Brides of Venice'; 'The Signal,' for which he received a prize from the British Institution; and others too numerous for mention. About 1840, through the influence of the younger Pugin, he became a member of the Roman Catholic Church, and thenceforth painted a long succession of pictures of a religious tendency; among them 'The Introduction of Christianity to Britain,' 'Christ and the Woman of Samaria,' 'Sir T. More and his Daughter,' 'St. Gregory teaching his Chant,' and 'The Baptist reproving Herod.' He was one of the first masters of the Government School of Design, when founded in 1841 at Somerset House, and in the same year was elected an A.R.A. In 1846 he became an R.A., and in 1848 was selected to paint in the Houses of Parliament, where he depicted 'Lear disinherits Cordelia' in the Poets' Hall, and, in the water-glass process, in the Peers' Robing Room, 'Moses bringing the Tables of the Law.' He painted 'The Judgment of Daniel' in oil for the House of Lords. The picture of 'Moses' was in hand for no fewer than fourteen years; this delay, and other matters connected with the painter and his work, the treatment vouchsafed to Maclise, an incomparably greater artist and Herbert's fellow at Westminster, and the gross unfairness of the payments made to them, excited much indignation, and discredited the later history of the great artistic scheme with which they were both associated. Since that time Mr. Herbert's art has not held its original place in the estimation of the world, and his efforts became distinctly less ambitious, although he was, on the whole, a very prolific painter. He was elected a Corresponding Member of the Académie des Beaux-Arts in 1869.

THE DISCOVERIES AT LYCOSURA.

American School of Classical Studies, Athens,
Feb. 28, 1890.

I HAVE had the privilege of seeing some of the most important parts of the works recently discovered at Lycosura, in Arcadia, by M. Kavvadias, the Director General of Excavations in Greece. From what I have seen I do not hesitate to say that these works, together with the sarcophagi found by Hamdi Bey at Sidon, are the most important finds in the domain of Greek sculpture made since the 'Hermes' of Praxiteles was unearthed at Olympia.

The peculiar and exceptional value of the Lycosura statues is that they are beyond a doubt the statues described by Pausanias (viii. 38) as being in the temple of Despoina, the works of the artist Damophon of Messene. Now of this artist no work is extant, and this was to be regretted the more as he certainly was one of the most interesting figures in the fourth century B.C. He was a contemporary of Scopas, Praxiteles, and Lysippus—probably older than Lysippus. He was peculiarly interesting, as he differed in spirit from his contemporaries in choosing exclusively for representation in his art the gods and higher religious types of Greece. He appears to have maintained the great spirit of the fifth century to a higher degree than his contemporaries, as in technique also his temple statues bridged over the gold and ivory work of Pheidias and Polycleitus and the marble sculpture of Scopas and Praxiteles. When the great gold and ivory marvel of Pheidias, the statue of Zeus at Olympia, was falling to pieces in the fourth century, it was Damophon who restored it to the entire satisfaction of the Eleans. Many of his statues were akrolithic, which is the next stage to gold and ivory, and a substitute for it, marble taking the place of the ivory, and wood, gilt and painted, the place of the sheets of chiselled gold. But, like his famous contemporaries, the material he used with preference was marble, while not a single work of bronze is mentioned. Overbeck thus sums up his account of Damophon: "He must appear to us as a decidedly great artist, serious as few were [in his days]. He stands before us as a sculptor of the ideal in the highest acceptance of the term, fusing his own work with the unattainable models of the preceding century, and still not opposing himself in fruitless reaction to the spirit of his own age," &c. To have come into possession of an original work by this artist, and at the same time of a genuine temple statue (agalma), must appear to all archaeologists an unprecedented piece of good fortune.

The excavations undertaken by the Greek Government were begun last July, and ended in November. The temple of Despoina has been cleared, and the bathron, or base, of the sacred statues can be distinctly seen at the east end of the cella, which it almost fills up. The cella is 10 m. wide.

Of the statues which stood on this base most of the fragments have been discovered, besides sculptures which decorated either the base or the thrones upon which the goddesses were seated. There are about a hundred fragments in all. There were four figures on the base, all of them over life in size, two of them colossal. One of the heads belonging to the larger figures is now here, and the two heads of the other figures. One torso and five pieces of drapery were so large that, the roads being bad, they could not as yet be transported here.

From the description of Pausanias, who tells us that the statues represented Demeter and Core, Anytus and Artemis, the extant fragments can be identified, and it is evident that Demeter and Despoina were seated on thrones in the centre, with Anytus and Artemis standing on either side.

The fragments that I have been able to examine would, even without the information derived from Pausanias, have been considered by any competent authority as remarkable works of the fourth century B.C. Though they manifest in the heads greater individuality than is possessed by works belonging to the fifth century, they are large in style. But the most striking fragments I had occasion to examine were some pieces of drapery belonging to colossal figures, the folding perfect in its indication of texture, while they are adorned with figures in low relief of most exquisite workmanship. Some had figures of Victory and Tritons, with curious hybrid beings, or perhaps a scene of metamorphosis, running figures changed into animals. M. Kavvadias thinks this has some bearing on the worship of Demeter. A larger piece of drapery is adorned with flowers in low relief. Doubtless we have in this work a reminiscence of the gold drapery adorned in repoussé and enamel.

There are small figures with fish-tails carrying circular baskets on their heads, similar to the object on the head of the colossal fragment from Eleusis now at the Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge. This is probably connected with the worship of Demeter. But I cannot tell whether these figures decorated the throne or the base.

It is to be hoped that a complete restoration of the whole sacred work may be made, and that the results of this successful excavation will soon be published.

CHARLES WALDSTEIN.

SALES.

MESSRS. CHRISTIE, MANSON & WOODS sold on the 15th inst. the following drawings: G. Koller, Marguerita coming from Church, 115*l*. F. Tayler, The Peat-Gatherer, 59*l*.; On the March, 52*l*.; The Ferry Boat, 99*l*. Sir J. Gilbert, Foragers, 70*l*.; Soldiers on the March, 178*l*. A. C. Gow, Marauders, 54*l*.; The Dog-Fanciers, 61*l*.; "As a strenuous Whig," 215*l*. C. Fielding, Stormy Day, 75*l*.; In the Lake District, 141*l*.; Llyn Tal-y-Llyn, Cader Idris, 115*l*. D. Cox, A Pass in Wales, Llanberis, 120*l*. W. C. T. Dobson, Contemplation, 73*l*.; Sappho, 63*l*.; Kate Kearney, 65*l*. B. Foster, Children going Home from School, 315*l*. E. Duncan, The Wreck, 65*l*.; Lindisfarne Abbey, Holy Island, 162*l*.; Wreck near the Corbière Rocks, Jersey, 84*l*. J. Hardy, jun., Highland Keeper, with pony, dogs, and game, 63*l*.; Setters and Dead Game, 95*l*.; Keeper, with grey pony and dead stag, 84*l*.; A Keeper, with grey pony and deerhound, 99*l*.; Deerstalking, 89*l*. A. B. Houghton, Useless Mouths, 138*l*. R. Thorne Waite, Caught in a Shower, 65*l*. E. Warren, A Surrey Cornfield, 50*l*. J. W. Whittaker, Sunset on the Glyders, 63*l*. Rosa Bonheur, Les Longs Rochers, Fontainebleau, 945*l*.

The same auctioneers sold on the 17th inst. the following pictures: J. Wynants and A. Van der Velde, A Landscape, with sheep and two peasants with a dog at a roadside, 126*l*. P. Mazzuolo, The Madonna and Child, with two saints, 100*l*. J. B. Pater, A Fête Champêtre, a composition of eight figures, 199*l*.; The Companion, a composition of nine figures, 220*l*. F. Hals, A Gentleman, with long hair in black dress, 1,995*l*. De Koning, A Birdseye View over a Landscape, with winding river, 435*l*.

Five Art Gossips.

BESIDES a comparatively unimportant Venetian landscape, which has lately been hung in Room VII. of the National Gallery, six more Italian pictures have been placed on the walls. Three of these are now in Room IX. No. 1295, 'The Madonna and Child, with Saints,' is by Girolamo Giovannone, a sixteenth century painter of the Lombard School. The Virgin is seated on a wooden throne covered with gold-embroidered cloth. On the top of the throne are two seated angels playing on musical instruments. On her right is a bishop, who wears a jewelled mitre and the grey garb of his order, and in his left hand holds a crucifix surmounted by, apparently, a stork. His right hand rests on the shoulder of a kneeling devotee dressed in black. On the opposite side a saint of the same order, holding a shorter crucifix, presents a second devotee, wearing a red dress and a sword. The devout expressions are rendered with sympathy; the flesh is carefully and skilfully modelled after nature; the face of the Madonna is charming, that of the Child has a pretty and infantine expression. This pleasing altarpiece, produced in the canopied fashion of the Ferrara-Bologna School of the period in question, seems to be in excellent preservation. In the same room is a small 'Virgin and Child,' by an unknown Milanese of the sixteenth century, apparently a follower of Leonardo. The Madonna wears, besides the traditional colours, a light brown head-cloth. The background is a landscape with rocks in a cool blue tint. In the same room likewise, but not as yet numbered nor named, is a small 'Dead Christ supported by Two Angels': a North Italian example, cold in colour, highly finished, and showing good anatomical knowledge. In Room III., and numbered 1299, is the 'Portrait of a Youth,' by Domenico del Ghirlandaio, a head wearing a purplish-red cap over thick brown curly hair, a grey coat buttoned close to the throat, stippled to show its rough surface, and, over the left shoulder, a dark green mantle. In the Octagon Room are two landscapes by Giuseppe Zais, a Venetian who died in 1704, called 'A River Scene' and 'A Rural Landscape.' The Ansidei Madonna has been taken downstairs for a short time.

On the 29th inst. Messrs. Christie, Manson & Woods will sell Sir F. Leighton's 'Paolo'; Linnell's 'Haymaking and Mowing in Derbyshire'; C. R. Leslie's 'Princes in the Tower,' which belonged to S. Rogers, for whom it was painted; Gainsborough's 'Sir T. Clarges' and 'The Harvest Wain'; Romney's 'Lady Hamilton as Sensibility,' engraved by Earlom, and six other Romneys. The most generally interesting lot will be Gainsborough's camera, which belonged to Dr. Monro, to Mr. B. White of Brownlow Street, and last to Mr. G. W. Reid of the British Museum, and was exhibited at the Grosvenor Gallery with the collected works of the painter, 1885.

It will interest many to know that Mr. Murray's rearrangement of the contents of the room appropriated to archaic sculptures in the British Museum is now complete, and has resulted in a clear and instructive grouping of many examples which were till lately practically out of sight or seen with incongruous neighbours. Some sculptures have been brought from the magazine into public view. An important rearrangement of the casts of statues in the pediments of the Egina temple has been effected by the same authority, who is about to add architectural decorations to the full-size reproductions of the pediments themselves, within which the casts from the figures at Munich are placed.

THE Royal Academy has published the 'General Index of the Catalogues of the Exhibitions of Works by Old Masters and Deceased British Artists. From 1880 to 1889.' This valuable pamphlet contains, year by year alphabetically, in two sections, the names of all the contributors and artists whose works have been shown during the period in question. The former decade was, as our readers know, indexed in the same manner.

THE Society of Lady Artists has appointed to-day (Saturday) for the private view of its exhibition, which will be opened to the public on Monday next in the Egyptian Hall, Piccadilly.

MR. W. H. ST. JOHN HOPE'S 'Report upon Kirkstall Abbey' will appear in the April number of the Reliquary. Among other articles to appear in this number are 'The Plate in the Tudor Exhibition,' by Mr. J. E. Nightingale; 'Woodwork in Hammer Church, destroyed by Fire,' by Dr. Cox; 'Field Names,' by Dr. Atkinson; 'The Use of the Zeon in the Services of the Greek Church,' by Father Hirst; and 'Some Pavements at Isurium,' by Mr. A. D. Leadman.

M. ALFRED NORMAND, who has been elected a member of the Académie des Beaux-Arts in place of M. Diet, deceased, is an older man than his predecessor. The new Academician gained the Grand Prix de Rome in 1846, a First Class Medal at the Exhibition of 1855, and the Legion of Honour in 1860. He designed the Maison Pompiénne in the Avenue Montaigne, the tomb of Jérôme Bonaparte in the Invalides, the hospital of St. Germain-en-Laye, and many other public and private buildings.

MESSRS. P. & D. COLNAGHI will very shortly publish an etching, by M. Laguillermie, from the famous Greuze known as 'La Cruche Cassée' (18×14 in.), and a mezzotint engraving, by Mr. J. D. Miller, after the same painter's 'Innocence' (15×12 in.).

DR. DÖRPFELD, finding he could not undertake any excavations at Idalion, in Cyprus, for the German Government, has gone to join Dr. Schliemann at Hissarlik, where operations have commenced outside the walls of the burnt city.

PROF. PIGORINI has now made his report on the palisade dwellings (terramare) in the valley of the Po. From this it appears that the terramare consist of a palisade enclosed by an external mound, defended by a ditch. In the terramare recently discovered at Castellazzo the mound is 15 metres wide, while the ditch is 27 metres wide and 1 metre deep. The station or dwelling is in the form of a trapezium, having an area little less than 200 metres square. The arts and industries of the primitive inhabitants of the valley of the Po appear from these excavations to have been identical with those of the inhabitants of the lake-dwellings of the Venetian territory.

NEAR Viterbo, in the district of Colleno, a chambered tomb has been discovered, with a vestibule adorned by two columns. The cell contained two sarcophagi of travertine, in which were found a golden ring and some gold thread, remnants of the rich clothing of the deceased. Between Vetralla and Capranica a marble sarcophagus has been unearthed, adorned with bas-reliefs, representing the myth of Theseus and Ariadne, of severe and simple style.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

ST. JAMES'S HALL.—Philharmonic Society. The Popular Concerts.

THE eclectic spirit which now animates the directors of the Philharmonic Society was evinced in the programme of the first concert, which took place on Thursday last week. Among popular composers of the last century no one has suffered greater neglect than André Grétry. The last of his works to survive was his 'Richard Cour de Lion,' but it is a very rare occurrence for his name to appear in a concert programme. The superior genius of Gluck crushed him, as he admitted, for Grétry was at the best only a melodist, and his music, therefore, lacks the breadth and dignity of treatment which history shows to be necessary in order to secure more than temporary fame. As a student he was more than once dismissed, as incapable of mastering the science of counterpoint, and he could never write easily in more than two parts. Still, within his limits he was as charming as was Auber half a century later; and as it would be idle to look for the revival of any of his operas, Mr. Cowen may be thanked for arranging some of the dance movements from 'Céphale et Procris' in the form of a suite. They are full of eighteenth century grace, and suggest the splendours of Versailles to the listener, but, at the same time, the music is too trivial to need the magnificent Philharmonic orchestra for its interpretation. In the widest possible contrast was the next instrumental item, M. Widor's Fantaisie in a flat for piano and orchestra. It is curious that the French composer seems disinclined to allow judgment to be passed upon him through the medium of his more important works. Two years ago he presented his 'Music to a Walpurgis Night,' but he has written symphonies and concertos, one of the former having been performed at the Crystal Palace on March 19th, 1887. It is impossible to speak in high terms of his pianoforte fantasia. We cannot complain because the work is vague in outline, as a fantasia may be in any form the composer may please to adopt. But the treatment of the subjects, which are excellent in themselves, is incoherent, and shows a striving after effects which are not attained. The orchestration is too thick and noisy, and, to sum up, the work is marked by a great deal of pretence, but little achievement. M. Philipp, the executant of the solo part, is evidently a capable pianist, but it is impossible to form an accurate judgment as to his powers until he is heard in better music. Dr. Mackenzie's Overture to 'Twelfth Night,' originally performed at the Richter Concerts, is a work of considerable merit, though we miss the spontaneity as well as the poetic feeling so noteworthy in his ballad 'La Belle Dame sans Merci.' Mr. Cowen's orchestra was heard at its best in Mendelssohn's 'Scotch' Symphony and Weber's overture 'The Ruler of the Spirits,' and at its worst in the closing scene of 'Die Walküre,' Wagner's rich but not noisy orchestration being rather coarsely rendered. M. Blauwaert sang the part of Wotan with much fervour, and proved himself, as at Bayreuth, an excellent Wagnerian artist. He was less successful in an air from Bach's chamber cantata 'Der Streit zwischen Phoebus und Pan,' which he sang in French. It only remains to be mentioned that the works of M. Widor and Dr. MacKenzie were conducted by their respective composers.

Since his visit to London in 1882 little has been heard of Signor Sgambati or his music. His chamber works rarely find a place in concert programmes, and until last Monday his name was unknown in connexion with the Popular Concerts. The reason for this neglect may be found in the lack of distinctive style and the sense of labour which mark his efforts. Roman by birth, his musical sympathies are with Germany, and in his music may be observed a constant striving to emulate the best characteristics of German classical art from Beethoven to Brahms. But the means to accomplish his end do not seem to be at Signor Sgambati's disposal. His music is far from commonplace, yet it lacks spontaneity, and hence, notwithstanding the effectiveness at times of the themes and their treatment, the general impression is unsatisfactory. The early Quintet in B flat, Op. 5, which was performed on Monday, is a favourable example of his style. The construction is clear, and the themes, if not original, are distinctive. Of the four movements the most pleasing is the second, entitled Barcarola, though the slow movement is extremely expressive. The work, like its companion in F minor, Op. 4, was composed before Signor Sgambati visited Germany in the company of Liszt, and for a young Italian musician educated in his native country it is a remarkable effort. It may be mentioned that it is in B flat, not in G minor as stated in Grove's 'Dictionary.' The pianist at this concert was Madame Backer-Gründahl, who played Chopin's Fantasia in F minor, Op. 49, with charming delicacy. Before her departure, however, the Norwegian artist should permit us to judge as to her capacity to interpret Beethoven's sonatas. Chopin's music is too extensively drawn upon at the present time. Schubert's matchless Quintet in C, Op. 163, was included in the programme; and Miss Liza Lehmann introduced a quaint and pleasing old song by Dr. Maurice Greene, "Go, rose, my Chloe's bosom grace," the words being by Gay.

DR. WYLDE.

THERE have been few more industrious musicians during the last half century than Dr. Henry Wylde, who passed away in his sixty-eighth year on Thursday last week, after a short illness. Originally intended for the Church, he evinced such a decided inclination for music that he was placed under Moscheles, and afterwards under Cipriani Potter at the Royal Academy of Music. In 1850 he obtained the degree of Mus. Doc.; in 1852 was founded the New Philharmonic Society, with which he was prominently connected from the first, and of which he assumed the entire responsibility from 1858 until 1879; in 1863 he was appointed Musical Lecturer at Gresham College, and retained the appointment until the time of his death; and in 1867 he built St. George's Hall as a home for the London Academy of Music, which he founded, and which has always enjoyed considerable repute among kindred institutions. The New Philharmonic Concerts possessed a certain value, many modern works finding a place for the first time in their programmes, the older society pursuing at the time a rigidly conservative policy. Unfortunately Dr. Wylde lacked the essential qualities of a conductor, and the performances were severely criticized at the time, and would scarcely be accepted at the present day. Nor did the deceased musician shine as a composer. He wrote many works in various styles, but not one of them has survived, and his literary efforts have not enjoyed great success. He will be chiefly remembered as a hard and conscientious worker.

Musical Gossip.

THE prospectus of the forthcoming English opera season at Drury Lane by the Carl Rosa Company was issued on Friday last week. It affords ample proof that the lamented death of the founder has not as yet resulted in any diminution of enterprise. During the three years which have elapsed since the company last visited London several works have been added to its repertory, and the public are to hear for the first time under its auspices Meyerbeer's 'L'Étoile du Nord,' Halévy's 'La Juive,' Gounod's 'Roméo et Juliette,' Bizet's 'Les Pêcheurs de Perles,' Balfe's 'Talisman' and 'Rose of Castille,' and Wallace's 'Lurline.' The interest of the season, however, will centre in the production of Mr. F. H. Cowen's new Scandinavian opera, which has received the title of 'Thorgrim.' According to rumour, to which, however, it is not wise to attach much importance, the work is more ambitious and more original than any of the composer's previous efforts. The list of artists is strong in point of numbers, but there are many names unfamiliar in the metropolis; the performers who have been favourably associated with previous seasons being Mesdames Burns and Fanny Moody, and Messrs. McGuckin, Runcio, Crotty, Aynsley Cooke, and Celli. A few others—such as Mlle. Zélie de Lussan, Mlle. Tremelli, Mr. Durward Lely, Mr. Henry Pope, and Signor Abramoff—are known in connexion with other operatic enterprises. Mr. E. Goossens is named as principal conductor. The performances will commence on Saturday, April 5th, and will last for five weeks.

HERR JOACHIM appeared at the Crystal Palace Concert last Saturday, and took part with Mr. Ernest Gillet in Brahms's Concerto for violin and violoncello in A minor, Op. 102. Our opinions concerning the work were given at length when it was twice performed at Mr. Henschel's Symphony Concerts two years ago (Athen. Nos. 3147 and 3148), and we have nothing to add to them. For the benefit of a Sydenham audience Herr Joachim played Bach's Chaconne, which he has already given twice this season at the Popular Concerts. The symphony was Haydn's in E flat, No. 10 of the Salomon set, and Miss Alice Whitacre was the vocalist.

DR. PARRY's 'Judith,' 'The Redemption,' and 'The Golden Legend' have been added to the list of works to be performed at the Bristol Festival next October. It does not seem likely that any novelties will be brought forward.

At a concert given by Mr. Leonard Forbes Robertson in the Princes' Hall on Tuesday evening the "Sutcliffe Quartet," consisting of past and present pupils of the Royal College of Music, made a remarkably favourable impression in Beethoven's Op. 18, No. 6, and Mendelssohn's Fragments, Op. 81. The young players have already an excellent understanding, and only need more individual breadth of style, which will come with experience, to hold their own with any quartet combination, either English or foreign. No other feature in the concert calls for note.

MISS MARY CARDEW, a young violinist who gave a concert at Chelsea Lodge, Tite Street, on Wednesday last week, is a pupil of Herr Joachim, from whose instruction she has evidently obtained great benefit, for she gave an able rendering of Spohr's 'Dramatic' Concerto in A minor, and also showed herself a capable leader in Mozart's Quartet in C. Her future will be watched with interest. Miss Marguerite Hall, Mr. J. Robertson, and Mr. Plunket Greene took part in the concert.

MR. W. COENEN gave a pianoforte recital at the Princes' Hall on Thursday evening last week, the programme including Beethoven's 'Waldstein' Sonata, and items by Mendelssohn, Chopin, Rubinstein, and Liszt.

CONCERTS of Irish music in recognition of St. Patrick's Day were given at the Crystal Palace and St. James's Hall on Saturday last, and at the Albert Hall on Monday.

MISS FLORENCE MAY gave a concert at the Princes' Hall on Wednesday evening, and showed that she has improved as a pianist since she was last with us. Her share in Mendelssohn's Trio in C minor, Op. 66, and Brahms's Sonata in G for piano and violin, Op. 78, was well done as to technique and general style, though the tone was slightly hard and cold. Miss May was assisted by Mr. Gompertz and Mr. Howell.

MOSKOWSKI's new Suite in F, which will be performed by the Philharmonic Society on June 5th, has been tried at the Leipzig Gewandhaus Concerts. Opinions are greatly divided as to its merits.

THE Borough of Hackney Choral Association performed Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater' and Mendelssohn's 'Walpurgis Night' in a very praiseworthy manner at the Shoreditch Town Hall on Monday evening. Mr. Prout's choir fully maintained its reputation in both works, and good service was rendered by Miss Pauline Cramer, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Gawthrop, and Mr. Bridson as the principal vocalists. Mr. Gawthrop appeared at a few hours' notice in the place of Mr. Charles Chilly.

HERR STAVENHAGEN will give a pianoforte recital at St. James's Hall on May 16th.

SIR CHARLES HALLE has decided to give six subscription orchestral concerts at St. James's Hall next season. The dates selected are Fridays, November 14th and 28th, December 12th, January 9th and 23rd, and February 20th.

CONCERTS, &c., NEXT WEEK.

- | | |
|--------|--|
| MON. | Concert in Aid of Miss Henway's School for Orphans of Musicians, 3.30, No. 35, Wimpole Street. |
| — | Highbury Philharmonic Society, Mendelssohn's 'Lobgesang,' 8, & Highbury Athenæum. |
| — | Popular Concert, 8.30, St. James's Hall. |
| TUES. | Miss Zimmerman's Pianoforte Recital, 3.30, Princes' Hall. |
| — | Mr. J. T. Hutchinson's Vocal Recital, 8, Princes' Hall. |
| WED. | Police Orphanage Concert, 8, St. James's Hall. |
| — | Royal Choral Society, 'Israel in Egypt,' 8, Albert Hall. |
| — | Mr. Stephen Kemp's Chamber Concert, 8, Princes' Hall. |
| THURS. | Philharmonic Concert, 8, St. James's Hall. |
| — | Miss Brasie Cox's Concert, 8, St. James's Hall. |
| FRI. | Miss Hope Temple's Concert, 3, St. James's Hall. |
| — | Royal Academy of Music Orchestral Concert, 8, St. James's Hall. |
| — | Wind Instrument Chamber Music Society's Concert, 8.30, Royal Academy of Music. |
| SAT. | Crystal Palace Concert, 3. |
| — | Popular Concert, 8, St. James's Hall. |
| — | Wesleyan Concert, 8, St. James's Hall. |
| — | Musical Artists' Society, 8, Princes' Hall. |
| — | Popular Musical Union, 'Elizah,' 8, the People's Palace. |

DRAMA

GLOBE THEATRE.—Sole Lessee and Manager, Mr. F. R. BENSON.—F. R. BENSON'S SHAKESPEARIAN COMPANY EVERY EVENING at 8 (Thursdays and Fridays excepted), in Shakespeare's Fairy Comedy, with the Mendelssohn incidental music.

A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM.
MATINEES OF 'A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM' every SATURDAY and WEDNESDAY. Doors Open at 2; Commence 2.30.—HARLEQUIN, THURSDAY and FRIDAY EVENINGS at 8, and every THURSDAY and FRIDAY until further notice.—No Fees.—GLOBE.

A Study of Ben Jonson. By Algernon Charles Swinburne. (Chatto & Windus.)

(Second and Concluding Notice.)

HERE is the question that our remarks of a fortnight ago led up to: if there is in very truth one instance—that of his revising 'The Spanish Tragedy'—when Jonson wrote not after the scientific fashion of "the tribe of Ben," but with a free imagination after the fashion of the other tribe, was the note there struck his natural note, and was the other—the note of 'Sejanus' and 'Catiline'—the acquired note? Understand this, we said, and you understand Jonson. But in order to make even a guess in answer to the query we should have to touch upon the great feature of Ben's character, his colossal egomania, and then a contrast between him and Shakespeare could not possibly be avoided; it would be forced upon us, and what a contrast it would be! In the year 1616 died the writer of the richest body of dramatic poetry extant in any literature—the richest body extant, we say, for it must be remembered that the 'Oresteia,' taken as a mighty drama in three acts, overtops in motive, in development, in scenic sublimity, and even perhaps in characterization, any single play of Shakespeare's, and that the trilogy on the Prometheus myth was, very likely, greater still. In the same year 1616 appeared one of the best edited books of poetry that during an author's lifetime have ever issued from the English press—Ben Jonson's 'Works.' Shakespeare produced plays, not works, to use Heywood's sarcastic distinction, and died leaving them unedited and uncollected to the mercy of chance. But no sooner did Heminge and Condell take up the priceless mass and pitchfork it into the folio of 1623 than the human race came and itself took charge of the largesse. The editor of Shakespeare is the "great man Mankind," to use Pascal's picturesque phrase. More entirely alive is he than any classic save Homer, who has the same editor—more entirely alive than even our own contemporary writers—any one of them—in verse or in prose. But what of him who mourned that Shakespeare had not blotted a thousand lines—what has become of that mourner? When he told King Charles that "the less poetic boys" judged "parts of him decayed" did he not indicate the seeds of a dissolution so complete that not even Mr. Swinburne's brilliant study can ever make Ben's "smoke-dried" tragedies live?

"In the splendid capacity for being alive the eel stands at the very top of the animated kingdom," says an enthusiastic naturalist. Let Mr. Swinburne remember this, and ask himself who stands at the very top of the poetic kingdom in the splendid capacity of being dead—who but this very giant he would reanimate—this giant lying there with mighty limbs, with thews that used to be the admiration not only of the Mermaid and the Devil Taverner, but of the world. Proverbially strong and ever ready to make or break is Mr. Swinburne's electric battery; but can it impart even a shudder to limbs so marble-cold as these?

In order to answer this question we should first have to answer another—a question that has reference to the poet whom Ben loved much, and would have loved more had he only "blotted" those "thousand lines." In literature, what is the "splendid capacity for being alive" which we see in Shakespeare, in Homer, and, indeed, in scores of lesser writers whose only kinship with these lies in the fact that they too in their smaller degrees have something of this inherent faculty? To understand the literary death of Jonson we must first understand the literary life of Shakespeare.

That nothing external can aid any literary product which lacks "the splendid capacity of being alive," and that nothing can stifle any literary product in which this capacity exists, is evidenced by the resuscitation of Marlowe, Webster, Ford, and others, after all those years of apparent death, and the discovery of 'Barnavelt.' In the long run justice, full justice, is awarded to every poet. True literature is the very voice of nature, and for this voice the world has, at first or at last, a sympathetic ear. In criticism authority is potent, no doubt, but only for a time. Nature's voice in the end stifles authority. What is the use of telling the neophyte who in some anthology or magazine article has come upon something that speaks to him—come upon Blanco White's sonnet to Night, for instance, or upon Wolfe's 'Burial of Sir John Moore,' or upon Mrs. Barbauld's divine verses about life and death—what is the use of telling such a reader that these are third-rate writers—that in mere quantity they produced scarcely anything worth reading, and that, compared with them, the voiceful Byrons and Southey's and Tom Moore's are giants? The neophyte gives no heed to such remarks: all he knows is that by one of those third-rate writers his soul has been spoken to, while voiceless to him have been Byron and Southey and Moore. This is and must be enough for him, the reader in question—that by the sonnet or the lyric of the third-rate writer he has been spoken to. A single song or quatrain, if it has the true voice, or a few lines like those interpolated in 'The Spanish Tragedy,' will outlast a hundred tragedies such as 'Sejanus' or 'Catiline.' Take the case of Michael Drayton. The author of 'Polyolbion' ought surely to be as dead as Ben himself. Why is he not so? Because Drayton in some happy and perhaps unguarded moment wrote, besides the 'Polyolbion,' the famous sonnet:—

Since there's no help, come let us kiss and part.

How old and how cold seems everything of Ben Jonson's save one or two songs—how old and how cold seems the latest sonnet of the latest poet of our own day—after Drayton's sonnet! and yet it was written contemporaneously with those plays and poems which Ben delighted to collect and delighted to christen his "Works"—omitting from the volume the one effort of his dramatic imagination (supposing it to be his) which had the power of speaking to the great human heart—the additions to 'The Spanish Tragedy.' Did he consider himself to have outgrown such unscientific presentment of character as those additions afford? If so, this, coupled with the fact of the careful and laborious editing of his poems, is, when we consider the times in which he lived, extremely valuable in enabling us to form an estimate of Ben Jonson both as a writer and as a man, and to compare him with certain of his contemporaries. Upon Ben's egotism and "supercilious goodwill," to use Mr. Swinburne's admirable phrase, the essay before us has the following remarks:—

"The tone of supercilious goodwill and friendly condonation which distinguishes his famous note on Shakespeare is unmistakable except by the most wilful perversity of prepossession. His noble metrical tribute to Shakespeare's memory must of course be taken into account when we are disposed to think too hardly of this honest if egotistic eccentricity of error: but it would be foolish to suppose that the most eloquent cordiality of a ceremonial poem could express more of one man's real and critical estimate of another than a deliberate reflection of later date. And it needs the utmost possible exertion of charity, the most generous exercise of justice, to forgive the final phrase of preposterous patronage and considerate condescension—'There was ever more in him to be praised than to be pardoned.' The candid author of 'Sejanus' could on the whole afford to admit so much with respect to the popular author of 'Hamlet.'"

The fact is that in all periods of all literatures there have been writers whose life-energy is expressed not entirely by the genius or the talent (as the case may be) which vitalizes their work, but partly also by that busy, bustling egotism which can never rest in calm enjoyment of art, but must needs be constantly in "evidence." Ben Jonson's instinct it was which taught him that in the literary fair he who can clash the noisiest cymbals, blow the boldest horn, or beat the loudest drum, governs (as long as the fair lasts) the popular ear. So Ben clashed and beat and blew, believing heartily that the fair was not for a day, but for all time. He did not dream that in the future day, when the fair should be over, and when the literary goods offered should be appraised according, not to the noise made in advertising them, but according to that inherent strength which in all organisms, artistic as well as natural, is irresistible as fate, Drayton's one sonnet would be more prized than 'Sejanus.' So it is, however. No one would dream of affiliating 'Sejanus' upon Shakespeare for the reason that it is too vital a work to have come from the poet who is credited with its authorship. But with regard to Drayton's sonnet this has been done by an eminent critic.

Of Ben Jonson as a figure we know a good deal. Picturesque, hearty, and interesting as that figure is, we know as much of it, perhaps, as we care to know. But true poetry—true imaginative work—being immortal, the men the world is wanting, and almost pining, to know more about, are those others who in that same fair did not blow and beat and clang so loudly—the writer of 'Hamlet,' the writer of 'The Duchess of Malfi,' the writer of 'Doctor Faustus,' and the writer of 'Arden of Feverisham.'

Whether, as some people have supposed, Shakespeare's neglect, or apparent neglect, of his plays is characteristic of the man, this seems clear, that the careful getting-up and important christening of Jonson's folio was characteristic of the author. There would be in our day nothing egotistical in an acted dramatist collecting and carefully editing his plays, but we must remember that the case was not exactly the same in Jonson's time, and that this praiseworthy act of his is perhaps yet another indication of his character.

Mr. Arber, in his introduction to the republication of 'Tottel's Miscellany,' speaking about the poets of the first half of the sixteenth century, says that they "wrote for their own delectation and for that of their friends, and not for the general public," and that "they generally had the greatest aversion to their works appearing in print." Now the reminiscence of this sentiment lingered with more vigour in the second half of the sixteenth century than is commonly supposed. To circulate unprinted "sugared sonnets" among one's "private friends" was a common and a charming custom; and as to dramatic poetry, we have already alluded to Heywood's preface to 'The English Traveller,' wherein he ridicules the idea of printing plays in volumes and calling them "Works."

Of course it is not our business here to account for the case of Shakespeare, who, so far from being a careless and perfunctory producer of the Heywood type, was given to elaborate his work after the manner of Coleridge, Rossetti, and Lord Tennyson, and yet was content, like Heywood, to leave such work as his at the mercy of whosoever might follow him. It is not our business to ask whether in Shakespeare's time a man not much above fifty years old might feel himself to be so young that he could safely procrastinate doing what might better be done in ten years' time, collecting his plays, nor yet, on the other hand, whether the sonnets are sincere in lamenting those "forty winters" which have left him an old man. It is not our business to ask whether, notwithstanding the energy of the artist, of which the mighty products of Shakespeare's pen afford such proof, there is or is not, as we once asked in regard to 'Arden of Feversham,' something in the nature of the true dramatic temperament which makes the mere act of creation all-sufficing, and stifles that literary ambition which with Ben Jonson, as perhaps with five-sixths of those who write, took the place of the true dramatic impulse. Our concern here is with Ben Jonson alone—with him whose egotism is seen in everything he did as well as everything he wrote—in the 'Discoveries' no less than in 'The Alchemist' and 'The Staple of News.' Our concern, we say, is alone with him to whom the exposition of his learning and his general knowledge was far more important than the exposition of his characters—with him who took far more delight in exhibiting his familiarity with the jargon of alchemy than in laying bare the innermost workings of the charlatan's soul—with him, in a word, who could not refrain from weakening the vitality of even so splendid a conception as Volpone by the intrusion of his own student-lore. Supposing that he who wrote the wonderful additions to 'The Spanish Tragedy' was afterwards driven back by some unlucky power—driven back to write 'Sejanus' and 'Catiline,' what was that power? So fatal is egomania to all literary art save the purely lyrical, that Jonson's egomania may, perhaps, be even enough to explain his passing from the "tribe of Nature's children" to "the tribe of Ben." And if it is, there is surely no fact more wonderful in the history of poetry.

Save in the masques it is in comedy alone that Jonson's dramatic work is now even readable. "No man," says Mr. Swinburne, "can know anything worth knowing of Ben Jonson who has not studied and digested the text of 'Every Man in his Humour,' 'The Fox,' 'The Alchemist,' and 'The Staple of News': but any man who has may be said to know him well."

We agree entirely with this, and also with his remarks upon the relative merits of the four great comedies, save that we are inclined to put 'The Fox' above all the rest. For rich variety of satire it must, no doubt, yield to 'The Staple of News.' In ingenuity of structure it must, no doubt, yield to 'The Alchemist.' But in burly strength and daring of Jonsonian humour it stands first, and comes nearer to the unction of Vanbrugh than does any other comedy.

In the careful and often laborious analyses of all the plays Mr. Swinburne has done admirable service to all students of Ben Jonson. And no less admirable service has he done in directing prominent attention to that portion of Jonson's work the general neglect of which has always been to us unaccountable, the 'Discoveries,' a work which shows more than anything else of Jonson's that his intellect was not only powerful, but also penetrating and delicate. In order to recognize this it may not, perhaps, be necessary to go so far as Mr. Swinburne goes when he says:—

"It is certain that in fervour of inspiration, in depth and force and glow of thought and emotion and expression, Donne's verses are as far above Gray's as Jonson's notes or observations on men and morals, on principles and on facts, are superior to Bacon's in truth of insight, in breadth of view, in vigour of reflection and in concision of eloquence."

And yet, important as are the 'Discoveries,' the book has not been more neglected by the public than by Jonson's admirers and editors. For instance, the condition in which Gifford, whose only right of existence is that he edited Jonson, Massinger, and Ford, left the text is as inexplicable as it is scandalous. The fine aphorism about love of country is turned into nonsense by the omission of the word "not." Again, in the note about the selfishness of love the substitution of "country" for "cousin" ruins everything. Take again the remarks upon epistolary style, and note how by the dropping out of the word "last" a fine sentence is turned into sheer nonsense. All these blunders and many more Mr. Swinburne has been the first to indicate. It will be a pity, indeed, if he does not give us a pure text of this book preceded by this admirable commentary. By doing this he would be producing a delightful volume and, at the same time, doing service to the memory of a writer for whose work he has already done so much.

We cannot close these remarks without saying that the thoroughness which characterizes Mr. Swinburne's critical work is, if possible, more conspicuous than ever in this volume. Merely as a study—new, condensed, and weighty, yet eloquent—of Jonson's masques, the book would be invaluable. The whole of the imaginative literature of the Shakespearean age seems to be literally at the critic's finger ends. And the marvel is how, laden as he is by such a mass of learning on the subject, he has succeeded in writing with such verve and brilliance.

In the matter of mere style, indeed, we cannot be wrong in placing this book at the head of Mr. Swinburne's prose writings.

No doubt the perorations in the essay on Chapman are, some of them, more striking than anything of the kind to be found here; but never before have his periods flowed in such a dazzling stream.

THE WEEK.

AVENUE.—Appearance of Mr. George Alexander in 'Doctor Bill,' Miss Cinderella, a Comedietta in One Act. By W. R. Walkes.

In appearing for the first time in the Avenue Theatre—now, and for some time past, under his own management—Mr. Alexander makes a modest and unobtrusive entry. At length released from his engagement at the Adelphi, he elects, instead of personating the hero of a version of 'La Lutte pour la Vie,' to take up Mr. Frederick Terry's part in 'Doctor Bill.' The chief inducement to a species of self-denial rare in an actor who is also a manager is financial. Mr. Aïd's adaptation is a recognized, and will probably prove an enduring, success. To withdraw this and replace it by an untried work would be an act of folly. In his new character Mr. Alexander has won an unexpected triumph. Among the gifts of a young actor whose best performances have been in romantic drama a comic vein did not count. He has now shown that he possesses it, and it is conceivable that he may find it in the future interfere with his more serious efforts. Garrick, it is known, stood between tragedy and comedy. In the case of men in general, however, the world likes to see a man take a line and stick to it. Mr. Alexander's light comedy has the special gift of unconsciousness. In the most trying circumstances he retains his gravity, and the laughter of which he is the cause does not seem to reach him. On the stage as in conversation the effect of this gift is irresistible. Mr. Alexander has amply vindicated his right to be considered a light comedian and an exponent of farcical comedy.

It is curious to observe the hold on the public taken by comedy of the lightest kind. At the Garrick Theatre, where Mr. Hare aims at the highest standard in art, at Terry's Theatre, under Miss Grahame's new management, and at the Avenue, three novelties, all of them belonging to farcical comedy, have been produced. In this there is nothing extraordinary, Pour ce que rire est le propre de l'homme, and the death of old-fashioned farce means the creation of new. With the taste for this new order of amusement has come a signal advance in comic acting. In the best Criterion days, ten years or so ago, the acting in this line of composition was said to equal that at the Variétés or the Palais Royal. Acting no less excellent may be now seen at several theatres, including the Avenue, at which the representation of 'Doctor Bill' is quite excellent. One or two actors—notably Mr. Benjamin Webster, whose representation is highly mirthful—indulge in extravagance which is to be regretted. As a rule, however, the performance is admirable, and in one character, that played by Miss Fanny Brough, matchless. Farcical comedy under such conditions will retain a long hold of the Avenue.

A new first piece, with the title of 'Miss Cinderella,' given at the same house, is disappointing. The story of a girl carrying off the love of a young nobleman who is angled for by her stepmother on behalf of her own daughter is pretty if simple. Mr. Walkes, however, paints his characters with a hurried brush, rendering them either hopelessly imbecile or impossibly brutal. As his play gains nothing from the exposition, its presence in the bill is by no means easily explicable.

Dramatic Gossip.

MR. MERIVALE'S adaptation of 'The Bride of Lammermoor' develops in action much matter which in the novel is lightly passed over, and is wholly different from any rendering yet attempted. It is said to be decidedly powerful, poetical, and fateful. Mr. Irving will, of course, be the Master of Ravenswood, and Miss Terry Lucy Ashton. Miss Le Thière will be Lady Ashton; Mr. Terriss, Bucklaw; Mr. Alfred Bishop, Sir William; Mr. Mackintosh, Caleb Balderstone; Mr. Wenman, Craigengelt; and Miss Marriott, Old Alice. Mr. Howe, Mr. Macklin, and Mr. Haviland are also in the cast.

At the Lyceum 'The Bells' will be given on the 12th and 19th of April, on which days 'The Dead Heart' is to be played in the afternoon. This is the first of the promised series of Lyceum revivals.

DURING June and July the Globe Theatre will be in the hands of Miss Adelaide Moore, a lady who appeared some years ago as Julia in 'The Hunchback,' and has since been in America.

'A VILLAGE PRIEST' is the title finally given Mr. Grundy's new play, now in rehearsal at the Haymarket.

A VERSION of Mr. Rider Haggard's 'Jess,' arranged in part by Miss Eweretta Lawrence, who will play the heroine, is promised for the afternoon of Tuesday next at the Adelphi.

MR. CHARLES WYNDHAM and Miss Mary Moore appear to-night at the Criterion in 'David Garrick' for the first time after their return from America.

MISCELLANEOUS performances for the benefit of the Royal General Theatrical Fund were given at Drury Lane on Monday. They included the duel scene from 'The Dead Heart,' by Messrs. Irving and Bancroft; Mr. and Mrs. Tree in 'The Ballad-Monger'; Mr. and Mrs. Willard in 'My Aunt's Advice'; Miss Fanny Brough and Mr. Alexander in an act of 'Doctor Bill'; Mrs. Langtry as Queen Elizabeth and Mr. Arthur Bourchier as Courtenay in 'Twixt Axe and Crown'; and many other performances, together with songs and recitations.

MISS MINNIE PALMER has been playing at the Grand in 'My Sweetheart.'

'DICK VENABLES' is the title of the new drama, by Mr. Arthur Law, to be produced on the 5th of April at the Shaftesbury. It is the name of the convict hero, to be played by Mr. Willard.

MR. JOHN MACLEAN died on Saturday last, at the age of fifty-five, in Percy Street, Tottenham Court Road. He had for some months past looked pinched and feeble. The deceased actor was born in London, and began his histrionic career in Plymouth in 1859. Two years later he appeared in London at the Surrey, and in 1862 attracted attention by his performance of Mr. Gibson in 'The Ticket-of-Leave Man.' In 1868 he joined the company at the Gaiety, with which he was long associated. A conventional and capable if rather a hard actor, he generally played old men, and was well received in such characters even as Sir Peter Teazle.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—J. S. B.—J. W.—P. S.—P. R. B.—B. C.—O. Y.—J. W. B.—received.
J. S., JUN.—You should inquire of some foreign bookseller. No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

MYTHS AND FOLK-LORE OF IRELAND.

By JEREMIAH CURTIN.

Crown 8vo. cloth, gilt top, 9s.

"Mr. Curtin's work is especially valuable."—Nation.

POETRY of the ANTI-JACOBIN, comprising the Celebrated Political and Satirical Poems, Parodies, and Jeux-d'Esprit of Canning, Wellesley, J. H. Frere, Ellis, Gifford, Carlisle, Pitt, and others, with Explanatory Notes, &c. By CHARLES EDMONDS. Entirely New Edition, with additional matter, and 6 Plates by James Gillray. Ordinary Edition, crown 8vo. cloth extra, 7s. 6d.

An Edition de Luxe of 250 copies, for England and America, numbered and signed, printed on hand-made paper, crown 4to. cloth extra, One Guinea nett. Full Prospectus on application.

New Additions to Low's Standard Novels.

SIX-SHILLING SERIES.

The PENANCE of JOHN LOGAN,

and OTHER STORIES. By WILLIAM BLACK, Author of 'A Princess of Thule,' 'A Daughter of Heth,' &c. Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

"The Penance of John Logan" is so well contrived, so brightly told, and so lifelike, that its simple pathos is irresistible."—Athenæum.

AGNES SURRIAGE. By Edwin

LASSETTER BYNNEER, Author of 'Damen's Ghost,' 'Penelope's Suitors,' &c. Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

LOW'S STANDARD NOVELS.

NEW AND CHEAPER ISSUE.

Crown 8vo. fancy boards, 2s.; cloth uniform, 2s. 6d.

FOUR NEW VOLUMES NOW READY.

CRIPPS the CARRIER. By R. D.

BLACKMORE.

DRED. By Mrs. Beecher Stowe.

The TRUMPET MAJOR. By Thos.

HARDY.

The VASTY DEEP. By Stuart

CUMBERLAND.

WORKS BY HENRY M. STANLEY.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITIONS. NOW READY.

HOW I FOUND LIVINGSTONE;

including Four Months' Residence with Dr. Livingstone. With Map and Illustrations. Crown 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.

"* The Unabridged Edition, superior in paper and binding, and with the Original Maps, price 7s. 6d., can still be obtained.

THROUGH the DARK CONTINENT; from the Indian to the Atlantic Ocean. With Map and Illustrations. Crown 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.

"* The Unabridged Edition, superior in paper and binding, and with the Original Maps, price 12s. 6d., can still be obtained.

MY KALULU: Prince, King, and

Slave. Crown 8vo. cloth, 2s. 6d.; gilt edges, 3s. 6d.

(Forming one of the Volumes in "Low's Series of Standard Books for Boys.")

Now ready, price One Shilling.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

APRIL NUMBER.

Contents.

THE MERCHANT of VENICE.

ANDREW LANG.

With 10 Illustrations (including Frontispiece). Drawn by E. A. Abbey.

THOMAS YOUNG, M.D. F.R.S. With Portrait. Rev. William Henry Milburn.

THE TRAGEDY of HUMPHREY. Mary G. McClelland.

GREAT AMERICAN INDUSTRIES. IX. A SUIT OF CLOTHES. Illustrated. R. B. Bowler.

DRAGON FISH'S SELFISH NATURE A Story. Annie Trumbull Slosson.

THREE INDIAN CAMPAIGNS. Illustrated. General Wesley Merritt, U.S.A.

NOT LOVE, NOT WAR. A Sonnet. Illustrated. Wm. Wordsworth.

IN THE HAWORTH. A Story. Illustrated. Geraldine Bonner.

THE NEW YORK MARITIME EXCHANGE. Richard Wheatley.

THE SHADOW of a DREAM. A Story. Part II. William Dean Howells.

AMERICAN LITERARY COMEDIANS. With 10 Portraits. Henry Clay Lukens.

&c. &c. &c.

London:

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON, SEARLE & RIVINGTON

(LIMITED).

St. Dunstan's House, Fetter-lane, Fleet-street, E.C.

MESSRS. BELL'S NEW BOOKS.

The NEW SPIRIT. By Havelock

ELLIS, Editor of "The Mermaid Series" and of "The Contemporary Science Series." Containing Essays on Diderot, Helmholtz, Walt Whitman, Tolstoy, and Ibsen. With Introduction and Conclusion. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d.

Fifth Edition, Revised, fcap. 8vo. 6s.

A HANDBOOK to the WORKS of ROBERT BROWNING. By Mrs. SUTHERLAND ORR.

CHEAP EDITION.

The FRIEND of MAN; and his FRIENDS—the POETS. By FRANCES POWER COBBE. Crown 8vo. paper cover, 2s.

"Miss Cobbe has made a beautiful selection of poetry which the fidelity and companionability of the dog has elicited from the poets of many nations."—Spectator.

"It may be divined that we welcome with enthusiasm Miss Cobbe's pretty little book, which is all about dogs.... dogs as seen by the poets, especially by the largest and most widely extended circle of poets, from Homer to Mr. G. R. Sims. It is an ingenious idea to collect the testimony of the Seers, those who among men are credited with the clearest gift of divination, in favour of that dumb companion whose instinctive sympathy and wonderful perception of human feeling throws a certain halo of poetry over the meanest cur."—Blackwood's Magazine.

NEW VOLUME OF PREBENDARY SADLER'S
COMMENTARY.—Crown 8vo. 6s.

The EPISTLES of ST. PAUL to the COLOSSIANS, THESSALONIANS, and TIMOTHY. With Notes, Critical and Practical, by M. F. SADLER, Rector of Houniton, Prebendary of Wells.

DOD'S PARLIAMENTARY COM-

PANION. 1890 Issue. Neatly bound, gilt edges, 4s. 6d.

"The invaluable 'Dod.'"—Saturday Review.

"The ever-useful 'Dod.'"—St. James's Gazette.

(WHITTAKER & Co. Paternoster-square.)

NEW VOLUME OF BOHN'S STANDARD LIBRARY.

GOETHE'S WORKS. Vol. XIV.

Reinecke Fox, West-Eastern Divan and Achilleid. Translated in the Original Metres by A. ROGERS. 3s. 6d.

NEW VOLUMES OF BOHN'S REFERENCE LIBRARY.

A BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY.

Containing Concise Notices (upwards of 15,000) of Eminent Persons of all Ages and Countries. With Supplement to 1883. By THOMPSON COOPER, F.S.A., Editor of 'Men of the Time,' &c. 2 vols. 5s. each.

STANDARD WORKS.

2 vols. imperial 8vo. buckram, 3l. 3s.

A DICTIONARY of PAINTERS and ENGRAVERS, Biographical and Critical. With a List of Cyphers, Monograms, and Marks. By MICHAEL BRYAN. New Edition, thoroughly Revised and Enlarged, by WALTER ARMSTRONG, B.A., Author of 'Peter de Wint,' 'Scottish Painters,' &c.; and R. E. GRAVES, of the British Museum.

"A book which no collector and no public library can possibly do without."—Times.

HISTORY of MODERN EUROPE, from the Taking of Constantinople to the Establishment of the German Empire, A.D. 1453-1871. By the late T. H. DYER. New Edition. 5 vols. 2l. 12s. 6d.

This work, which has been for some time out of print, has been revised throughout for this edition, with the introduction of fresh matter and the addition of new chapters, bringing the history down to the year 1871.

USED AS THE STANDARD OF ORTHOGRAPHY IN THE POSTAL TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT.

WEBSTER'S DICTIONARY of the ENGLISH LANGUAGE. 1 vol. of 1,628 pp., with 3,000 Illustrations, 4to. cloth, 21s.; half-calf, 30s.; calf or half-russia, 31s. 6d.; russia, 40s.

The COMPLETE DICTIONARY.

With several valuable Literary Appendices, and 70 extra pages of Illustrations, Grouped and Classified, 1,919 pp. cloth, 31s. 6d.; half-calf, 40s.; calf or half-russia, 42s.; russia, 2l. 10s.

"Certainly the best practical English dictionary extant."

Quarterly Review, 1873.

* * * Prospectuses, with Specimen Pages, sent post free on application.

London: GEORGE BELL & SONS, York-street, Covent-garden.

SATURDAY, MARCH 29, 1890.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
ENGLISH INTERCOURSE WITH SIAM	397
LADY WILDE ON IRISH CHARMS	398
RECENT EDITORS OF ÆSCHYLUS	399
A PARISH IN THE NORTH RIDING	400
NOVELS OF THE WEEK	401
RECENT VERSE	402
OUR LIBRARY TABLE—LIST OF NEW BOOKS	402-403
BEATRICE; MR. GLADSTONE'S MODEL LIBRARY;
KEMBLE AND MR. SREBOHM; CHARGES OF PLAGIARISM; THE SPRING PUBLISHING SEASON;
THE RUTLAND CORRESPONDENCE; THE SOURCE OF
'THE ANCIENT MARINER'; THE SUPPOSED UNCLIAL
CODEX AT DAMASCUS; THE PASTON MSS.	403-405
LITERARY GOSSIP	405
SCIENCE—A NATURALIST AMONG THE HEAD-HUNTERS; ASTRONOMICAL NOTES; GEOGRAPHICAL NOTES;
SOCIETIES; MEETINGS; GOSSIP	406-409
FINE ARTS—THE TUDOR EXHIBITION; MINOR EXHIBITIONS; SALES; GOSSIP	409-411
MUSIC—THE WEEK; NEW SONGS; GOSSIP; CONCERTS, &c., NEXT WEEK	412-414
DRAMA—THE WEEK; GOSSIP	414

LITERATURE

English Intercourse with Siam in the Seventeenth Century. By John Anderson, M.D. (Kegan Paul, Trench & Co.)

THE opening chapters of this book are rather dry, but if the reader, or at any rate the reader who takes something more than the average interest in Oriental history, will persevere he will be rewarded, as the latter part of the volume supplies a great many details throwing light upon the movements that culminated in the murder of Constant Phaulkon and the overthrow of the dynasty then reigning in Siam. Much information not generally accessible is also furnished about the French embassies to Siam dispatched at the time when Louis XIV., encouraged by Jesuit influences, entertained a hope that the country might embrace Christianity as well as become an important outlet for French commerce.

Politically modern Siam has an importance for Englishmen as the autonomous Asiatic state which forms a convenient buffer between our own territories and the territories of France. We have an interest in preventing its destruction and upholding its independence. But the Siam of the seventeenth century was not the Siam of the present day; this Dr. Anderson in his instructive introduction brings well before his readers' eyes. The Siam which he describes was a Siam which held possession of Tenasserim; whose seat of government was at Ayuthia, eighty miles from the sea up the river Menam; whose kings had their country residence forty miles higher up the stream, at Nophaburi or Louvo; and whose principal outlet for commerce was at Mergui, a port opening on to the Bay of Bengal, and conveniently facing the Coromandel coast. The Siam of to-day has entirely lost Tenasserim; its ancient capital (Ayuthia) was destroyed by the Burmese; its modern capital (Bangkok) is twenty miles from the sea. The port of Bangkok is inconvenient, but it is the only one which the country possesses. A glance at the map will show how the compulsory shift of the commercial outlet from Tenasserim to Bangkok must have assisted the Chinese in securing and keeping the lion's share of the foreign trade of the country for themselves. The great lesson, then, in political geography which the reader can learn from this book is that, owing to the hostile attacks of her neighbours, Siam lost direct access to the Indian Ocean; had she been able to keep Tenasserim it is probable that she would have been commercially a much greater power than she is at the present day. There are also several passages in the volume which must strikingly bring home to the mind of any thoughtful person how little disposed the authorities of an Eastern country in those days were to resent the intrusion of foreigners. The higher nobles, with the monarch at their head, not uncommonly held most of the trade of the country in their own hands; they were glad to find purchasers for their produce in Portuguese, Dutch, or English merchants, and were eager themselves to buy commodities from Europe. It was not till later, when the white invaders began to appropriate wide and valuable slices of territory in various directions, that the policy of many of the Eastern rulers changed; that fear, jealousy, and suspicion constrained them to aim at isolation, to close trade routes, to forbid the entry of foreign vessels into their harbours, or the settlement of foreigners in their dominions. Commercial treaties have pretty well broken these barriers down in modern times; but the barriers were themselves, it would seem, not of very ancient construction.

There are some curious and entertaining extracts from old records to be found in the appendix to this book. The first of these is an account, originally published in the Calcutta Government Gazette in 1827, of overland journeys from the Tenasserim coast to the court of Siam—undertaken in connexion with proposals for the release of some prisoners—by British officers, apparently in the winter 1824-5. The descriptions of the days' marches and the line of route followed are here so accurate that they might well serve to guide some traveller of the present day. The story of the brothers George and Samuel White, as disclosed in their petitions to Parliament and the answers put in by the East India Company—to whom these interloping traders had been as thorns in the flesh—is too long to be described in these columns; the reader can find it in the appendix for himself. He can also find there, if he cares for such grim narratives, an account of the burning of a poor wretch for the sin of witchcraft at Bombay in the year of grace 1671. In this connexion we may also call attention to a foot-note on p. 296, where a story is quoted about the treatment of Capt. Udall's corpse. Capt. Udall was an Englishman who had been killed in a skirmish. He was buried at Ayuthia "in a pretty deep grave." Two days later his body was found disinterred, stripped of its winding-sheet, and tied upright to a tree. It was reburied under heavy stones, but the day following was discovered in the same position as before. Then his friends sank the body in the river. The old writers suppose that the corpse had been treated as described for purposes of sorcery and incantation. Speaking, however, with a pretty good experience, we know of no evidence to confirm the view that the Siamese ever practised sorcery with dead bodies. The motives for the acts described can probably never be cleared up; but there remains the possibility that the European strangers had in their ignorance buried Capt. Udall in or near a temple precinct where religious pollution was dreaded, or even at a spot which some private proprietor deemed too close to his own ground. On a point such as this a Siamese, who believes in the spirits of the dead haunting their graves and in the mischief which they can work, is apt to be peculiarly sensitive.

It is certainly among the things not generally known that the Siamese in days gone by successfully resisted the attacks of the East India Company, and carried on aggressive operations on their own account, and with success, against the princes of Goloonda; but the records of these achievements, and of the exploits of Capt. Coates, the English leader of the Siamese ships of war, are given to the public by Dr. Anderson, and will be found full of entertainment. Equally interesting is the story of the misfortunes which befell poor Peter Crouch and his companion John Thomas, both sturdy servants of the East India Company, who got themselves into trouble for refusing to sell for ready money a packet of nails to the Siamese Government. A case more in point could hardly be quoted to show what grievances may be occasioned by the accidental circumstance that one of two nations is wholly unacquainted with the laws and usages of the other. In 1683 the British vessel Delight, on a voyage with merchandise for Canton, was driven by stress of weather to Bangkok, and had there to lie till the monsoon changed. It became known that among her cargo were some iron nails, fit for shipbuilding purposes, and the Siamese Government—who had given the vessel shelter in her distress—must have been surprised to find, when they desired to buy some of these nails, that their request was refused; the fact being—as Messrs. Crouch and Thomas endeavoured courteously to explain—that, as the vessel had made a deviation, they could not, or feared they could not, break bulk by disposing of any of the cargo in a port to which it was not consigned without exposing the owners of the vessel to what they call "this shipp's wholl demorage w^{ch} will be noe small charge." The Siamese officials, however, were terribly incensed, and enforced their demand by imprisoning Messrs. Thomas and Crouch. For two days these resolute Englishmen, to whom their gaolers supplied no food, held out, but yielded at length to the pangs of hunger, and gave the necessary orders for delivering the nails.

Many useful foot-notes have been supplied where the text seemed to need elucidation; but in one or two instances there is no foot-note where we think that one is required. Thus, on p. 291, an account is given how the commandant of the fort at Bangkok received orders to stop a ship on her way down the river, and to arrest the captain. The commandant accordingly required this captain to come ashore "before he would permit the opening of the chain." It is to be doubted whether an ordinary reader would understand what this means, unless it were explained to him that there was at that time a huge iron chain stretched right across the river Menam from bank to bank at the place referred to. This was, of course, intended to prevent an enemy sailing up stream, or a ship from escaping out of the country on an ebb tide at night. In later days, when Bangkok itself had become the capital, this chain was shifted to Paklat, some ten miles further down stream; it has long since fallen into disuse, but the remains of it could be seen not many years ago.

On p. 312 it is said that when hostilities were expected certain of the king's goods were ordered to be stored for safety in the clongs at Tenasserim. The note here explains the word clong as probably a corruption of hong or hang, a warehouse or factory. Klong in Siamese signifies a creek or a canal, and the real meaning seems to us to be that the ships with the king's goods on board were to be taken away from the river mouth and hidden at selected spots in branches of the river where strangers would not be likely to trace them. In a letter quoted on p. 209 Mr. Strangh pleads that as an "Orrambarro" he is rather to be pitied than blamed. This word is also passed over in silence. Mr. Strangh, no doubt, meant that he was an orang bahru or new man, a Malay term for a new-comer unacquainted with the ways of the country.

It appears that the first commercial report on the trade of Siam was written (probably by one George White) at Ayuthia in 1678, that is long before Blue-books or consular establishments were thought of. The document, which is among the India Office records, is stated to have been much injured by damp or fire, and is in parts illegible; at least so Dr. Anderson, who has printed as much of it as he can read, states; but we hope that another equally competent hand will have a trial at deciphering its contents, for there is the possibility that something further may be gleaned by going over this ground a second time. In the report, however, as here presented a few errors—perhaps they are only misprints—have caught our eye. Thus on p. 422 "Indicah" should probably be Judicah (i.e., Ayuthia); on p. 423 "Sommans" is perhaps a mistake for sampans; "ffuah" should be, or is meant for, fuang, an eighth part of a tical; and "taell" is occasionally written where possibly tical is meant. "Invudacoñs" on the next page is, of course, a mere form of writing inundations.

The foregoing, however, are all in the nature of minor blemishes, and we have brought them under notice from no desire to find fault, but as contributions towards the emendation of a second issue of the work. Public interest in Indo-Chinese countries is rather likely in the near future to increase than to dwindle, as the possessions newly added in Burmah to our Indian empire get themselves developed, organized, consolidated, and re-peopled; while the progress of France in Cochinchina and Tonquin, and the endeavours of enterprising pioneers of commerce to draw Chinese trade in increased volume down the Laos States, deserve a larger share of attention than they usually receive. These considerations justify us in saying that Dr. Anderson has done good service in publishing the present volume. He has not given his readers a hastily compiled sketch of his own immediate experiences as a traveller in Tenasserim, but he has employed a few years in working up the materials for his book, and now puts forth what he has to relate in a matured state; hence his pages, if they do not command a very wide circle of readers, will at any rate find their value recognized by those more especially interested in that part of the world of which they treat.

Ancient Cures, Charms, and Usages of Ireland: Contributions to Irish Lore. By Lady Wilde. (Ward & Downey.)

LADY WILDE is always an amusing writer; her humour has a quaint seriousness that renders even book-making tolerable from her hand, and her seriousness has a humour of which she is probably unconscious. The materials from which she has spun this book are for the most part trivial, and even worthless. As a "contribution to Irish lore" it is of little value; yet the author has a pleasing way of telling a story, so that albeit she used all her best materials for her really interesting 'Legends of Ireland,' she has contrived to make up a fairly amusing volume of the fragments that remained.

The origin and growth of superstition appear to have no charm for her; she says nothing of the why and wherefore of the absurd cures and charms she has collected; nor does she tell her readers which, among the recipes she gives, still keep a place in the rural pharmacoposia, and which have fallen into disuse, nor does she even name the districts wherein the various mixtures of cats' hairs and fasting spittle are popular. The cures, &c., are merely jotted down in a disconnected manner, without comment or any arrangement, whether of date, character, or subject. First we have ten "ancient charms," then "ancient cures" for cramp, mumps, and fever, though to the uninitiated there is no distinction between the two classes of prescription. Then follow half a dozen "charms and cures" of unspecified age; then we recur to "ancient cures," and so forth, backwards and forwards, to the end of the chapter of ignorant and uninteresting recipes. This part of the volume is somewhat of a piece of book-making; but the stories and legends that follow are more amusing, and the chapter on the "American Irish (The Irish of To-day)" is really remarkable; for here Lady Wilde tells the Saxon plainly what she thinks of him, and paints English and Irish character from the Irish point of view. There is a good deal of truth in what she says—the English ruler is seldom loved by the conquered race; but, while admitting that sympathy and conciliation are not salient features of the English character, impartial judges will demur to the portrait sketched by Lady Wilde. "It would," she writes,

"indeed be impossible to find natures more entirely antagonistic than the Saxon and the Celt. The stolid Saxons [at the Conquest].....were rapidly crushed and humbled.....it was evident that nature meant them for a destiny of inferiority, for a servile race, and so they have remained ever since, emphatically 'the lower classes' of England. The Celts, on the contrary, with their Greek nature, love glory and beauty and distinction, everything that is free and splendid.....They will never tamely submit to coercion, injustice, and inferiority, like the apathetic dull-brained Saxon.....The English live under method and rule.....and will even bear oppression, so as a chance of gain comes with it."

Again, after some pages of tolerably fair, though severe criticism of English rule, she declares that the English are "without illusions, without dreams, without reverence.....No lofty eloquence inspires their oratory. They live wholly in the sensuous and the actual. The Irish live on dreams and prayer.The round, stolid English head, the pale, cold eyes, denote a nation of practical aims, a people made for commerce and industry; while the small oval head of the Celt, and deep, passionate eyes denote a people made for religion and art; and, therefore, the greatest mistake ever made by England was the endeavour to force the Reformation on a people like the Irish. Protestantism, without art, or beauty, or ritual, or symbol, or reverence, suited the self-asserting, dogged egotism of the English.....The Reformation was a genuine outcome of Saxon nature, a mere revolt against grace, refinement, the beautiful, and the mystic."

Then follows a page or two upon Protestantism and Catholicism, which, from the absence of all reference to truth and inspiration, will probably be as unacceptable to one party as the other. The "stolid parishioner," we gather, "pays the clergyman to do a certain duty"; and from the context it would seem that this duty is to promulgate "Protestantism with its hard scholastic dogmas," and to offer "in place of.....the mystic symbols of altar and cross.....the abstractions of theology in the Thirty-nine Articles." Many sins have been imputed to the Church of England, but never before have we heard her charged with a too close adherence to the Thirty-nine Articles, in which "the Irish, however, found no comfort."

Much cannot be expected from a race that, with the Creed and Gospel at hand, guides its national life by the rule of the Thirty-nine Articles; and it is not surprising to read that it is "stolid," without ideals, dull. The Irish, on the contrary, like

"all oppressed nations, are eloquent. When laws forbid a people to arm, they can only speak or sing. [Is rebellion then unheard of?] Words become their weapons, and the Irish armoury is always bright and burning. Nationality, this dream of an ideal future, illumines their poetry and oratory, their music and song, with a vague splendour of passion and pathos, and preserves even the common speech and popular literature of the people from the coarseness and vulgarity so obtrusively characteristic of the English lower classes. Ireland, then, has some compensation for her sufferings; many fine-toned chords in the nature of her people, a gentle courtesy of manner that is almost reverential, and a power of winning sympathy and love which the stolid English organization with its plethora of prosperity and self-centred egotism is entirely without."

This is really wounding when we consider that the frankness of the author is restrained by an almost reverential courtesy of manner, and we wish that Lady Wilde could have overcome the instincts of her race and spoken her mind out freely; only, when she pits Irish literature against English, and boasts that the Anglo-Saxons are "made for commerce and industry," "without illusions, without dreams, without reverence," living "wholly in the sensuous and the actual," she should remember that this stolid, cold-eyed, dull-brained, apathetic race has produced a few poor poets. We do not claim for Shakespeare the "vague splendour of passion and pathos" of Sheridan, nor aspire to rank Byron, Shelley, Wordsworth, Keats, and Coleridge with their Celtic contemporary Tommy Moore; for we remember that

"the Celt is the artist and poet of the world.....the passionate poet and orator, the centrifugal force of the human polity, ever sending forth a rush of new thought into the world, to kindle as with light and flame the hopes and aspirations of oppressed peoples and nations, and to arouse their energies for the holy war against wrong, and for the sublime cause of human right."

How does Lady Wilde hope to make good her boast? The Italians are not Celts, nor are the English, nor the Germans; yet these, and not the Irish, are the nations that have produced the artists and poets and musicians of the world. The Celtic race, probably, is as good as any other; but with the solitary exception of O'Connell it has produced no champion of oppressed races, and Irishmen, as a rule, have been led by patriots who were English by name and creed.

Lady Wilde has, we believe, lived for many years in England, but her studies of character have been made exclusively among the most prosaic class. Selfishness and love of ease are the monopolies of no nation. She has only to visit the poor, the sick, the erring, and the outcast—less, indeed—she has only to read her newspaper—to learn that pity and love and self-abnegation inspire English hearts as frequently as Irish ones, and that "self-centred egotism" is an affair of character, not of race. From the pen of an untravelled Connaught woman such an estimate as hers would not have been surprising; but it is sad to think that all the years that Lady Wilde has dwelt in London have taught her nothing but hatred.

So great is her antipathy, that in defiance of even Celtic historians she asserts that before the Norman invasion "the goods of life were abundant and shared by all alike. The condition of the Irish people was better a thousand years ago than it is now." Thirty years ago such statements were excusable, but Irish histories are now so abundant that all who write on Irish subjects ought to have some knowledge of the past.

About the future Lady Wilde is also a little vague; but she considers it "not wholly impossible or improbable"

"that some day the Irish race will be powerful enough to recross the Atlantic with ships and arms and money, overthrow English rule, and annex Ireland to the great Federal Republic under the stars and stripes. . . . Indeed the subject has already been discussed, and even a suggestion offered that America should purchase Ireland from the English Government in a peaceable, orderly way."

By whom and to whom this remarkable suggestion was offered the author does not vouchsafe to say, nor does she tell us what kind of reception it met with; the detail of the scheme is a little vague—like the future of Ireland; but on Home Rule she looks "with bitter disdain," and she avers that "in a Republic alone is to be found the true force that emancipates the soul and the life of man."

But though Lady Wilde's enthusiasm is unrestrained, it is impossible not to feel sympathy with her ardent, though embittered love of country, and she is, unfortunately, justified in attributing many of the misfortunes of Ireland to the scorn and lack of sympathy and brotherhood of England; only her book proves (if proof be needed) that such error of judgment and narrowness of heart are not only on one side, and that the Saxon has no monopoly of undeserved contempt and hatred.

ÆSCHYLUS.

The Agamemnon of Æschylus. With an Introduction, Commentary, and Translation by A. W. Verrall, Litt.D. (Macmillan & Co.)

The Suppliants of Æschylus. A Revised Text, with Introduction, Critical Notes, Commentary, and Translation by T. G. Tucker, M.A. (Same publishers.)

DR. VERRALL aims at nothing else than revolutionizing our idea of the 'Agamemnon.' According to his views of the play, the scholars of to-day and their teachers have hitherto been entirely wrong. They have been attributing inconsistencies to the poet of which it is absurd to conceive him guilty; they have been mistaken about the development of Attic tragedy, and have even misinterpreted the term "drama." This word, Dr. Verrall insists, properly and originally meant pantomime. He tells us that the 'Medea' of Euripides and the 'Edipus at Colonus' of Sophocles were not essentially "actions" or performances at all, but things to be heard and read. Surely we may be allowed to add "as well as seen." We submit that by way of distinction from ἔπη, heroic narrative, the most "cabinet" play ever composed might be called δράμα, an acted tale. Dr. Verrall calls Aristophanes as a witness on this point: "'Phrynichus,' says Agathon to Mnesilochus in the 'Thesmophoriazuse,' 'whose work you have yourself heard, was fine in person and fine in dress, and that is why his actions were fine too.'" It is unfortunate for his theory, and only too characteristic of Dr. Verrall's method of theorizing, that he has wrenched this passage from a context which subverts his interpretation. The last line translated, διὰ τοῦτ' ἄρ' αὐτοῦ καὶ τὰ δράματα ἦν καλὰ, is followed by ὁμοία γὰρ ποιεῖν ἀνάγκη τῇ φύσει. Moreover there would be little point in Agathon citing Phrynichus à propos of Euripides and himself (Agathon), if there was so little in common between the early poet and the contemporaries of Aristophanes. This part, then, of Dr. Verrall's case breaks down upon examination, and equally so, in our opinion, do the other arguments adduced in support of his conception of the plot, which with its secondary chorus of conspirators, to whom the beacon-fire on Mount Arachnæus (where Ægisthus and his λοχῆται lay in hiding) conveyed the news of Agamemnon's return, and with the elaborate stage "business" proposed, would content even Mr. Augustus Harris.

The story of the transmission of the fiery message from Troy, Dr. Verrall contends with much ingenuity, is to be regarded as a mere invention by which the queen deceives the king's adherents as to the true purport of the blaze on Mount Arachnæus. It is no doubt curious that Agamemnon should arrive in Argolis within an hour or two of the announcement, made on the strength of the system of fire-signals, that Troy had fallen during the night which has just passed (v. 291); but the situation involves no such conspicuous absurdity as Dr. Verrall imagines. Of course the queen is misled by the beacon message, for Troy must have fallen from twenty to thirty days before the king's return at the very least. But the easy supposition that a period of fine weather in Argolis may have been supposed to have coincided with a period of dull weather in the northern Ægean fully accounts for the mistake, upon which the chorus animadvertes (vv. 485-93); so that the poet may stand excused for the adoption of a singularly effective device for the evolution of a series of profoundly tragic episodes. With the arrival of the herald, and subsequently of the king, the subject of the beacons becomes quite unimportant, and moreover the queen, having been proved right as to the fact, need not be expected to allude to having been wrong as to the time at which it had occurred. In her speech, vv. 592-617, Clytemnestra speaks before the herald of ἀλωσιν Ἰλίου τ' ἀνάστασιν. Dr. Verrall renders ἀνάστασιν "destruction," as if it were κατασκαφήν, and comparing her words, vv. 353, 354, founds thereon an argument against the view usually taken of the beacon-signal. But she had not heard the herald's report of the "destruction" of Ilium, and therefore it is most natural to suppose that this ἀνάστασιν means "depopulation," which is, indeed, the only kind of "destruction" which can be signified by ἀνάστασις. Applied to the Ilium of wood and stone, it might mean "restoration" rather than overthrow. We admit that the views expressed by the chorus are not invariably consistent; but, so far from distributing the choral utterances between two bodies each steadfast in mind, we have regarded the inconsistencies as consummate touches of ἥθος on the part of the poet, the aged citizens being too much excited and perplexed by the encompassing doubts and fears to preserve an even tenor of thought. Critics are always forgetting the elementary truism that strong emotion is not logical, and that its moods are fitful.

It is probable that scholars have been looking for Dr. Verrall's treatment of difficult passages, in which the text is generally supposed to be corrupt, with more interest than for the rest of his work, wondering whether he would emend in his old dashing style or keep to his newer method of essaying to justify and interpret the most hopeless difficulties without alteration of MS. readings. In his preface our editor reiterates his conviction of the "substantial integrity" of the text of Æschylus, a position which necessitates copious annotation. Several of Dr. Verrall's original suggestions are extremely valuable; and his comments are almost always interesting and instructive even when slight deviations from the straight road have led him completely astray. With regard to the phrase κοιμώμενος στέγαις ἀγκαθεν, vv. 2, 3, a novel explanation of which, "lulled in the embrace of the roof," is ingeniously and learnedly defended, we must ask, Could the form ἀγκαθεν mean anything but "from the inside of the arm"? Can we argue from πετραία ἀγκάλη—"enveloping rock," and κυμάτων ἐν ἀγκάλαις, "in enveloping waves," to the embrace of "an angle of sloping roofs"? How could such an angle appear at the top of the scenic representation of the palace of the Atreidae? Do sentinels who are afraid to sleep lie down? The form ἀγκαθεν may mean "by the arm" or "by the arms," if the arm is round or on an object, so that the body hangs (partly or entirely) from the arm. Thus the sentinel would be resting ἀγκυθεν if he were resting with his arm on or round an acroterion which was higher than his shoulder. The needless conjecture of Wecklein, οὐδ' ὄφρα' ἂν λάβοιμι βριζούσης φρενός (v. 287), for οὐ δόξαν, κ.τ.λ., is accepted and defended thus: "δόξαν is emphatic by position, and with this emphasis the sentence implies that she might accept something from a sleeping mind, but not a δόξα." This is a strange objection to make to "I would not accept the fancy of a sleeping mind," though the fallacy does not altogether spring from the substitution of "from" for "of." Of the obscure passage, vv. 417-22, Πολὺν δ' ἀνέστητον, κ.τ.λ., Dr. Verrall speaks in ecstatic terms which emulate the raptures of an æsthete over an exceptionally dingy shade of brown. He ventures to defend the last line, v. 422; but as the argument opens with the statement "Ἀφίσθαι γυναῖκα (see L. and Sc. s.v.) is to put away a wife," we may dismiss it at once as untenable. Dr. Verrall should always verify his references to Liddell and Scott. Had he done so in this case, he would have found that Liddell and Scott rightly say that ἀφίεναι means "to put away," "divorce," not ἀφίσθαι. Dr. Verrall repeats, though we have more than once exposed it, Mr. Sidgwick's mistake as to such constructions as οὐκ ἔσθ' ὅπως λέξαιμι. The optative is not deliberative, but simply gives a nearer approach to certainty than the optative with ἂν. It is better to say with Dr. Verrall that v. 544, τεθνᾶναι δ' οὐκ ἔρ' ἀντερῶ θεός, is hopeless, than to accept the easy alterations which have been proposed. Of course Dr. Verrall's eccentric view of the structure of the play has in many places affected his explanation and translation detrimentally, but even when he is most positive and most mistaken he is never irritating, for his tone is always genial and every page evinces ingenuous enthusiasm. The translation is remarkably brilliant and effective.

There is a considerable amount of praiseworthy work in Prof. Tucker's edition of a beautiful if very corrupt play, but unfortunately our editor has joined the numerous band of students who expend so much time and energy on textual criticism that they do not invariably pay proper attention to the demands of exact scholarship and common sense. It is of little avail to have sat at the feet of scholars like Cobet and Bast if the disciple makes haste to be original, and fails to criticize carefully his own proposals with due regard to context and classical usage and grammar. A critic may be expected to be most on his guard when discussing the general principles of textual criticism, yet we find Prof. Tucker displaying haste and want of judgment with respect to a deliberately selected illustration of the careful exegetical study "necessary for determining whether or not an emendation is required, and, if required, of what nature it should be." These are Prof. Tucker's words:—

"In P. V. 680

ἀπροσδόκητος αὐτὸν αἰφνίδιος μόρος τοῦ ζῆν ἀπεστέρησεν, to say nothing of the metrical difficulty, no careful student of Æschylus could bear the flagrant tautology ἀπροσδόκητος αἰφνίδιος. In emending therefore he would not accept any word of merely the same sense as αἰφνίδιος. The true reading I should restore with αἰπεινός (Homer's αἰπὺς δλεῖρος). This differs from αἰφνίδιος and from ἀπροσδόκητος in the metaphor."

Now there is no tautology at all in the case, and it is not easy to see how αἰπεινός could have been corrupted into αἰφνίδιος, and, lastly, αἰπεινός is not elsewhere used metaphorically like αἰπός. Yet, in spite of this unfortunate blemish, the principles laid down in the preface are so thoroughly sound that it is difficult to account for the propounder's disregard of them in practice. In v. 44, Ζηνὸς ἐφάγερων τ' ἐπωνυμία δ' ἐπεκράτειτο μόρσιμος αἰών, the change from the MS. ἐφάγιν is judicious, though perhaps ἐφάγιν τ' accounts better for the corruption; but ἐπωνυμία should be retained. The translation "in name whereof a life (i. e., a living being) of such sort as the fates allowed was being brought to accomplishment" is intolerable. The right literal rendering of the MS. reading is "by a naming after which her life was being brought to its crowning point, as was fated." The recorded μήτιδος (v. 54) is changed to Δανλίδος without any discussion whether μήτιδος οἰκτρᾶς may not be the genitive after ὅπα, and τᾶς Τηρεῖας ἀλόχου genitive after μήτιδος, the order being Pindaric, or yet again whether μήτιδος οἰκτρᾶς may not be a descriptive genitive, "of the wife of Tereus with her skill in plaintive song." The dialogue between the king and the chorus, vv. 265 ff., is distributed in a most eccentric manner, and one or two lines have to be mammoocked to fit them into the new arrangement, the lines BA., μὴ καὶ λόγος τις Ζῆνα μυχθῆναι βροτῶ | XO., καὶ κρυπτά [κἀκρυπτά] γ' ἦρας ταῦτα παλλαγμάτων [παλλαγεύματα], being transformed into XO., ἥ καὶ λόγος τῆς Ζῆνα δηχθῆναι πόθῳ; BA., κοῦ κρυπτά γ' ἦρας ταῦτ' ἀπ' ἀντιπαγμάτων (vv. 268, 269). The ἰὸφ ὅμ passage, vv. 799 ff., is ingeniously metamorphosed into a semblance of intelligibility.

The translation is decidedly good, and there is plenty of valuable matter in the commentary; though, apart from the discussion of various readings, the annotation is rather sparse. Very little is said about the metres of the choruses, which is a pity, as the rhythm has, of course, to be taken into account in reconstructing and repairing verses; and the 'Supplices' stands in need of these operations to a greater extent than any other drama of Æschylus which has come down to us. We cannot recommend the edition for educational purposes, but it is well worth the attention of mature scholars.

The Register Booke of Inglebye juxta Grenhow since the Year of our Lord 1539. Edited by John Blackburne, Curate. (Canterbury, Cross & Jackman.)

INGLEBY JUXTA GREENHOW is a parish in the North Riding of Yorkshire. The population is, and always has been, small. The last census gives a return of 391 souls. A secluded place such as this is pretty sure to have—if it still possesses it—a more than usually interesting parish register. As our town registers furnish evidence of a continual shifting of the population, so these records of village life, led far away from the hum and bustle of politics and trade, show how permanently families remain attached to one small spot when there is no strong inducement to break up the old home.

Mr. Blackburne supplies in his introduction much useful information of which his title-page gives no promise. He, in fact, furnishes notes of a series of records relating to the parish from the Domesday survey until quite recent times. No attempt has been made to write the history of the place; but the facts and references are at hand for the use of any one who desires to do for Ingleby what Canon Raine has accomplished for Marske and Hemingborough. We gather that the church has been much injured by neglect and injudicious repairs. The plates lead to the conclusion that the piers are of Norman work of rather late character.

Few of our earliest registers have come down to us. Ingleby juxta Greenhow is an exception. There are three baptisms for the year 1539. In 1540 and 1541 there are the like number, then the baptisms begin to increase; in 1552 they reach the number of ten. From 1583 to 1591 they fall off considerably, never being more than one or two during the year. This does not seem to indicate that the population was less elastic, but rather that the parish minister or his clerk did not keep the register properly. The following not very intelligible memorandum seems to indicate this: "The olde booke was soe rent & torne that ther is not names extant, or to be found set downe in these yeares & in some others." After the beginning of the new century the population increased by "leaps and bounds." In 1603 we find eleven, and in 1610 there are twenty, two of which were twins. Remote as Ingleby juxta Greenhow was and still is from the busy world, Scotch and Irish people sometimes made their way there. In 1626 a Highlander, Malcolm Magreggor, is entered as the reputed father of a base-born daughter, and in 1633 occurs the baptism of "Johannes fil. Roberti Heburne natus in oppido Magherling in Hybernia."

From 1653 to 1659 births, not baptisms, are registered. In those years England was a commonwealth, and the opinions of our lawgivers, combined with the legal advantages of such a course, caused the passing of a statute entitled "How Marriages shall be solemnized and registered, and also a Register of Births and Burials." This Act is not to be found in the 'Statutes of the Realm,' from which all the Parliamentary legislation is excluded. It exists, however, as a folio pamphlet, and occurs in its place under the 24th of August in the book known as Scobell's 'Acts and Ordinances.' During these seven years eighty-eight births are recorded. This was the precise time, if the novelists' view of history were correct, when we should find the largest crop of those strange theological names which go by the nickname Puritan. It is, therefore, not amiss to remark that there is not one among them which can fairly bear that character; Dinah, Esther, and Josias are the only ones which can without hesitation be attributed to the influence of the Old Testament. An examination of the remarkably good index with which the volume is furnished leads to a like conclusion. There are, of course, a few names strange to our ears, the source of which is certainly not Holy Scripture, such as Bethalina, 1797; Hervina, 1681; Anastache, 1743; Pontia, 1664; Munday, 1544; and Merrill or Merroll, which seems to have been a by no means uncommon name.

The Ingleby juxta Greenhow registers do not furnish many nicknames. One, however, is curious. There was in the parish a highly prolific race of the name of Ripley, one branch of which for some generations went by the name of Ripley alias Midnight. Entries regarding these people occur between the years 1669 and 1694. It would be interesting to know from what deed of darkness they acquired their second name. It has been suggested more than once that if the information were brought together a considerable amount of weather knowledge might be gleaned from old parish registers. An instance of this kind occurs under March 14th, 1666, when we find that a widow called Anna Bland "tempestate venti, nivis et frigoris extincta." Between the years 1568 and 1633 we have counted twelve instances of marriage where the woman is spoken of as wife of the husband, meaning, as we cannot but believe, that these persons were man and wife before the service in church was performed. Here we come upon a trace of the penal laws which embittered the lives of those of our ancestors who refused conformity to the Established Church. Some Protestant Dissenters and all Roman Catholics had a strong objection to participating in the service provided by law. How matters were managed by the Protestants we know not. The members of the Church of Rome, it would seem, were married secretly by their own clergy, and afterwards, in those cases where property depended on the legitimacy of the offspring, went to the church for the sake of obtaining legal sanction to their union. The returns of the Yorkshire Roman Catholics of 1604 prove that these marriages were very common. "Supposed to be married by old priests," "married by some popish priest, as they think," are typical entries. One of the great Northern house of Cholmley was, if this record is to be trusted, "married in a fell by a popish priest." These entries in the Ingleby juxta Greenhow parish register confirm the information already supplied by the recusancy documents.

NOVELS OF THE WEEK.

- Misadventure.* By W. E. Norris. 3 vols. (Spencer Blackett.)
One Another's Burdens. By Mary E. Mann. 3 vols. (Bentley & Son.)
Briars; or, On Dangerous Ground. By A. M. Monro. 2 vols. (Griffith, Farran & Co.)
Paul Jones's Alias, &c. By David Christie Murray and Henry Herman. (Chatto & Windus.)
A Waif of the Plains. By Bret Harte. (Same publishers.)
Dollis Brooke. By Carter Harrison. (Remington & Co.)
The Captain of the Polestar, and other Tales. By A. Conan Doyle. (Longmans & Co.)

A Fairy Godfather. By J. A. Goodchild. (Remington & Co.)
The Blindness of Memory Earle. By C. T. C. James. (Same publishers.)

MR. NORRIS has a manner of treatment peculiarly his own, so that it makes little difference to him or his admirers what subject he takes in hand, old or new, conventional or original. Like a painter who obstinately clings to the quiet and sober style which happens to suit him best, and disdains to vie with the vivid colourists whose pictures draw the uninstructed crowd, he is best appreciated by those whose taste he has already cultivated; and by this time, no doubt, he has a public on whom he can rely. In 'Misadventure' we have nothing fresher than a country girl with a train of lovers—the despised sailor, whose race for a wife is something like the race of the tortoise against the hare; the free-handed young man who is involved in a fatal "misadventure" with her brother, and who comes to a violent end; and the travelled owner of a neighbouring estate, who is mixed up with a Russian lady of a decidedly intriguing bent, and who also comes to a violent end. These are familiar types, and their haps and mishaps are equally familiar; but Mr. Norris plods on with his story in an easy, unbroken, mildly cynical fashion, and makes himself interesting without visible effort. Even when he is exciting, it is plain to the reader that he is not himself excited; and he winds up with a shrug of his shoulders:

"In this world everything comes to an end—sorrow and joy and love and life itself. Stories, too, come to an end at last, and patient readers are released."

Miss Mann has unfortunately fallen a victim to that epidemic of low spirits which has prevailed in English fiction for some time past. Illustrious outbreaks of this description—the Byronic gloom, the youthful Werther follies, and that "belle mélancolie" which Chateaubriand admired so much in his own heroines—are matters of history and of past days, with a stereotyped explanation ready made for use in examination papers. The reason of the present fashion of depression amongst our numerous band of lesser novel-writers of cultivation and refinement, is as perplexing and regrettable as it is marked. Where there is no great imaginative force, such as has once or twice of late years almost justified its own unrelenting pessimism, the feeble but constant hymning of obstinate mistake, failure, and irrational self-sacrifice is more apt to awaken impatience and unhallowed memories of Mrs. Gummidge than sympathetic interest in the reader. But in spite of this great drawback, the want of ordinary good spirits in face of the problems of existence, and of its heroine, in whom all the tendencies complained of are incarnate, 'One Another's Burdens' is a pretty and carefully written story. Libbie Strong is a healthy and natural young creature, who tells her sister the most refreshing home truths from time to time. Mr. Elgard is a very fair success in the matter of villains. Miss Mann fortunately relents so far as to end with the happy and long-deferred marriage of two of the martyrs, though with incorrigible obstinacy her last word is a morbid question as to its advisability, most inappropriately placed in the mouth of our courageous and cheerful young friend.

'Briars' is a pleasant and genial English tale—a tale of a snug English estate, of its manly owner, of his companionable young son, and of the more or less companionable and happy creatures brought in contact with them. There is a good character-plot in the story, exceptionally good and interesting; but there is not a trace of the hard strain after incident and sensation which some readers and writers of fiction consider indispensable for the making of a plot. 'Briars' is without a villain—save for one Nina, who does the greatest possible harm with the least possible intrusion into the narrative. As for the hero in chief, he is a woman's ideal man, and a very good one of his kind. The reader need not fight shy of this book, as though all its men and women were mawkish models for the rising generation. It is not so. They are fair samples of a better class of refined gentlefolk, and most of them are decidedly peccant. Perhaps their biographer is too lenient in her description of them; but that her drawing has been done from the life, and that her dialogue has been naturally inspired, may be asserted without fear of contradiction.

Two writers and two artists have contributed to produce the volume in which 'Paul Jones's Alias' occupies the place of honour. It is perhaps no reproach to any of them to say that a single hand might have made a better book than this quadruple combination. The pictures, in particular, are uneven in merit, and it is to be hoped that neither Mr. Forestier nor Mr. Nicolet is responsible for the illustrated cover. 'Paul Jones's Alias' is a story of two British officers who carry on a swindling partnership, and at an hotel in Paris they come across two Americans bearing an identical name, though one of them, a millionaire, is travelling under an alias. The natural consequence is that they fleece a poor artist; and so Messrs. Murray and Herman have their stage effects all ready to hand. The stories in this volume are ingenious rather than pleasant. Something of the agreeable, no doubt, is sacrificed to the ever-present suggestion of footlights and shifting scenery; but the loss has its compensations.

'A Waif of the Plains' adds one more to the brilliant pictures of wild American life some thirty years ago which Mr. Bret Harte has impressed upon the mind of his readers, but in other respects it is not to be classed with his best works. To form an idea of what a journey with a waggon train to California was like, the imagination asks for no more than the terse description here given. The reader almost feels that actual experience would have left a less vivid impression. Nature, inanimate and human, could hardly be portrayed with more incisive art. But Mr. Bret Harte has led his public to ask for a story no less carefully and vigorously put together, and in 'A Waif of the Plains' he has not done anything up to his best standard. A story which ends with a promise of a continuation is a confession of incompleteness, and offers a prospect of future dissatisfaction. It is true there was no other way out of the difficulty. The first episode in the waif's life had been brought to an end in some chapters which are as near as anything written by Mr. Bret Harte can be to dulness, and it was only possible to begin again or to make some excuse for a lame conclusion. The next instalment of the waif's life will deal with his love affairs, and continue the development of the character of his little companion in the waggon crossing the plains, an odious damsel of the kind Mr. Bret Harte knows how to make interesting.

As it is impossible to suppose that any one can find much to amuse, instruct, or edify him or her in 'Dollis Brooke,' it is unnecessary to dwell at length upon a book which can excite the reader's curiosity on one point only—why it should have been written. The conversation of young men who are as dull as they are dissipated and vulgar, their eminently unpleasing exploits and companions, are hardly more offensive than the subsequent moralities of the story and the tangle of melodramatic absurdities by which virtue and guilt receive their respective awards. As a matter of course in work of this calibre, the reader never escapes from the present tense from beginning to end.

'The Captain of the Polestar' is an attractive collection of short stories, some of them being reprints from magazines, from the pen of Dr. A. Conan Doyle. Those who are fascinated by eerie tales will linger over the dim horror of the opening story; those who like a good laugh will revel in 'The Great Keimplatz Experiment' and 'That Little Square Box.' Lovers of wild adventure, of brilliant satire, of quiet pathos, will all find wherewith to be content in the little book, which, in its variety of subject and treatment, reads more like a volume of stories from Maga than a collection of tales from one and the same pen.

What shall be said of a fanciful affair like 'A Fairy Godfather,' except that it may be read? It is a curious medley of imaginative and symbolic utterances, alternating with what sometimes reads like nonsense, and is really more than nonsense, and occasionally humorous besides. Society, and our latter-day world generally, as seen from the point of view of a gentleman, a dweller in fairyland, in a variety of human disguises, is the idea. It is a little vague and confused, perhaps, for a satire—a thing to be read, as it were, running; but it is not altogether unamusing nor uninteresting either for a reader who cares to reflect a little now and again.

As regards mere writing there is not much to be said in favour of 'The Blindness of Memory Earle.' Even the material is unequal and badly put together, and yet the story has its good points, and possesses more interest than many a better written book. There are occasionally shrewd remarks, though not, perhaps, much knowledge of human nature at first hand. The girl and her garden in the East-End lodging-house make a rather pretty idyl, which is the nicest part of the story. Hetty is the ministering angel of the lodgers, especially of the blind man. Together they lead a kind of open-air existence on the roof-garden, within sight and sound of "the river old and grey, flowing its appointed way." All this affects one rather pleasantly. Being an idyl, no mention is, of course, made of the chimney smuts, which must have been a drawback, and which a London reader feels in the air as he reads. Memory is the somewhat provoking name of the amiable weakling who is the hero. Besides his physical blindness he is afflicted with blindness of another kind, which leads him into the error of marrying the woman he loves instead of the woman who loves him. But he and the gentle Hetty of the roof-garden are finally restored to one another. Too many italics and too much pathos are amongst the author's stumbling-blocks. So is the use of "like" for as, "riding" for driving, &c. "Qui bono" is probably a misprint; but what, one would like to know, is "a dark complimentary gown admired by every one"? Two snobbish vicars are too much for one story, and are overdone besides. One "dines late, and is [privately] proud of the fact"; the other "charters a cab" at a school treat, and (publicly) boasts of it to the onlookers.

RECENT VERSE.

Merlin: a Dramatic Poem. By Ralph Macleod Fullarton. (Blackwood & Sons.)

In the Garden of Dreams. By Louise Chandler Moulton. (Macmillan & Co.)

Autumn Songs. By Violet Fane. (Chapman & Hall.)

In telling the tale of Merlin and Vivien Mr. Macleod Fullarton takes, as Lord Tennyson did, the version of the legend which makes Vivien's deed one of hatred and murder, and in presenting it in a dramatic form he has to struggle against a heavy difficulty in the necessary attempt to let his reader probe Vivien's mind with him, and to work out, first for her love and then for her deadly malevolence, motives sufficiently true to feminine human nature to make her a psychological reality. More manageable material for an introspective drama might have been found in the other version of the legend—that in which the catastrophe comes, not of the baleful beauty's hate, but of her love, and in which, using the irrevocable spell she has coaxed him to teach her, she consigns Merlin to a living death in immortal captivity in order that while she lives he shall know nothing but their love. It cannot be said that Mr. Fullarton has wholly overcome the difficulty of his task: there never could have been such a man as his Merlin, such a woman as his Vivien; and his Morgan la Faye, with her pertinacious unrequited love for Merlin, though less abnormal than they, has only the vitality of stock characters in fiction, while her intrusion into the story does not serve its purpose of helping to interpret Vivien's character, but adds to it the incongruity of a hot-blooded jealousy strangely alien to its other components. There are, however, fine passages in the book, and altogether considerable poetic strength; and it seems probable that this poetic strength could display itself successfully in a dramatic form if Mr. Fullarton were to choose a subject giving its own clues to the characters of the personages. The Faust-like portions of 'Merlin' must be mentioned in order to except them from commendation. As poetry they not only fall sadly short of their great model, but they are distinctly inferior to the rest of the book; and, as a contribution to the evolution of the story or of Merlin's character in the story, they are meaningless.

Mrs. Moulton has long since established her name, and a book of poems by her is sure of welcome. 'In the Garden of Dreams' shows her gift of lyrical music—music which sometimes reminds us of Miss Rossetti's—and it shows also her high qualities of tenderness, thoughtfulness, and grace. Most of these poems are sad, or tinged with sadness; we will not quarrel with her for that, for of Mrs. Moulton it is especially true that her "sweetest songs are those that tell of saddest thought"; but we do take objection to her excessive use of any pathetic idea which has taken a strong hold on her mind. To give an instance—a salient instance—there is her ghost idea. The ghost, no commonplace visible spectre, is sometimes the subtle presence of the spirit of the dead, or, it may be, of the living, sometimes the personification of a memory or of an existing evil—shades of difference which scarcely at all vary the imaginative figure—and, whether as presence or personification, it persistently haunts the book: 'Parleying,' 'When Day was Done,' 'At Midnight,' 'The Ghost's Return,' 'In a Garden,' 'A Ghost's Question,' 'Hereafter,' the 'His Second Wife Speaks' series, the three touching In Memoriam sonnets called 'Her Ghost,' 'A Silent Guest,' 'Love's Ghost,' all have it for their direct theme, and in simile, illustration, or suggestion, it reappears in perhaps a majority of the other poems. However, though we point out as a mistake Mrs. Moulton's yielding to the temptation of reiterating a favourite idea, we must own of her ghost that there is nothing which it touches it does not adorn. As to the specially ghost poems, they are of the best in the book.

Violet Fane's 'Autumn Songs' are only autumnal subjectively and metaphorically—autumnal not because they sing of harvests and vintages or of russet and falling leaves, but because the writer's feeling is, as she puts it in the poem called 'Life's Afternoon,'

I sit at rest and Autumn-time is here!.....
Her first red leaf lies quivering at my feet.—
"At rest,"—not yet at peace! Oh, hurrying year!
Oh, Youth, and Summer, that were once so sweet,
Ere I renounce you,—with your joys and woes,—
I must await the numbing Winter snows!

How shall a minstrel wake the trembling lyre
And sing of Love, in Autumn-time, and live?.....
Yet cold the verse that lacks the sacred fire
Which Hope, and Youth, and Love, alone can give!
I strike the lyre; the answering echoes ring!—
Say, oh, my Friend! is it too late to sing?.....
Nay! for in sorer Autumns have I seen
Some slim brown bird start up upon a spray
And warble as tho' all the world were green
And chill October blossoming like May,— Yet droops the rose, and howso' sweet the song
Nor bird nor minstrel may rejoice for long.

Certainly it is not too late for Violet Fane to sing. Her especial gift—that which gives to her verse a vividness and attractiveness sometimes lacking in that of far greater poets—is verve; and this volume shows no signs of autumnal decadence in that.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

ANY high-school pupil who has had some practice in essay-writing ought to be able to produce a book like Idle Musings, by E. Conder Gray (Heinemann), but ought to know better than to do so. It is indeed a pity that the essays here collected were not written at examinations. In such circumstances the author would have had the advantage of being unable to make long extracts from well-known writers. Take away the quotations, however, and little remains, but even that little is too much. Almost every one of the essays would be improved if the first paragraph was cut out.

The success of Mr. Bryce's book by no means detracts from the interest of an excellent volume called The United States, written by the late Prof. Alexander Johnston, of Princeton College, and published by Messrs. Blackie & Son. While there is little American history in Mr. Bryce's volumes, the present publication is almost entirely historical. It has a good index, and those who consult it as a book of reference can easily find any of the important events of American history. The almost forgotten war between the United States and France is clearly set forth, as are the "Ostend Manifesto" and the "X. Y. Z. Mission," and many other matters now wholly out of sight. It would be an excellent thing if some one would bring the book more thoroughly up to date, as, although finished in 1887 for the 'Encyclopædia Britannica,' and slightly improved since that time by notes and additions, the work is fuller and better on the earlier than on the later parts of American history. As the bibliography given is by no means confined to history, it should, we think, include the names of de Tocqueville and Bryce.

The Pedestrian's Record, published by Messrs. Allen & Co., and written by two gentlemen of the name of Lupton, is not much in our way. Besides a list of running "times," it contains, however, general chapters on training and human anatomy.

MESSRS. SMITH & ELDER have issued Vanity Fair with the author's illustrations, now rather worn, at a shilling. The type is good and the paper fair. Of course 'Vanity Fair' for a shilling is not so great a feat as 'Westward Ho' for sixpence; yet it is creditable to the publishers. We hope they will follow it up with 'Pendennis' and 'The Newcomes' at the same price.

E. V. B. has published a seventh edition of her charming book Days and Hours in a Garden (Stock), and provided a new preface.—Prof. Piazzi Smyth has issued a fifth and revised edition of his favourite work, Our Inheritance in the Great Pyramid (Burnet & Co.).—Mr. Pascoe has brought out a new issue of London of To-day (Simpkin, Marshall & Co.). We observe that in the list of libraries that of the Society of Antiquaries is omitted.

MRS. BENNETT, who has now taken the name of Tregaskie, has sent us three catalogues, one of them adorned with a frontispiece by Mr. Crane and a colophon by Mr. Image, and another containing, inter alia, a collection of Johnsoniana. We have also received catalogues from Messrs. Garratt & Co., Mr. W. Hutt (first editions of Browning, Shelley, &c.), Mr. Jackson (grangerized books, &c.), Messrs. Jarvis & Sons (one of water colours and mezzotints, another of pamphlets), Mr. Lauser (engravings), Mr. Nutt (folklore), Messrs. Sotheman (good), and Messrs. Williams & Norgate (Oriental).—Messrs. George's Sons (fairly good) and Mr. Nield (fairly good) of Bristol, Mr. Simmons of Leamington, Messrs. Matthews & Brooke (good) of Leeds, and Mr. King of Torquay have also forwarded their catalogues.

We have on our table Madeira and the Canary Islands, by A. S. Brown (Low).—Facts about the Matabele, Mashonas, and the Middle Zambezi, by L. P. Bowler (Pretoria, Glückstein).—Problems in American Society, by J. H. Crooker (Boston, U.S., Ellis).—The Ethical Teaching of Froebel, by M. J. Lyschinska and T. G. Montefiore (Kegan Paul).—Scale Drawing, by T. N. Andrews (Sutton & Co.).—The Industrial Progress of the Nation, by E. Atkinson (Putnam).—Economic History and Theory, by J. Mavor (Edinburgh, Brown).—A Handbook of Precious Stones, by M. D. Rothschild (Putnam).—A Popular Treatise on the Winds, by W. Ferrel (Trübner).—Amateur Work, illustrated, Vol. VII. (Ward & Lock).—Natural History Transactions of Northumberland, Durham, and Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Vol. VIII. Part III. (Williams & Norgate).—Worcestershire Nuggets, by an Old Digger (Worcester, Deighton & Co.).—Lal, by L. Lathrop and Annie Wakeman (Bristol, Arrowsmith).—The Story of the Dockers' Strike, by H. L. Smith and V. Nash (Fisher Unwin).—The Siren of Warrington, by J. Collett (Bickers).—and The Peril of Richard Pardon, by B. L. Farjeon (White & Co.).

LIST OF NEW BOOKS.

ENGLISH.

Theology.

Bousfield's (E. H.) The Conversion of England, cr. 8vo. 2/6
Douglas's (H.) Heavenly Teachings in Earthly Proverbs, 3/6
Figgis's (J. B.) Sweet Home and the Way from Home to Heaven, cr. 8vo. 2/6
Townsend's (E. F.) Jehovah-Jesus, Divine Appearances, 5/

Fine Art.

History of Art in Sardinia, Judea, &c., from the French of Perrot and Chipiez, illustrated, 2 vols. 3s. 6d.
Ward's (J.) Elementary Principles of Ornament, 8vo. 5/ cl.

History and Biography.

Carmen Sylva (Queen of Roumania), The Life of, translated by Baroness Deichmann, 8vo. 12/ cl.
Dictionary of National Biography, edited by L. Stephen and S. Lee: Vol. 22, Glover—Gravel, roy. 8vo. 15/ cl.
Johnston's (A.) The United States, its History and Constitution, cr. 8vo. 4/6 cl.
McCarthy's (J.) A Short History of our own Times, cheap edition, 12mo. 2/6 cl.
"None of these things move me." Memoir of C. E. Toomer, by C. M. G., Preface by Whitfield, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
Stow's (J.) London under Elizabeth, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl. (Caris-brooke Library.)

Geography and Travel.

Green's (W. S.) Among the Belkirk Glaciers, cr. 8vo. 7/6 cl.
Illustrated Diary of a Voyage from London to Australia, Introduction by H. Nisbet, royal 8vo. 5/ cl.
Macquoid's (G. S.) Up and Down, Sketches of Travel, Illustrations by T. R. Macquoid, 8vo. 10/6 cl.
Whitehouse's (C.) The Rajah Mooris, 8vo. 4/ swd.

Philology.

Motti's (P.) Method Gaspey-Otto-Sauer: Russian Conversation Grammar, cr. 8vo. 5/ cl. Key to ditto, cr. 8vo. 2/

Science.

Chambers's (G. F.) Handbook of Descriptive and Practical Astronomy: II. Instruments and Practical Astronomy, 21/ Thornton's (K.) Surgery of the Kidneys, being the Harveian Lectures for 1889, 8vo. 5/ cl.

General Literature.

Anstey's (F.) The Parish, Popular Edition, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.
Armstrong's (L.) The Blue Mountains, Fairy Tales, cr. 8vo. 5/ Biggs's (H.) A New Review of National Education, 12mo. 2/ Blackburn's (H.) Art in the Mountains, the Story of the Passion Play at Oberammergau, 8vo. 5/ cl.
Cobbe's (F. P.) The Friend of Man, cheap edition, cr. 8vo. 2/ Cunningham's (Sir H.) The Heriots, 3 vols. cr. 8vo. 31/6 cl.
Davis's (H.) For so Little, a Novel, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.
English's (H. G.) The Art of Riding, cr. 8vo. 10/6 cl.
Filippini's (A.) The Delmonico Cook-Book, 8vo. 12/ cl.
Frandon's (R. E.) King or Knave? 12mo. 2/ bds.
Frederick's (H.) The Lawton Girl, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.
Gift's (T.) Lil Lorimer, 12mo. 2/ bds.
Haggard's (Capt. A.) Ada Triscott, a Novel, 2 vols. cr. 8vo. 21/ Hall's (Mrs. W. D.) Eric Rotherham, Sequel to 'Marie', 6/ cl.
McCarthy (J.) and Campbell Praed's (Mrs.) The Rival Princess, 12mo. 2/6 cl.
Murray (D. O.) and Herman's (H.) Paul Jones's Alias, 6/ cl.
Nomad's A Railway Foundling, 3 vols. cr. 8vo. 31/6 cl.
Oldfield's (A.) Practical Manual of Typography and Reference Book for Printers, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
Pascoe's (C. E.) London of To-day, 1890, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
Salway's (R.) Wildwater Terrace, a Novel, 2 vols. 21/ cl.
Sheen's (A.) The Workhouse and its Medical Officer, 2/6 cl.
Storey's (W. W.) Conversations in a Studio, 2 vols. 12/6 cl.
Tales of the Sun, Folk-lore of Southern India, collected by Mrs. H. Kingscote and Pandit Natesa Sastri, cr. 8vo. 5/ Valling's (H.) The Quality of Mercy, 2 vols. cr. 8vo. 21/ cl.
Vigny's (A. de) Cinq Mars, or a Conspiracy under Louis XIII., trans. by Hazlitt, Etchings by Gaujean, 2 vols. 30/ Warden's (F.) A Woman's Fate, 12mo. 2/ bds.

FOREIGN.

Theology.

Delitzsch (F.) Messianische Weissagungen in Geschichtlicher Folge, 3m. 60.
Dusterwald (F.) Die Weltreiche u. das Gottesreich nach den Weissagungen d. Propheten Daniel, 2m. 50.
Schwane (J.) Dogmengeschichte der Neuere Zeit, 5m.

Fine Art and Archaeology.

Bosquet (É.) L'Art du Relieur, 12fr. 50.
Le Roux (H.) Les Fleurs à Paris, Eaux-Fortes de P. Avril, 10fr.

Geography and Travel.

Blancini (F.) Cartes Commerciales, Series 1, 24fr.
Humann (K.) u. Puchstein (O.) Reisen in Kleinasien u. Nordsyrien, 60m.

Science.

Rosenberger (F.) Die Geschichte der Physik, Div. 3, Part 2, 10m. 40.

General Literature.

Montépin (X. de) La Tireuse de Cartes, 6fr.
Samary (J.) Les Gaudinades de Charlotte, 4fr.

BEATRICE.

(SONNET FOR THE SIXTH CENTENARY OF BEATRICE'S DEATH, TO BE COMMEMORATED AT FLORENCE IN MAY.)

BREATHING through twice three hundred years an air

Of memory fresh as Morning's altar-spice,
Thou, Star of Dante—Star of Paradise,
Hast made the star of womanhood more fair;
For, though thou art now his lofty guardian there,
Victress o'er jealous Sin, who dared entice
His feet from thee,*—though now the high device

Of wisdom lights the wreath around thine hair,—
Those eyes can dim the angels' eyes above
Because they tell what flight was thine below:
No eagle-flight past peaks of fire and snow,
But through Life's leaves the flutter of a dove Whose beating wings soothed Dante's air with love—

Struck music from the wind of Dante's woe.

THEODORE WATTS.

* "Purg." c. xxx. See also Guido Cavalcanti's sonnet to Dante Alighieri, rebuking his way of life after the death of Beatrice.

MR. GLADSTONE'S MODEL LIBRARY.

It is certainly odd that the library of the Astronomical Society should hold only 9,000 volumes when according to Mr. Gladstone's calculation it should have capacity for 20,000. There is perhaps some peculiarity in the arrangement of the shelves which would account, in part at least, for the discrepancy. But that the space which Mr. Gladstone mentions—40 ft. long by 20 ft. broad and 9 ft. high—will hold 20,000 volumes (more rather than less) is beyond doubt. I find by actual count and measurement of my own books and shelves that 84 ft. of shelving, including uprights and the thickness of the shelves, will hold 1,000—or, to be precise, 970—volumes. Upon Mr. Cowper Ranyard's showing, Mr. Gladstone's model library would contain 204 ft. of shelving 9 ft. high—that is to say, 1,836 ft. in all. Instead, therefore, of accommodating only the 8,000 volumes which Mr. Cowper Ranyard calculates must be its utmost capacity, it would hold 22,000. Allowing space for one door and one fireplace, and for the projecting bays to be at right angles with the shelves built against the walls, there would still be space for 20,000 volumes—again more rather than less, since Mr. Gladstone would mask the ends of the projecting arms with short rows of shelves, from 12 in. to 18 in. long in each case, I should suppose. These end-shelves alone would hold from 800 to 1,000 small 8vo. and 12mo. volumes.

J. PENDEREL-BRODHURST.

KEMBLE AND MR. SEEBOHM: A CORRECTION.

March 27, 1890.

A SENTENCE in my article on landholding and land transfer, in Macmillan's Magazine for April, p. 419, has become unintelligible by the accidental misplacement of some words. In justice to my friend Mr. Seeböhm and myself, I hope you will allow me to give the sentence as it ought to be: "Mr. Seeböhm's divergence from Kemble [as to early English landholding] is not so much in any definite conclusion of fact, as applied to a given time, as in the general interpretation of the course and tendency of changes."

FREDERICK POLLOCK.

CHARGES OF FLAUNTERING.

Kingston-on-Thames, March 24, 1890.

It is just as well that my first letter had to be delayed by you, because it was written while I was in a violent passion. The notice which Mr. W. E. Henley caused to be printed had a certain lordly air which is scarcely justified by our respective positions in literature. I effaced myself long enough on his account, and, because he was a sufferer, I ran his literary errands quite cheerfully until the task struck me as being rather profitless and worse than thankless, so for many years I have minded my own business with signal success, and I will not put up with offensive airs from any such man. And now as to the ridiculously petty matter in question.

I put in two lines of my own after I received Mr. Henley's first draft of his song. Moreover, in the fourth line he wrote:—

A-sitting in my parlour and cuddling with my dear.

This was not quite like his usual daintiness, and I modestly suggested a little alteration even to that fragment; but I kept the old scrap of paper. Mr. Henley's usual reception of my suggestions in those days was more than flattering, and I can hardly bring myself to quote his most eloquent praises. At all events he wrote saying that I was "the prince of cuttists," and he held to that judgment even during the three years when he came to be under my editorship. If anything had to be touched in proof, he was quite ready to trust my hand, and, though I was not a blushing novice at that date, I liked the approval of so consummate a judge.

2. It seems to be suggested that I am so inferior a workman that it is sacrilegious to suppose that I could humbly aid such a craftsman as Mr. W. E. Henley. Now it happens that for some years he sent a fair copy of all his poems to me, and I possess at this moment a very large selection of his MSS. In the fashion of youth we exchanged arguments about this or that, and though I was most cruelly out-argued sometimes, yet my suggestions were often graciously adopted even when I was only eighteen years of age. In 1872 I received the 'Cycle of Songs' from which two of the poems in Mr. Henley's book are taken, and which I hawked about to half the publishers in London. As I was "too moral to live" in those times, I wanted some changes made in the beautiful 'Cycle.' The Master refused for a time, but I see he has kindly got rid of the very few and faint lines of a purely erotic nature. Up till 1877, when London was started, I saw, I think, about all of Mr. Henley's productions, but I have scarcely any in my possession dated 1876. You will see then that besides being permitted to help in the cooping of an abominable old bawdy ballad (which I know by heart), I was permitted to be the adviser of my Master as to many hundreds of poems, and I had the additional rapture of acting as business agent—though, Heaven knows, the sales were not extensive. Alas, no!

3. Perhaps when Mr. Henley ventured on the dangerous task of contradicting me, he did not know that I have not destroyed one fragment of his writing, as sent to me, since 1871. Letters are sacred things to me, but, if Mr. Henley would care to have photographs of more than two, I can easily choose a most interesting set for a select circle.

4. My memory is, so my friends say, rather good, and thus, until I was twenty-six or twenty-seven years old, I kept an accurate record of conversations in which Mr. Henley, Mr. Stevenson, and others took part. The talk seemed too good to be lost, and it serves me in the present instance.

5. Now as to the air of the ballad. It is very pleasant to find Mr. W. E. Henley contradicting me, of all others, about the tunes of sea-songs. In 1878 he had a tune for 'Home, dearie, Home,' and played it to me. I had the tune. Now Mr. Louis Stevenson said that Mr. W. E. Henley's version was "put up," whereupon Mr. Henley declared that Mr. Stevenson "knew nothing at all about the matter." But he took my version afterwards—at a very slow time.

6. The notion of my being unable to supply this gentleman with a poor shanty is too much. Why, I taught him 'Nancy Grey,' and he and his family called the tune simply "Jim"—not "Jim's tune"! I also taught him the air to 'Fifteen Men on the Dead Man's Chest,' which he, in turn, imparted in April, 1884, to Mr. Walter Pollock. Moreover, I explained to him that the "Dead Man's Chest" is a bare rectangular rock of about 1,200 square feet on the summit, and it lies by the Florida Keys. Mr. Stevenson's printers puzzle thousands by not printing capitals. Then I taught him 'Away down Rio,' and my record of his remark is that he said, "Some stunning old poet did that." I also taught him 'Billy Boy' in the old version, and 'The Lion Man-of-War,' and many others. The man forgets that we naval school boys used all the old shanties to sing as we walked round at nights, and I am a perfect mine of them. A mine which Mr. W. E. Henley freely worked, before he was indiscreet enough to call me a liar in a public print!

7. I heartily regret my own clumsiness in choosing Mr. Henley's song at all as a specimen. I meant him good, as I always have done, and I forgot that I was not my own editor. On the instant when I saw that the song was being butchered in a cheap book I wrote to Mr. Henley; received his hearty thanks; and that, I think, was not like carelessness on my part, when I might have let the obscure publication sell.

8. I do not give Mr. Henley the lie, which he was good enough to give me; I will say that he, perhaps, has not so accurate a record as I have.

I hold over two hundred of his letters, which are most interesting at present, and I have some other things which I may find still more useful on this point. For near six years I have kept away from Mr. Henley, but I never have ceased to press his great claims on the public when I had a chance.

During one spell of seclusion, when I saw no one, spoke to no one, read nothing but my own proof-sheets and my employers' letters, he was as dead to me; and, when I casually heard that he was dead, I had only a twinge for a little while, and relapsed into the old stupor during which—when it recurs—I seem to be consulting a brain far away from me, and I can ask the other brain questions about myself and be satisfied with the answers. My work went on like machinery, no one about me ever did anything but leave me alone, and I only knew that my old friend was gone; yet I never bothered about it. I believe that is the only time during ten years when I have not been eagerly curious about what he was doing. When I came out of doors again, and asked people what was going on, I found that Mr. Henley was at work, and had edited a book, and I took up the thread again. From that time I have gone on in the old way, and now it seems incredible that I should be having a sort of literary dispute with Mr. Henley. Personally I cannot put up with him, but that accident does not prevent me from saying that I can only express my opinion of his powers in superlatives. I think I may respectfully say, however, that gratitude is not, perhaps, one of his strongest points. Here I am wasting hard coins in talking about a song which either of us could imitate six times over in a day. I am at present selling a series for good money, and I could have done two pretty ones while I have been scrawling this—and all because a person to whom my best years were loyally devoted chooses to call me curdly, and brutally, and publicly a liar! If anything of the kind occurs again then good-day to conciliation, and let us have the bare knuckles, but do not let my time be fooled away by even the most pardonable, but inaccurate denials.

Now to Messrs. Longmans, for whose courtesy I am duly obliged.

1. I did write to a friend, whose name I do not want to drag in, because it vexes me to hurt his feelings, and I owe him so much kindness that I should have held my hand altogether, had I not thought that Mr. Haggard was growing past bearing with. Mr. Haggard's mistake was in not using the press. A jocular and offhand remark was not enough in such a case—especially when transmitted, as it were, fourth-hand. Mr. Knight is a man of station, wealth, and culture, and I am pleased to learn that Mr. Haggard did not mean to flip him off like an impudent schoolboy in a coltish mob.

2. Was any explanatory fly-leaf inserted in Longman's Magazine—the volume, I mean? I take that to be the first edition of 'Allan Quatermain.'

3. What is the good of allowing all future editions of the book to go out wanting even the microscopic fly-leaf?

4. It would never have struck me that Mr. Haggard was afraid of introducing strange things into fiction. One learns as one goes on.

5. Might I, as a mere common composer of essays and stories, advise Mr. Haggard to choose his phrases so that he may not appear to be making game of his equals—or even of his superiors?

6. Why does not Mr. Haggard tell us his reason for not mentioning the fact that he took a chapter from this humble person who writes? Had he sent a note to me—and very distinguished individuals do find time to address me on many matters—saying, "Dear Sir,—I perceive that you have much knowledge of the more squalid kinds of life at sea, and I want to write about emigrants in a new book of mine. May I use your article which appeared in the —"

on —?" then I should have said, "Go on, take the lot; and if I can help you in any way I shall be glad." But then Mr. Haggard chose to ignore my personal existence, and I will not endure that. And now I have squandered enough good guineas.

JAMES RUNCIMAN.

THE SPRING PUBLISHING SEASON.

MR. FISHER UNWIN will publish in the coming season the second volume of the 'Century Dictionary' (Conc—Fz.), — 'The Two Kinds of Truth,' by an Old Life Member of the British Association, — 'The Wider Hope,' essays by various writers on the future state, with a paper by De Quincey, — 'The Government Handbook, a Permanent Record of the Forms and Methods of Government' (being the new form of the 'Government Year-Book'), by Lewis Sergeant, — and 'Trials of a Country Parson,' by Dr. Jessopp, — in belles-lettres: 'The English Novel in the Time of Shakespeare,' by M. J. J. Jusserand, translated by Elizabeth Lee; and 'The Stream of Pleasure,' by Mr. and Mrs. Pennell, — in travels: 'Japan and the Pacific,' by Mr. Manjuro Inagaki; and 'Through Abyssinia, an Envoy's Visit to the King of Zion,' by Mr. Harrison Smith, R.N., — in biography: the new volumes of the 'Adventure Series,' viz., Robert Drury's 'Journal in Madagascar,' edited, with notes, by Capt. J. P. Oliver; 'The Memoirs of the Extraordinary Military Career of John Shipp,' with an introduction by Major Chichester; and 'Pellow's Adventures and Sufferings during his Twenty-three Years' Captivity in Morocco,' edited, with notes, by Dr. Robert Brown, — in history: the new volumes of the 'Nations' Series, viz., 'The Jews under the Romans,' by Rev. W. D. Morrison; and 'Scotland,' by Dr. John Mackintosh, — in natural history: 'Wild Nature won by Kindness,' by Mrs. Brightwen, Vice-President of the Selborne Society, — in fiction: 'A Marriage de Convenience,' a novel in two volumes, by Mr. C. F. Keary; 'Mumford Manor,' a novel, by Mr. J. Adamson; 'The Treasure Tower, a Story of Malta,' by V. W. Johnson; and 'The Old Hall among the Water-Meadows,' by Miss Mackenzie Kettle, — in poetry: the new volumes of the 'Cameo Series,' viz., 'Iphigenia in Delphi,' with translations from the Greek, by Dr. Garnett; 'Poems of Robert Surtees,' edited by Mr. Edward Peacock; and 'Miræio, a Provençal Poem,' by Frederic Mistral, translated by Miss H. W. Preston; also 'A Poetaster's Holiday,' by E. Ridsdale, and 'Song-Strays,' by Cyfaill, — in addition, the half-yearly volumes of the Century and St. Nicholas for April, 1890, will make their appearance.

THE RUTLAND CORRESPONDENCE.

49, Fitzwilliam Square, Dublin, St. Patrick's Day, 1890.
"It is surprising that the correspondence between Pitt and his first Lord Lieutenant should have been suffered to remain unpublished for more than a century," observes the writer of a most interesting notice of it in Saturday's Athenæum. The Irish Times regards the correspondence as quite a revelation, and in three recent leaders points to it as such. But these letters, as you are aware, have been known to the historian for the last fifty years, a few copies having been printed for private circulation under the supervision of Lord Mahon. So far back as 1842 the Quarterly Review (vol. lxx. p. 280 et seq.) published an exhaustive paper on this identical correspondence, with copious extracts, by, I think, the Right Hon. J. W. Croker, a thoroughly competent hand.

The reviewer in the Athenæum considers that this "correspondence" exhibits Pitt and Rutland as "staid and serious-minded statesmen," and more than once refers to the "discretion" shown by the latter. Rutland's reputation, however, was of an opposite sort. Dublin is full of traditions of his boyish wildness, and some highly piquant samples of that quality may be found in 'Curran and his Contemporaries,' by Charles Phillips. The Duchess of Rutland, his consort, as appears from the admirable history of Mr. Lecky (vol. vi. p. 371), "wrote to a lady friend in England expressing her anxiety about the incapacity of her husband, and that he wanted to resign." She knew him better than contemporary writers, whose estimate of his powers of statesmanship I forbear to cite.

Rutland's letters mainly deal with commercial restraints and protective duties, and I am strongly disposed to suspect that they were drafted for the light-hearted and volatile young Viceroy by his Chief Secretary, Mr. Orde, afterwards Lord Bolton—a name ignored by all biographical dictionaries. "Orde's propositions" as regards a commercial treaty between the two kingdoms are very familiar to every reader of Irish history. They occupy much space and attracted great attention at the time. Orde married the natural daughter of the Duke of Bolton, acquired his property, and died in 1807. Sir Jonah Barrington describes him as a "cold, cautious, and sententious man" ('Rise and Fall of the Irish Nation,' Paris edition, p. 319), and the letters in reply to Pitt are much more likely to be Orde's than Rutland's. For this idea, however, I am alone responsible. The present Duke—to whom letters are much indebted—is not to be blamed, as some of the reviewers convey, for suppressing certain replies of his ancestor to Pitt, for the Quarterly in 1842 notices (p. 294) the same omission.

WILLIAM J. FITZPATRICK.

* * The theory that the letters are by Orde is untenable. There is a letter from Rutland to Orde (pp. 153-58) so similar in style and tone to those addressed to Pitt that we should think it "much more likely" that he is the author of all the very few letters ascribed to him.

THE SOURCE OF 'THE ANCIENT MARINER.'

3, Kensington Palace Gardens, March 24, 1890.

THE communication from J. D. C. concerning the glosses to 'The Ancient Mariner' is full of interest. His proposed emendation of "driven" for "drawn," in the gloss "The ship drawn by a storm toward the south pole," can, however, I think, scarcely be justified. I have in my library Coleridge's copy of 'Sibylline Leaves' (1817), and although it contains various emendations of the text, evidently made in view of a future edition, "drawn" remains unaltered.

I am obliged to add that in a note referring to a subsequent stanza Coleridge complains of "the oversight or the self-opinion of the Printer, to whom the Author was indebted for various intended improvements in his Poems."

STUART M. SAMUEL.

THE SUPPOSED UNCIAL CODEX AT DAMASCUS.

IN the Athenæum of February 1st I gave an account of an uncial codex of the Bible and the Shepherd of Hermas which, according to the account of the Greek judge at Cyprus, M. Papadopoulos, was to be found in the Arabic library at Damascus. On account of the great interest attaching to it, I had determined presently to communicate further particulars. Meanwhile Dr. Neubauer printed in the Times of February 12th a letter from the Syrian Archbishop of Damascus, Mgr. David, which declared that no such MS. existed in the city. The inquiries which I was then instituting, unfortunately, led me to the same conclusion. Next I applied to M. Papadopoulos himself, and begged him to send me, if possible, details regarding the manuscript which he had described. From a letter he wrote me on the 15th (27th) of February I take the following extract:—

"In compliance with your wish I seize the opportunity to let you know that I inspected this manuscript many years ago at Damascus, when Midhat Pasha was Governor there. I recommended this codex to his care, and I spoke much to him about its importance. At the same period I made for myself the notices of it which I published in the Sotér. I am sorry that I cannot offhand furnish you with any further account in order to make you quite satisfied."

Soon after this I received a communication of the 13th (25th) of February from the Greek Patriarch of Antioch, Gerasimos, who himself resides in Damascus. His reply to the questions I addressed to him explained the whole matter satisfactorily. The library in question in which the valuable codex was supposed to be preserved, writes the learned Patriarch, is no other than that termed by the Arabs Melik-Iddader. Monseigneur Gerasimos had immediately after the publication of the article of M. Papadopoulos begun to take the necessary steps to get a sight of the treasure. He, however, received repeatedly from the librarian the dry assurance that there was no such codex in the library. A repeated examination of the catalogue of the library, now open to consultation—the defects of which in his time M. Papadopoulos explicitly mentions—and a close investigation of the manuscripts lying in the compartments by the learned representative of the Patriarch, have led to the same negative results. Even the most tempting offers of handsome reward have obtained no information from the librarian. He adheres firmly to the statement that since he has been there—and he has been a long time in the library—he has seen no such codex. What is one, then, to infer? Of mystification on the part of the first author of the report, M. Papadopoulos, there can be no idea. The trustworthiness of that gentleman is beyond all doubt. The only blame one can impute to him is that he should have imparted his discovery to Midhat Pasha instead of communicating with the Greek Patriarchate of Antioch, when decisive steps might have been taken for the preservation of the codex. All suspicions of the truth of the narrative of M. Papadopoulos being dismissed, there remain only two possible alternatives; and in this opinion I agree with the Patriarch Gerasimos. Either the manuscript has been destroyed by Turkish fanaticism, or the old custodian of the treasure of the library, informed of its value, sold it for sterling coin. I trust that the second conjecture may prove correct, for the precious codex will turn up again some time, if at present it lies concealed in the possession of Heaven knows who. But if it be destroyed the loss to science can hardly be too deeply mourned.

SEYR. P. LAMBROS.

THE PASTON MSS.

THE long-lost original MSS. presented by Fenn to George III. have turned up at last. We know on the authority of Fenn himself that they were presented in 1787; and in the preface to his third volume, dated "St. George's day, 1789," he says, "They are now in the Royal Library." But from that day forward, with the exception of a vague tradition that they were once seen by somebody in the hands of one of the ladies of the court, no one seems to have known what became of them; nothing whatever, in short, was known about them beyond the simple fact that they were no longer in the Royal Library, until, shortly after the death of the late Col. George Tomline, they were found in his library at Orwell Park. Fenn's introduction to the king, to whom, on the recommendation of Mr. Pitt, the volumes were permitted to be dedicated, was brought about by the intervention of his friend Dr. Pretyman, at that time Pitt's private secretary (afterwards better known as Tomline, Bishop of Lincoln, and subsequently of Winchester); and it is a singular coincidence that the MSS. in question should have come to light just one hundred years later in the possession of one of the bishop's grandsons.

Literary Gossip.

WE are glad to say that Lord Tennyson's health is improving day by day. Though still weak, he now drives out in the sunshine, and gets much good from the fresh air.

A MEMOIR of the Right Hon. Arthur MacMurrough Kavanagh, of Borris, is in preparation by his cousin Mrs. Steele, of Florence. The memoir will embody selections from his diaries of foreign travel as well as a record of his experiences as a landlord and member of Parliament.

MESSRS. WARD & DOWNEY will publish shortly a series of essays upon historical and antiquarian subjects, contributed to the various magazines, entitled 'Paper and Parchment,' by Mr. Ewald, of the Record Office.

LORD ACTON's extensive library is being prepared for sale by auction by Messrs. Puttick & Simpson. The library is entirely characteristic of its noble and learned collector, consisting chiefly of books of an erudite nature, nearly all in foreign languages. In the whole of this large collection there is hardly a book which even a ripe scholar could open without increasing his knowledge. The most interesting peculiarity of it is the almost exhaustive series of works on the topography and antiquities of foreign cities. English books are chiefly conspicuous by their absence, and, indeed, it appears that the collector was not a great patron of the English booksellers. We understand the first portion will be sold at the end of June or the beginning of July.

THE large collection of original papers, relating chiefly to the period of the Long Parliament, brought together by Dr. John Nalson in the reign of Charles II., some selections from which were published by him, was found by the Commissioners on Historical MSS. to be in the possession of the Duke of Portland. Mr. Blackburne Daniell has recently completed a lengthy report upon them, which will be printed among the proceedings of the Commission.

THE executive of the Honourable Artillery Company having recently represented to the Queen that every English sovereign or heir apparent since the reign of Charles I. had signed the Ancient Vellum Book (of which a notice appeared in the Athenæum for March 15th), Her Majesty expressed her willingness to sign the New Vellum Book, a sumptuous volume recently prepared for the signatures of royal and other distinguished personages belonging to the present century, and Lieut.-Col. Raikes, the well-known historian of the Company, attended with the two books at Windsor Castle last Friday week, when, by Her Majesty's request, the venerable record was detained at the Castle until Monday for fuller inspection.

THE Twelfth Report of the Historical Manuscripts Commission will be ready for issue shortly after Easter. It will contain summary accounts of various collections of private muniments visited by the Commissioners or their inspectors since the date of their preceding Report. Fuller details of each collection will appear in a series of appendix volumes. Besides the family papers at Belvoir, Hatfield, Melbourne Hall, and Rydal, which have already been noticed in these columns, will be described those of the Duke of Beaufort, Lady Donoughmore, Mr. J. H. Gurney, Mr. W. B. Hulton, Mr. Ketton of Felbrigg, the Earl of Home, and some collections in Ireland, as well as the cathedral archives of Ely, Gloucester, Lincoln, Peterborough, and Southwell.

MRS. ALEXANDER NAPIER has completed her edition of Johnson's 'Lives of the Poets,' which she took up on the death of her husband. She has followed the text of 1783, which Cunningham tampered with. Prof. Hales has contributed an introduction.

THE Rev. Edward Cookson, of Ipswich, has, we are pleased to hear, presented to the Harleian Society transcripts of the parish registers of St. Mary Key, Ipswich, 1559-1795, and of those of St. Mary Burstall, Suffolk, 1542-1836, with complete indices.

THE death is announced of Mr. W. S. Johnstone, formerly editor of the Evening Standard.

THE late Dr. Mackay left in manuscript some unpublished poems, which will form a posthumous work, to be published by Mr. George Allen, of Orpington and Bell Yard, London, probably during the month of May.

MR. SUTHERLAND EDWARDS is writing an historical work on Russia, 'The Romanoffs: Tears of Moscow and Emperors of Russia.' Mrs. Sutherland Edwards has finished a novel entitled 'The Secret of the Princess,' in which she has endeavoured to make use of her knowledge of Russian society, and to supply a truthful and not unfavourable picture of town and country life in Russia in the period immediately preceding the emancipation of the serfs. Mr. Joseph Hatton is also going to bring out a novel dealing with Russia, called 'By Order of the Czar.' Its particular theme is the persecution of the Jews; but Nihilistic conspiracies play a considerable part in the book.

THE publication of the Red Book of the Exchequer in the Rolls Series, which was undertaken by the late Mr. Walford Selby, and partly prepared by him, will be completed under the joint editorship of Mr. Hubert Hall, of the Public Record Office, and Mr. J. Horace Round.

A TESTIMONIAL is to be presented to Dr. Bullen on his retirement from the Museum by his friends among the general public. The secretaries are Mr. George Wright, F.S.A., of the Junior Athenæum Club, and Mr. B. F. Stevens, of Trafalgar Square.

MR. W. HEINEMANN will shortly issue 'Arabic Authors: a Manual of Arabian History and Literature,' by Mr. F. F. Arbuthnot, M.R.A.S., author of 'Early Ideas' and 'Persian Portraits.'

MESSRS. GRIFFITH & FARRAN propose to follow up their sixpenny reprint of the late Mr. W. H. G. Kingston's 'The Three Midshipmen' with an issue of 'Peter the Whaler' by the same author.

'THE MINER'S RIGHT,' the new story by Mr. Rolf Boldrewood, author of 'Robbery under Arms,' will be published by Messrs. Macmillan & Co. immediately after Easter.

THE Manchester Literary Club held its annual meeting on Monday last. The report is of a satisfactory character. During the session papers have been read on art, bibliography, history, poetry, the drama, and kindred subjects. The club now comprises 217 members.

THE Rev. W. E. Addis, formerly of the London Oratory, and now assistant of the Rev. Dr. Strong at Melbourne, has just published a sort of Apologia, describing the process by which he gradually came to relinquish his former beliefs. Its title is 'Six Lectures on the Miracles of the Bible.' The lectures treat the subject on the historic side.

PROF. ABEL, of Berlin, who is at present living at Wiesbaden, proposes to lecture at the forthcoming Oriental Congress in London on the affinity of the Indo-European and Egyptian languages and its etymological uses. Prof. Abel has, as our readers are aware, endeavoured to prove, in a series of monographs, that Egyptian and Indo-European roots are mainly identical, and subject to the same phonetic, conceptual, and formative changes. If the laws governing these changes and increments are more easily recognized in Egyptian, this, he thinks, is solely owing to the difference inevitably prevailing between a primitive and a highly developed stage of the same linguistic type. In Egyptian words have many phonetic variants with the same meaning equally attaching to all, while every one of them may include a separate cognate meaning as well—in the former case a comprehensive phonetic variability, in the latter a wide phonetic and conceptual fluctuation is freely displayed to the observer. In Indo-European, on the contrary, phonetic differentiation is, as a rule, employed to express conceptual variety, the words created in this wise being accordingly kept asunder by signification as well as sound, and admitting apparently of no reunion until subjected to the tests of Egyptian cognate etymology. On these general principles, amplified by copious special traits, Egyptian and Indo-European etymologies are shown to be mainly identical, the exploration of the younger branch being rendered dependent upon the comparative study of the older and more primitive idiom.

A MONUMENT in honour of Fritz Reuter is to be erected at his native place, Neubrandenburg.

THE Berlin Academy has now ready for publication another volume of the new 'Corpus Inscriptionum Græcarum,' which will continue, besides the inscriptions of Italy and Sicily, the Greek inscriptions found in Gaul, Germany, and Britain.

THE Italian Government has resolved to celebrate the fourth centenary of Columbus's discoveries by the publication of as complete a collection as possible of all documents and papers bearing upon the early history of America and its discoverer. A royal commission has been formed to carry out the scheme, and the Minister of Public Instruction is making inquiries of the custodians of the various public archives and libraries in Europe in order to ascertain what materials exist for such a work.

THE library of Mr. Lovell, late editor of the Liverpool Mercury, is to be sold in Liverpool in the middle of April. The catalogue has two unusual features: a portrait of Mr. Lovell and an éloge upon him by Mr. Hall Caine, reprinted from the Mercury.

THE chief Parliamentary Papers of the week are Further Correspondence respecting the Affairs of Bechuanaland and Adjacent Territories (2s. 10d.); Education (Scotland), Statement as to Relief of School Fees (1d.); List of School Districts in England and Wales, with the Standards fixed by the Bye-laws of each District (1s. 6d.); Naval and Military Organization, Report of Lord Hartington's Commission (1s. 3d.); Navy Estimates (4s. 5d.); and the following Trade Reports—Finances and Budget of Russia for 1890 (3d.); United States, Trade of Baltimore (2d.); Trade of New Orleans (2d.); Agriculture of New Orleans (1d.); Russia, Agriculture of the Consular District of Taganrog (1d.).

SCIENCE

A Naturalist among the Head-Hunters. By C. M. Woodford. (Philip & Son.)

MR. WOODFORD may be warmly congratulated on what we gather is his first literary venture. He has written in a pleasant and unaffected style a decidedly interesting account of a rarely visited country. He tells us that he has been asked to return and live permanently with the natives of Aola; if he can write another book like this about them he may go, but if not we must ask him to travel elsewhere and write us another book. He ventures to beg pardon "for any defects of style or expression on the score of literary inexperience." It is true they are to be found, as are some misprints which might have been avoided; but if a man is a tactful traveller, an excellent collector, a good story-teller, and modest withal, we think he is about as much as we can expect one man to be even in the best possible of worlds. We have too much to say about the charms of the book to be able to waste space with its few defects.

The first chapter is in a sense introductory, and gives a short history of the Solomon Islands, the inhabitants of which do not seem to be exactly angels. We have heard of many games in which there is a pool, but never till now did we know that "all the villages of the district will club together and make a pool of native money, shell-beads, armlets, necklaces of porpoise teeth, and other ornaments, which goes to the village that distinguishes itself most in the attack upon the first vessel that comes along."

Evening parties in these islands do not seem to leave any greater sense of pleasure behind them than do similar forms of entertainment in this country; they are noisier, however, than even undergraduates' "wines," if the performance which "took place just outside my house" may be taken as an example:—

"On one occasion the women sat in a ring on the ground, and, beginning about ten o'clock at night, emitted, at intervals of about a quarter of an hour, the most ear-piercing shrieks that it is possible to imagine; these lasted about two minutes, and then all was quiet again for another interval. The shrieking lasted until after daylight next morning, by which time most of the women had lost their voices."

In the third chapter an account of the zoology of the islands is given. Two very large rats were discovered, which have been called by Mr. Oldfield Thomas Mus imperator and M. rex; the former, which is larger than any known rat, is nearly two feet in length. Thirteen new species of birds were found, and Mr. Woodford thinks that the mountains of Bougainville, which are over 10,000 feet high, and have never yet been ascended, will yield a number of zoological prizes of various kinds. Dr. Guppy was the first to find the largest of known frogs, which has been named by Mr. Boulenger Rana guppyi; Mr. Woodford found some which weighed over two pounds and a half, and he observed that they fed on crabs and young rats. Mr. Salvin has related in the Proceedings of the Zoological Society the discovery of the male of the large and beautiful butterfly Ornithoptera victoria, and of an allied species, O. regina. Mr. Woodford tells us that when he first saw an ornithoptera he, with the sun in his eyes, mistook it for a pigeon coming towards him; this will give some idea of the size of these magnificent insects. When Mr. Woodford's collections of insects and spiders are worked out they will be found, it seems likely, to contain a large number of new and interesting forms, and it is to be hoped it will not be long before this is done.

In the fourth chapter we have an account of a typical day's collecting. It is one of the most interesting accounts of the kind which we have ever read, but we must content ourselves with a single extract from it:

"The sago palm bears fruit but once. Its load of nuts is its final effort; it has fulfilled its allotted task in the great round of nature, and there remains nothing for it but to die. The nuts become ripe, and are strewn in thousands around the tree, until the fruit-stalk stands up by itself empty and bare. The great branches turn brown and drop one by one to the ground. Inside the trunk the work of decay is going on, until what at one time was a mass of white sago and pith becomes nothing but a collection of rotten brown fibres. One day the tradewind blows perhaps stronger than usual, and the leafless column of the trunk falls with a crash, destroying in its fall many of the young palms that are already springing from the nuts scattered some months before."

The observations on the animals other than man that are found in these islands are naturally more pleasant reading than the accounts of the "head-hunters." The habit to which the name refers appears to be a perfect passion, but as there are more shocking stories told in a recently published Blue-book about the habits of some of our fellow subjects nearer home, there is no need to moralize on the offences of the Solomon Islanders.

Mr. Woodford thinks that Pope would not have written as he did about the "poor Indian" had he ever been in the islands which form our author's text: "My own experience of the natives has been that, in all that appertains to driving a bargain, what they do not know is not worth knowing"; he seems, nevertheless, to have managed to make friends with most of them, and to have been at times of service. He has given a lifelike picture of their feelings, habits, and superstitions, and we trust that the public may again have from his pen a book which can be as unreservedly recommended as this interesting little book, which, index and all, is only 250 pages long. One word in conclusion in praise of the illustrations, reproduced from photographs taken on the spot.

ASTRONOMICAL NOTES.

The planet Venus sets now more than half an hour after the sun, and will for some time be a brilliant object in the evening for a longer and longer interval after sunset. At the end of next month she and Mercury will be very near together, a short distance to the south of the Pleiades. Mars, in the eastern part of Scorpio, will rise during April between 9 and 10 o'clock in the evening, whilst Jupiter, which is in Capricornus, does not yet rise until after midnight. Saturn, in Leo, continues to attract attention by his close proximity to Regulus, the brightest star in that constellation; he will be on the meridian about 9 o'clock in the evening on the 6th prox., and about 8 o'clock on the 21st.

Mr. Ellery has published the Second Melbourne General Catalogue of Stars, which embodies the results of observations made with the old transit circle from the beginning of the year 1871 to the end of August, 1884, when the old instrument was superseded by the new, which has an aperture of eight inches and a focal length of nine feet. The present catalogue contains the places of 1,211 stars, reduced to the epoch January 1st, 1880.

At the request of Prof. Luther, his son, Dr. W. Luther, of Hamburg, selected the name Glauke for the small planet No. 288, which was discovered by him at Düsseldorf on the 20th ult. Two more small planets (each of the thirteenth magnitude) have since been discovered: No. 289, by M. Charlois at Nice on the 10th inst.; and No. 290, by Dr. J. Palisa at Vienna on the 20th.

A new comet (α , 1890) was discovered by Mr. Brooks at Cambridge, U.S., on the morning of the 22nd inst. It was at the time in the constellation Equuleus, moving in a north-easterly direction towards Pegasus.

GEOGRAPHICAL NOTES.

M. GABRIEL MARCEL publishes in the Revue de Géographie an interesting old Portuguese map, the original of which exists in the Bibliothèque Nationale, with an accompanying article, in which the great extent of Portuguese explorations in the past is insisted upon. The map, however, far from proving that the Portuguese, at the time it was compiled, had extended their "établissements" into Mashonaland, shows very conclusively that their knowledge of the country, even near the coast, was very superficial.

The Scottish Geographical Magazine publishes an account of a trip 'Around and about Armenia,' by Col. Mark S. Bell, which is well worth reading, especially by students of political geography. Col. Bell thinks meanly of the Armenians, "a race perhaps possessed of no very excellent or noble qualities." In common with all Asiatics they "lie from childhood," and "their religion exercises no moral restraint over them." The author has a good deal to say about the prospects of a war with Russia in that part of the Turkish empire, and seems to think that there is but little prospect of a successful issue for Turkey unless the Turkish troops are led by British officers and fed and clothed by the British taxpayer. The other papers in the same periodical are by the Hon. John Abercromby, on the wall of Derbend, and by Dr. H. J. Johnston-Lavis, on the state of the active Sicilian volcanoes in September last.

Dr. Rohrbach publishes in the Mitteilungen an elaborate paper on 'Mittlere Grenzabstände,' that is, on the mean geographical distances from the seaboard, in as far as they illustrate the accessibility of various countries or continents. He thus finds that the average distance which an inhabitant of any part of Europe has to travel in order to reach the sea amounts to 209 English miles. These distances, in the case of the other continents, are as follows:—Australia, 214 miles; North America, 274; South America, 344; Africa, 417; Asia, 482.

Both the Bremen Geographische Blätter and Petermann's Mitteilungen publish full reports on Dr. Kükenthal's recent expedition to Spitzbergen, which led to a fuller examination of King Charles or Wyche's Land than had previously been accomplished. The maps accompanying these reports are identical, but the Blätter supply in addition a couple of chromo-lithographs and a paper on the geographical distribution of animal life in the East Spitzbergen Sea, by Dr. A. Walter. The results of this expedition are creditable to the Bremen Geographical Society, which fitted it out, and they prove once more that, given able observers, much useful work may be done at a very moderate expenditure of time and money.

SOCIETIES.

ROYAL.—March 20.—The President in the chair.—The Bakerian Lecture, 'On the Discharge of Electricity through Gases,' was delivered by Prof. A. Schuster.

ASTRONOMICAL.—March 14.—General Tennant, President, in the chair.—Prof. J. E. Keeler and the Rev. S. R. Craig were elected Fellows.—Dr. E. J. Spitta read a paper on some experiments relating to the method of obtaining the co-efficient of absorption of the wedge photometer. He believes that the co-efficient of absorption has not hitherto been correctly determined, owing to the method of evaluating the absorption of different thicknesses by comparison with a polarizing photometer.—A paper by Prof. E. C. Pickering was read 'On a New Class of Binary Stars.' During the past two years he has obtained more than seventy photographs of the spectrum of ζ Ursæ Majoris. On comparing these photographs it was found that the K line appeared double at intervals of fifty-two days, beginning from the 27th of March, 1887. For several days before and after the dates when the line appears double, it presents a very hazy appearance. The other lines of the spectrum are seen with difficulty when K is hazy and double; but several of them are certainly doubled when K is double. The only satisfactory explanation of this phenomenon is that the brighter component of the star must be a double star having components nearly equal in brightness and too close to have been separated yet visually, and that when one component is approaching the earth, the lines in its spectrum are moved towards the blue, while all the lines in the spectrum of the other component will be moved in the opposite direction. When the motion of the components becomes perpendicular to the line of sight the lines recover their true wave length and become single. From measurements of the plates Prof. Pickering deduces a velocity of about one hundred miles a second towards and away from the earth when the lines are most doubled. This would give, if the orbit is circular and its plane passes through the earth, about 900,000,000 miles for the space travelled by the components in fifty-two days, which would give a distance apart for the two components of 143,000,000 miles, about equal to that of Mars from the sun, and the combined mass of the two components would be about forty times that of the sun. Since the discovery with regard to the spectrum of ζ Ursæ Majoris Prof. Pickering finds that the lines in the spectrum of β Aurigæ are also doubled at intervals of about four days, and the relative velocity of the two components is in this case 150 miles per second.—Mr. I. Roberts read a paper 'On the Suspected Variability during Short Periods of certain Stars in Orion.' He has taken two photographs of the Orion nebula, one with two hours' exposure on the 29th of January, and the other with two and a half hours' exposure on the 3rd of February. The plate was slightly shifted between the exposures, so that the images of all the stars are shown as double on the plate, and in the case of ten of them he detects a decided change in brightness.—The following papers were announced or taken as read: 'On some Celestial Photographs taken with a Large Portrait Lens at the Lick Observatory,' by Mr. E. E. Barnard, 'Coronæ Australis,' by Mr. E. B. Powell, 'On the Proper Motion of Groombridge, 1830,' by Mr. W. T. Lynn, 'Observations of the Variable Star S (10) Sagittæ,' by Mr. J. E. Gore, 'Observations of Comet α , 1888 (Barnard, September 2nd), taken at the Sydney Observatory, 'On a Method of obtaining the Error of a Chronometer by Equal Altitudes of Two Stars on Opposite Sides of the Meridian,' by Commander A. M. Field, 'Notes on a New Theory of Short-Period Variables of the Type δ Cephei,' by Mr. G. F. Hardy, 'A Simple Method of obtaining an Approximate Solution of Kepler's Equation,' and 'On the Parallax of Double Stars,' by M. A. A. Rambaut, 'Observations of the Phenomena of Jupiter's Satellites at Windsor, New South Wales, in the Year 1889,' by Mr. J. Tebbutt, 'Photograph of the Clusters 33 and 34 Herschel VI. Persei,' by Mr. I. Roberts, 'Further Note, with Correction, on the Spectrum of the Sun-spot of June, 1889, by the Rev. A. L. Cortie, 'Ephemeris for Physical Observations of Jupiter, 1890,' by Mr. A. Marth, and 'Observations of the Moon made at the Radcliffe Observatory, Oxford, during 1889, and a Comparison of the Results with the Tabular Places from Hansen's Lunar Tables,' by Mr. E. J. Stone.

GEOGRAPHICAL.—March 24.—Rt. Hon. Sir M. E. Grant Duff, President, in the chair.—The following gentlemen were elected Fellows: Rt. Hon. Lord Kinnaird, Major N. Powlett, Capt. T. H. Butterworth, Messrs. W. D. Coggeshall, G. M. E. Jones, W. H. Maw, B. Ninnis, and W. D. Pitcairn.—The paper read was 'North American Trans-Continental Pathways, Old and New,' by Mr. A. A. Hayes.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.—March 20.—Dr. J. Evans, President, in the chair.—Mr. E. Willett exhibited a fine and perfect example of a Roman mortarium dredged up by a trawler twenty miles south-east of the Kentish Knock light-ship, or forty miles due east of the North Foreland, in about twelve fathoms of water. The rim is stamped GATISIVS GRATVS.—Mr. Willis-Bund exhibited a handsome wrought-iron coffer of early sixteenth century date, with a modern brass seal inside, formerly belonging to the Abbey of Fécamp.—Mr. Money exhibited a number of Saxon and other antiquities found in Berks.—Mr. MacMichael exhibited portion of a large Roman balance of bronze, lately found in the City of London.—Mr. H. Price read a paper describing some excavations made by him on the Saalburg last autumn.—The President announced that, in accordance with the resolution passed by the Society at their ordinary meeting of February 27th, with regard to the resumption of the systematic excavation of Silchester, the Council had appointed an executive committee to carry on the work, and it was proposed to form a general committee for the collection of the necessary funds. The Council had also granted 50*l.*, half from the Society's funds, half from the Research Fund, towards the excavations, and, in addition, another 50*l.* had already been promised. Besides these contributions the Treasurer had most generously undertaken to excavate an entire square, or insula, of the city at his own cost.—The Council of the Society of Antiquaries has passed the following resolution, in addition to communicating with the Prime Minister on the subject: "That the Council hears with much regret of the injuries that have been inflicted upon ancient monuments in Egypt, and heartily sympathizes with the Society for the Preservation of Monuments in Egypt. It further requests the President to memorialize the Foreign Office, in the name of the Council, upon the subject, with the view of a friendly remonstrance being addressed to the Egyptian Government."

NUMISMATIC.—March 20.—Dr. J. Evans, President, in the chair.—Messrs. C. S. Jefferies and C. G. Thomas were elected Members.—Mr. Webster exhibited a rare bronze coin of Maus or Moas, King of the Sakas or Sace Scythians, who ruled in the Panjab about B.C. 120–100. On the obverse of the coin is an elephant's head with trunk raised, and on the reverse a caduceus and the inscription ΒΑΣΙΛΕΥΣ ΜΑΥΟΥ.—Dr. Evans exhibited twelve varieties of the silver money of the Emperor Carausius from his own cabinet.—Mr. Montagu exhibited the silver penny of Matilda of the Oxford mint, from the Nottingham hoard (Hawkins, third edition, p. 186). He remarked that this coin was the more interesting from the fact that Matilda resided at Oxford for a time in 1141. Mr. Montagu also exhibited eight half-crowns of the Tower mint of Charles I., with the plume over the shield on the reverse, and with the following mint-marks: castle, negro's head, rose, harp, lis, crown (two varieties), and tun, the last three being unpublished. He also stated that similar half-crowns were known to him with the following mint-marks: cross on steps, portcullis, and bell; and that half-crowns of this type were coined from silver obtained from the Welsh mines.—Mr. L. A. Lawrence exhibited two hitherto undescribed slight varieties of the noble of Edward III., and three varieties of the groat and one of the half-groat of the same king.—Rev. Canon Greenwell communicated three papers, 'On a Find of Archaic Greek Coins in Egypt,' 'On a Find of Archaic Greek Coins of the Islands of the Ægean Sea,' and 'On Rare Greek Coins,' in his own cabinet.—Dr. B. V. Head exhibited casts of the coins referred to in Canon Greenwell's papers, and made some remarks on the more important specimens.

LINNEAN.—March 20.—Mr. W. Carruthers, President, in the chair.—Mr. G. F. Scott Elliott was admitted and Mr. H. E. Milner elected a Fellow.—Prof. P. M. Duncan exhibited several specimens of Desmophyllum cristagalli, obtained from an electric cable at a depth of 550 fathoms. Though showing great variation in the shape and nature of the wall, the specific characters of the septa were maintained. The core, extending as a thin lamina far beyond the peduncle, had no connexion with the septa. A section of Caryophyllia clavus showed theca between the septa, and a section of Lophohelia prolifer exhibited a true theca extending beyond the septa.—Mr. E. B. Poulton exhibited some lepidopterous larvæ showing the variation in colour induced by natural surroundings, and some lizards in spirit from the West Indies showing the pineal eye very distinctly. In continuation of a former paper on the external morphology of the lepidopterous pupa, Mr. Poulton gave a detailed and interesting account of the sexual differences observed in the development of the antennæ and wings.—Prof. G. B. Howes read a paper on the intestinal canal of the Ichthyopsida, with especial reference to its arterial supply. He described certain arteries hitherto unrecorded, and some variations he had found in them in the frog and salamander. The artery known in the Elasmobranchii as the inferior mesenteric was shown to belong to the superior mesenteric series. Discussing the morphology of the intestines and its derivatives, the author defined the large intestine of the Pisces more precisely than had hitherto been done, and showed that the appendix digitiformis of the elasmobranchs must be regarded as homologous with the appendix vermiformis of mammals, and that a short cæcum coli is present, at any rate, in the Batoidæ. The anatomical relationships of the appendix digitiformis were described in certain elasmobranchs for the first time, and some notes were added upon the cæcum and large intestine among teleosts.—An interesting paper was then read by Mr. R. A. Grimshaw, 'On Heredity and Sex in the Honey-Bee.'

ZOOLOGICAL.—March 18.—Prof. W. H. Flower, President, in the chair.—The Secretary exhibited (on behalf of the Rev. G. H. R. Fisk) a specimen of a white bat, obtained at Somerset West, near Cape Town, believed to be an albino variety of Vesperugo capensis; and Capt. P. Armitage two heads of the Panolia deer (Cervus eldi), obtained on the Sittang river, Burmah. One of these was of an abnormal form.—Mr. Selater exhibited (on behalf of Mr. R. B. White) examples of four species of mammals obtained in the Upper Magdalena Valley, in the department of Tolima, U.S. of Colombia.—Dr. Mivart read a paper on the South American Canidae. The author called attention to the difficulties in the way of the correct discrimination of these animals, and to what appeared to him to be the unsatisfactory character of some of Burmeister's determinations and descriptions. Forms to which the names fulvipes, griseus, patagonicus, enterianus, gracilis, velulus, and fulvicaudus had been assigned were declared to be quite insufficiently discriminated from Canis azara. On the other hand, two very marked varieties, or possibly species, were noted and distinguished under the appellations Canis pavidens and Canis uroctictus, the type of each of which was in the British Museum, both the skin and the skull extracted from it in each case.—Mr. R. I. Pocock read a revision of the genera of scorpions of the family Buthidae, and gave descriptions of some new South African species of this family.—And Mr. F. E. Bedard described some points in the anatomy of the condor (Sarcophagus gryphus).—A communication was read from Prof. R. Collett containing the description of a new monkey from North-East Sumatra, proposed to be called Semnopithecus thomasi.

METEOROLOGICAL.—March 19.—Mr. H. F. Blanford, V.P., in the chair.—Capt. G. A. Chaddock, Capt. H. E. Rawson, Dr. A. E. Garrod, Messrs. D. Balfour, W. Belk, W. S. Crimp, and G. Fellows were elected Fellows.—The following papers were read: 'A Brief Notice respecting Photography in Relation to Meteorological Work,' by Mr. G. M. Whipple. The first person to use photography for obtaining meteorological records was Mr. T. B. Jordan, of Falmouth, in 1838. Some years later Sir F. Ronalds and Mr. C. Brooke devised more elaborate apparatus, and the arrangement of the former being now in use at the observatories of the Meteorological Office, and that of the latter at Greenwich. Reference was also made to Mr. J. B. Jordan's form of sunshine recorder, and to Capt. Abney's photo-nephograph. The various photographic processes which have been employed in connexion with these instruments were fully described.—Application of Photography to Meteorological Phenomena, by Mr. W. Marriott. The author showed how photography could be most usefully employed for the advancement of meteorological knowledge.—After the reading of these papers the meeting was adjourned, to allow the Fellows to inspect the exhibition of instruments, &c., illustrating the application of photography to meteorology. Specimens or drawings of nearly every photographic meteorological instrument and records from the same were shown, and a collection of photographs of clouds and other meteorological phenomena. The photographs of clouds taken by M. P. Garnier, of Boulogne-sur-Seine, were exceptionally fine. A number of new meteorological instruments were also shown, as well as an ingenious working model devised by Mr. A. W. Claydon for showing the connexion between the monsoons and the currents of the Arabian Sea and the Bay of Bengal.

PHILOLOGICAL.—March 21.—Rev. Prof. Skeat in the chair.—Prince L. L. Bonaparte's paper 'On Albanian, Modern Greek, Gallo-Italic, Provençal, and Illyrian still in use (1889) as Linguistic Islands in the Neapolitan and Sicilian Provinces of Italy,' was, in his absence through indisposition, read by Mr. A. J. Ellis. Albanian, introduced in the fifteenth century, existed in 55 places, all specified, and illustrated by maps, a vocabulary of 199 words and examples. Modern Greek (which was not a descendant of the ancient Greek of Southern Italy, but a recent importation, and much Italianized) existed in 26 places, specified. Gallo-Italic, from the Waldensian Piedmontese, is found in 7 places, Provençal in 2, and Illyrian in 3, all specified. This paper is the result of two recent visits to Italy.—Mr. Ellis subsequently gave an account of Mr. Horatio Hale's researches on the Chinook jargon or Oregon trade language.

INSTITUTION OF CIVIL ENGINEERS.—March 18.—Sir J. Coode, President, in the chair.—The paper read was 'On the Lough Erne Drainage,' by Mr. J. Price, jun.

HISTORICAL.—March 20.—Mr. O. Browning in the chair.—Mr. A. R. Ropes read a paper 'On Frederick the Great's Invasion of Saxony and the Prussian Mémoire Raisonné, 1756.'—A discussion followed in which Messrs. H. Haines and H. E. Malden and the Chairman took part.

NEW SHAKESPEARE.—March 14.—Dr. F. J. Furnivall in the chair.—Mrs. C. Steeles read a paper 'On Shakespeare's Treatment of his Originals.' Shakespeare wrote his plays under at least four laws or limitations, considering (1) their effect on the public (and the censor), (2) their relation to the acting powers of his own company, (3) the materials to hand, and (4) the satisfaction of his own feeling and critical judgment; with sometimes a fifth, a "second intention," as explained by Spenser in the opening of the 'Faery Queene.' There are evident traces of some such representation of contemporary men in Shakespeare's plays on ancient stories. 1. Shakespeare had to labour against the sensationalism of his age, by showing interest in character as well as plot—only once, in 'Titus Andronicus,' following the pre-Shakespearean taste. 2. The acting powers of his company must have varied much from time to time, and a history of the actors might aid in fixing the date of a play; we know that successive editions of 'Hamlet' age the hero according to Burbage's age. 3. In his histories Shakespeare kept as faithfully as he could to his authorities, and never willingly misled his hearers; as an artist, however, frequent foreshortening of time was necessary. In his Roman histories his respect for classical authorities made his renderings very faithful. In other plays this fidelity was less marked. While the 'Merchant of Venice' showed complexity of origin and commingling of material, 'Romeo and Juliet' was simple in origin and faithful to the story. In 'Hamlet' Shakespeare had revolutionized the heathen story with the revolution in faith and manners consequent on Christianity. The real Hamlet had the bravery, revenge, patience, and cunning of the savage. Shakespeare's Hamlet was written up to date, and was a Christian, scholar, and philosopher. Shakespeare has robbed Macbeth of the Christianity he gave to Hamlet. As if the real Macbeth had not been sufficiently wronged by the historian, Shakespeare proceeds to give the historic Macbeth all the vices of all the sovereigns for eighty years before his time. It was as if he had created one of Galton's generic photographs, by superposing one photograph on another, to give the type-idea he had gathered from the chaotic seething of a troublous age.

PHYSICAL.—March 21.—Prof. W. E. Ayrton, President, in the chair.—Mr. A. E. Childs was elected a Member.—The following communications were read: 'The Villari Critical Points in Nickel and Iron,' by Mr. H. Tomlinson, 'On Bertrand's Idiocyclophanous Prism,' by Prof. S. P. Thompson, and 'On the Shape of Movable Coils used in Electrical Measuring Instruments,' by Mr. T. Mather.

ARISTOTELIAN.—March 17.—Mr. S. H. Hodgson, President, in the chair.—A symposium on the subject 'The Relation of the Fine Arts to One Another' was contributed to by Messrs. B. Bosanquet, E. W. Cook, and D. G. Ritchie.—A general discussion followed.

MEETINGS FOR THE ENSUING WEEK.

- MON. London Institution, 5.—The Phonograph, Col. Gouraud.
 — Institute of British Architects, 7½ and 8.—Special General Meeting.
 — Aristotelian, 8.—The Philosophy of Herbert of Cherbury, Mr. H. W. Hunt.
 — Society of Arts, 8.—Some Considerations concerning Colour and Colouring, Lecture III, Prof. A. H. Church (Cantor Lecture).
 TUES. Zoological, 8½.—Further Remarks on the Fauna of the Solomon Islands, Mr. C. M. Woodford. Contributions to the Study of Holoderna suspecta, Dr. R. W. Shufeldt. Description of a New Species of Deep-sea Fish from the Cape (Lophotes fishii), Dr. A. Günther.
 WED. Entomological, 7.—Classification of the Pyralidina of the European Fauna, Mr. E. Meyrick. Catalogue of the Pyralidina of Sikkim, collected by the late Otto Müller and Mr. H. J. Elwes, Nynheer P. C. T. Snellen. Notes on certain Species of Cetoalidina of the Section Goliathidina, Prof. J. O. Westwood.
 — Cymrodorion, 8.—Welsh Place-Names, Prof. J. E. Lloyd.
 — British Archaeological Association, 8.—Reminiscences of a Visit to Ephesus and Smyrna, Rev. H. Cart. Gokewell. Ynnyon, Llanymyneir, Mr. E. Peacock. Discoveries at Llanegwilly, Mr. B. Peters.
 — Shortland, 8.—T. T. Clarkson's Shortland, Mr. A. Jones.
 THURS. Linnæan, 8.—Morphology of the Gallinæ, Prof. W. K. Parker.
 — Chemical, 8.—Note on the Hydr-sulphides, Mr. H. Picton.
 — Mathematical, 8.—Some Groups of Circles connected with Three Given Circles, Mr. R. Lachlan.

Science Gossip.

THE first volume of an historical work on the theory of determinants by Dr. Thomas Muir, of Glasgow, will be published in a few days by Messrs. Macmillan & Co. It deals with general determinants, and gives an account of all the writings on the subject prior to the appearance of Cayley's first paper in 1841.

MR. H. A. MIERS, of the Natural History Museum, is engaged upon 'A Text-Book of Mineralogy,' which will be published by Messrs. Macmillan & Co. The work will be illustrated.

IN the Zoologist for 1884 a supplement to 'Thompson's Natural History of Ireland' was announced, and contributions of information were invited. Since that time a considerable amount of material has been accumulated, but, as the largest part of it relates to birds alone, it has been thought desirable, instead of embracing the whole ground covered by Thompson's work, to publish separately the information acquired relating to the ornithology of Ireland. Before this is put into its final shape persons who are able to supply notes on Irish birds are requested kindly to furnish any additional information that they can to Mr. R. J. Usher, Cappagh, Lismore. The book will be issued by Messrs. Gurney & Jackson.

ON Saturday last the Geologists' Association visited the Starfish Gallery of the Natural History Museum, when an explanation of its contents was given by Prof. Jeffrey Bell.

THE Geologists' Association intend to make an Easter excursion to North Staffordshire, beginning on Thursday next.

THE Mineralogical Society of St. Petersburg is to hold a fête on May 7th/19th of the current year, in celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the presidency of H.I.H. the Duke of Leuchtenberg, when an "adresse de félicitation" will be presented to His Imperial Highness, and a banquet will terminate the proceedings.

FINE ARTS

THE TUDOR EXHIBITION, NEW GALLERY.
 (Fourth Notice.—The Holbeins concluded.)

IT seems to us that whoever painted No. 101 (a question which we shall discuss in our concluding article) likewise painted Queen Catherine Parr (106), which is ridiculously ascribed to Holbein. So far as the face goes, it is an able and beautiful picture, but the hands show it is no Holbein. Walpole affirmed that the Earl of Denbigh had a portrait of Katherine Parr, and this picture from Newnham Paddox is No. 168 on the other side of the gallery here. It is evidently a version of No. 106, and in some respects is superior to it. J. G. Nichols accepted this portrait as a veritable likeness of Katherine Parr, as Walpole likewise had done. No. 106 and No. 168 may represent Katherine Parr before her marriage to Henry, the pictures containing no sign of royalty and depicting a younger lady than the queen. No. 106 looks like a "flattering" likeness of the Princess Mary when she was young. It has her firm eyes, which are beautifully rendered, and the thin, set lips, and that erect carriage and dignified mien which characterize all her portraits. But we must not forget that the old portrait-painters never "flattered." A figure thus attired must have been splendid in life. Her bright and pure carnations, red lips, intelligent eyes, and "candid brow," shine, so to say, within the frame of dark warm brown hair and her comely coif; her dress of white is brocaded with shining silver and lined with ermine; her red petticoat and large sleeves of the same material are stiffened with embroidery. In her girdle, which is characteristic of the period, are antique cameos. She holds a pink in her baby-like fingers, and her ample sleeves are slashed, while puffs of white cambric have been "pulled through" and enriched with fine English needlework of an elaborate pattern in vermilion. This charming picture is perishing for want of care. Lord Denbigh's (168) is in a better condition; but neither should be entrusted to incompetent restorers.

LORD DILLON's William Warham, Archbishop of Canterbury (107), is an inferior version of the fine Holbein at Lambeth, and not nearly equal to that in the Louvre. The reddish and thick complexion, opaque skin, harsh, hard, and dry handling, and dull surface go to show that Lord Dillon's picture was probably painted in Holbein's shop by an assistant about as clever as he who produced the version (41), of which we have written before, of the Queen's Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolk (91), with brushes heavily loaded with opaque pigments and used with no sympathy for his master's technique. We assume all the three pictures were done in Holbein's shop because the croziers, mitres, and cushions delineated in real gold are undoubtedly by one and the same hand. The Queen's Erasmus (112) is either a Holbein or a supremely fine ancient version of one, painted before the master came to this country, but now much darkened and befouled with varnish, most of which ought to be taken off. An exquisite study of character, displaying at once Erasmus's timidity and his slightly sardonic yet gentle sense of humour and the thorough concentration of the student, it is—though so small and unpretentious that few of the passing crowd notice it—a gem of the first water, and, apart from the varnish, in excellent preservation, although it was painted more than three hundred and sixty years ago. The expression of the head, the attitude of the figure, and the manner in which the eyes are directed indicate that the sight of the great Humanist had begun seriously to fail. It is probably one of the two portraits—let men of letters take note of this—which Frobenius himself, for whom they were both painted, gave to Erasmus at Basle, the companion being Frobenius's own portrait. They are respectively Nos. 597 and 603 at Hampton Court, where there is another "Erasmus" in the act of writing, numbered 594, and alleged to be a copy by C. Vischer of a Q. Matsys (?), of which there is a variant in the Louvre and one at Longford Castle which belonged to Dr. Mead. The last is said to have been the original Matsys painted for Sir T. More. After the death of Frobenius Erasmus is supposed to have retained these pictures till his own death in 1536. Le Blond, the Duke of Buckingham's agent, bought them for 100 gold ducats for his employer, about 1625; the duke gave them to Charles I., in whose catalogue by Vander Doort, 1639, they are mentioned as "No. 43. Done by Holbein. Item. The picture of Frobenius, with his printing tools by him; being Erasmus of Rotterdam's printer and landlord at Basil; in a black frame," and "No. 49. Done by Holbein. Item. The picture of Erasmus of Rotterdam, in a high black frame; done by Holbein, fellow to the aforsaid piece of Frobenius, painted upon the right light," i.e., the light comes from the right of the figure. The portraits were valued at King Charles's sale at 200l. "Erasmus" was sold, May 24th, 1650, to Mr. Milburne for 100l. Col. Hutchinson bought "Frobenius," and both were returned to the Royal Collection at the Restoration. Patin in 1672 saw them hinged together, as formerly. See Mr. E. Law's Catalogue of Hampton Court Pictures, 1881, p. 203. The Duke of Buckingham had, according to Brian Fairfax's catalogue, "The Picture of Erasmus. 1 f. 0. 1 f. 0," by Holbein, sold at Antwerp, and now probably at Vienna. Erasmus had (as above stated) his Holbeins hinged together as a diptych; on the back of the Frobenius is: "This picture of Frobenius was delivered to his M^y by y^e Duke of Buckingham before [he went to the] Isle of Ree." The architectural background of "Erasmus" (112) is supposed to have been painted by Steenwyck before the duke purchased the pair. The brand of Charles is on the back of each panel. We observe, however, in King James I.'s catalogue of October, 1624, No. 4, "Erasmus Rotterdamus, donne by Holbyn," which Mr. Scharf, in the 'History of Old London,' 1867, p. 314, supposed to be No. 597 (old number 324) at Hampton Court, i.e., No. 112 before us. Probably, however, King James's No. 4 was that which his son exchanged with Louis XIII. for 'St. John,' by Leonardo da Vinci, and a 'Holy Family' by Titian. No. 112 was doubtless "No. 543. By Holbein. A Piece, being Erasmus with his hands on a red book," in Chiffinch's catalogue of the pictures of James II. Walpole, 'Anecdotes,' p. 79, says that the pictures were both at Kensington Palace in his time. Lord Portarlington's Erasmus (115) ascribed to Holbein should bear neither name. It is a portrait of a German bourgeois, and is of the school of Cranach. The cross of St. John of Jerusalem indicates a knight of that order.

We cannot agree with Mr. Boyce in assigning the interesting Portrait of an Englishman (125), which was at the Academy in 1873 (198) and in 1880 (184), to either of the Holbeins. It seems to us not even of their school, but French and showing traces of Italian influence. Although retaining many charms dear to painters' eyes, it has been much damaged and badly repaired. Another picture to which the name of Holbein seems to cling without cause is Lord Warwick's Henry VIII. (126), perhaps the best example, if not the archetype and pattern, of a very numerous class, a variant of which is No. 49, lent by St. Bartholomew's Hospital; another is at Kimbolton, a third at Knole. The coat and its embroideries, the cap and jewellery, are noteworthy. Still more so is the staff in the left hand of the king. Holbein died between the 7th of October and the 29th of November, 1543. The date of the Warwick Castle portrait and its variants is given in the inscription on No. 49 as "Anno Dni 1544." Apart from this No. 126 is a good and sympathetic portrait. The king looks younger than his years, but deeply touched by sickness; the habitual use of the staff is significant; he is fat, but not so bloated as other paintings make him; and we do not read in his face much of the grimness, obstinacy, and brutal egotism Waagen found in it.

Another version of the Nicholas Kratzer (129) which Lord Galway has lent is mentioned by Van Mander, i. 221 and 222, edit. 1884. The original of the Kratzer from Serlby which is now in the Louvre, painted and dated in 1528, was touched with a finer, lighter, and firmer hand, with clearer pigments and truer sense of light. Van Mander or his correspondent saw it in the possession of Andries de Loo in London about 1570. The original drawing for the portrait is said to be at Windsor, but we have not identified it. There is a curious record of Kratzer in Ellis's 'Original Letters,' third series, i. 221 and 231. We do not know why Mr. Willett's Queen Anne of Cleves (133) bears that name, and for a wonder—it is dated 1534, i. e., five years before Holbein was sent into the Low Countries to “express” her “image verve livelye”—it does not bear the name of this master. This heavy-featured and dull German lady is much older than nineteen, which in 1534 was the age of Queen Anne. It is not in the least like the portrait in the Louvre or Hollar’s etching, which was derived from the Louvre portrait or from a similar work. Still it is an admirable picture, full of character, beautifully drawn, painted with a rare sense of the textures of flesh, woven fabrics, and jewellery. Lord Denbigh’s Third Duke of Buckingham (136) looks like a work of Holbein, to whom it is attributed, but it hangs too high for examination. Lord Denbigh’s No. 140 is neither a Holbein nor a portrait of Queen Anne Boleyn. It is a pretty little portrait, probably a late copy of a Clouet or of a work of his school. No. 141, called Queen Jane Seymour, and, for a wonder, not attributed to Holbein, is very like other portraits of her. The Hon. H. T. Wilson’s Henry VIII. (142) is no Holbein, although ascribed to him; it is one of a numerous class and tolerably like the king.

The so-called Dancing Picture (145), said to comprise portraits of Henry VIII., Anne Boleyn, and others, is really a group of French or German rakes and courtesans dancing in a landscape. A finer original may lie concealed under much coarse daubing. There is animation in the design, but the faces retain no likeness (and probably never had any) to the persons in question. The extreme improbability of such a subject being painted by Holbein—who did not come to England till long after Henry VIII. had passed the age represented by the figure which bears his name—is only equalled by the absurdity of its being painted at all for the Duke of Norfolk, as Vertue supposed and Walpole reported. The oldest mention of such a painting, whether by Holbein or not, is in Evelyn’s ‘Diary,’ who, August 25th, 1678 (not 1675, as the Catalogue says), saw some such work at the Duke of Norfolk’s at Weybridge.

It appears to us that the much-discussed picture of Henry VIII. granting the Charter to the Barber-Surgeons’ Company (152), part of the history of which is given in the Catalogue, may have been begun by Holbein, whose style the design of the whole undoubtedly resembles. He may have drawn the figures, or some of them, on the panel, and even painted those of the king and a few of the more important kneeling personages. Van Mander, ed. 1884, i. 218, states that even in his time, c. 1580, certain persons thought this work had never been completely finished by Holbein, but completed with much intelligence by other hands. It is quite certain that even in the best of the much repainted and otherwise damaged figures little or nothing remains of Holbein’s work. Supposing Holbein began it, he would have found it difficult to execute with his own brush so large a painting—containing life-size portraits, nineteen in all—between the granting of the charter in 1541 and his own death two years later. It might be dangerous to remove the dirty varnish and foul repaintings so as to uncover what may be authentic on the panel; there is, however, without resorting to this dangerous test, ample grounds for believing Van Mander’s report. We agree with Wornum, who wrote that “Holbein never did finish the picture, and from the great inferiority of the second series of heads on the left hand of the king I think these must have been added later; there is no trace of Holbein’s hand in them; and the fact of five of them being without names is also suggestive of the assumption that these five were not even members of the guild when the picture was painted.” A large proportion of the surface now visible is obviously in the technique of the later half of the seventeenth century, replete with characteristics quite unknown in Holbein’s time, and, above all, diametrically different from anything of his. This portion is probably due to repairs made after the Fire. When Pepys saw it on August 29th, 1668, he “found it so spoiled [by the Great Fire] that I have no mind to it, and it is not a pleasant, though a good picture.” His language suggests that “by the help of Mr. Pierce,” a surgeon, he might have had the picture for 200*l.* Wornum (‘Holbein,’ 349) misread Pepys’s words and fancied he had said he was willing to give 200*l.* for it. At the best it never was better than a made-up picture painted to order for a City Guild, in which a ridiculously big monarch, who never sat for this travesty of his likeness, appears in the middle of an awkward group of ill-composed figures. Though, even now, a few of the portraits betray something of the energy and insight of Holbein, most of them were never touched by him, while the majority owe little even to a far less skilful hand; the picture was damaged by the Fire, and clumsily repaired in a manner foreign to Holbein’s. It may or may not have been meddled with since then, but that the existing surface owes little to the sixteenth century we have no hesitation in affirming.

That “Hans Holbein” the Younger painted Lady Burdett-Coutts’s extremely interesting, humorous, animated, and brightly-coloured portrait, dated 1514, of Francis, Prince of Thurn and Taxis (153), will not be believed by those who know the artist was born in 1497 and resided in Augsburg till 1515, so that he could not very well have painted a portrait of this portly and jovial prince, the first Postmaster-General on record, when he was seventeen years old and not before the world at all. Hans Holbein the Elder might have painted it, and it is not unlike his work. Dr. Waagen in ‘Works of Art and Artists in England,’ 1838, iii. 96, described this picture when it was at Corsham Court in 1835, and was “inclined to take it for an early work” of Hans Holbein the Younger. It must be admitted to resemble the capital portrait of John Herbert, dated 1516, which in 1880 Lord Northbrook lent to the Academy as No. 191. The portrait of Elizabeth, Wife of Lord Vaux (170), seems to have belonged to the Duke of Buckingham, and is mentioned in his catalogue. It was her son who wrote to Burleigh the pitiful letter when he was summoned to Parliament, “I am come upp raggedlie auted and clothed, unfittedest to geve duetiefull attendance on Royall presence.” He avowed that he had pawned his “Parliament Robes,” and was so poor that the “citizen” who held the pledge would not release them even for a few days, although his lordship offered his bond with surety to redeliver them. This Lord Vaux of Harrowden was, he said, the “Infortunatest peere of Parliament for pouvertie that ever was,” on “this present Sondaie, the xvijth of Februarie, 1592.” See Ellis’s ‘Letters,’ third series, iv. 108. Mr. W. M. Molyneux’s Edward VI. (175), aged ten, is a pretty old version of the school of Holbein, executed in a fine and delicate manner and evidently from the life; the flesh is faded, but apparently not much rubbed or restored, or, if restored, restored with uncommon skill and taste; the hands are excellent. Of the Earl of Yarborough’s Edward VI. (174) we have already written as among the most precious Holbeins in England. This portrait, as well as No. 184, of the same person, wears that “great collar of ballast rubies conteyninge twenty peeces of goulde, whereof tenn are sett with greate ballas rubies, and tenne with sixtene round pearles in eiche pece,” which was long the glory of the English Royal Jewel House, and which Charles I. licensed the Duke of Buckingham and others to sell in Holland, 1625; see the ‘Letters of Henrietta Maria,’ pp. 53, 64, &c.; and Walpole, ‘Anecdotes of Painting,’ 1849, vol. iii, Appendix, p. 499. Another Edward VI. (180), lent by the Duke of Portland, is a small half-length of great beauty and touching pathos, probably by a Frenchman and a late follower of Clouet; the face and dress have been rubbed, and the former has been—if it was ever finished, which we doubt—repainted.

How such a wretched thing as Edward VI. presenting the Charter to Bridewell (181), lent by the Governors of Bridewell Hospital, retains any part of the reputation it long enjoyed it is hard to say. As the event it represents occurred ten years after Holbein died, its claim to be a masterpiece of his has long been abandoned. A picture by Stretes, or some other good artist, may be under this large surface, foul with daubings by an ignorant hand of the last century. Another spurious Holbein is Lord Petre’s Edward VI. (182), which, if this boy of thirteen or fourteen years is the king at all, must have been painted after Holbein died in 1543. It is one of the most surprising facts with which art critics have to deal that, notwithstanding that Mr. Black demonstrated in 1860 that Holbein died between the 7th of October and the proving of his will on the 29th of November, 1543, no owner of a portrait of Edward VI. painted when the boy-king was more than six years of age has consented to relinquish for it all claims to be by Holbein. In examining the collection before us it has been our duty to point out how many portraits, good, bad, or indifferent, bear the name of this artist, although on historical as well as technical grounds it is demonstrable they have no right to be attributed to his hands. The errors of Waagen, writing long before Mr. Black’s discovery was made, are excusable. This excellent critic and good judge often commented on the characteristics, as distinct from earlier pictures, of what he called Holbein’s latest or “fourth” style. We now know that the pictures he classified as belonging to it were produced after Holbein’s death by accomplished contemporaries. That the authorities of Bridewell formerly persisted in calling their big compilation (181) a Holbein, although it represents an event which occurred ten years after this painter died, and have since assigned it to the more talked of than known G. Stretes, is a fact almost unique, and creditable to them. What can be said on this subject by the owners of Nos. 52, 53, 54, 70, 84, 86, 106, 107, 108, 109, 114, 126, 127, 128, 129, 142, 147 (dated “1545”), 148, 149, 150, 153, 168, 173, 182, 186, and 190, not one of which has a reasonable claim to the name of Holbein?

There is a pathos about Lord Petre’s picture which is not due to its technique. The likeness to the king is by no means perfect, yet one would desire it should be truly named, because the boy’s sickly look, his relaxed features, and sad eyes, tend to confirm the touching idea that this is the latest likeness of one in whom so many hopes centred. It is noteworthy that the hair of No. 175, a real Edward, is dark brown, although in the older No. 182 it is much lighter. In nature the contrary would be the fact. While Nos. 180, 186, 187, all Edwards, have reddish brown hair, a picture in the British Museum, described by J. G. Nichols, has hair almost red. No. 184, Edward VI., lent by Mr. Thurlow, was a good likeness and fine picture before it was shamefully mauled; the beautiful dress and its wealth of embroideries are still admirable. As in the Petworth portrait, the king wears the so-called inestimable collar of rubies which we have mentioned above. The Earl of Denbigh’s Edward VI. (190), dressed in a flame-coloured satin coat lined with white fur and superbly embroidered, is a version of the Windsor picture which was copied by W. Derby for Lodge’s ‘Portraits,’ a model of its kind, and, though no Holbein, very charming indeed. Is it the “King’s Majestie, the whole stature, in a gowne like crymesen satten furred with lusernes,” mentioned as No. 150 in the catalogue of pictures at Westminster Palace in 1542? It seems to be Vander Doort’s “Picture of King Edward VI., at length, in a red satin coat lined with white fur, and in a white suit, in a wooden gilded frame.”

MINOR EXHIBITIONS.

THE thirty-seventh annual exhibition at the French Gallery is chiefly remarkable for the large contributions of Profs. F. von Uhde and M. Liebermann. Herr von Uhde, once a captain in a Saxon cavalry regiment, took to painting in middle life with zest and great natural powers, which might have been better directed had he studied under the auspices of another master than M. Munkacsy; at a later time he came under the still worse influence of M. Manet and his followers. It is a great pity that Herr von Uhde has not been more fortunate in his teachers, for he possesses undeniable sympathy with the poetry and passion of the grave religious subjects he affects, and might have produced a more acceptable picture than Suffer little Children to come unto Me (No. 62), a large work full of life-size figures, but of low and modern types. This remark applies to all the religious art of the Impressionists, French, German, and English. The aggressive vulgarity of their work is painful. These figures of Herr von Uhde do not support the dignity of the subject and they are not veracious; yet veracity is supposed to be their greatest merit, simply because they are squalid, not to say hunger-smitten. No one can suppose that the poverty of Christ's followers degraded their features and vitiated their expressions. The full meaning of Dekker's line regarding Christ, "The first true gentleman that ever breathed," has never occurred to Prof. von Uhde. It is a pity that this is the case, because, being a professor in Germany, his influence may be mischievous, while his undeniable aptitude for rendering effects of light, and insight into such expressions and characteristics as suit his taste, are likely to recommend a sort of teaching which can have no permanent or elevating value. We do not say that No. 61 is vulgar because a group of Bavarian peasants do duty for the Apostles gathered at The Last Supper, but because nothing noble shines through the poverty of the people, and because the professor has not cared to cultivate his own art and aspire to something better than the crude surfaces, poor coloration, and heavy handling of pictures otherwise valuable. Nothing could be more hopeless than, as some have done, to compare them with Rembrandt and Albert Dürer. — Prof. M. Liebermann, who affects homely subjects, such as Flax Spinners, Holland (59), and Women mending Nets, Katwyck (60), does not offend his admirers by confounding poverty with squalor and making religious subjects mean. Though he is rough almost to coarseness, and possesses an indifferent idea of colour, the Prussian painter has great power in many ways, deals with interior light with felicity and facility, and knows better than his brother professor how to put the elements of a picture together pictorially and truly. He imparts movement to his figures, and their faces show humour and character without vulgarity or meanness of any kind.

Another noteworthy work is M. A. Bramtots Departure of Tobias (7), a smaller version of a beautiful picture now in the public gallery at Bourges, which was exhibited in Paris a few years ago, and described in our review of the Salon. The youth is gracefully and sincerely designed, and his father, though he is somewhat stagey, is a telling figure. The most admirable element is the radiant angel clad in white. — The Orphan Sisters (12) of Herr W. Firlé shows taste, appropriate energy, and grace. The design is good, the effect is broad, and the colour acceptable. The artist's The First Communion (33) is a genuine piece of sentiment. — The Poppy Field (19) of M. A. Demont renders truly and artistically the effect of a summer moon rising above a meadow, which is a charming mass of colour, full of pale purple flowers, the under leaves of which are of too positive a green. The general effect is broad, harmonious, and sober. — No. 21 is Prof. L. C. Müller's half-length figure of Hamida, an Arabian Girl, solid and sympathetically painted, with a fine morbidezza. The rich lips are admirably handled, so is the chin, and the eyes are skilfully delineated. In short, it is as natural and artistic as the artist's set subjects are academical and melodramatic. — The Interior of a Florentine Church (25) has been brilliantly, harmoniously, and softly painted by M. D. Pesenti. — We may contrast with this capital specimen of fine art the somewhat hard, metallic, and laboured, but delicate, firm, and bright groups of figures of tourists and country folks in Prof. C. Seiler's clever Buffet at a Railway Station (29). — A specimen of M. Munkacsy, which was conspicuous in the Academy of 1880, is now called The Two Families (34). It is a brilliant and effective rather than harmonious and solid picture of an interior. — The Passing Clouds (36) of Prof. J. Wenglein sparkles with light and colour; the figures are spirited and sketchy, and the work is somewhat painty. The artist seeks to combine Watteau with Fortuny, and, although gifted with a spirited touch, does not quite succeed. — The Argument (41) of Prof. C. Seiler possesses a good deal of spirit, and shows a firm and almost photographic touch, which reminds of Herr Jan van Beers. — The watery landscapes of Herr Heffner are so exactly like those he has already "turned out" by the dozen that we need say no more of them. — The most effective and telling, if not the least dashing and showy of Prof. M. Liebermann's contributions differs from those we have already mentioned in many ways, and represents an allée verte crowded with old soldiers clad in black. It thus justifies its title of The Garden of the Maison des Invalides, Amsterdam (51).

When the Fine-Art Society dispatched Mr. A. East to Japan with a commission to paint, according to Western notions, that highly artistic nation, their costumes, streets, houses, furniture, and faces, the idea was new and bold. The result — to those natives of the Island Empire who are accustomed to see "the Japanese as painted by themselves," with sublime indifference to aerial as well as lineal perspective, with a bewildering ignorance of what all Europeans prize highly under the name of symmetry, and with colours as harmonious as they are brilliant and deftly applied — must be decidedly puzzling. Mr. A. East, who is already well known as a capital artist, and is an accomplished and ready sketcher, with a quick eye for character and sympathetic zest for the charms of colour and light, brought home more than a hundred drawings, which ought to be seen by everybody who cares for Japan and its people. We commend for special notice The Harbour of Nagasaki, Evening (1); Kobe Harbour (4), with its remarkable and peculiar sky; Tea-House Garden near Kiyôto (11), with plum-blossom; Summer Noon on the Lake of Hakone (12), with the Fugi San in the distance; and the same great mountain as seen from a street in Yokohama, No. 17. Mr. East has delineated in bright, clear, and pure colours the effects of sunlight, snow, dawn, early morning, afternoon, rain, twilight, and moonrise.

In the same Society's gallery may be seen a hundred drawings of London under various effects by that accomplished water-colourist Mr. H. Marshall, who, if not the discoverer of the pictorial charms of metropolitan smoke, mist, and daylight saddened by universal grime and gloom, has undoubtedly carried his studies of those plagues to a degree which sometimes touches upon the poetical, and is always true and artistic. Nor in this century of clever pictures has he omitted the beauty of the pure sunlight which once upon a time glorified The Old Church at Chelsea (1), or failed to give a certain grace to the heavy red brick-built Emmanuel Hospital (4). His Sunrise, from Waterloo Bridge (8), would have delighted Wordsworth, who saw so much that was fine from the neighbouring bridge at Westminster. The air of Piccadilly (20), though surcharged with dim smoke and reddish sunset glare, is not unbeautiful, while its vista is admirable. The lurid and livid smoke and pallid lustre manifest in Westminster, from Bertram's Wharf (39), should be studied in association with the broad and solid Westminster Abbey, from Lambeth Bridge (49), the more delicate Hazy Morning, Millbank (56), the very rich and strong Cripplegate (71), and the almost outlandish Little Britain (75).

SALES.

MESSRS. CHRISTIE, MANSON & WOODS sold on the 22nd inst. the following works belonging to the late T. O. Barlow, R.A. Pictures: R. P. Bonington, A Coast Scene, Normandy, with boats and figures, 1,018*l.*; Château of the Duchesse de Berri, on the Garonne, 420*l.* Sam. Bough, Hay Barge in the Fens, 210*l.* J. C. Hook, "Luff, Boy!" 357*l.*; Song and Accompaniment, 189*l.* J. Pettie, Head of a Cove-nanter, 168*l.*

The following were from other collections: J. Pettie, "Dost know this Waterfly?" 120*l.* J. Brett, Bude Sands at Sunset, 115*l.* H. W. B. Davis, Morning, 120*l.* K. Halswelle, The Lowering Element, 115*l.* J. Linnell, The Isle of Wight from Lymington, 388*l.* Van Haanen, The Cobbler's Shop, 420*l.* B. W. Leader, Bettws-y-Coed, 399*l.* H. Moore, The Silver Streak, 372*l.* J. D. Watson, Love's Young Dream, 126*l.* F. Dicksee, Memories, 840*l.* G. F. Watts, The Red Cross Knight and Una, 1,732*l.*; Love and Death, 1,386*l.*; The Rider on the White Horse, 1,522*l.*; The Rider on the Red Horse, 236*l.*; The Rider on the Black Horse, 388*l.*; Death on the Pale Horse, 236*l.*; Hope, 483*l.*; Cupid, 199*l.*; The Penitent, 420*l.*; The Dove that returneth no More, 493*l.*; Mount Ararat, 330*l.*; Rain passing Away, 126*l.*; The Rainbow, 535*l.* Drawings: J. M. W. Turner, Aysgarth Force, 199*l.*; The First Steamboat on the Thames, 442*l.* Sir J. Gilbert, Richard II. resigning his Crown to Bolingbroke, 504*l.*

The same auctioneers sold on the 24th inst. the following engravings: The Dance of Death, by A. Rethel, and two Art Union sets, 5*s.* J. C. Hook and J. E. Hodgson, etchings, 18*s.* Writing the Sermon, by Sir J. Millais, and "Let my lamp at midnight hour," by S. Palmer, and his portrait by Cope, 1*l.* 8*s.* Southwark Fair, and others, after Hogarth, 13*s.* J. M. W. Turner, portrait, by C. Turner, 32*l.*

Fine-Art Gossip.

WE are in a position to state that Mr. Briton Riviere will have no pictures to show to his friends this year. Being one of the Hanging Committee of the Academy Exhibition, he has decided to postpone sending his large 'Daniel's Answer to the King' to Burlington House, where he will be represented by a smaller painting only.

MR. HOOK has recently finished four pictures of about the same dimensions as he usually adopts, and at least three of them will go to the Royal Academy. The first is a Cuypp-like piece, a view of the Dutch Rhine in the golden afternoon light of summer merging into autumn, while all the outlines and the extreme distance are softened by vapours which pervade the air, although they cannot be said to be distinct. The brimming river has, notwithstanding this, that brightness and wealth of colour and tone in which all the Dutch masters, from Van Goyen and Vlieger to Cuypp, Ruysdael, and Van der Capelle, delighted. 'A Dutch Pedlar' (such is the name of Mr. Hook's work) is even richer in colour, more varied and choicer in tone, and, while brighter than the old pictures now look, it is quite as harmonious, broad, and telling. The meadows on either hand of the stream are clad in deep verdure, and, as they recede into the distance, groynes project from their banks at nearly regular intervals into the Rhine, each being marked by its beacon pole. The splendid surface is dotted with slow craft, creeping seaward towards us. The sky is partly veiled by clouds, whose edges are touched by the sun, while their long reflections quiver in the stream. In the front of the picture is the landing-place of a ferry, where a pedlar, his wife, his cart, to which a dog is harnessed, and another dog released from the traces, wait for the boat which, coming landwards, swings to the submerged chain in the familiar Dutch manner, so that the current itself works the ferry. The cargo of the boat consists of a horse and cart, passengers and their goods. The pedlar lounges against his dog-cart and smokes his pipe, his wife sits upon the nearest groyne; the harnessed dog rests, expectant and eager to go on again; the other laps water from the stream. The dog-cart is loaded with two babies, a big bird-cage, and various pedlary. The second picture, 'Last Night's Disaster,' indicates the subsidence of a terrible storm upon a sandy coast, and offers a thorough contrast to the restful Dutch piece. A fisherman's boat has been tossed high upon a sandbank the tempest has piled in the foreground, far beyond the usual reach of the waves. Receding now, the billows of the pale glass-green ocean, dashed with foam, still beat so furiously upon the shore that the spectator seems almost to hear the sullen thunder with which their regular fall breaks the hoarse murmur which is the burden of the sea's angry music. Brilliant sunlight pervades the scene, and lights up the crests of the nearer waves, but makes still blacker the fragments of the storm-clouds that fly in the upper air before the remnant of the gale, and between whose masses blue gaps and white vapours lined with pallid green are rapidly forming. Far off, a lonely schooner, reeling in the wind, is just distinguishable against the greenish sky of the horizon as seen between two wave crests. Near the front, aloft upon the sandy hillock, the black boat lies conspicuous, half filled with sand. There is a great hole in her side, through which the sunlight penetrates. Labouring near her bow are two men, one of whom is digging a channel along which she may be dragged to the sea again, while the other places a prop to prevent her from falling too soon. On the top of the hillock a comely girl, in a russet, rose, and brown dress, is digging with a long spade. The hollows and heaps of the sand and all the foreshore glitter in the sun. The still vexed ocean was never more sympathetically painted. 'Breakfast for the Porth' is the title of a coast piece, a little rocky Cornish cove lying resplendent in the pure and delicate light of early morning. The azure and pale green sea is dashed by the foam caused by its chafing against underlying stones, while the tide creeps silently up the cliffs that recede to the distant Land's End and its outlying islets. Upon the beach in front a party of weather-beaten men and buxom women are dressing fish upon a rock. A group of fish, infinitely beautiful in their various hues, their roses, whites, buffs, greys, and greens, lie in the foreground. A man rows landward in a boat whose blackness is a precious feature in the coloration; a few small craft are at anchor in the middle distance; some filmy clouds extend themselves in the upper atmosphere, and the lower air is filling with mist drawn from the water by the sun. The figures which give its title to the fourth picture are more important than those of the third. It is called 'The Jib for the New Boat,' and depicts the warm, pearly atmosphere of a Cornish summer and the serenest weather. It is a picture of a halcyon sea, along whose surface ripples without edges, except where they lapse upon the beach, creep slowly and without a sound. The ripe corn on the summits of the distant cliffs looks pale, and with its neighbouring verdure is subtly harmonized with the sombre grey of the underlying slate. The left front of the design is occupied by the blackish roofs of a group of cottages with which the light russet of their cob walls and their red chimney-pots assort well. Nearer are three "sailor-men," including a sail-maker, who are discussing the right cut of a new jib, which, a mass of purplish brown, lies upon the knees of a sturdy and handsome fellow and his companion. The men wear blue, black, and red, fine elements in the chromatic design. Their vis-à-vis on our right is a plump and comely young mother in a rich dark brown dress, upon whose bare bosom and shoulders the sunlight and its clear shadows fall so as to make her the counterpart and complement to the group of men. A big baby fills her arms, and while pretending to be interested in the new jib's shape, she is suckling it. On a lower level and at the sea's edge some men are working on the new smack, whose black hull helps the coloration of the picture, and gives force to the sheeny surface of the sea, upon whose delicious blueness the rosy white of the clouds lies with all the magic of Mr. Hook's art. Of the four paintings this is the richest and broadest in colour and tone, as the first-named is the softest and most simple. The most energetic and expressive is the second, with its storm-drift and tremendous billows. The most sumptuous, vivid, and enamel-like in colour is the third. The most serene and tender in colour is the fourth, where the softly-shining sea, a huge sheet of pearl and azure, adds to that halcyon sentiment in which, even more than in the passion of a storm, the painter is at home.

Mr. Hook's four pictures intended for the Royal Academy Exhibition are, with Mr. G. F. Watts's kind permission, to be seen by the friends of both artists at the studio of the latter, Little Holland House, Melbury Road, Kensington, on the 4th and 5th prox. only.

THE Antiquary for April will contain the opening section of a calendar compiled by Mr. W. Page, F.S.A., that ought to prove of considerable value to ecclesiologists and local historians. Hitherto the inventories of church goods of different parishes, temp. Edward VI., have had to be searched for in various places and three classes of records in the Public Record Office; but Mr. Page is bringing out a list arranged under counties according to hundreds, so that it can at once be seen whether there is any such inventory extant for a particular parish, and if so where it is to be found.

THE private views of the exhibitions of the Society of British Artists and the Continental Gallery are appointed for to-day (Saturday); the public will be admitted on Monday next.

REFERRING to our paragraph, ante, p. 347, on the 'Landscape with Cattle,' attributed to Paul Potter, No. 88 at the Academy Winter Exhibition of this year, of which the catalogue states it is dated "1657," Mr. M. Colnaghi writes that the picture is really dated "1653." No doubt our correspondent is correct; but this does not convince us of the genuineness of the picture.

IN Paris, on the 17th inst., a picture of M. Diaz, entitled 'Les Orientales,' was sold for 13,200 francs, and the 'Vue prise à Sin, près Douai,' of Millet fetched 5,850 fr.

M. MONTAIGNAC, agent of the "American Art Association" in Paris, has announced that the exhibition of modern French pictures in New York, which included 'L'Angelus' of Millet and a collection of the bronzes of Barye, has realized 205,000 francs. The Association has appropriated to the intended monument of Barye 30,000 fr. of this sum, which will be forwarded to Paris, together with 10,000 fr. collected in New York for the same purpose. The Municipal Council of Trent has decided to erect a monument of Dante in one of the squares of the town. The death of Madame Pommery, widow of the wine-grower of Rheims, is recorded. She possessed a fine collection, from which she lately gave to the Louvre 'Les Glaneuses' of Millet, for which she gave M. Bischoffsheim 300,000 fr. M. Le Sénéchal de Kerdreoret, the well-known marine painter, has been appointed Peintre du Ministère de la Marine. So says Le Journal des Arts.

A BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION has been formed in Scotland to provide a fund to give aid to artists who are in distress. A number of artists of high standing have contributed pictures for disposal to forward the views of the Association.

THE American School in Athens have received a further concession from the Greek Government authorizing them to conduct excavations at Megalopolis, in Arcadia. Meanwhile the Greek Archaeological Society is about to resume the excavation of the Dipylon.

AT Monte Alvo, in Sardinia, Signor Tamponi has discovered a number of human skeletons in one of the so-called tombs of the giants, thus confirming a tradition to that effect preserved by Lamarmora, which had hitherto been deemed improbable.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—Saturday Concerts.
ST. JAMES'S HALL.—The Popular Concerts.

THE novelty at last Saturday's Crystal Palace Concert was Goldmark's overture 'Im Frühling,' Op. 36, which is also announced for performance at the Richter Concerts. It is understood to be a recent work, and it certainly displays the composer in a highly favourable light. Goldmark's music is frequently marred by serious inequalities. Excellent ideas are sometimes spoilt by want of symmetry in the general structure, or by meaningless and even vulgar details and bombastic orchestration. To a slight extent these remarks might apply to the 'Spring' Overture; but on the whole it may be described as a bright, vigorous, and genial work. As the annotator says, so glowing and highly-coloured a picture of spring cannot have been suggested by Northern climes. The overture was splendidly played and warmly received. Mozart's 'Linz' Symphony, generally known as No. 6, had not been heard at the Crystal Palace, at any rate at a Saturday concert, for ten years. It affords an illustration of the marvellous art of the composer in obtaining effects with limited means, for the score contains neither flutes nor clarinets, yet the orchestration is full of picturesque details. The work was written at Linz in 1783, that is, at least four years before the three great symphonies in E flat, G minor, and C ('Jupiter'). Of the manner in which Sir Charles Halle played Beethoven's Concerto in C minor it is quite unnecessary to say anything. The only other instrumental item was Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's ballad 'La Belle Dame sans Merci.' Miss Liza Lehmann rendered songs by Hook and Thomé in her best manner.

Although the Belgian pianist M. Arthur de Greef has not yet been heard in any works of magnitude, there can be little doubt that continental report has not exaggerated his abilities, and that we have in him an artist of the highest rank. At his performances at the Popular Concerts on Saturday and Monday last he appeared to some disadvantage, owing to the metallic and unsympathetic quality of the instrument on which he played; but on the former occasion he invested Mendelssohn's 'Variations Sérieuses' with a larger amount of poetic feeling than it might be thought possible they would be able to bear. Some of the variations were placed in a new light, and all of them were played in the style of a master who has formed his opinion concerning the significance of the music, and has no difficulty whatever in giving it expression. M. de Greef's rendering of the pianoforte part in Beethoven's Trio in D, Op. 70, No. 1, particularly of the sublime largo, was equally striking. It should be added that M. de Greef was a pupil of Brassin, from whom he may have gained his excellent technique, but who could not have given him the higher qualities which mark the artist as distinguished from the virtuoso. Saturday's programme included Schubert's Quartet in D minor, and Bach's Concerto in D minor for two violins, performed, as before, by Madame Néruda and Herr Joachim. Madame Bertha Moore was the vocalist.

On Monday M. de Greef's solos were a Caprice by M. Saint-Saëns, founded on the ballet airs from Gluck's 'Alceste,' and Chopin's B flat minor Scherzo, Op. 31. We shall hope to hear him shortly in works of greater significance. The rest of the programme does not call for any comment. It included Beethoven's Quartet in E minor, Op. 59, No. 2, the same composer's Sonata in G for piano and violin, Op. 30, No. 3, and Spohr's Barcarolle and Scherzo for violin. Mr. Thorndike was the vocalist.

NEW SONGS.

The Lifted Veil. By Joseph Barnby. (Metzler & Co.) As songs with religious words are greatly in vogue just now, this example may be recommended as at once simple and musicianly.—Noël, by Charles Gounod, is a simplified arrangement for soprano of a well-known motet for female voices.—An extremely effective song for any voice of moderate compass is Chant d'une Bretonne, by Benjamin Godard. It has English and French words.—Kenilworth, by Gerard F. Cobb, is a vocal gavotte, the style of the music being quite in keeping with the words. There is an effective modification in the third verse.—You ask me why I love, by Laurence Kellie, is expressive, but the false accents in the words are irritating.—An effective song, with violin or violoncello obligato, is Midsummer Night, by Percy Reeve.

Emmanuel, by Paul Rodney (Enoch & Sons), is a sacred song with somewhat mawkish words, but a well-written voice part. The same composer's Thy King has also religious verses of an inoffensive kind, and the music is unobjectionable, though commonplace, as is that of We've said good-bye, a love song with dimal words.—Yet another sacred song is Babylon, by Michael Watson, written with the composer's usual fluency and highly expressive. The words are suggested by the 137th Psalm. Little Lord Fawntleroy, by the same composer, is a pleasing ballad, suitable for children.—Only a Rose and You sang to me, by Milton Wellings, are unpretentious love songs. The latter is the more commendable of the two, both in words and music.—The Angel Came, by F. H. Cowen, is a quasi-sacred song for contralto. Though without any positive faults, it is scarcely worthy of the composer.—Different in character from any of the foregoing is The Prima Donna, by J. L. Roeckel. It is vigorous and slightly declamatory, and if sung with spirit would certainly be effective.—One Summer Night, by F. L. Moir, is a pleasing and musicianly example of the tearful kind of love song in vogue at present.—The curious title of Madrigal is given to a dainty and attractive song for mezzo-soprano voice by C. Chaminade. It has English and French words.

A Second Set of Six Songs. By H. Festing Jones. Op. 5. (Weekes & Co.) These are settings of amatory stanzas by Shakspeare, Hood, and other poets. Though unpretentious, they are full of pleasant touches of musicianship, and the accompaniments are free and interesting. If not of equal merit, they are as a whole superior to ordinary drawing-room ballads.—This last remark will also apply to The Heart ever Faithful, a set of four songs by Gerard F. Cobb, Op. 17, though in this instance the interest lies chiefly in the voice part. Indeed, as regards melody, they are more effective than any of Mr. Cobb's previous compositions. Tenor vocalists, for whom they are best suited, cannot fail to be pleased with them.—Sleep in Peace, by Ciro Pinsuti, is a pleasing ballad in the late composer's most refined manner.

As there are degrees of merit even in the most conventional style of shop songs, we may commend The Sea hath its Pearls and How have I thought of thee, by R. Ernest Bryson (London Music Publishing Company), as smoothly written and pleasing; also Tiny Feet, by Morton Elliot, a tuneful song for contralto.—An extremely well-written song with an effective accompaniment is L'Hirondelle, by F. W. Davenport. It has French words.—Serenade, by Walter Mitchell, Mine Alone, by H. E. Warner, and Love's Golden Dream, by Lindsay Lennox, are more commonplace, and are defaced by that vulgar device the waltz refrain.

A melodious love song with a rippling accompaniment is The East Indian, by J. Jacques Haakman (Charles Woolhouse). The same composer's The Young Rose is less commendable. Both are settings of verses by Moore.—Twilight Visions, by Herbert Sharpe, is an effective, though mournful, song for contralto. There is an ugly pair of consecutive fifths in the sixth bar of the first and second verses.—Of the same class are Suspense, by Sydney Shaw, and Sleep, by J. E. Vernham. The last has religious verses, and the music is placid and rather hymnlike.

Musical Gossip.

THE Royal College of Music gave another orchestral concert on Thursday last week at Alexandra House. The programme included Wagner's 'Faust' Overture, a choice that cannot be commended; Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony; Bach's Violin Concerto in A minor, played by Miss Donkersley; and Schumann's Introduction and Allegro Appassionato in G, Op. 92, a beautiful, though rarely heard work, played by Miss Ethel Sharpe.

'ISRAEL IN EGYPT' was performed by the Royal Choral Society in the Albert Hall on Wednesday, with Miss Anna Williams, Mrs. Brereton, Madame Patey, and Mr. Iver McKay, who gave a very creditable rendering of "The enemy said," as the principal vocalists.

THE concert of the Highbury Philharmonic Society on Monday deserves more than passing mention. The programme contained a new choral work, 'The Song of the Western Men,' by Mr. G. R. Betjemann, son of Mr. G. H. Betjemann, the well-known violinist and conductor of the Society. It is a setting of verses by the Rev. R. S. Hawker, in which the Cornish men express their determination to prevent or, at any rate, avenge the death of Bishop Trelawny, one of the seven bishops who were committed to the Tower in the time of James II. Mr. Betjemann has approached the illustration of this subject in the proper spirit. His music is full of energy, the themes are striking, and the whole is distinguished by a sense of freedom without licence. There are several effective bits of writing, the most remarkable being the change from E minor (through the unresolved dominant thirteenth) to the tonic major at the words "Here's twenty thousand Cornish men will see the reason why." There are, perhaps, too many changes of time and key, and the scoring is a little too thick in places, but the work shows great promise, and the writing for the voices is so full of interest that it cannot fail to please choral societies. Another success was won at this concert by Mr. G. H. Betjemann, who gave a brilliant rendering of Dr. Mackenzie's 'Pibroch,' under the composer's direction. The programme included Mendelssohn's 'Lobgesang' and the 'Hebrides' Overture, the efforts of orchestra and chorus, the former mainly and the latter wholly composed of amateurs, being worthy of much praise. Madame Bertha Moore, Miss Florence Monk, and Mr. Charles Banks were the principal vocalists.

MISS AGNES ZIMMERMANN gave a pianoforte recital at the Princes' Hall on Tuesday afternoon before a large audience. The excellent pianist played in her best manner Beethoven's Sonata in C, Op. 2, No. 3; Chopin's in B flat minor, Op. 35; and minor items by Emmanuel Bach, J. S. Bach, Lee, Rameau, Rubinstein, and other composers.

LAST week the Bristol Orpheus Glee Society decided to pay another visit to London, the date fixed being Saturday, April 26th. It is to be hoped that the public will manifest a larger amount of interest in the event than was shown on the previous occasion. The glee is eminently an English form of composition, and the Bristol Society is the finest of its kind in the kingdom.

ON May 6th, at St. James's Hall, two new Welsh works will be produced. The first is a dramatic cantata, called 'Nebuchadnezzar,' by Dr. Joseph Parry, music lecturer at the Cardiff University College. His son, Mr. Haydn Parry, is the author of the other work, which is entitled 'Gwen.' The libretto is by Mr. J. Young Evans, of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and is based on the well-known Welsh legend of the Lady of the Van Lake. The choruses will be rendered by a Welsh choir, assisted by ladies from the Guildhall School of Music.

M. EDGAR TINEL's oratorio 'Franciscus' was performed for the first time in this country, under the direction of Miss Caroline Holland, at the Westminster Town Hall, on Tuesday afternoon, the concert being for a charitable purpose. It is impossible, however, to form an accurate judgment as to the merits of the work until it is heard under more favourable conditions. 'Franciscus' was produced at Malines in August, 1888, and has since been given at Brussels several times with much success. The libretto, translated by Miss Holland, is taken from a poem by De Koninck, and deals in romantic fashion with the career of St. Francis d'Assisi from his early life to his death. The music, so far as could be judged, shows traces of diverse influences, but throughout it is clear, tasteful, and appropriate, and some portions are noteworthy for higher qualities. With the accompaniments rendered on the pianoforte, and without a conductor to maintain precision, the performance could not fail to be, on the whole, imperfect and ineffective. It may be mentioned that some symphonic movements illustrating Corneille's 'Polyeucte,' by M. Tinel, have just been received with much favour in Brussels.

AT Mr. Stephen Kemp's concert in the Princes' Hall on the same evening, the most important works in the programme were Dvorak's Trio in B flat, Op. 21, and a melodious and pleasing MS. Sonata in A, for piano and violin, by Mr. Walter Macfarren.

AT length, after a delay of eighteen months, M. Saint-Saëns's 'Ascanio' was produced at the Paris Opéra on Friday last week. That the work is in every sense worthy of the composer is generally admitted, but that it is an advance upon his previous operas few have the courage to assert. The libretto is taken from the drama 'Benvenuto Cellini,' by Paul Meurice, which enjoyed great success at the Porte Saint-Martin thirty-five years ago, and in which Mélingue, who, besides being an actor, knew something of the arts of sculpture and painting, used to delight the audience by moulding a statuette of Hébé every evening before their eyes. It is scarcely necessary to mention that Berlioz has written an opera entitled 'Benvenuto Cellini,' and other composers who have chosen the same subject are Franz Lachner and Lauro Rossi. The present libretto, by M. Louis Gallet, seems very complicated and confused. Of the performers M. Lassalle, Miss Eames, and Madame Bosman are highly praised, while others are condemned as unworthy of the principal lyric theatre in Paris.

SOME of the Italian journals persist in stating that Boito's 'Nero' will be produced next season at La Scala, Milan, and that M. van Dyck will undertake the leading part. On the other hand, it is pointed out that the Belgian artist is engaged at the Vienna Opera. It seems on the whole improbable that the companion work to 'Mefistofele' will ever see the light.

STRIKING success has been won at Ghent by a dramatic symphony entitled 'Mazeppa' and a one-act opera, 'La Reine des Fées,' by Paul d'Acosta. The composer is an amateur and writes under a nom de guerre.

THERE is probably no truth whatever in the statement extensively circulated that M. Gounod has accepted a commission to compose an opera for America on a Mexican subject, and that it will be produced under his personal direction in 1892.

CONCERTS, &c., NEXT WEEK.

- Mon. Trinity College Students' Orchestral Concert, 8, Princes' Hall.
 — Popular Concert, 8.30, St. James's Hall.
 Fri. Royal Choral Society, 'The Messiah,' 7, Albert Hall.
 — Rossini's 'Stabat Mater,' &c., 7.30, St. James's Hall.
 Sat. Crystal Palace Concert, 3.
 — Carl Rosa Opera Company, Gounod's 'Romeo and Juliet,' 8, Drury Lane.

DRAMA

THE WEEK.

VAUDEVILLE.—Afternoon Representation: 'Miss Tomboy,' a Comedy in Three Acts, founded on 'The Relapse' of Sir John Vanbrugh. By Robert Buchanan.

SHOULD success attend the experiment of Mr. Buchanan in his 'Miss Tomboy' of converting into farcical comedies the pieces of the Restoration dramatists, a new and rich mine will be opened to the adapter. Of seventeenth century plays none is fouler than 'The Relapse.' In Amanda Vanbrugh shows us a moderately virtuous woman sadly out of place in the company she frequents. The proceedings of Loveless and Berinthia, however, are scandalous enough for Mrs. Behn, the very name of one of the characters is an outrage, and the conception of Coupler would shame the worst annals of the French Regency. So much cleverness is there, nevertheless, in the characters and so much art in the dialogue that the play has offered a constant attraction to succeeding dramatists. Sheridan in 'The Trip to Scarborough' achieved an excellent adaptation, retaining all that was brilliant in the dialogue, and confining within the limits of suggestion the rampant obscenity of the original. The production of this piece had been anticipated by that of 'The Man of Quality,' a poor farce by John Lee, the actor, extracted from the comic scenes of 'The Relapse,' and was followed after a long period by an adaptation by Mr. John Hollingshead, also called 'The Man of Quality,' produced at the Gaiety. In this version Mr. Alfred Wigan was Lord Foppington and Miss Ellen Farren was Miss Hoyden. None of these adaptations has failed. In the first prologue to 'The Relapse,' spoken only on the first two days of its production in 1697, it is stated of the play that 'Twas got, conceiv'd, and born in six weeks' space.

This seems probable enough. The more serious scenes, if such a phrase may in this case be pardoned, are written in irregular and mongrel verse, and the character of Lord Foppington, the conception of which is Colley Cibber's, is the only brilliant thing in the play. How brilliant, however, this character is! It is scarcely going too far to say he is the best comic creation in the English drama since Shakspeare. His affectations are enchanting, his "strange oaths" have inspired Sheridan, and his wit in the midst of its impertinence is so genuine that we are almost sorry for his defeat. His penultimate speech, which should mark his exit, addressed in congratulation to his brother and successful rival, contains the quintessence of Restoration comedy. To appreciate it one must know the character of Miss Hoyden. "Dear Tam," says the defeated and hoodwinked peer, "since things are thus fallen out, prithee give me leave to wish the(e) jay. I do it de bon cœur, strike me dumb. You have married a woman beautiful in her person, charming in her airs, prudent in her conduct, constant in her inclinations, and of a nice morality, split my windpipe."

This work Mr. Buchanan has taken, and, with some aid from Sheridan, has rendered conformable to the most Philistine notions of the day. In his omissions, the most important of which were imperative, he has been generally, but not uniformly, discreet. It is the underplot of 'The Relapse' with which alone he deals. With his additions we are not content. The effect of these is to take away the seventeenth century tone of the play, and to deprive some of the characters of their truth. The fit of penitence on the part of Tom Fashion, which makes him before marrying his mistress own to the trick he has played, however it may suit a public of to-day, is irreconcilable with the period in which the action is laid, a period in which no device that could bring a man the possession of a woman was other than justifiable. 'Miss Tomboy,' though far too much of Vanbrugh's wit is left out, is an amusing play. It is, however, as farcical comedy that it attracts. What sentiment it possesses is of the eighteenth century, moreover, not the seventeenth. Tom Fashion is influenced by Tom Jones, and Miss Hoyden has a slight infusion of Sophia Western, or of some woman of more refinement than the original character. For this perhaps the acting is responsible. Miss Hoyden in Vanbrugh is a vulgar country wench, who only needs a veneer of civilization and the privileges of matrimony to join the sisterhood of Mrs. Foresight and Mrs. Frail. These attributes are suggested by Sheridan, and, indeed, by Mr. Buchanan. Miss Winifred Emery shows us a sweet, gracious, and delightful romp, whose movements mingle with their bucolic freedom a Miranda-like freshness. It is a charming creature that is shown us, but it is not the Miss Hoyden of the past. Mr. F. Thorne gave a conventional Sir Tunbelly Clumsy; Mr. T. Thorne has too serious a style for Lord Foppington. As Tom Fashion Mr. Gilmore was fairly good, and Mr. Cyril Maude acted Doggett's part of Lory in a fashion that suggested he might some day with advantage be tried as Lord Foppington.

Gramatic Gossy.

MR. WYNDHAM's reappearance at the Criterion took place in his favourite character of David Garrick. With the exception of the assumption by Mr. William Farren of the rôle of Simon Ingot the cast is practically the same as was before assigned the play; Miss Mary Moore being Ada Ingot; Mr. Blakeley, Smith; and Mr. Giddens, Squire Chivey. Mr. Farren acts with so much distinction, however, that a feeling of incongruity is caused when he appears in company with men and women so preposterous in vulgarity as his associates. Mr. Wyndham plays with much brightness and spirit; but he also needs no such foils as he assigns himself.

'ANDROMEDA,' a "Greek tragedy in one act," by Miss Rose Seaton, was given on Monday afternoon at the Vaudeville. The heroine resembles her illustrious namesake in this only that she expiates the offences of her mother, who by deserting the shrine of Artemis, at which she was a priestess, has incurred the wrath of the goddess. Moved by a desire to revisit her home, Andromeda repeats her mother's fault, and in so doing brings about the destruction of her family. The conception is fateful and the language fluent. At one point, indeed, the piece almost stirs. It is, however, long and deficient in movement, and as it is feebly acted the result is depressing. Miss Seaton played Andromeda.

WITH the before-mentioned piece was played 'Number Two,' announced as a farcical comedy in three acts, by Mr. Harry Croft Hillier. This piece is below the average of its class, and in construction and dialogue is as weak as it can well be. The acting was boisterous, noisy, and ineffective.

A NOT very successful adaptation of 'Jess' was produced at the Adelphi on Tuesday afternoon. The version, which is in four acts, is by Miss Eweretta Lawrence and Mr. J. J. Bisgood. If the interminable speeches assigned to Jess, who was played by Miss Eweretta Lawrence, were curtailed, the play would gain something. Its termination, in which the heroine enters the chamber of Frank Muller and returns with the knife red with his heart's blood, is impressive; but a recasting of the story and dialogue is necessary before the whole can take a hold on the public. Miss Forsyth, Mr. Beveridge, Mr. Dalton, and Mr. Julian Cross took part in a tolerably competent interpretation.

'CERISE & Co.' is the title of Mrs. Musgrave's satirical comedy, which is to be produced at the Comedy on April 17th, with Miss Fanny Brough, Mr. Eric Lewis, and Mr. Hawtrey in the cast.

A DRAMATIC version of Mark Twain's story 'The Prince and the Pauper' is to be given at a series of afternoon representations at the Gaiety, with Mr. W. H. Vernon as King Henry VIII. and Miss Vera Beringer as the prince.

MR. W. HERBERT and Mr. Lewis Waller have been secured for the forthcoming production of Mrs. Hodgson Burnett's 'Nixie.'

M. RAYMOND DESLANDES, the dramatist, whose death is announced from Paris, was born at Yvetot in 1825. His most noted pieces, written alone or in conjunction with MM. Decourcelle, Labiche, Clairville, Grangé, Durantin, and other dramatists, were 'Les Domestiques' (Variétés, 1861); 'Un Mari qui lance sa Femme' (Gymnase, 1864); 'Le Marquis Harpagon' (Odéon, 1862); and 'Un Gendre' (Vaudeville, 1866). He had been during late years one of the managers of the Vaudeville.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—S. K.—A. R.—P. S. P. C.—J. W.—C. R.—R. B. J.—G. B.—J. E. B.—R. S.—H. S. G.—W. H. D.—received.

W. E. W.—You should ask your bookseller such a question.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

Erratum.—No. 3254, p. 310, col. 2, lines 34 and 33 from bottom, for "The Wollaston Medal was presented to Prof. Judd," read "The Wollaston Medal was presented to Prof. Judd for transmission to Prof. W. Crawford Williamson."

SATURDAY, APRIL 5, 1890.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
THE HISTORY OF DUBLIN UNIVERSITY	427
A CENTURY OF SONNETS	428
RUSSIAN STORIES	429
NICHOL'S MONOGRAPH ON BACON	429
A WINTER IN SOUTH AFRICA	431
THE PURGATORIO OF DANTE	431
NOVELS OF THE WEEK	432
EARLY CHRISTIAN LITERATURE	433
SCHOOL-BOOKS	434
OUR LIBRARY TABLE—LIST OF NEW BOOKS	434-435
THE NEW CODE; MR. GLADSTONE'S MODEL LIBRARY	435-436
LITERARY GOSSIP	437
SCIENCE—MEDICAL BOOKS; GEOGRAPHICAL LITERATURE; CHAMBERS'S ENCYCLOPEDIA; SOCIETIES; MEETINGS; GOSSIP	438-439
FINE ARTS—PRUSSIAN ART YEAR-BOOK; LIBRARY TABLE; THE GROSVENOR GALLERY; MINOR EXHIBITIONS; THE NEW RULES FOR STUDENTS OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY; NOTES FROM CILICIA; SALE; GOSSIP	440-443
MUSIC—THE WEEK; GOSSIP; CONCERTS, &c., NEXT WEEK	444-445
DRAMA—THE WEEK; COLERIDGE'S 'OSORIO' AND 'REMORSE'; GOSSIP	445-446

LITERATURE

The History of the University of Dublin, from its Foundation to the End of the Eighteenth Century. With an Appendix of Original Documents. By John William Stubbs, D.D. (Longmans & Co.)

THE University of Dublin has long awaited its historian, and if Dr. J. W. Stubbs can hardly be said to have achieved that position, he has at least put into print a mass of materials which will immensely lighten the labours of the historian yet to come. To write the history of a university nowadays is a very different task from that aimed at by the historian of the older antiquarian type. For the mediæval universities we have models in the works of Father Denifle and Prof. Kaufmann, each excellent in different degrees and in different spheres of interest. And before these writers we had in England an example of the same scholarly work, guided by the same wide and comparative study of parallel institutions, in Mr. Bass Mullinger's history of the University of Cambridge. More recently Mr. Maxwell Lyte has attempted, not without success, to perform the same service for the history of Oxford. But Mr. Mullinger, unlike the other writers we have named, carries down his history as far as the seventeenth century, and his work, it might naturally be presumed, would be taken, in its main lines at least, as a pattern by the historian of a university the system of which bears any sort of analogy to the historic universities of England; above all, in the case of a foundation like Trinity College, Dublin, which was confessedly established on the model of those universities. It is in many ways unfortunate that Dr. J. W. Stubbs has not so understood the scope of his work. He knows his subject admirably, and sets down his facts fully and fairly. But beyond a few passing allusions to Cambridge statutes he gives hardly a hint of the existence of related—we may, indeed, say parent—university institutions. He discusses the details of the Dublin curriculum without seeming to be aware that its organizers were repeating in a variety of points the practice which had already attained its maturity, if it had not outlived its vitality, in the older universities. His interest is limited to Trinity College, Dublin, and he recounts its history as though it were an isolated development entirely unconnected with any other institution. Depriving himself thus of his historical basis, Dr. J. W. Stubbs has further impaired the value of his book by ignoring the various illustrations which a comprehensive study of academical institutions would have supplied to give life to the subject of his special researches. At the very outset, for instance, after describing the attempts made towards the erection of an Irish university in the Middle Ages, he passes straightway to the reign of Elizabeth, and reaches, a few lines later, the actual establishment of Trinity College. He thus misses the suggestive fact mentioned by Mr. Mullinger, that six years before the foundation of that college, John Case, a Fellow of St. John's College, Oxford, had, in a letter to the Chancellors of Oxford and Cambridge prefixed to his 'Speculum Moraliū Questionum,' dwelt earnestly on the injury which Ireland suffered from the lack of a university, with the plain object of promoting such a design ('University of Cambridge,' ii. 352 f.); and that earlier still, in the reign of Edward VI., Archbishop Browne, of Dublin, had sketched out a scheme for the establishment of a society in that city "to be called Christ's College of the fundacion of King Edward the Sixt." Nor does Dr. J. W. Stubbs seem sufficiently informed of the current history of the time with which he deals. We take an example which will also serve to show how awkwardly he has arranged his materials. After reciting the terms of Elizabeth's letters patent, dated March 3rd, 1591/2, he speaks in general terms of the "Provost and Fellows" (p. 9), but we do not learn their names until p. 18. "The first Provost was Archbishop Adam Loftus, who held the office for merely a year." By referring back to p. 11 (there is no other indication of the date), we presume this year is to be reckoned from January, 1593/4. Loftus was succeeded by the well-known Walter Travers, concerning whom our author has gleaned some facts from Strype's 'Life of Whitgift'; but his looseness in regard to dates has led him to give a completely misleading account of the circumstances of the Provost's appointment:—

"Upon the death of Mr. Alvey the Mastership of the Temple became vacant, and a strong party, comprising Lord Burleigh among the rest, endeavoured to secure the succession for Travers (who then held the post of Lecturer in the Temple). He was a prominent Puritan, and a leader of that party. His promotion was opposed by Archbishop Whitgift, who informed the Queen that Travers was one of the chief authors of dissension in the Church.....When Burleigh failed to have Travers appointed to the Temple, he sent him to Trinity College, where he was elected Provost by Archbishop Loftus and the Fellows, and was sworn in on December 5, 1595." No one reading this narrative would guess that the vacancy in the Temple occurred in August, 1584, and it is quite unaccountable that Dr. J. W. Stubbs should have omitted to state that the man who was appointed Master was none other than Richard Hooker. Moreover, so far from Travers being at once elected Provost of Trinity College, he was for a long time engaged in a famous controversy with Hooker, and was not appointed at Dublin until ten years after his disappearance.

Instances of defective arrangement might be multiplied. In reading the book one is constantly obliged to wait several pages for the particulars of name and date which ought to be given when the occurrence in question is first mentioned; while in other cases the same facts are repeated on different pages without any reference to their previous notice. On p. 29 we read of "Mr. Chapell of Christ's College, Cambridge," as Dean and Catechist. On p. 62 we are reminded that the Provost "induced Mr. William Chapell to come from Cambridge to Dublin as Dean and Catechist. He was now Dean of Cashel." But it is not until p. 67 that we learn that William "Chappel" was "formerly Fellow of Christ's College, Cambridge," and tutor of the college when Milton was a student, with further notes concerning him. On another occasion it is necessary to pass from p. 39 to p. 62 to understand the circumstances mentioned on the former page. An allusion on p. 69 has to be supplemented by fuller particulars on p. 72. The same facts about John Harding are given on p. 74, note †, and p. 76. Dr. J. W. Stubbs's habit of repetition not unfrequently leads him into discrepancies in the matter of dates and in the spelling of proper names. It is also inconvenient to have the narrative interrupted from time to time by notices of the eminent members of Trinity College living under a particular Provost—notice which would find their place more properly in the alphabetical catalogue of "some of the well-known members of the College" printed at the end of the volume. The names in this catalogue, it should be observed, are not regularly incorporated in the index, which is in other respects incomplete. The name of Ambrose Ussher (p. 170) is absent from it, and there is no reference to Erasmus Smith, whose trust is frequently mentioned in the course of the volume.

Badly put together as Dr. J. W. Stubbs's book is, and entirely lacking in the higher qualities of a history, it contains a large store of valuable, interesting, and often entertaining matter. At the outset it is curious to note, as almost an anticipation of modern university "reforms," that the Fellows by the terms of foundation were to "be removed from their fellowships" on the expiry of seven years from their Master's degree. The original design of the College, as expressed in a letter of the Irish Council proposing to furnish education especially to "those that are poor (as it were in an Orphan's Hospital freely)," compares strangely with the scale of endowments in the latter part of last century, when a Senior Fellow's income might average 800*l.* (pp. 210, 278). In 1596 one Kerney, a printer, was allowed rooms in College, with "a Fellow's Commons during his life, at the Fellows' table," while his boy, who was also lodged in the College, took his dinner "at the lower Scholars' table, Kerney paying for it when he was able." On p. 23 we have an amazing record of the preaching energy of Luke Chaloner, one of the first Fellows of Trinity College and the father-in-law of Archbishop Ussher:—

"From his own memorandum it appears that prior to 1607 he had preached not fewer than 1,428 sermons, of which 379 were on the book of Genesis. He spent seven years in preaching on that book, mostly on Fridays. On St. Matthew's Gospel he spent five years in preaching on Sunday Afternoons 210 sermons."

The standard of discipline in the early years of the College history was severe, if somewhat elastic, as the following entries show:—

"A public whipping, at the hour of corrections, for breaking the Provost's windows."

"A student fined 25s. for stealing half a hog-head of the Provost's strong beer, through Sir Wilson's study wall being broken."

"Made to sit in the stocks at supper-time for fighting with weapons."

Apparently it was not only the undergraduates who "fought with weapons":—

"November 21, 1617.—Mr. Taylor, Senior Fellow and Dean, severely censured and punished for a wound committed upon the person of Gower, a Scholar of the House."

In 1619 a general state of laxity was discovered equally among undergraduates and bachelors. Passing over some of the delinquents, we read:—

"Sir Underwood for going to an ale-house and coming in after the shutting of the gates, was punished by a declamation openly in the Hall during dinner. Hogan, Hurley, and Lisragh severely punished with the rod for going out into the town without leave, and tipping in ale-houses. Sir Holland confessed that he was late out of College at night, and came into the Chapel by breaking a bar of a window in the steeple. Beere, Temple [son of the Provost], and Paget, were sharply corrected for departing from the Sermon [at Christ Church] to go a-walking, and for consenting to the plucking of cherries from a tree of Dean Wheeler's garden hanging on the wall. One, Life, a lewd boy, and an instrument for them, was banished the College."

In 1628 a system of secret spying seems to have been established:—

"August 24.—Warning given of town haunting and swearing. The Deans requested to appoint secret monitors for them."

Still, whether within or without the College, the students continued as unruly as ever. In 1629 a heavy penalty was inflicted "for drunkenness and knocking Strank's head against the seat of the Chapel." The next entry has a national flavour:—

"Booth for taking a pig of Sir Samuel Smith's, and that openly in the day time before many, and causing it to be dressed in town, inviting Mr. Rollon and Sir Conway (who knew not of it), was condemned to be whipped in the Hall, and to pay for the pig."

As we proceed further in the book the College history becomes more decorous and is comparatively free from incidents of this sort. Disorder among the students is exchanged for intrigues and jealousies among the Fellows. The higher rank of Senior Fellows evolves itself and monopolizes all power in the government of the College, to the exclusion of the Juniors; but the vigilance of the Provost is too much for them, and he soon obtains for himself an autocratic position on the Board probably unique in the history of colleges. He could declare a candidate for a fellowship elected who had received never so small a minority of votes in the Board meeting. In the second half of last century the provostship was for a time practically a political appointment. In 1758 a layman, Francis Andrews, was appointed Provost. He was a member of the Irish Parliament and a friend of the Chief Secretary, Rigby. There can hardly be a doubt that Rigby's interest with the Duke of Bedford, then Lord Lieutenant, secured his appointment. The next Provost, John Hely Hutchinson, was still more of a political personage; and he was simply appointed in order to make a vacancy in the offices of Prime Serjeant and Alnager of Ireland which he held. He, too, sat in Parliament, and made use of his position as Provost of Trinity College as an electioneering agency for the return of the university members. So far had things gone in this direction that in 1793 the Fellows seem to have influenced the appointment of a particular man as Provost by promising their votes to a candidate for their constituency. The College was under repeated obligations to the Irish Parliament for grants in aid of its buildings and for other assistance; and once the Fellows showed their gratitude in a truly remarkable way:—

"September 24, 1717.—The Degree of LL.D. is to be offered to all Members of the House of Commons who desire it, in consequence of an address to the King for 5,000*l.* to complete the Library."

And forty-one members "availed themselves of this privilege."

We have left ourselves no space to speak of the careful, if somewhat monotonous account of the management of the College estates, the changes in its studies from time to time, the growth of the buildings, the formation of the library, or many other valuable parts of Dr. J. W. Stubbs's history. The narrative of the vicissitudes of the College during the Civil War and Commonwealth is not so well done as that of its action at the close of the reign of James II. Indeed, thanks to the increasing abundance of materials, the book improves steadily as it goes on, though the defects to which we called attention at the outset are still apparent. With whatever reserves, we have no doubt that it will be welcomed by many outside the roll of Dublin graduates to whom it especially appeals, and will be widely used as a book of reference not only for the history of Trinity College, but also as throwing light upon the general condition of education and society in Ireland during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Nor should we forget to thank the author for printing the extremely serviceable appendix of documents with which his work concludes.

A Century of Sonnets. By Samuel Waddington. (Bell & Sons.)

MR. WADDINGTON is, as is well known, a veteran in the art of sonnet-writing. And it is not too much to say that of his hundred sonnets there is not one which is not admirable for completeness and finish. The skillful strictness with which he obeys the laws to which he submits himself is noteworthy, and shows that the management of verse has no difficulties left for him; but he does not, like most sonnet-writers, constrain himself to one form only of the sonnet. Probably he would do so if his 'Century of Sonnets' were a connected series; as it is, the variety introduced by changes of versification is a merit in a volume containing so many sonnets without a bond of sequence to require uniformity. Mr. Waddington, though using the Petrarchan model for many of his best sonnets, has not preferred it; his most frequent choice is the form in which the octave is that Petrarch uses, but the sestet consists of an alternately rhymed quatrain and a couplet. In clumsy hands the concluding couplet is apt to turn out a mistaken venture, falling apart from the rest of the sestet, and coming in as mere tag, or like a rhymed saw, and with too often the jingle of tags and saws, but Mr. Waddington is able to escape such risks and to use it as an effective winding up.

How far Mr. Waddington is a poet is more difficult for a critic to decide than how far he is an excellent literary artist. All his sonnets are good in thought and expression, and some are beautiful: but the question how much these excellences are due to the author's taste, his skill, his thoughtfulness, and his literary training, and how much to his being by nature a poet, is prompted by this volume and is not answered by it. The requirements of the sonnet are so definite that, when such command of versification as Mr. Waddington's has been achieved and they are no impediment whatever to expression, they are like moulds for the metal to shape in and like rails for the train to run on. The more perfect the sonnet the more the art that went to its making is concealed, but, whatever its inspiration, the sonnet derives more from art than does any other of the serious forms of poetic expression, and it can never throw off a slight artificial constraint which is one of its beauties, but a beauty foreign to that of the "first fine careless rapture" as to which we can always be sure at once that the singer is skylark, not bullfinch piping excellently—that he would in some form or other have been a poet if nobody before him had ever published a poem. This may be the case with Mr. Waddington—we by no means affirm that it is not—but there is a sort of deliberateness and an evenness of emotion about these sonnets which hinder that impression of reality which is the spell of poetry.

The arrangement of the 'Century'—rather a large number to be read miscellaneous—would, we think, have been more attractive and have done better justice to the poems if there had been some sectional grouping. Some of the love sonnets, for instance, might, without any one of them losing its individuality, have gained in interest by being in a sequence; and so of the sonnets on religious themes, and perhaps of some others. We should think few readers, if any, can like to have their minds drawn hither and thither, from one isolated theme to another, at every page, and this enforced desultoriness brings an unwillingness to read on which there is nothing in the poems themselves to produce. However, this question of grouping does not affect the internal merits of the sonnets. We prefer those of them which are either love sonnets or akin to love sonnets—'The Aftermath' for one. That is probably too well known for quotation; 'Nightfall' we have not seen before and it may be one of those now printed for the first time:—

The shades of evening lengthen,—let us close
The latticed window, and draw down the blind:
These shadows seem as spirits, and the wind
Moans in its wandering; mournfully it goes
As some poor soul that grievous sorrow knows,
Or homeward traveller fearful lest he find
Beside his hearth the doom that haunts his mind,
And o'er his pathway its grim visage shows.

As haunted houses are our haunted hearts,
Wherein pale spirits of past sorrows dwell !
Wherein, as players that play many parts,
Presentiments their tragic tales foretell !
Draw close the curtain,—ay, shut out the night;
The night is dark, let love then be our light.

'After Long Years' and 'Late Fruit' both have for theme a love of long and late maturing, thus differing from most love sonnets, and both have a touch of earnestness which is not always in Mr. Waddington's poetry, therefore we quote one of them:—

AFTER LONG YEARS.

Have I not loved you, and shall love not bind
Our hearts and lives now parting days are past ?
The ivy tendrils cleave where once entwined
And will not part unbroken; boughs long clasped
And in those sheltering arms by love confined,
Would droop, if bared, beneath the stormy blast,
Cold, beating hail, and harsh life-withering wind,—
Would droop awhile, and fade, and fall at last !

Have I not loved you, and shall love be cast
From out the home where once, a winsome child,
Of old you welcomed him, and gayly smiled,
And with your long brown tresses bound him fast ?
Nay, now a man, his conquering might you know,
He holds you, sweet,—he will not let you go.

Two of the sonnets, 'The Plurality of Worlds,' addressed "To William Whewell," and 'Ireland,' seem to be regrettable. Mr. Waddington's strength is not, as these two sonnets show, in satire—still less in argument: and we think the same may be said of the sonnet form of verse, but, however that may be, it serves ill for such rough use as it is put to in these two productions. The reference in 'The Plurality of Worlds' to the well-known saying about Dr. Whewell's foible of omniscience inevitably reminds us that there was another half to that clever and by no means unmannerly twit, and that that half bore something about his science which makes it likely that he was not in that respect so greatly inferior to Mr. Waddington as might be inferred from Mr. Waddington's contemptuous chaffing (we apologize for the undignified word, but there is no other to fit the fact), and that the heresy to which Dr. Whewell gave thought and knowledge and dialectic skill is scarcely conclusively refuted by the sole argument of Mr. Waddington's ipse dixit in a sestet:

A myriad stars, a myriad orbs, are shining,—
A myriad homes, above, around, on high !
And these, oh these, are but, to our divining,
The little canopy that forms our sky :
Beyond, beyond, beyond them all must be Worlds beyond worlds through all infinity.

The 'Ireland' sonnet—"Home Rule" is its second title—is all scolding and jibes; but the scolding and the jibes must necessarily be unconvincing to Home Rulers, because they beg the questions at issue. "Let Reason rule," says the sonnet: "we do," say the Home Rulers. "Take not the 'felon's' part, nor play the 'fool,'" says the sonnet: "we don't," say the Home Rulers. What is the use of the delicate machinery of the sonnet for the fisticuffs of verse? We hope that in another edition 'The Plurality of Worlds' and 'Ireland' may not be left to be flaws in the artistic fitness and the dignity of Mr. Waddington's otherwise irreproachable 'Century of Sonnets.'

Tales and Legends from the Land of the Tsar: a Collection of Russian Stories. Translated from the original Russian by Edith M. S. Hodgetts. (Griffith, Farran & Co.)

THIS is a bright little book. Miss Hodgetts not only knows some excellent fairy tales, but has an excellent way of telling them. Her collection will very likely be a great favourite with our young people, who will probably not regret the absence of any learned notes on comparative folk-lore. There is a weird power in these Russian tales, and Miss Hodgetts says in her preface with good reason that "the perfect recklessness regarding possibility (to say nothing of probability) lends a special charm to the Russian story." How graphic, too, are the details! What a vigorous Northern picture is that of Jack Frost (Morozko) on p. 57!—

"Jack Frost jumped from branch to branch, coming nearer to her. Suddenly he sprang from the tree and stood by her side, his ice-cold fingers touching her shoulders. He was a handsome-looking old man, with a long white beard, and curly white locks hanging down his back; he had a kind-looking old face, with a good-natured smile on it."

This story must have been in the mind of the poet Nekrasov when he wrote the following clever stanza in his 'Red-nosed Frost' ('Moroz, Krasni Noz'), which has been well translated by Mr. Sumner Smith, of Yale College:—

—All stiff she is growing,
Has touched her, the frost-king, the weird:
A breath in her face he is blowing,
And on her sharp needles is strowing,
From out his huge icy gray beard.

This folk-tale will also be found in the late Mr. Ralston's work 'Russian Folk-Tales,' 1873, p. 219.

'The Snow Maiden' is a story full of poetical beauty. Certainly, judging by this and others, we cannot consider the Russian peasant to be wanting in imagination and fancy. He sets no limit to either. The absolute audacity of his conceptions seems to belong to a certain Orientalism of his mind. It is the same spirit which animates the 'Tales of the Thousand and One Nights.' Adventure follows upon adventure; time and space are as nothing, and over all there is a fatalism which regards man as the plaything of the Divinity:—

As flies to wanton boys are we to the gods:
They kill us for their sport.

There is no melancholy in these stories such as we find in the Russian novel, but a reckless, happy-go-lucky sort of existence, which makes them unique among European folk-tales.

Again, how thoroughly Oriental and luxurious is the imagery! Every one is gorgeously appraised, and there is a glory of palaces reminding one of those which Tennyson dreamed of at the court of Haroun-al-Raschid. Thus:—

"The grey wolf's costume was most extraordinary. He had a red cap on his head with green feathers in it; round his neck he had a blue silk ribbon; he wore a red velvet jacket embroidered with gold, lilac gloves with lace ruffles, a scarf round his waist; on his hind feet he had slippers, and on his tail he wore a silver net ornamented with diamonds. The feast continued until very late at night; but as soon as it was dark the golden cassowary was brought in with its golden cage, and hung up on the balcony. The whole court shone like lightning immediately, so that no lamps were wanted, not even in the streets round about the palace, as the cassowary afforded light enough."

Is Stasov right, after all, in his view that these tales are for the most part of comparatively late Oriental origin, coming into Russia by way of the bazaars and caravanserais?

Many of the tales have already been translated by Ralston; to those previously mentioned we may add 'King Vladimir and the Skeleton,' which he has given on p. 85 from Afanasiev. It is the old story of Kostchei the deathless. There is also 'Vasilissa the Beautiful' (as we prefer spelling her name), which is given by Ralston on p. 150; it seems to be a Slavonic variant of the story of Cinderella. 'The Three Kopecks' occurs on p. 43 of the same work. 'Prince Kid-skin' ('Tsarevich-kozlionochek') is a good old Russian tale, which is to be found in the collection of Afanasiev, and is by him assigned to the government of Voronezh.

One of the last tales given by Miss Hodgetts is from a famous bilina. Of course Ilya Muromets figures in the book in an excellent story. We do not like, however, the transformation of his name into Elie Muromitch, which is hardly accurate, and we are surprised that so good a Russian scholar as this lady should be contented with it. Elsewhere we have come upon some rather strange renderings of the names; but these are trivial matters. The book is well done, is decidedly amusing, and we wish it all success.

Philosophical Classics.—Francis Bacon: his Life and Philosophy. By John Nichol. 2 vols. (Blackwood & Sons.)

THE number of small books about great men is alarmingly on the increase. Every month sees the invention by some ingenious literary man or pushing publisher of a new "series"—each "series" to be complete in itself; and thus work which has already been quite well done on a certain scale must be repeated on that identical scale without so much as the pretence of fresh inquiry or original thought. At the same time it must be admitted that the "Philosophical Classics" enjoy what, among works of their class, might almost be called a long-established reputation, that Messrs. Blackwood had a clear right to dedicate a place in them to Bacon, and that they have selected a cultivated and ingenious person to carve the statue for its niche. It was certain that Prof. Nichol, if never exactly inspired, would never sink to flatness in treating any theme that interested him; and since none but a dull man could fail to be interested in Bacon, it was beyond doubt that Prof. Nichol would attack his work with the requisite enthusiasm. Indeed, we are not sure that his sails have not been inflated by too swelling a breeze when we read how "America had been found in the sunset and the high road to Cathay reopened in the dawn." But it would be needlessly severe to find fault with a genial exuberance of style, which is at least as likely to stimulate the attention as to corrupt the taste of those who acquire their knowledge through "series."

The present work, unlike its fellows, is in two volumes, giving, not unnaturally, one complete volume to the life of Bacon, so different in its fulness and variety from the ordinary life of a philosopher. Truly Bacon acted up to his principle that not even for philosophers was this world a place for "lookers-on." It might be well, indeed, both for those who dispute whether his 'Instauratio' was Utilitarian or not, and for those who deride him as postponing philosophy to the pursuit of worldly eminence, to remember how deep and settled a principle with him was the preference of the active to the contemplative life. On this we may have some words to say later. The general spirit of the present biography is favourable to Bacon. No attempt is made to deny the lack of spirit and backbone, the servile obsequiousness, that could lead the first of the judges to pervert justice at the bidding of a royal favourite. But blame is conveniently, and to some extent truly, thrown on the age, or rather the court, "at once magnificent and mean," in which Bacon lived; and our tolerance—nay, more, our pity—is dexterously roused by representing the man, who for more than two centuries has been scorned as a flatterer of royalty, as no worse than the steadfast upholder of a cause not less honourable, though less fortunate, than the cause which first defeated, and then insulted and misrepresented it. The suggestion is, perhaps, more dexterous than fair. It is not easy to see why the consideration we yield to a Falkland, encountering a premature death for fidelity to a losing but valuable principle, should be extended to Bacon, whose most obvious aspect is that of one sunning himself in the favour of a king, as yet not much less than absolute, and helping him to trick an incensed and dissatisfied nation. Prof. Nichol, in fact, adopts and even exaggerates Mr. Gardiner's unduly favourable view of Bacon's political life and purposes. Independence of character and force of will we suppose no one has ever attributed to Bacon; but we must also own that for ourselves we cannot discover in him much of statesmanlike breadth, and still less of statesmanlike insight. Imbued for the first forty years of his life with the spirit and aim of the Elizabethan era, intimately connected with its leading men, and patronized by its central sun, the queen, it is not to be wondered at if he emerged steeped in Royalist sentiment and prone to exaggerate the value of central authority. In saying this of him no moral blame is imputed, but we deny him the penetration which might have discerned the influx of new and strong currents into the spirit of his time—we deny him the judicial calmness which might have made even a man who foresaw nothing of the future distrust the wisdom of loading a scale already predominant. In fact, Bacon showed in political matters neither calmness nor penetration. He was not a statesman, but a "politique." His one wish was to be powerful—that he might advance the cause of philosophy and the welfare of the human race, it is true, and partly, it cannot be doubted, because he loved dignity and pomp. One statesmanlike object may be attributed to him, a real desire to consolidate and organize that chaotic mass of judicial decisions known as the common law; but of this purpose, endowed though he was with a mind and training admirably fitted for it, he accomplished even less than of his other design, the advancement of science. To two things he really devoted himself—the means of elevating his fortune, and the elaboration of a new logic. He attained conspicuous success in both; but the fortune unworthily built up crumbled in its possessor's hands; the logic, constructed with too little regard or study of the most earnest workers in the same field that Bacon himself desired to sow, was marred by egregious blunders, and misplaced scorn, and finally evoked enough of ridicule and opposition almost to counterbalance the great effects it should have produced by its merits. Caustic as was Dr. Abbott's sketch of Bacon's life, we find in it not merely an intimate study of the original documents, but a penetration and knowledge of human nature far greater than we discover in Prof. Nichol's manual, which, honestly compiled as it is, yet, lacking a true and thorough clue, produces in the end a bewildering, confused impression, of which little more can be said than that it involves hardly more affection for Bacon and far less understanding of him than the unsparing, but truly judicial work of Dr. Abbott.

Mr. Nichol's second volume offers less debatable matter, and in style, selection, and arrangement must be pronounced decidedly successful. The book opens by presenting Bacon's own view, expressed in his own fresh and vigorous metaphors, of his relation to his predecessors—a view which is followed by a later and more impartial estimate of that relation, based on good modern authorities. The estimate, of course, is not free from some of the faults which inevitably attend compilations. A reader of the original 'Timæus'—at least one who read it for its own sake—could hardly describe as a mere réchauffé of Pythagorean and Democritean fantasies the work which first stated and signalized the place of the brain in the human organism, a truth again lost or endlessly controverted when its discoverer had passed away; nor can the inquiry into the nature of space—another striking chapter in the 'Timæus,' and actually referred to on p. 19 of the volume before us—be regarded as either a borrowed or a baseless fantasy. It is a serious fault to tell us that "the acoustics, as the optics, of the Greeks rest on the assumption of emissions and transmitting media," first, because these last words conjoin into one two absolutely opposing theories (since what is "emitted" travels by virtue of the original expulsive force, while "transmission" is due to the activity of the medium); secondly, because Aristotle, at least in his 'De Anima,' mentioning both theories, rejects emission in favour of transmission. It may be added that this contemptuous mode of speaking of assumptions on which distinguished men of science have elaborated extensive theories, and one of which actually dominates present scientific thought, is quite uncalled for and misleading. Prof. Nichol is, in fact, not altogether fortunate in dealing with Aristotle, as we may show by two more instances, which, to be sure, in a sense balance one another; so that if Aristotle rises by a correction of one error, he sinks by correction of the other. Still, if we desire truth, a protest must be made against the citation on p. 27 of a notoriously obscure passage from the 'Physics'—in apparent contradiction, too, to the whole tenor of the Aristotelian logic—as a typical statement of Aristotelian doctrine. On the other hand, we must reclaim, perhaps with a blush, for Aristotle what Prof. Nichol calls on p. 78 "medieval allegory"—the association, that is, of form with the male, matter with the female principle of the universe. In spite, however, of these blemishes, Prof. Nichol's introductory chapters may fairly be pronounced charming and instructive. He does justice to the scattered "aperçus" of Bacon's predecessors while noting their almost irresistible tendency to return to the worst Aristotelian ruts. He does justice to the boundless curiosity of the Greeks, and to the real value of much of its fruits. He aptly compares it to "the ardour of a child putting questions, the answers to which he cannot understand." The parallel is even closer than he has suspected. The child and the ancient Greek do not even know what sort of answer ought to content them; but it is one of the fruits of the long intellectual struggle of Greece—reaped, it is true, only partially by itself—that it has taught us to conceive more truly what makes a satisfying, what an unsatisfying response. With this knowledge, too, we can put our questions more wisely, and to ask the right question is one half of knowledge.

The account here given, in general admirable, of Bacon's intellectual achievement, gifts, and defects has, perhaps, one fault. It is somewhat painfully complicated at times by the author's endeavour to give the fullest account possible within his limits of the whole endless and involved series of Bacon's writings. It may be questioned whether so much should have been attempted in a compendium; it is open to doubt whether a clearer, more favourable, and at the same time more just appreciation of Bacon's genius would not have been attained by neglecting the posthumous works, the interminable unstudied and unpolished conjectures of a leisured philosopher, given to the world, without the curtailments and revision that their author would have applied, by a young and injudicious admirer. Such a stumbling-block and stone of offence as the 'Sylva Sylvarum' might have been left in MS. to the tender mercies of the kitchen-maid without loss to anybody and with much gain to Bacon's fame. Verily, Bacon might have complained that the light planks of his philosophy had alone been saved from shipwreck and the stronger timbers lost if he had seen these minor tracts the mark of scoffers and the study of antiquarian commentators, while the 'Novum Organum' was put aside as commonplace and superficial.

Finally, we cannot refrain from breaking a lance in an old dispute with Prof. Nichol. Was Macaulay wrong in describing Bacon as essentially a practical, not a speculative, philosopher? In spite of all Mr. Nichol's pleadings, we are not persuaded that he was. Power and command over nature in the largest sense, that all its resources might be used for the largest of ends, "the relief of man's estate"—this still seems to us the truest description of Bacon's object. Practicality remains the chief note of his character, but a practicality raised immeasurably above that of the vulgar pleasure-seeker or successful business man by the width of his sympathy and the comprehensiveness of his view. And such a character is no doubt what Macaulay intended to indicate, what Macaulay, allowing for the far narrower range of his intellect, fully sympathized with, not one content with mere discoveries—such as Prof. Nichol unfairly and sophistically suggests—that a particular person would do well “to shun mince-pies.” The magnificent passages from the ‘Advancement of Learning’ tell us that we should not seek in knowledge “a terrace with a fair prospect”; they impeach Paris’s judgment not as preferring “pleasure” to “wisdom,” but as preferring “pleasure and love” (that is, sensual pleasure) to “wisdom and power”; they admonish us that in this world none may be lookers-on, as the philosopher vainly described himself to be, “but God and the angels alone”—the contemplative life is not to be put into comparison with the active. All this comes from Prof. Nichol’s own selected quotations, and those of one or two pages alone. We leave any reader to decide whether they make for or against the litigant who relies on them. In fact, Mr. Nichol himself calls Bacon “in part a Utilitarian, not because he loved truth less, but man more.” The description is just, and it certainly is not one that the most gifted of men need scorn to have applied to him.

A Winter Tour in South Africa. By Sir Frederick Young, K.C.M.G. (Petherick & Co.)

A PAPER read last November before the Royal Colonial Institute has formed the nucleus of this octavo volume, which describes a three months’ tour in South Africa, favoured by circumstances that turned the journey into something like a triumphal progress. As a late honorary secretary and present vice-president of the Colonial Institute, Sir Frederick Young had a just claim upon the goodwill of colonists sitting under their own roof-tree which they were not slow to recognize, and he relates with pardonable complacency how, on his arrival at Cape Town, “every one without exception, public men and high officials, members of the Cape Government, leaders of the Opposition, and innumerable private friends, Dutch and English alike,” showered compliments and hospitalities upon him, which proved an earnest of the “kind and lavish attentions” that met him at every stage of his route, extending up the country to Waterburg in the Northern Transvaal, thence down to Durban, and along the east coast to Port Elizabeth.

The story of this eminently enjoyable trip is told in a spirit that cannot fail to gratify the colonial worthies who conspired so successfully to give it a festal character; but the work put into the book is too slight to make it in any true sense a solid contribution to the already voluminous collection of South African literature issued even since the last war, and decided conclusions are too often announced by the author, unsupported by evidence sufficient to enable the reader to reach any conclusions whatever. The most interesting non-political chapter is that devoted to the mining industries of Kimberley, which have been many times described; but Sir Frederick Young chronicles in terms of high approbation an attempt to deal with the spirituous liquor difficulty in relation to indigenous labourers which is comparatively recent, and certainly fits in with the theory carefully instilled into his mind that the natives “are to be regarded as mere children,” and must be under the guidance of a firmly controlling hand. This paternal system is thus described:—

“Excellent arrangements are made for the protection and well-being of the native workmen, especially by the introduction of ‘compounds’ during the last year or two. These are vast enclosures with high walls, where the natives compulsorily reside after their daily work is done during the whole time they remain at work in the mine. This system has been attended with the most satisfactory results. I went over the De Beer’s ‘compound,’ where I saw an immense number of natives, all appearing lively, cheerful, and happy. A large number were playing at cards (they are great gamblers) and others amusing themselves in various ways. No intoxicating liquor is permitted to be sold within the ‘compounds.’ The weekly receipts for gingerbeer amount to a sum which seems fabulous, averaging from 60*l.* to 100*l.* a week. The natives can purchase from the compound store every possible thing they want, from a tin pot to a blanket, from a suit of old clothes to a pannikin of mealies. Before the establishment of the ‘compounds,’ when the natives had the free run of the town, and could obtain alcoholic liquor—on Saturday nights especially after they had done their work and received their weekly wages—Kimberley was a perfect pandemonium.”

The question why, if a high hand is to rule the well-being of the native labourers, the grog shops should be left open and the men skut up (with a single store to monopolize their necessary purchases), is not raised.

Bechuanaland impressed Sir Frederick Young as “a land of promise” and field for settlement. In his chapter on colonization he puts out the idea that non-commissioned married officers and soldiers should be encouraged to form “a military colony at the expense of the Home Government in a wisely selected spot and under proper and judicious arrangement.” In the Dutch republic he was struck with the number of English names over shop-doors, and with the amount of English spoken at Pretoria and the smaller towns, as indicating a sure, if gradual Anglicizing of the Transvaal. He took advantage of an interview with President Kruger to declare a hope that he might see the day when the Republic would be penetrated by railroads north, south, east, and west; but the cautious Dutchman vouchsafed no more definite answer to this “strongly expressed aspiration” than a smile.

Sir Frederick Young is an ardent advocate of Imperial Federation, and his volume contains as part of its appendix a lecture on that topic recently delivered by him.

Readings on the Purgatorio of Dante, chiefly based on the Commentary of Benvenuto da Imola. By the Hon. W. W. Vernon. 2 vols. (Macmillan & Co.)

THE commentary by Benvenuto of Imola, the pupil of Boccaccio and friend of Petrarch, had long been known to students of Dante, by name at any rate, as one of the most rich in information among the many which the half-century after Dante’s death produced, and perhaps quite the freest of them all from the faults of pedantry and strained interpretation. For a long time, indeed, there was a popular belief, based partly on Benvenuto’s reputation, partly on a misunderstanding of some words in the colophon to the book, that the commentary in the early edition of Vindelin da Spira was due to him; but this was shown to be erroneous by Muratori, who actually printed most of the historical portions of the true commentary in his great work the ‘Italian Antiquities.’ Several MSS., among them one in the Cambridge University Library, have been furnished with commentaries borrowed wholly or mainly from Benvenuto; and some thirty or forty years ago a so-called Italian translation, inaccurate to the point of dishonesty, was published in the great man’s native town. But the entire commentary remained practically inaccessible to scholars; only a few MSS. of it existed, and these were all in Italian libraries. At length the munificence of Mr. Vernon, aided by the industry and learning of Sir James Lacaita, accomplished in 1887 the task before which scholars (with the honourable exception of the American Dante Society, whose project for a similar work was only abandoned on the announcement of Mr. Vernon’s intention) and publishers had hitherto shrunk. When the book appeared it was felt that, merely as a specimen of mediæval literature, it took a very high place. In the introduction, written in his own delightful manner, which Dean Church has prefixed to the volumes before us, he gives his estimate of Benvenuto in words which, as we cannot improve upon them, we will quote:—

“His work, though not the earliest commentary, is perhaps the most important. It is unequal in the illustrations which he inserts, and the explanation he gives of difficulties; but it contains a great mass of useful and curious information.....To comment adequately on the Commedia was beyond the power of those who in the fourteenth century undertook to do so. To comment worthily a man must have something of the deep and serious temper of the writer, and this was not the spirit of Boccaccio, who set the fashion of lecturing. Benvenuto is a scholar with a good deal of classical reading, a man of Italian good sense, Italian humour, and in considerable proportion Italian cynicism. He will go as far as knowledge and a sensible view will carry him; his humour and cynicism will sometimes find kindred materials in his subject, and sometimes will be out of place: but the awful and solemn depths of a soul, which had dwelt for years in the presence of the eternal world and had all but seen it, were beyond his capacity. Still, he is very instructive. He tells a great number of things which we should not otherwise know. He often shows good sense in his explanation of a passage or choice of a reading. He knows what others have said about his subject, and supplements or corrects them.”

A commentary of which this can be said was obviously worth reproducing. But since in the large octavo form in which it has been reproduced it fills more than 2,500 pages, it is equally obvious that only very determined students were likely to make acquaintance with it. Mr. Vernon has, therefore, added to the debt which readers of Dante already owed to him and his family by publishing these “readings,” in which he has, so to speak, boiled down

Benvenuto for the general reader; dividing each canto after him in the way which seems to have been regarded in those days as essential to a "high-toned" commentary, and further breaking up each division into short lengths, which he translates into English prose and then elucidates. The book is thus complete in itself, containing the entire text of the 'Purgatory,' a literal prose version, and the "readings," which—though, as we have said, they are based on those of the Imolese—are by no means drawn from that source alone. Mr. Vernon has studied the more recent commentaries, especially those of Longfellow, Scartazzini, and Dr. Plumptre, and occasionally can add something of interest from his own information. Thus:—

"Sir James Lacaita once told me that in 1822 the historian Troya was travelling about in the Val di Magra, in search of materials to collect for the purpose of writing a life of Dante, and he was hospitably entertained by the Marchese Malaspina, who descended in the direct male line from the one who six hundred [sic] years before had received and entertained Dante himself."

A little touch like this, which (mutatis mutandis) we might have found in Benvenuto himself, bridges over the gulf of centuries (nearer five, by the way, than six), and makes the reader feel that in Mr. Vernon no small portion of the mediæval commentator's spirit still survives.

The misfortune is that the earth has quickened its period of rotation so enormously since those good old days. We are aware that astronomy does not teach this, nor, indeed, is the fact one which astronomical appliances are capable of detecting, any more than the scales will show that a pint of peas weighs less at the equator than at the Pole. But just as one weighing by a spring balance gets better measure at the former station than at the latter, so by comparison of the work done is it easy to see that twenty-four hours in the fourteenth century must have meant a very different period from its nominal equivalent in the nineteenth. Consequently, while there was plenty of time for Benvenuto to compile the enormous mass of erudition and gossip which he has bequeathed to us, and doubtless also for his admiring disciples to read and enjoy it, in these less spacious times it is to be feared that some will find even Mr. Vernon's much condensed 'Readings' a trifle prolix. Why, they will say, was it necessary on one page to quote Benvenuto as remarking "that the Sicilian tyrants Dionysius and Phalaris never invented any worse torture than envy" (a remark, it may be observed, which does not profess to be original), and on the next to give, quite independently, the passage of Horace upon which Benvenuto was here enlarging? Why, again, should such an exceeding commonplace observation of the good Imolese as "that men are wont to turn a phrase so as to avoid pronouncing anything horrible," be deemed worthy of reproduction? These are two instances, taken at random in turning over the pages, of a kind of thing which is all very well when a lecture has to be made to occupy its hour—for what man can talk an hour on any subject, and say nothing not worth hearing?—but upon which, as we have said, the modern student, who expects to get his information in a compressed form, rather grudges having to waste his time. Those who have leisure, and merely want to see without much trouble what a mediæval commentary on Dante "amounts to," will find Mr. Vernon a pleasant guide, and fairly safe. Of course there are many points on which he takes, as every commentator must do, a view which others will be inclined to controvert; but on these there is no need to dwell.

We note, however, a few undoubted blunders which seem to have been overlooked when the errata were sent to the printer. Faenza was never called "Forum Favii" (i. 370), though the neighbouring Forlì no doubt was "Forum Livii." "Faventia," however, is a name not unknown in Roman history. The note (ii. 137), "Figliuole is the Italianized form of filiole, the vocative case of filioles. The literal sense here would be 'O my little son.' We also find scolare for scolaro; pensiere for pensiero, &c.," is partly superfluous, partly irrelevant, and partly incorrect. Vernaccia, whatever the derivation of that obscure word may be, is certainly not "from the Latin vinaciola" (ii. 166), even if such a wondrous formation were possible. In Purg. xxv. 80 a little attention to scholastic terminology would have shown that when Benvenuto explained in virtute by "id est, in potentia sua," he did not mean "by its innate power." On p. 55 of the same volume the remarkable name "Fabricius Caius Luscivius" (which would seem rather to belong to the seventh circle) appears to be due to Mr. Vernon's unaided invention; unless, indeed, a mysterious Caius Licinius, whom Benvenuto drags suddenly into the middle of the Fabricius story, has in some way contributed to it. Lastly, a good many readers will fail to make out the meaning of the following statement: "Duns Scotus placed less reliance upon the power of reason than did Thomas Aquinas, who may be ranked as a rationalist, while the former may be styled a sceptic." Rather a startling estimate of the Angelic and Subtle Doctors; but a reference to Ueberweg throws some light on its origin.

If, in another edition, these and other little matters of the same kind could be revised, and the superfluities excised, the book might take a permanent place among the aids to the study of Dante.

NOVELS OF THE WEEK.

- Without Love or Licence.* By Hawley Smart. 3 vols. (Chatto & Windus.)
A Railway Foundling. By Nomad. 3 vols. (Trischler & Co.)
A Lover of the Beautiful. By Katherine Carmarthen. (Macmillan & Co.)
Lothair's Children. By H. R. H. (Remington & Co.)

LOVE, to a very moderate extent, has a place in Mr. Smart's new volumes; and licence, or the want of it, has, one can see, an important bearing on the story; but whether the proceedings of the illicit distiller, or of the lady who is married in a registry office, stand most in need of such preliminary sanction it is for the reader to determine. The honest bookmaker who plays so important a part in the final settling-day which squares the account between Richard Lydney and his injured relations, and who is generally the good genius of the piece, is a character in whom the author has always testified an honourable confidence, and Sam Mercer is an agreeable specimen of a much-abused fraternity. His black-browed sister, whose schemes of ambition are so audacious and so simple, and whose desire to marry a gentleman is only satiated by bigamy with two baronets, is a less agreeable portrait. She is certainly badly used by the commonplace young man who becomes her first husband, and when she "calls for fresh cards and a fresh deal" it is impossible not to sympathize with her rather barefaced demand. She is clumsy enough in her efforts to cut the connubial bond, and it is sad to find at last that she becomes "one of those lost Pleiades upon whom society has closed the gates of Paradise." (Our author seems here a little "mixed.") Virtue as represented by Mary Lydney is charming, but a trifle colourless.

'A Railway Foundling' will prove a disappointment to many people exactly in so far as it does not carry out the hopes raised by Mr. Aird's interesting introductory notice, of a study of that peculiar phase of modern labour so little known to the outside world. The organized bands of migratory workers, with their leaders and superintendents, who move about the country wherever the exigencies of railroad work require their huge labour and enterprise, may strike the imagination as forcibly as those wandering companies of cathedral builders in the Middle Ages of whom their existence reminds us. The bands of English workmen whom the late Mr. Brassey, for instance, led from one side of the world to the other to open up the way between the nations, are well worthy of remembrance, and their exploits are full of interest and suggestiveness. It is greatly to be regretted that "Nomad" should have chosen to pass so lightly over the rich vein of interest evidently at her command to give precedence to the love affairs of a number of commonplace, not to say common, young people, perfectly realistic and healthy, but somewhat lacking in those qualities of refinement and personal distinction on which the author nevertheless insists. The complications of the plot are decidedly more melodramatic than pleasing. It is to be hoped that few men would inaugurate their acquaintance with a young girl by relating to her such a story as that which Philip Dyketon unfolded about his mother to Mabel Ellaby, whom, by the way, he from the first addresses as "child." The drawbacks of the story are the more irritating as they obscure much that would have been interesting in itself. "Nomad" gives evidence of real ability in the byways and minor sketches of her novel; it is to be hoped she will give it better scope on a future occasion than in conventional mysteries about concealed marriages and legitimacies, or in such fancy sketches from what the French call "le highif" as the "Countess Smalkington's" manners and conversation.

Admiration for the work of certain modern English painters, and the delight of a true imagination in the great sources from which they have drawn their inspiration (and also their limitations), appear to form the basis of the Marchioness of Carmarthen's story, and naturally prove quite inadequate to meet the strictly definite demands of all literary enterprise. 'A Lover of the Beautiful' recalls with a certain vividness the warmth and colour of Rossetti's pictures, instinct with the poetry of the 'Vita Nuova'; but the human interest fails, and the hero, Della Varazia, artist and poet, is scarcely such stuff as literary dreams are made of. The husband of a perfectly beautiful and adoring young wife, who repels her advances with quotations from Plato (or the mediæval mystics' interpretation of him) in dispraise of earthly affection, is certainly liable, as in this case, to end by killing her with boredom. The poetic justice which Fate reserves for him can afford but a poor satisfaction to her or the reader, and none at all to that quite lifelike and agreeable person Cousin Silvano. The Italian atmosphere and scenery are fairly well reproduced, and there is much to show that if Lady Carmarthen were to turn her attention with careful study to life and nature, she might when she writes again be much more successful.

The latest venture of the writer who veils his identity beneath the modest initials of H. R. H. is worthy of notice not for its intrinsic merits, which are of the slightest, but for the principle which it involves. Hitherto authors have universally enjoyed the privilege of writing sequels to their own stories if so inclined. But Mr. or Mrs. or Miss "H. R. H." threatens to deprive them of that innocent prerogative, and to establish a precedent which if generally adopted will surely make all the great novelists turn in their graves. The boiling down of Scott was bad enough, but this is far worse, as it suggests endless possibilities of literary vandalism. Turning to the present volume, it is enough to say that H. R. H. is hardly qualified to wear Lord Beaconsfield's mantle. H. R. H. is devoted to the aristocracy and upholstery, but there the resemblance ends. The names are a study in themselves. There is an Antinus and a Lady Kerrera, the former of whom is beautiful, and the latter of marble pallor. Then why not frankly call them Antinous and Carrara? Then we have an eminent statesman named Mr. Sadrocke; but why continue the enumeration further? Let us end this imperfect notice with an eloquent quotation:—

"I have been in Corisande's garden," Lothair had once said to the Duchess, "and she has given me a rose." And yet all that this implied had not come to pass, and Corisande was dead, another man's wife; and Clare Arundel instead of being the bride of the Church was Lothair's wife."

EARLY CHRISTIAN LITERATURE.

Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der Altchristlichen Literatur. Von Oscar von Gebhardt und Adolf Harnack.—Band V. Heft IV. Agrapha: Aussercanonische Evangelienfragmente, &c. Von P. Prim. Alfred Resch.—Anhang: das Evangelienfragment von Fajjum. Von Adolf Harnack. (Williams & Norgate.)—The work before us enters a field not untrodden. It has been partially examined by various scholars from Cotelierus, Grabe, and Fabricius down to Hilgenfeld, Pick, and Dodd. None of these, however, has aimed at a complete survey, nor entered with much critical minuteness into the sources of the materials dealt with. Kirchenrath Resch is the first who has attempted to explore the entire subject. The title agrapha, a term derived from St. Clement of Alexandria, is applied to words of our Lord not found in the canonical gospels, but preserved traditionally, including other authentic words in patristic citations, derived from an extra-canonical source. To trace and collect these is the object of Dr. Resch. The most important part of the work is contained in the ninth, tenth, and eleventh sections, which present a list of the logia, followed by exegetical remarks upon them, with additional logia by way of appendix. In all cases the logia are accompanied by canonical parallels. It is noteworthy that none are found having cognate expressions in St. John's Gospel, though all other canonical books of the New Testament are adduced. Agreeably to his purpose the compiler describes doubtful and spurious agrapha with the fragments of apocryphal gospels, such as those of the Egyptians, of the Didascalia, and of the Hebrews. The subject with all its branches comes under the notice of this industrious scholar. It is impossible to show the exact method pursued without giving an example, for which purpose a short one has been selected: "a. Clem. Rom. I. 46, 2, p. 76, 2.

γέγραπται γὰρ κολλᾶσθε τοῖς ἁγίοις, ὅτι οἱ κολλώμενοι αὐτοῖς ἀγιασθήσονται.
b. Duae viae vel Judicium Petri (=Kav. ἐκκλησι.) c. 12 p. 115, ed. Hilgenfeld.
κολλώμενος γὰρ ἁγίοις ἀγιασθήσῃ.
c. Clem. Al. Strom. V. 8, 53, p. 677.
γέγραπται δὲ μετὰ ἀνδρὸς ἀθώου ἁθῶος ἔση καὶ μετὰ ἐκλεκτοῦ ἐκλεκτὸς ἔση καὶ μετὰ στρεβλοῦ διαστρέψει. κολλᾶσθαι οὖν τοῖς ἁγίοις προσήκει, ὅτι οἱ κολλώμενοι αὐτοῖς ἀγιασθήσονται."

A critical illustration of a page and a half illustrates this logion, which appears to be authentic, being introduced by "for it is written." But another saying which Dr. Resch puts among the authentic ones cannot be so reckoned, viz., "And to those who think that God tempts, as the Scriptures say, he said, The evil one is the tempter." Though this citation from the Clementine Homilies has a parallel in 1 Thessalonians iii. 5, it is difficult to believe that Christ really spoke the words.

The materials accumulated and digested by the author far exceed former collections. Fathers, versions, apocryphal writings, ancient MSS., have all been laid under contribution with a view to completeness. Amid so much research into the sources of sayings which do not appear in canonical works, it is natural to find too many, and such a tendency is observable in Dr. Resch, whose critical judgment is hardly equal to his knowledge of the literature of the subject. His discussions of the logia must not be accepted without scrutiny. No fewer than sixty-two logia are thought to be authentic, besides the greater number of the supplementary ones. The lists may well be reduced. The theories of the writer on many debatable and difficult topics relating to the Gospels are often set forth with confidence. He has rightly directed attention to Codex D, the readings of the old Italic, and the ancient Syriac versions, putting a high value on them—higher, perhaps, than they have hitherto been supposed to have. He has also employed sources not applied to the same purpose before, such as Agathangelus, the Didache, the οὐράνιος διαλόγος, &c. He assumes a pre-canonical Urevangelium written in Hebrew, to which he traces not a few logia throughout the New Testament, a theory open to many objections. His treatment of the Gospel according to the Hebrews is specially unsatisfactory, because he believes that its original language was Greek, and that it was made from St. Matthew's Greek Gospel with the help of the Urevangelium. The author would have done better if he had refused to follow Prof. Harnack's advice, and had avoided the subject. As Dr. Resch maintains the Greek original of St. Matthew's Gospel, he discards the authentic Hebrew logia as its base, but admits they were used in its compilation, not without the Hebrew Urevangelium, which he makes one source of all the synoptics. Such speculations are flimsy enough, though they follow in part the similar ones of Weiss. We observe that Dr. Resch assumes as a fact the priority of St. Mark among the synoptics, as also the use of the fourth Gospel by Justin Martyr. The author does not hesitate to state that a redactor sometimes abridged the text of a canonical gospel, of which he finds an example in St. Matthew x. 23, where D and Origen add, κάν ἐν τῇ ἐτέρᾳ διώκωσιν, πάλιν φεύγετε εἰς τὴν ἄλλην. While we attach great value to the text of D, we should hesitate to assume as its basis a document of the second century, or to trace the Syriac versions back to the same age. Yet the author feels no difficulty in making such hazardous assumptions. Although we often differ from the critical opinions of the author, we look upon his book as an important contribution to an interesting subject. It exhibits an amount of early patristic knowledge seldom equalled, as well as a keen perception of textual parallels. Henceforward it must rank as a classical work on the topic. It will also supplement the critical apparatus of future editions of the Greek Testament; and no editor can afford to neglect it. Not a few of the readings here adduced are absent even from the copious collation which accompanies Tischendorf's edition. Every student of the New Testament who seeks to know all the words of Christ which it is possible to find will gladly avail himself of the valuable help now within reach. The papyrus fragment which Dr. Harnack describes in the last part of the volume was discovered by Bickell in 1885, and has since been commented on by scholars of different countries. The document having been printed in facsimile, Harnack imitates the original letters as nearly as possible, supplying the words and parts of words that are wanting, after the manner of Bickell and Usener. The difficulty consists in supplementing the deficiencies in the last four lines, the first three being easily filled up. The gospel MS. to which they belonged appears to be of the third century, and represents an Egyptian text. The parallels to the passage are St. Matthew xxvi. 30-34, St. Mark xiv. 26-30; but these canonical gospels have no words corresponding to the commencing φαγεῖν ὡς ἐξ ἔθους. Whether the writer had the two canonical gospels before him, and whether his source was tradition, the logia of St. Matthew, or the Gospel to the Hebrews, are matters of speculation. The subject admits of no probable solution, so that Harnack himself leaves it undecided. His short essay embraces all that is necessary to give the reader a full knowledge of the old fragment. Our regret is that the words are so few and so imperfect; but every part of an original gospel text so early as the third century is important to the New Testament critic.

Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der Altchristlichen Literatur.—Band VI. Heft II. Der Paulinismus des Ireneus: eine Kirchen- und Dogmengeschichtliche Untersuchung ueber Verhältniss des Ireneus zu der Paulinischen Briefsammlung und Theologie. Von Dr. Johannes Werner. (Williams & Norgate.)—The essay on St. Ireneus is divided into two parts, one belonging to ecclesiastical history, and another belonging to the history of doctrines. Each of them is subdivided into sections, the first into three, the second into five. The work is sufficiently comprehensive, omitting nothing that properly belongs to its subject, and containing topics of importance to the student of early Christianity. In the formation of the Catholic Church and of the New Testament canon St. Ireneus was a prominent factor. A writer who has 1,065 quotations from the early Christian literature, of which no fewer than 324 are from St. Paul's epistles, must be interesting to the theologian. The main difficulty of the subject which Dr. Werner has undertaken lies, as he candidly notes, in the question whether St. Ireneus's coincidences with the sentiments of St. Paul were consciously derived from the apostle, came from Paulinizing Gnostics, or were the common property of Christendom before this Father's time. One thing is clear, that his ideas often differ from St. Paul's. Faith is not the same in both writers. According to St. Irenæus we are justified by faith and works. It must be admitted that St. Irenæus did not rightly grasp the essence of Paulinism. The tendency of his mind was practical rather than speculative. Dr. Werner's monograph is an able examination of the topic of which it treats, and no student of Church history can afford to ignore it. The author has studied carefully and minutely the great work of the Lyons father, comparing its contents with the Pauline epistles in a fashion which for thoroughness cannot be easily surpassed. If we have any fault to find with what he has done, it is with his bad style, and with an occasional failure in perceiving what St. Paul's ideas really were. He is not so well versed in Paulinism as he is in the opinions of St. Irenæus, though his knowledge of the New Testament is extensive.

SCHOOL-BOOKS.

Jackson's New Style Vertical Writing Copy-Books. (Sampson Low & Co.)—These copy-books appear to be designed for the practice, rather than the teaching, of upright penmanship, which is said to be "required in the Civil Service and Government examinations." The copies are clear and distinctly legible, but they are ugly by reason of their verticality, and we cannot admit that they possess all the advantages claimed for them by Mr. Jackson. The sentences to be copied are sensibly chosen, and contain a good deal of information—several of them, however, should have been revised.

Kindergarten Games without Music. By Wilhelmina L. Rooper. With Preface by T. G. Rooper. (Griffith, Farran & Co.)—Mrs. Wilhelmina Rooper has compiled forty-two games for "baby classes"—a school year's course. The games are judiciously chosen, and seem suitable for little children. They will no doubt, in the hands of competent and sympathetic teachers, enliven the school hours of the youngsters for whom they are intended. The introduction, by T. G. Rooper, is devoted to elucidation of the principles underlying the games, and is written in the rather rhapsodical style frequently affected by Fröbel's admirers.

Premier Livre de Lecture. By A. Cogery. (Relfe Brothers.)—Mr. Cogery in this little book supplies for the use of young beginners in French a series of well-chosen, simple, and interesting reading lessons. Under every line is the literal English translation, word by word. This is a very old method of learning the first rudiments of French, and possesses great practical advantages, although it was never regarded with the favour that, in our opinion, it deserves. This useful little book is further recommended by its cheapness—it costs but sixpence.

Wilhelm Tell. Schauspiel von F. Schiller. Edited by Karl Breul. (Cambridge, University Press.)—Dr. Breul has brought out 'Wilhelm Tell' with a learned introduction and commentary for the Pitt Press. That there was any great necessity for doing this when the Clarendon Press edition is obtainable at a low price may be doubted; but that is rather a question for the University Syndicate than Dr. Breul. He has done his work both carefully and well; and for those who wish really to master the play nothing could be better, but Dr. Buchheim's less elaborate notes will be found more suitable for pupils who simply want to pass elementary examinations. A little slip in the English of the learned editor at the bottom of p. xlviii had better be corrected in another edition.

Practical and Conversational Lessons in Spanish. By J. W. Ralfe. Part II. (Liverpool, the Author.)—This second part deserves a good deal of the praise we gave to the first. Any one working under an intelligent teacher will find this volume assist him in acquiring quickly a knowledge of commercial Spanish. Sometimes additional explanations might be desirable. For instance, on p. 49 it would have been well to explain the difference in meaning between "acontecer" and "suceder."

Samson Agonistes. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by C. S. Jerram. (Rivingtons.)—Milton's Samson Agonistes. With Introduction and Notes by H. M. Percival. (Macmillan & Co.)—Both these editions show care. Prof. Percival's notes are very elaborate—too elaborate, we think, for schoolboys. He is particularly fond of illustrative quotations, and draws them from rather a wide range of literature, and the pupil who would appreciate them must know his Greek plays well and have read a good deal of Elizabethan literature. Mr. Jerram's notes are more concise, and we think better fitted for schoolboys. On the other hand, Prof. Percival's introduction is superior to that of his rival. Surely it is not needful to give a sketch of Milton's life, as Mr. Jerram does, in a book of this kind. Mr. Jerram should omit his note on p. x; it is slightly foolish.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

PROF. BLACKIE, in the preface to his Essays on Subjects of Moral and Social Interest (Edinburgh, Douglas), speaks of them as discourses; he might have gone a step further and called them sermons. Sermons they are; and written sermons, as he himself says, are comparatively ineffective. He is speaking, to be sure, of the want of dignity in the modern Scottish pulpit, attributing it in some measure to "the evil habit which has been creeping in latterly of reading sermons instead of speaking them"; but it is quite as great a mistake to address a reader in a style meant for a listener. Prof. Blackie wears one with exordium, with lessons picked up by the way, and with explanations of what explains itself. But these are mere affairs of style, unfortunate especially because Prof. Blackie has much to say and has no doubt about what he means. Academic essays, perhaps, afford relaxation to one of the least academic of professors. He may have found the writing of his 'Philosophy of Party' an exhilarating exercise; his readers will prefer the essay on Scottish nationality, in which he points out the national characteristics with clear decision, and inveighs against the "disease of Anglification" with refreshing freedom. But the most interesting part of Prof. Blackie's book is that which deals with education—the essay on the philosophy of education and the practical appendix on how to learn and teach languages. Here the author finds much to combat, and he is always at his best when combative. First, there is "the besetting sin of our modern education, the worship of books," and this really forms the groundwork for the whole of Prof. Blackie's admirable disquisition, every word of which deserves attention. When he comes to the practical application of his theories he is less strong, for he fails to grapple with the difficulty which at once presents itself, the sordid question of how much his system would cost. The teaching which depends on the energy and the personality of the teacher is hard to get, and necessarily expensive, and must require a proportionately large staff. The "natural" method depends on this dictum: "Languages are learned in a natural way by the constant and frequent repetition of certain sounds addressed to the ear, and reproduced by the tongue of the learner, in direct connexion with interesting objects of his immediate environment." Few educationalists at the present day will be found to object to this; but the proper and possible ways of putting it into practice are not easy to be sure about. And one cannot put out of sight the danger that occurs to teachers who have tried the natural method—the danger of going beyond the point at which the teacher may begin to do too much, and fail to force upon the learner the essential lesson of self-reliance, the necessity of facing and working out difficulties for himself.

THE first part of Mr. Ashbee's Bibliography of Tunisia from the Earliest Time to the End of 1888 (Dulau) is a reprint of the appendix to Messrs. Graham and Ashbee's 'Travels in Tunisia'; the second part is a list of such works as have appeared since the publication of that volume, or were omitted in the catalogue mentioned. A bibliography in the strict sense of the term it can scarcely be called, for it is neither descriptive nor critical. The compiler has not attempted to follow the books through their several editions, to indicate their typographical or iconographical peculiarities, or, with the exception of an occasional note on an important or specially useful work, to analyze their contents. Nor does Mr. Ashbee claim that more than a small number of the "items" he registers have passed through his hands, previous African bibliographies—such as the extremely faulty ones of Gay, Kayser, and Veth and Kan—and booksellers' catalogues being the chief materials employed in the preparation of this quarto of 144 pages. However, for all practical purposes it may be regarded as almost exhaustive and fairly correct, though of course, by adopting the statements of his authorities, Mr. Ashbee has made himself responsible for a good many errors of omission and commission. Thus, not to mention the numerous books and papers printed since 1888, which demand a supplement to themselves, we note the absence of any mention of Lafitte and Servonnét's monograph on the Gulf of Gabès, Fallot's 'Tunisie' (printed in Tunis), Gregory's 'Egypt and Tunis,' a list of the Tunisian journals (of which there are eleven), or of the local guide-books. Nevertheless there is a reference to Addison's 'Cato'; and certain school geographies are noted because they have something about Tunisia, though, on the other hand, others of much greater importance are entirely ignored. Ibn Batuta obtains a place in spite of that entertaining vagabond having very little to do with Tunis; but the only edition of his travels mentioned is the fragment edited by Dr. Lee sixty years ago. Yet the sole edition any one would nowadays think of quoting is that of Deffrémery and Sanguinetti in four volumes. Even Moura's imperfect version in Spanish is preferable to Lee's. A tolerably complete list of Father Delattre's papers on Carthage is given; still it is not complete. Thus we note the omission of his 'Les Lampes Antiques du Musée de St. Louis de Carthage' (an edition of which was, we believe, issued in 1888), and of his 'Inscriptions Latines de Carthage,' of which at least three fasciculi have appeared, the latest in 1887, at Vienna; while the 'Fouilles d'un [not "dans"] Cimetière Romain à Carthage' ought to be entered more accurately. These and a few similar lacunæ are, however, almost inseparable from any bibliography undertaken without the help of specialists. Even Sir Lambert Playfair's lists of the literature of Tripoli and Algeria are by no means complete or without errors. All of the states of Northern Africa—with the exception of Morocco—having now special bibliographies, the student will in future be saved much of the toil and uncertainty of his predecessors. And as Muley Hassan's squalid empire is, by some misunderstanding, to be furnished with two, in addition to the faulty catalogues of Renou and De la Martinière, that region will soon be the best bibliographized of any in the Dark Continent.

BIBLIOGRAPHERS will welcome Mr. Fiske's list of Books printed in Iceland between 1578 and 1844 which are found in the British Museum Catalogue.

FROM Battersea Public Libraries we have received a catalogue (Truslove & Bray), compiled by Mr. Inkster, the appropriately named librarian, of the lending department of the Central Library on Lavender Hill. Mr. F. W. Madden has sent us his catalogue (Robinson & Son) of the 20,000 volumes in the Victoria Lending Library at Brighton. The Thirty-seventh Report of the Liverpool Library is also on our table, in the main cheerful in tone, yet speaking of money difficulties.

We have on our table The Empire of Man: an Essay in Verse, by Lieut.-Col. Fife Cookson (Kegan Paul),—Lily and Leander, by the Rev. S. Macnaught (Edinburgh, Gemmell),—Gloria Patri: a Book of Private Prayer for Morning and Evening, by J. R. Macduff, D.D. (Nelson & Sons),—Our Christian Heritage, by Cardinal Gibbons (Baltimore, U.S., Murphy & Co.),—Religious Systems of the World (Sonnenschein),—Sunday School Class Register (C.E.S.S.I.),—The Permanent Elements of Religion, by W. Boyd Carpenter, D.D. (Macmillan),—The Church-Worker, Vol. VIII. (C.E.S.S.I.),—Wolfgang von Goethe: Ermanno e Dorotea, Versione Metrica, by Luigi Virbio (Genoa, Istituto Sordo-Muti),—and Catálogo da Exposição Permanente dos Címelos da Bibliotheca Nacional, by João de Saldanha da Gama (Rio de Janeiro, Leuzinger & Sons). Among New Editions we have Garry's Elocutionist, by R. Garry (Marcus Ward),—English Grammar for Beginners, by J. H. Hawley (Relfe Brothers),—The Kindergarten at Home, by Emily A. E. Shirreff (Hughes),—The Money, Weights, and Measures of all Nations, by W. A. Browne (Stanford),—and Revised Guild Action, by G. Shaw (Simpkin). Also the following Pamphlets: The Fate of the Triple Alliance, a Jeu d'Esprit, by R. Walsh (Simpkin),—Our Unappreciated Petroleum Empire, by C. Marvin (Anderson & Co.),—Is Dissent a Sin? by the [Rev. C. Whitaker (Heywood),—The Place of Greek in Education, by G. G. A. Murray (Glasgow, MacLehose & Sons),—How to Cook Wives (Putnam),—The Element of Terror in Primitive Art, by B. Ferree (New York, 38, Park Row),—and Trade Unionism, by J. Sterling (Glasgow, MacLehose & Sons).

LIST OF NEW BOOKS.

ENGLISH.

Theology.

- Gall's (Rev. J.) The Synagogue, not the Temple, the Gern and Model of the Christian Church, cr. 8vo, 5/6 cl.
Gospel History of our Lord in the Words of the Revised Version, arranged by C. C. James, cr. 8vo, 3/6 cl.
 Sandford's (Rev. F. D.) Hymns of the Gospel, Musical Editors J. Sweeney and W. Kirkpatrick, cr. 8vo, 2/6
 Taylor's (L.) Pleasant Hours with the Bible, cr. 8vo, 2/6 cl.

Fine Art and Archaeology.

- Verrall's (M. de G.) Mythology and Monuments of Ancient Athens, Introduction and Essay by J. Harrison, 16/6 cl.
Poetry and the Drama.

- Ibsen's Prose Dramas, edited by W. Archer, Vol. 2, 3/6 cl.
 Ridsdale's (E.) A Poetaster's Holiday, Poems, 12mo, 3/6 cl.
 Tweedie's (Mrs. A.) The Oberammergau Passion Play, 1690, cr. 8vo, 2/6 cl.

History and Biography.

- Browning (R.), Life of, by W. Sharp, 8vo, 2/6 cl.
 Edwards's (H. S.) The Romanoffs: Tsars of Moscow and Emperors of Russia, cr. 8vo, 6/6 cl.
 Fox (C. J.), Life of, by H. O. Wakeman, cr. 8vo, 2/6 cl. (Statesman Series.)
 Hulbert's (W. L.) France and the Republic, 8vo, 18/6 cl.
 Hunter's (Sir W.) Rulers of India: The Marquess of Dalhousie, cr. 8vo, 2/6 cl.
 Jenks's (E.) The Constitutional Experiments of the Commonwealth, cr. 8vo, 2/6 cl. (Cambridge Historical Essays.)
 Letters of Philip Dormer, Fourth Earl of Chesterfield, to his Godson and Successor, edited by Earl of Carnarvon, 21/
Memorials of the Life of George E. Corrie, D.D., edited by M. Holyrood, 8vo, 18/6 cl.
 Palestine under the Moabites, Syria and the Holy Land, A.D. 650-1500, trans. by G. Le Strange, 8vo, 12/6 cl.

Philology.

- Lange's (F.) New Analytical Method of learning Languages: Graduated German Prose-Writing, cr. 8vo, 3/6 cl.
 Platonis Euthyphro, Intro. and Notes by J. Adams, 2/6 cl.
 Speech of Demosthenes against the Law of Leptines, Revised Text, Introduction by J. E. Sandys, 8vo, 9/6 cl.

Science.

- Muir's (T.) The Theory of Determinants, Part 1, 8vo, 10/6 cl.

General Literature.

- Adamson's (J.) Mumford Manor, a Novel, cr. 8vo, 6/6 cl.
 Banks's (Mrs. L.) From the Same Nest, a Homely Tale, 2/6 cl.
 Dickens's (C.) Nicholas Nickleby, Crown Edition, cr. 8vo, 5/
 Hardy's (T.) The Trumpet Major, a Tale, cheap edition, 2/
 Haycraft's (M. S.) Myrtle and Rue, a Story for the Young, cr. 8vo, 2/6 cl.
 Johnston's (V. W.) The Treasure Tower, a Story of Malta, cr. 8vo, 3/6 cl.

- Lang's (A.) Prince Darling, and other Stories, 12mo, 2/6 cl.
 Marryat's (F.) A Scarlet Sin, 2 vols. cr. 8vo, 21/6 cl.
 Mason's (F.) Flowers of the Hunt, illustrated, 8vo, 10/6 cl.
 Pierce's (J.) In Cloud and Sunshine, 12mo, 3/6 cl.
 Worboise's (E. J.) Married Life, cheap edition, cr. 8vo, 3/6 cl.

FOREIGN.

Theology.

- Grill (J.): Zur Kritik der Komposition d. Buchs Hiob, 2m, 40.
 Liber Jeremie: Textum Masoreticum illustravit S. Baer, Prefatus est F. Delitzsch, 1m, 50.

Law.

- Hermann (E.): Noch ein Wort üb. Mythio, 2m.
 Oertmann (P.): Die Fiducia im Römischen Privatrecht, 5m.
 Pfäffler (H. H.): Die Sogenannten Besitzklagen d. Römischen Rechts, 8m, 80.

History and Biography.

- Cauer (F.): Parteien u. Politiker in Megara u. Athen, 2m.
 Gundlach (W.): Der Streit der Bischöfer Arles u. Vienne um den Primatus Galliarum, 6m.

Philology.

- Alfarabi's Philosophische Abhandlungen, hrg. v. F. Dieterici, 5m.
 Fisch (R.): Die Lateinischen Nomina Personalia auf "o, onis", 5m.
 Homer's Ilas, ed. P. Cauer, I.-XII., 3m.
 Schwabe (E.): Ælii Dionysii et Pausaniæ Atticistarum Fragmenta, 12m.
 Strassmaier (J. N.): Babylonische Texte, Part 7, 20m.

Science.

- Korschelt (E.) u. Heider (K.): Lehrbuch der Vergleichenden Entwicklungsgeschichte, 7m.

THE NEW CODE.

THE Committee of Council on Education could not have celebrated the jubilee year of their existence better than by framing a new code of regulations for the distribution of the parliamentary grant for public education in England and Wales. By a minute dated the 10th of March, from the historic Council Chamber, Whitehall, they have adopted a thoroughly new set of regulations, with the purpose of rendering more simple and more effective the rules which shall govern them in the administration of the vote from Parliament, which now reaches, excluding the cost of administration, a grand total of 3,418,366l. This Code was laid on the tables of the two Houses of Parliament on the 28th ult., and it is practically an entirely new one, based mainly on the recommendations of the Royal Commission presided over by Lord Cross. This Commission began its work in 1886, and devoted two years to a laborious and minute inquiry into the system of elementary education in England and Wales. It was composed of representatives of every school of opinion: the official, the clerical, the Nonconformist elements all found their representatives in such men as Sir Francis Sandford, Dr. Temple, Cardinal Manning, and Dr. Rigg, while education itself, unallied to any particular denomination, found a voice through Mr. Lyulph Stanley, Mr. Alderson, and Mr. Heller. The report of the Commission fills six bulky volumes, and no student of the history of the development of elementary education in this country will need to make researches beyond them. The most experienced inspectors, the ablest teachers—both masters and mistresses—together with representatives of the Board and the voluntary schools, gave evidence before it, and it is to the matured opinions of the Commissioners that we owe the present Code, which, strangely enough, in its leading principles is a reversion to those which guided the founder of the Education Department, the late Sir James Kay-Shuttleworth. The objects which that distinguished man set before himself in framing the celebrated Minutes of 1846 were to stimulate local exertion in founding elementary schools and to secure that the instruction should be given by a body of teachers well qualified for their work. Inspection of the schools and a satisfactory report on their condition were rightly insisted on as a preliminary to the payment of a grant; but Sir James's chief reliance was upon the teachers themselves. To create a body of well-qualified and well-paid teachers, who should command confidence and respect by their ability and character, was his great aim. In judging the work done in the schools the inspectors were instructed to test the general spirit, life, and intelligence of the scholars, and were bound down by no mechanical rules for their individual examination. They were instructed to encourage teaching that should be humanizing and formative, and it was recognized that the excellence of a school could not be gauged by a percentage of passes. And a great work was done under those early Minutes. An army of trained certificated teachers and pupil teachers came into existence, a body of highly competent inspectors was formed, and thousands of schools were affording education to the children of the poor throughout the country. There were two defects in the system: the one as affecting school provision, and the other as touching the quality of the teaching. The system was a purely voluntary one. There was no statutory power to compel the provision of school accommodation nor the attendance of children at school even where school seats existed. Consequently only the richer districts were fairly provided, while the poorer ones were left untouched. To the quality of the instruction given in the schools there were also numerous objectors, their contention being that the teaching was pretentious and showy, that the sharpest scholars attracted the masters' attention, and that they were pushed on at the expense of the other children around them. Doubtless there was ground for this contention, for otherwise, in order to make the teaching more effective and more evenly distributed among the scholars, the Royal Commission of 1859—with such men as Mr. Goldwin Smith, Mr. Nassau Senior, and the Rev. William Rogers amongst their members—would hardly have reported as they did. "There is only one way," they reported,

"of securing that the teaching shall be more evenly distributed among the scholars, and that is to institute a searching examination by a competent authority of every child in every school to which grants are to be paid, with a view to ascertaining whether the indispensable elements of knowledge are thoroughly acquired, and to make the prospects and position of the teacher dependent to a considerable extent on the results of this examination."

It was on this recommendation that Mr. Lowe (now Viscount Sherbrooke) took his stand when he introduced his revised Code of 1861. However well meant and however supported, it proved to be a disastrous event in the history of elementary education. The payments being made to depend on the individual examination of the scholars in the elementary subjects of instruction, the failure of a child, from causes over which the teacher had often no control, acted as a direct fine on the managers. The consequence was that the dull scholars, the children—and there are many such—who were by nature unfitted to learn much, were the ones who absorbed the teacher's attention, while those who were most likely to benefit by good teaching were left to shift for themselves. They were certain to "pass," so but little was done for them, and they were kept back in low standards as long as it was possible so to keep them, and often when removed to another school a boy who had passed in the fifth or sixth standard was put down into the third or fourth. Necessarily the work of the teachers, and the examination of the inspectors, became mechanical when no encouragement was given to the teaching of subjects which foster mental activity and create a thirst for knowledge in the scholars. Dr. Fitch, one of the most experienced of the inspectors, wrote:—

"I cannot resist the unwelcome conviction that the new Code [Mr. Lowe's] is tending to formalize the work of the elementary schools, and to render it in some degree lifeless, inelastic, and mechanical. I find too many teachers disposed to narrow their sense of duty to the six standards, or to what they sometimes call, with unconscious sarcasm, the 'paying subjects.' I find an increasing eagerness on the part of teachers to get hold of text-books which are specially adapted to the requirements of the Revised Code, and which claim as their chief merit that they do not go a step beyond those requirements. The practice of explaining and questioning on the meanings of words appears to me on the decline. Spirited oral teaching, mutual interrogation, home lessons, and other devices by which the intellectual life of a school is kept up, are far less common than they ought to be, and, as I have reason to believe, than they once were. The teaching of grammar, history, and geography has been much discouraged. It has always been a characteristic of the best schools that in each of them there was some one subject which, if not a hobby of the master's, was yet one in which his own tastes led him to take particular interest, and which by its special finish and excellence served to prove that his heart was in his school, and that he was proud of its success. I regret to say that I see comparatively little of this sort of enthusiasm, and that the adoption of a uniform standard tends in some measure to discourage it."

It is no wonder, therefore, that when the late Mr. Matthew Arnold was sent abroad to compare German schools with ours he should report thus:—

"I speak of what I saw and heard, and of the impression which was made upon me, after seeing English schools for more than thirty years. The methods of teaching in foreign schools are more gradual, more natural, more rational, than in ours, and in speaking here of foreign schools I include Swiss and French schools as well as German. I often asked myself why, with such large classes, the order was in general so thoroughly good, and why with such long hours the children had in general so little look of exhaustion and fatigue; and the answer I could not help making to myself was that the cause lay in the children being taught less mechanically and more naturally than with us and being more interested. In the teaching of arithmetic, geometry, and natural science I was particularly struck with the patience, the clinging to oral question and answer, the avoidance of over hurry, the being content to advance slowly, the securing of the ground; but presently they find that the slower rate of advance is more than compensated for by the thoroughness of the teaching and the hold gained upon the matter of study. The same thing in teaching the elements of writing and reading, and in training children to answer questions put to them; the same patience, the same care to make the child sure of his ground. Again and again," he continues, "I find written in my notes the children human. They had been brought under teaching of a quality to touch and interest them, and were being formed by it. The fault of the teaching in our popular schools at home is that it is so little formative.....it does little to touch their nature for good and to mould them."

Mr. Arnold in this weighty condemnation of our system was only giving forcible utterance to the opinions of the ablest inspectors, managers, and teachers, and it is matter for rejoicing that therecent Royal Commission should have adopted similar conclusions. They were unanimously of opinion that the present system of "payment by results" is carried too far and is too rigidly applied, and that it ought to be modified and relaxed in the interests equally of the scholars, of the teachers, and of education itself. They were likewise of opinion that while Parliament, in voting large payments of public money to school managers, requires some security for the educational results, and looks to the reports of H.M. inspectors for security that these results are attained, payments should be made so as to avoid fixing the managers' and teachers' attention too exclusively on the details on which the grant is based.

The Committee of Council, having had that report before them since June, 1888, have at length produced and submitted to Parliament a radically revised Code, and it has been fortunate for them that they should have secured for their secretary (in place of the lamented Mr. Cumin) a man of such high administrative ability as Mr. George Kekewich. This Code, the result of extraordinary labour, really promises to secure for our future handicraftsmen, our agriculturists, mechanics, and clerks, an education that shall be human and formative. There is some prospect at last that John Comenius's maxim respecting education will find a place in English schools. "The aim," he says, "of education is to train generally all who are born men to all which is human." The new Code provides, amongst other things, for the better training of the pupil teachers and the higher proficiency of the certificated masters and mistresses. For every good examination passed by a pupil teacher an annual stipend will be paid to him, and if he succeeds in obtaining a Queen's scholarship at a training college, the sum of 5*l.* will reward his success and start him with the necessary text-books. Inefficient pupil teachers will be weeded out before they can swell the ranks of the incompetents, and henceforth only the élite amongst them will find their way into the training colleges.

The establishment of day training colleges, which must be attached to some university or college of university rank, is to be encouraged by annual grants. This will have the effect of drawing into the ranks of the elementary school teachers, whose salaries and emoluments have so largely increased since 1870, many well-educated men and women who, up to now, have been debarred from entering the profession by reason of their not having been pupil teachers or resident students in college. We shall now hear of university men, and women with university certificates, entering and leaving the ranks of the elementary school teachers. The certificate of merit will in future only be granted to candidates who pass examinations in both "first" and "second year's" papers with an interval of actual tutorial work between the two examinations.

In the list of subjects to be taught in the schools drawing becomes compulsory; amongst the class subjects recitation, apart from English, finds a place; and in the specific subjects Welsh, German, book-keeping, and shorthand are now to be found. It may be interesting hereafter, and we therefore set down now the subjects of instruction which in the year 1890 the State deems worthy of encouragement in its public elementary schools. The obligatory subjects are reading, writing, arithmetic, needlework (for girls), and drawing (for boys). The optional subjects, taken by classes throughout the school, are singing, recitation, drawing (for boys in infant classes), English, geography, elementary science, history, and needlework (optional as a class subject). Special optional subjects, to be taken only by individual children in the upper classes, are algebra, Euclid and mensuration, mechanics, chemistry, physics, animal physiology, botany, principles of agriculture, Latin, French, domestic economy, Welsh, German, book-keeping, shorthand, cookery, and laundry.

But the central article of interest for managers and teachers is that numbered 101. This relates to the principal grant payable to schools for older scholars and to the rules of examination. Percentage grants, and so-called merit grants, now disappear. The principal grant will consist of 12*s.* 6*d.* or 14*s.* per scholar in average attendance. A thoroughly good school will earn the higher of these amounts, a bad school will earn nothing. A fixed grant for discipline and organization of 1*s.* or 1*s.* 6*d.* will also be paid; but neither of these grants will be reduced—they will either be well earned or wholly withdrawn. In judging of the results of the year's teaching the inspector will examine the scholars, as a rule, by sample, not less than one-third being individually examined. All the scholars whose names are on the registers of the school must be present at the inspection, unless there is a reasonable excuse for absence; and while all will be liable to be examined in the three elementary subjects, they will be placed in standards suitable to their capacity, which need not be the same for each subject. As a rule the scholars will be examined in the classes in which they are taught.

We believe that this large concession of freedom to the teacher and inspector will be amply justified by the results. Instead of lifeless teaching being tested by a mechanical examination, in which that dreadful bugbear "percentage of passes" performed its baneful part, we may hope to have spirited teaching tested by an examination which in the hands of a capable inspector will be fruitful for the following year. In the olden days, when such men as Dr. Temple and the lamented Mr. Arnold were inspectors, their annual visits were looked forward to with eagerness by teachers and scholars, and always resulted in inspiration for the succeeding year's work. In the words of Mr. Fitch, "The inspector will try to ascertain what ideal the teacher has placed before himself, and how he has succeeded in attaining it"; and H.M. inspector, instead of bending over an examination schedule and entering a (X) or an (O) against every scholar's name, and hurrying off without a word of encouragement to teachers or children, will now have the leisure and the freedom to make a real inspection of the school.

By the reform introduced into the conditions for the payment of grants in evening schools, scholars who have passed in the Fifth Standard will be allowed to confine their studies to "specific" subjects. It is hoped by these means that a large number of young men will be drawn into the evening classes when they find that they will be enabled to obtain teaching in the principles underlying the handicraft or the industry by which they earn their livelihood.

If this Code receives the sanction of Parliament it will come into force on August 31st of this year. The large changes introduced into it and the humane principles which it adopts should not fail to bear abundant fruit. There are on the registers of inspected schools nearly five millions of scholars. They are to be the next generation of our artisans, our mechanics, and our agriculturists. In them will be deposited a large, if not a preponderating share of political power. Is it not then a wise thing on the part of a nation to train generally "all who are born men to all which is human," and to endeavour to instil into the masses of its workmen sound morality and real culture? We accept this new Education Code as a help in this direction, and we hope that Parliament may see fit to adopt it.

MR. GLADSTONE'S MODEL LIBRARY.

MR. PENDEREL-BRODHURST has evidently only given my letter a hasty reading before rushing to the defence of Mr. Gladstone. If he will look again he will find that I do not give 204 ft. of 9-foot shelving as the amount which would be contained in Mr. Gladstone's ideal library, but as the actual amount of shelving in the Astronomical Society's library, which was full to overflowing with nine thousand volumes. The library described by Mr. Gladstone would, including liberal estimates as to end cases and window cases, only contain 174 ft. of such shelving. I made a statement of fact with regard to two public libraries which Mr. Penderel-Brodhurst meets by counting 970 evidently small volumes in his library, on which he founds a calculation that neglects the existence of quartos and folios.

In recommending fixed shelving Mr. Gladstone says very truly that the man who plans for himself a library with shelves that cannot be moved ought to have a pretty accurate knowledge as to the proportion of books of different heights which he will have to find room for, and I had hoped that this renowned master of statistics was about to give some valuable information as to the relative numbers of royal and demy octavos, posts and crowns, and the proportion of deep and high shelving that would probably be required for quartos and folios. But the question is evaded. Some such statistics would be welcomed by many besides myself.

A. C. RANYARD.

Richmond.

APPARENTLY professional librarians do not consider it worth while to canvass Mr. Gladstone's statements. Not to make any political comparisons, the ex-Premier's article, it must be admitted, can hardly be treated as a serious contribution to the subject of library economy. A very slight analysis of its contents renders that apparent.

But while the question of the housing of books is undeniably one of increasing urgency, it must be pretty obvious that any information as to the number of volumes which a library either contains or could contain must have merely the most general and vague value. A "volume" is the most intangible unit. How little significance the term can possess for any but ordinary private libraries, when one public library will bind tracts and pamphlets as separate volumes, while another binds up half a dozen together, or when one may bind each volume of a periodical set by itself, however thin, while another puts two, or perhaps three or four, together!

An imaginary mean volume might be assumed, and perhaps 9½ in. by 6½ in. by 1½ in. would be as good figures as any others; 9 in. by 6 in. by 1 in. is too small. Grant, however, the 6 in. back to front. Twenty thousand volumes 1½ in. thick would require 30,000 in. or 2,500 linear feet. How is that length of shelving to be got out of Mr. Gladstone's arrangement of his 40 ft. by 20 ft. room?

Allowing ten shelves for the cases 9 ft. high, the projecting cases with their end shelving would give some 700 ft., or both sides 1,400 ft. of shelving. The remaining 30 ft. of side wall, not allowing for windows, would give 300 ft. Allow, say, half on account of the lights, and 300 ft. will represent the total of the two side walls. For end walls say one-third of side walls, 100 ft. Total, 1,400+300+100=1,800 linear feet, or 700 ft. short of the theoretical requirements: 800 ft. short would be nearer the mark if actually carried out.

If the unit volume be taken as only an inch thick this shelving would fulfil the requirement of accommodating 20,000 "volumes." But this point is, of course, the kernel of the whole matter. However, even if not demonstrably impossible to accommodate 20,000 volumes of mixed sizes on some 2,000 ft. of this assumed standard shelving, to accomplish the feat would certainly prove an arduous undertaking for any man who embraced it. Several difficulties of detail in the matter of the fittings of the model library soon discover themselves, but it is not worth while to consider them.

A. HASTINGS WHITE.

Literary Gossip.

MR. GLADSTONE has expressed an intention some day to republish in separate form his article on 'Ellen Middleton,' lately printed in Merry England, should he find time to edit it with a profusion of explanatory notes.

LORD ACTON will contribute to the forthcoming number of the English Historical Review a notice of the great German historian Wilhelm von Giesebrecht. Prof. Sanday has an article on 'Bishop Lightfoot as an Historian.' The number will also contain some documents relating to the Pilgrimage of Grace which are of particular interest. It is singular that Robert Aske's own narrative of the events has never before been printed at length. Mr. Firth contributes an unpublished account of the battle of Marston Moor by Sir Hugh Cholm.

A NEW volume by Mr. W. S. Lilly will shortly be published under the title of 'Right and Wrong.' The contents will largely consist of articles which have already appeared in the leading magazines.

On the 25th of April the first number of a new quarterly review will appear, entitled Subjects of the Day. The editorship will be in the hands of Mr. James Samuelson, author of 'India, Past and Present,' and other works. The publishers will be

Messrs. George Routledge & Sons, and half-a-crown will be the price. Sir W. W. Hunter writes in the first number on 'Ancient Civilization and Modern Education,' and Sir P. Magnus on 'Technical Education and Payments on Results.'

MESSRS. METHUEN & Co. will commence shortly the issue of a series of copyright novels under the title of "Methuen's Novel Series." Each novel will be in one volume and will be published at three shillings and sixpence. The first will be a new work of fiction by Mr. Baring Gould, 'Jael,' and this will be followed by Mrs. Leith Adams's 'My Land of Beulah.' Miss Mabel Robinson's stories 'Disenchantment' and 'The Plan of Campaign,' and novels by Edna Lyall, Mr. Manville Fenn, L. T. Meade, and other well-known writers will appear in due course.

East and West is in future to be issued in the middle of each month instead of the beginning, and its price is to be a shilling instead of sixpence. Mr. Heinemann is to be the publisher.

A PRESENTATION of plate was made last week to Mr. Alderman Abel Heywood, the well-known Manchester publisher, on having reached his eightieth birthday. In the course of his speech on the occasion Mr. Heywood alluded to his imprisonment more than half a century ago for selling the unstamped Poor Man's Guardian, published by Mr. Hetherington, the democratic publisher of the period.

WE are sorry to hear of the death of Dr. Marinus Frederik Andries Gerardus Campbell, who has for many years been the librarian of the Royal Library at the Hague, where he entered as assistant, we believe, more than fifty years ago. Dr. Campbell had the influenza very badly at the new year, this developed into heart disease, and in the seventy-first year of his age he succumbed. He was an Honorary Fellow of the Society of Antiquaries, having been elected January 8th, 1880. He was of Scotch descent, his ancestor having been an officer in the Scottish Brigade stationed in Holland about 1740 or 1750. Dr. Campbell was last in England at the Caxton Exhibition, 1877, and met here many English men of letters. His cordial welcome of English visitors at the Royal Library will be remembered by the very many friends who survive him.

IN accordance with the promise recently made by Mr. Raikes in the House of Commons, that public attention should again be called to the advantages of Government insurance, the General Post Office is about to issue in leaflet form Mr. A. G. Bowie's article on 'Post Office Insurance and Old Age Pay,' which recently appeared in 'A 1.'

THE new volume of the "Book-Lover's Library," which will be issued very shortly, will be entitled 'Newspaper Reporting in Olden Time and To-day,' and will be written by Mr. John Pendleton, author of 'The History of Derbyshire.'

THE Society of Authors has admitted a publisher as a member on the ground that he is an author as well as a publisher. This looks very like admitting the wolf into the fold; but, at any rate, it shows that the Society has not that hatred of publishers with which it is sometimes credited. The Society has been doing useful work lately in trying to instruct authors as to proper prices of print and paper. Their ignorance in these matters usually tends to make authors suspicious of respectable publishers, and an easy prey to swindlers.

MR. CLINCH, of the British Museum, is writing a monograph on 'Bloomsbury and St. Giles's, Past and Present,' with historical and antiquarian notices of various places in the vicinity. The history of St. Giles's will include that of the foundation, in 1101, of the Hospital for Lepers, and its subsequent history until the time of its suppression; the parish church, and the many important characters, historical, political, and literary, whose remains rest within its vaults or graveyard; a comprehensive account of the charities connected with the parish; the origin and history of "the Seven Dials," "the Rookeries," &c. Under Bloomsbury the subjects treated of will be "Queen Anne's Bath," "Royal Toxophilite Society," Gray's Inn, Lincoln's Inn, &c. The history of such national institutions as the British Museum and the hospitals will be set forth in considerable detail. The volume will be embellished with twenty-four full-page illustrations and maps. Messrs. Truslove & Shirley will be the publishers.

MESSRS. SONNENSCHNIG & Co. are adding to their "Social Science" Series volumes on 'Crime and the Prison System,' by Mr. W. Douglas Morrison, of H.M. Prison, Wandsworth; and 'Charity Organization,' by Mr. C. S. Loch, secretary of the Charity Organization Society.

MR. HAILSTONE, of Walton Hall, whose death we have chronicled in our "Fine-Art Gossip," has bequeathed his valuable collection of Yorkshire books to the Dean and Chapter of York.

THE Rev. H. Sebastian Bowden, of the London Oratory, is editing an English translation of Dr. Hettinger's 'Evidences of Christianity.' The first part of the work will be issued immediately by Messrs. Burns & Oates under the title of 'Natural Religion.' The eminent German theologian heartily approved the translation, the appearance of which he has not lived to see.

'DIE KRIEGE FRIEDRICHS DES GROSSEN' is the title of an important and voluminous publication which will be issued by the Generalstab of Berlin. The work will be based on all the available sources, and contain a number of hitherto unknown materials and documents. Each military period in the life of the great king will be treated separately. Part I., consisting of two volumes, will embrace the events of the first Silesian War (1740-42), whilst Part II. will be devoted to the second Silesian War (1744-45). The first volume of Part I., which is expected to be issued shortly, will furnish a general military, political, and geographical introduction to the whole work, together with an account of the military events down to the battle of Mollwitz (April 10th, 1741), in which Frederick was victorious in spite of himself.

EIGHT posthumous poems by the famous Hungarian poet Alexander Petöfi, dating from the year 1848, are said to have been discovered at the museum of Buda-Pesth. They are expected to be published shortly.

DR. BERNHARD VOLZ, who was employed in the family of the late Emperor Frederick as tutor, will shortly issue a 'History of Germany in the Nineteenth Century.' The work, which will be completed in about six parts, begins with the Peace of Luneville, and will conclude with the death of the Emperor William I.

THE death is announced of the well-known writer on military subjects, Baron Ambert.

THE following Trade Reports are among the Parliamentary Papers of the week: Finances of Hungary, No. 652 (2d.); Trade of Tripoli, No. 653 (1d.); Finances of the Argentine Republic, No. 654 (1d.); Trade, &c., of France, No. 655 (1d.); Trade of the Consular District of Cherbourg, No. 656 (1d.); and Agriculture of Poland, No. 657 (1d.). The new Education Code (5d.) has also been issued.

SCIENCE

MEDICAL BOOKS.

The Causation of Disease. By Harry Campbell, M.D. (Lewis).—Dr. Harry Campbell is well known as one of the ablest of medical tutors, and in this book there may be traced the habit of careful arrangement of ideas which is necessary to those who have to place before pupils such a tabular scheme of the vast collections of theory and fact as shall enable them in a reasonable time to attain distinct notions on modern medicine. The author is widely read in general literature, and often illustrates it from his medical knowledge. One chapter discusses the parasitic origin of cancer, in which Dr. Campbell believes on à priori grounds. Another chapter discusses the duration of the evolution of the mind, and after a careful analysis of the mental work of several celebrated women arrives at the conclusion that the female mind will work and improve as long as that of man. Another subject discussed with great ability is the degree in which the selection of wives among civilized nations is in relation to the principles of sexual selection laid down by Darwin. The interesting subject of the effect of London life on the constitution is thoroughly discussed. Dr. Johnson thought that London children were as strong as country children, but Dr. Campbell is of an entirely contrary opinion. There are, fortunately, some exceptions.

"When, however, a Londoner leads an outdoor life, considerable physical strength may be attained. Many instances might be cited in proof of this: Jem Smith, the champion English prizefighter, was born and brought up in the East End of London (a considerable period of his youth was spent in an open timber-yard, where he had the advantages of open air and muscular exercise), and one may observe in London-born navvies, too, very good development of body. Wherefore I attribute the physical degeneracy of Londoners to the bringing-up of the children in close, ill-lighted rooms, and to their subsequently following employments which entail prolonged confinement indoors." Such are a few of the topics of this interesting book, the product of careful thought and prolonged observation.

Doctors and Doctors. By Graham Everitt. (Sonnenschein & Co.).—This work proposes to give a facetious account of some chapters in medical history, but is profoundly dull and very inaccurate in its details. The author begins with the error of supposing that the physicians of the school of Salerno had no medical knowledge, while, in fact, they were the undoubted descendants of the Greek school of medicine. They were rational enough in parts of their practice, and many of the rules of the 'Regimen Sanitatis Salerni' may be followed with advantage in the present day. The author imagines without just grounds that the Jewish physicians of the Middle Ages were superior to those of other races. There is, perhaps, no more benighted work of the period than the 'De Dietis' of Isaac, the son of Solomon, one of the best known of Jewish physicians. Mr. Everitt seems not to know that Linacre, the founder of the College of Physicians, was a clergyman, and to have read none of the recent works which throw light on the early history of surgery in England. A chapter is devoted to the famous controversy which is celebrated in Garth's 'Dispensary.' The account adds nothing to what is already known, and fails to state clearly the stages of the dispute. Throughout the book three things are wanting—medical knowledge, literary taste, and historical research.

Contemporary Medical Men. By John Leyland. 2 vols. (Leicester, 'Provincial Medical Journal' Office).—This gorgeously bound book contains biographies of about fifty apothecaries, surgeons, and physicians. A life of Darwin is thrown in, though he cannot be called a medical man in any sense. The lives are all laudatory and have no literary merit. They contain the most extraordinary statements. One physician, we are told, chiefly practised "among certain large families"; another, we are informed, has saved money, and his father "never in his life had donned a pair of trousers." This we may believe, but not that his mother was descended from Dr. Isaac Barrow, for Barrow was never married. The surgeons come off no better. One is a "fifteenth child" and "a great addition to the dinner table." Another has been "well received" by the Saturday Review, attended a sick rhinoceros, and obtained free access to some "preserved animals." Some of the celebrities are made to shine by a sort of reflected fame. Thus a respectable public medical official became acquainted with the "Delta" of Blackwood's Magazine, thought of going to Balliol College, Oxford, and finally joined a society of which Oliver Goldsmith was once a member. However, now he has attained some reputation of his own, knows Bret Harle, and has been knighted. The general tone of these biographies must be more unpleasant to their subjects than to other readers, and it is to be hoped that such productions will soon sink into oblivion.

GEOGRAPHICAL LITERATURE.

Excursions et Reconnaissances, Tome XIV., No. 31 (Saigon), is almost exclusively occupied with philological matter, the principal article being the first of a series which will no doubt be of considerable interest, on the writing, dialects, history, manners, and customs of the Shams, by a scholar of much experience in those regions, M. Aymonier. The history and ethnological affinities of these Shams, or Tsians, once the leading race in Annam, are obscure. They are divided now into two branches, one which has migrated into Cambodia being all nominally Musulman; the other, which remains in the Binh Thuan province of Annam, is only partially Musulman, with apparently some traces of Indian practices. It is supposed that in blood, as certainly in language, they have considerable affinity with the Malays. The present paper deals only with the language, which M. Aymonier finds in close relationship with the Polynesian group, and as it were in an intermediate position between the Khmer (Cambodian) and the Malay. There are various verbal inflections corresponding to the Sanskrit virama, anusvara, &c., which he can only explain by these terms.

The Samoafahrten (Leipzig, Hirt & Son) of Dr. O. Finsch were undertaken, as our readers are probably aware, not in the islands of Samoa, but in a vessel of that name, among the coasts and islands of the German New Guinea territory. To the record of his travels the 'Ethnographischer Atlas' before us is a valuable adjunct, the accompanying text, however, giving it an independent value. The subjects here dealt with, in illustration and text, are: houses and household furniture; implements and weapons; costumes, fabrics, and ornaments, personal and other; boats, and fishery. Accuracy in drawings such as these is the first essential; and as we are able to vouch for this in the case of several of the drawings in question, it is only fair to assume the correctness of the rest. Almost all give a clear notion, not only of texture, as in the case of the netted and plaited articles, but of the construction, as shown in the representation of the stone weapons and the way their handles are fastened, and of the fish-hooks. Several of the articles described are common, sometimes with slight variations, to the Melanesian group, and, e.g., in the cases of the stone implements and of the drums (musical instruments), are found further afield in the Pacific. The forms of masks given are curious; they are much less elaborate than those of New Ireland. Dr. Finsch asserts that they are used practically much as among ourselves, for purposes of masquerade. This statement we venture to take with the qualification suggested by his own subsequent remark, viz., that miniature imitations of these masks are probably worn as a sort of amulet, and with some reference to tabu. Among the images figured under the heading of "Tabu" (pl. xv.) are some of the well-known Korwars, which Dr. Finsch—rightly, as we believe—classes not as idols, but as ancestral images. In this connexion, then, the representations, found also in a tabu-house, of a fish and of a "bitch" (which, by the way, seems to us not unlike a Pteropus or flying fox) may be thought to have some bearing on the totem question. Dr. Finsch considers that the various patterns of decoration here presented to us show a keen feeling for art in the Papuan. We may note that the specimens of ornamentation here given show these natives to be equally familiar with curved and rectilinear forms. Figures of birds, fishes, and lizards or crocodiles are used, and even in the specimens before us—of the ornamentations, for instance, on a shield, a club, a lime spatula, &c.—it is not impossible to trace the development from these figures of seemingly mere conventional patterns. The letterpress is given in English and French as well as in German. The author of the English translation does not seem altogether familiar with his subject, and if, as we gather from his name, he is an Englishman, it must be said that his acquaintance with his native idiom leaves something to be desired.

We have received from Messrs. Walker & Co. The Pocket Atlas and Gazetteer of the Dominion of Canada, by Mr. J. Bartholomew—an excellent little work in which we have detected no errors. It includes Newfoundland as well as Canada, and is therefore really a Pocket Atlas and Gazetteer of British North America. From the same firm there reaches us the Pocket Atlas of the World, by Mr. John Bartholomew, which is equally good.

'CHAMBERS'S ENCYCLOPEDIA.'

Dublin.

A PATIENT of mine, a gentleman of high literary attainments, called my attention the other day to the short article on "Auscultation" in the current reissue of 'Chambers's Encyclopedia.' He suffers from chronic pulmonary disease, and, with a natural curiosity, wished to inform himself of the various sources of professional information relating to his own case, by the general reading for which he has ample leisure and opportunities. I there found, to my surprise, that the introduction of this method of investigation is attributed to Auenbrugger, date eighteenth century. This statement indicates a curious confusion of names and things. The fact is that Auenbrugger secured a perennial fame in medical history by the introduction of "percussion"—not auscultation, with which his name is in no wise associated—as an auxiliary means of physical examination in visceral disease. This discoverer was an enthusiast, and published the results of his investigations only after seven years of laborious application, "inter tædia et labores." He calls the method thus developed "inventum novum, ex percussione thoracis humani, ut signo, abstrusos interni pectoris morbos detegendi." The modesty of the inventor was not quite commensurate with his other qualifications, as he calls his own work "magnum opus." The use of immediate auscultation (direct application of the ear to the surface of the chest) is as old as the practice of Hippocrates, who tells us: "You shall know by this that the chest contains water and not pus, if on applying the ear during a certain time on the side you perceive a noise like that of boiling vinegar." The practice, which did not turn out to be specially instructive in diagnosis, had been dropped by physicians till modern times, when mediate auscultation—i. e., the use of the stethoscope—was introduced by Laennec, whose volumes on the subject (published at Paris in the year 1819) will ever remain the great storehouse of original observations on the physical phenomena of pulmonary disease.

JOHN KNOTT, M.A., M.D. (Dubl.).

SOCIETIES.

ROYAL.—March 27.—The President in the chair.—The following papers were read: 'On Black Soap-films,' by Prof. Reinold and Mr. Rücker, 'The Variability of the Temperature of the British Isles, 1869-83, inclusive,' by Mr. R. H. Scott, 'The Rupture of Steel by Longitudinal Stress,' by Mr. C. A. Carus-Wilson, 'Measurements of the Amount of Oil necessary in order to check the Motion of Camphor upon Water,' by Lord Rayleigh, 'On the Stability of a Rotating Spheroid of Perfect Liquid,' by Mr. G. H. Bryan, 'A Determination of "v," the Ratio of the Electromagnetic Unit of Electricity to the Electrostatic Unit,' by Prof. J. J. Thomson and Mr. G. F. C. Searle, and 'On the Progressive Paralysis of the Different Classes of Nerve-cells in the Superior Cervical Ganglion,' by Messrs. J. N. Langley and W. L. Dickinson.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.—March 27.—Dr. J. Evans, President, in the chair.—Mr. Moens exhibited four silver beakers, used as "sacrament cups" in the Dutch Church at Norwich. They are $\frac{5}{8}$ in. high, engraved with roses, &c., and with an inscription recording their being the gift of Richard Brown of Heyham. They bear the Norwich hall-mark in use 1560-70, and the maker's mark is that of the well-known Peter Peterson. The beakers were probably given when the Dutch Church at Norwich was founded in 1568. Mr. Scharf exhibited a fine portrait of Queen Elizabeth, recently discovered in a cottage not far from Cowdray House, Sussex, upon which Mr. O'Donoghue read some descriptive remarks.—Mr. A. J. Evans read a paper 'On a Late-Celtic Cemetery at Aylesford, Kent.' This cemetery was of great interest as presenting a stage in sepulchral practice not hitherto noticed among the ancient Britons, as well as from the new class of native earthenware and imported bronze vessels brought to light. The graves were small pits in the flat earth, arranged in family circles, and each containing a group of cineraries and accessory vessels. Mr. Evans showed that the form of interment answered to that prevalent in a large part of Gaul at the time of the Roman invasions, and in a previous paper had already traced certain situla-shaped cinerary vases, through intermediary examples in Belgic Gaul and the Rhine district, to the Illyro-Italic or Old Venetian province round the head of the Adriatic. The bronze vessels which he now described included a patella and cenochoe of Italo-Greek work, the first authentic instance of the discovery of such imported vessels in a British cemetery, though Mr. Evans showed that the custom of associating Greek and Etruscan bronzes with their sepulchral deposits was very widely spread among the Gallic tribes on both sides of the Alps. Among the bronzes of indigenous Celtic fabric discovered was a beautiful plated pail surrounded with a zone of animals and foliated ornaments in repoussé work, presenting the closest resemblance to the decorative work found in the Helvetian station of La Tène, in Switzerland. The fabulous animals depicted were, on the other hand, almost identical with those found on the coins of the Remi, from which Mr. Evans drew the conclusion that this situla had been manufactured in the Rheims district and imported into Britain. Two British gold coins were also discovered in the cemetery, of uninscribed types which occur indiscriminately on either side of the Channel, and which were, therefore, to be referred to some Belgic prince who reigned in parts of both Gaul and Britain. No single object of Roman origin was found in the cemetery, and from a general survey of the evidence Mr. Evans considered that the sepulchral deposits found must be ascribed to the century immediately preceding Caesar's invasion, and referred to the same Belgic invaders who seem at about the same date to have introduced the ancient British coinage. On the other hand, the presence of some rudier urns in the traditional British style, and of skeleton interments in cists on the outskirts of the cemetery, seemed to indicate the partial survival of the earlier inhabitants on this Kentish site. Altogether the conditions brought to light by these discoveries, and the close connexion that they presupposed between Britain and the Belgic parts of Gaul, suggested a comparison with that which subsisted between England and Normandy in the period that immediately succeeded the Norman Conquest.

MICROSCOPICAL.—March 19.—Prof. U. Pritchard, V.P., in the chair.—Mr. J. Mayall, jun., read a letter from Prof. E. Abbe, of Jena, announcing the donation of one of Zeiss's new apochromatic one-tenth objectives of 1.6 N.A. He also sent a condenser of 1.6 N.A., and a flint-glass slide containing mixed diatoms mounted by Dr. H. van Heurck, of Antwerp, together with a supply of flint-glass slips and cover-glasses for use in mounting objects for examination with the new objective. It was, of course, understood that in order to exhibit the full power of the increased aperture, it was necessary to employ a condenser of corresponding aperture, and the objects to be viewed must be mounted on slips with covers, and mounting and immersion fluids of correspondingly high refractive power. In order to further test this lens a committee has been appointed.—Mr. Mayall called attention to and described two microscopes by MM. Nachet and Pellin, of Paris, which were exhibited by Mr. Crisp.—Mr. Rousselet exhibited a number of rotifers to show their abundance at this season of the year.—A specimen sent by Col. O'Hara, supposed to be some kind of entozoon which had been passed in urine, was exhibited.—Prof. Bell gave a résumé of Mr. A. D. Michael's paper 'On the Variations of the Female Reproductive Organs, especially the Vestibule, in Different Species of Uropoda,' the author being unavoidably absent through illness.—Mr. C. H. Wright exhibited and described specimens of a new British hymenolichen, Cycosoma interruptum.—Mr. E. M. Nelson read a short note on the images of external objects produced from the markings of Pleurosigma formosum.—A note was read from Dr. H. van Heurck, correcting an error in his recent communication to the Society relating to the structure of diatoms.—Mr. Mayall read a translation of an article by Prof. E. Abbe on the use of fluorite for optical purposes, from which it appeared that the special qualities of the new apochromatic lenses were due to the employment of this mineral in their construction.—Mr. C. H. Gill read a paper 'On some Methods of preparing Diatoms so as to exhibit clearly the Nature of their Markings,' which was illustrated by numerous photomicrographs.—Mr. P. Brahm exhibited and described a new form of oxyhydrogen lamp adapted for microscopical purposes, the lamp being so mounted as to be used in any position above or below the object. Its application to photomicrography was demonstrated in the room.—Mr. Clarkson also exhibited one of the same lamps separate from the photomicrographic arrangement.—The next conversation was announced to take place on the 30th of April.

CHEMICAL.—March 20.—Dr. W. J. Russell, President, in the chair.—Messrs. W. C. Sayers, F. H. P. Coste, B. Blount, S. H. Collins, and T. S. Dymond were admitted Fellows.—Prof. Judd delivered a lecture 'On the Evidence afforded by Petrographical Research of the Occurrence of Chemical Change under Great Pressures.'—The following paper was read: 'The Formation of Triazine-derivatives,' by Mr. R. Meldola.

MEETINGS FOR THE ENSUING WEEK.

MON. Royal Institution, 5.—General Monthly.
TUES. Horticultural, 1.—Popular Lecture 3.
THURS. Electrical Engineers, 8.—Signalling across Rivers in India, Mr. W. T. Melhuish; 'The Diathermancy of Air in relation to the Efficiency of Incandescent Lamps,' Mr. F. Higgins.
FRI. New Shakespeare, 8.—A Paper by Miss Latham.
SAT. Astronomical, 8.
SAT. Botanic, 23.—Election of Fellows.

Science Gossip.

We regret to hear that Sir Richard Owen has had a relapse. He rose as usual last Saturday morning, but was compelled to return to bed, and Sir James Paget was summoned by telegraph. Since the attack of some weeks ago Sir Richard had been doing very well.

THE new telescopic comet (α , 1890), which it appears was discovered by Mr. Brooks, at the Red House Observatory, Phelps, N.Y., on the morning of the 20th ult., was observed by Prof. F. Schwab at Kremsmünster on those of the 24th and 27th, and by Dr. Kobold at Strassburg on that of the 29th, when its apparent place was R.A. 21^h 11^m, N.P.D. 80° 41'.

FINE ARTS

Jahrbuch der Königlich Preussischen Kunstsammlungen. Zehnter Band. (Berlin, Grote.)

THERE is no article in the present volume of the Prussian 'Year-Book of the Royal Art Collections' which is likely to attract the attention of the general reader; on the other hand, we find ample measure of good, sensible work, certain to be of real service to future writers on the history of art.

No one, however, but an expert can possibly be expected to take an interest in the painfully minute steps by which Dr. Bode decides which, out of many, are the true portrait busts of Marietta Strozzi, or identifies in a bronze by Donatello, hitherto passing as a semblance of Scipio Africanus, the features of Louis Gonzaga III., Duke of Mantua. Fortunately such investigations as these have an immense fascination for those who engage in them, for they must be content, like virtue, with their own reward. The true zealot can, indeed, find no pleasure equal to that of correcting the heresies of others, and the labour of months is ungrudgingly bestowed by the genuine archaeologist to prove that a date is a year or two wrong or that an attribution cannot be completely justified. Dr. Bode is an enthusiast in this pursuit, and an enthusiast whose zeal has been abundantly stimulated by success. Besides clearing up the two points mentioned above, he has this year triumphantly shown that the celebrated profile portrait of a lady by Leonardo in the Ambrosiana, named by "Lermolieff" Bianca Maria Sforza, and ascribed by him to the brush of Ambrogio da Preda, should be restored to Leonardo, but most certainly does not represent the lady in question. The features of Bianca Maria, the second wife of the Emperor Maximilian, are set before us in the pages of the 'Year-Book,' not only in authentic drawings, but also in a very curious and adequate reproduction of a fine portrait, now in the possession of a private collector at Berlin, which in every respect presents the characteristic workmanship of the painter on whom "Lermolieff" too generously bestowed the masterpiece of the Ambrosiana. In yet a fourth contribution Dr. Bode, continuing his labour of love, restores to Gian Marco Cavalli (in accordance with an indication due to Prof. Rossi) that bust of Mantegna which was placed on his tomb, and which has hitherto, regardless of dates, been attributed to Sperandio, who died just eleven years before the great master. In this connexion Dr. Bode himself notes how enormously our knowledge of the history of old Italian art has of late been enriched by the exertions of Venturi at Modena, of Rossi (and we may add, of Bertolotti) at Mantua; we have to thank them not only for knowledge as to local artists, but also for facts as to the relations cultivated by the princes of these places, at the very flower time of Italian art, with its chief representatives. In respect, indeed, of certain phases it seems as if the day may come before long when the student of art history will have to complain of the plethora rather than of the dearth of documents.

We have before called attention to what has appeared to us the growing tendency to revert to the study of the more shining periods and names in the history of art, and it may be said that the larger number of the subjects treated in the present volume show that sense of proportion which, in the first ardours of a new-born desire for accuracy, seemed well-nigh lost. Alfred Meyer has a careful study of important Venetian sepulchral monuments, in which he traces the gradual disappearance of religious sentiment and symbolism, and the way in which this inspiring motive was replaced in the sixteenth century by the rendering of historical facts, until at last the images of the tomb no longer reflected pious hopes for the salvation of the dead, but blazoned forth his whilom fame amongst the living. Dr. Justi, too, makes a valuable contribution to Titian literature by his descriptive catalogue of such works of that painter as were formerly in Spain, but have now disappeared or have been sold into other countries. Nor must we omit to mention in connexion with Italian art Dr. Julius Lessing's interesting paper on the carelessly guarded treasures of St. Nicolas in Bari and the Santa Casa of Loreto, amongst the first of which he notes the most beautiful piece of pure Gothic goldsmiths' work which he has been able to discover in the length and breadth of Italy—a reliquary of silver gilt dating from about the beginning of the fifteenth century. The treasury of the Santa Casa, at one time of superlative magnificence, is now relatively poor. Plundered by the French at the close of the last century, only a few of its original possessions have been brought back through the piety of the devotees of this ancient shrine, and the beauty of these is obscured and their importance lessened by enforced companionship with the overwhelming rubbish dedicated by the neighbouring peasantry.

Amongst the papers which deal with the works of German and Flemish masters a special place must be given to Dr. Thode's essay on Dürer's 'Madonna with the Carnation,' now in the Museum at Cologne, and the composition of which Dr. Thode shows to have been borrowed from Schongauer. His discussion of this question is interesting chiefly because it touches on certain doubtful points in Dürer's youthful career, suggesting some stay made by him at Cologne, and the influence upon his work of the great Swabian master. In writing of the "Genter Altar" Dr. Seeck shows good ground for his assertion that various paintings hitherto assigned to Jan Van Eyck on account of their resemblance to certain portions of the altarpiece (parts of which are now at Brussels and Berlin) should properly be assigned to Hubert, since the more distinctive portions of that work are chiefly from Hubert's hand. Dr. Seeck also expresses the hope that the point thus established—which enables us to judge of the style of Hubert at the close of his career—may lead to the recognition of the master's work in its earlier phases, and supposing that Dr. Seeck's results stand the test of future investigation, he may be congratulated on having brought an important gain to the history of art. Jan Van Eyck himself receives from Dr. von Tschudi the honours of a careful study, devoted in the main to the 'Madonna with the Carthusian Monk,' once the property of the Marquis of Exeter, and commonly known as the Madonna of Burleigh House. Alas! this masterpiece, the execution of which Dr. von Tschudi puts circa 1440-50, is now for ever lost to England, for at one of the sales of 1888-9 it passed into the hands of the Prussian Government, and now adorns the walls of the Museum of Berlin. Another important study in the present volume bears the joint names of Bredius and Bode. In dealing with the works of Symon Kick they have introduced us to that great group of Amsterdam painters who loved to depict scenes from daily life, and among whom Peter Codde is specially memorable, owing to his relations with Franz Hals, for whom he is now known to have prepared the great unfinished picture of the Amsterdam "Schützen-gilde." To the equally gifted Symon Kick—as the reader who shall consult the learned pages of the 'Year-Book' will speedily be convinced—the exertions of Drs. Bredius and Bode have now rightfully restored a series of works which have hitherto been ascribed (like the much admired 'Interior' exhibited at the "Old Masters" in 1888 by Mr. Agnew) to Nicolas Maes, or have passed under the names of Jan le Dueq or of Van der Helst.

In every direction this pious work of re-establishing credit and fame which time has obscured is carried zealously forward by the writers of the 'Year-Book' with rare impartiality. Dr. Lessing generously brings the full weight of his authority and all the soundness of his learned method utterly to destroy the pretensions of those who have gone about claiming for the Nuremberg goldsmith Caspar Enderlein the design of the Temperantia bowl due to the charming invention of François Briot. The Berlin Museum possesses not only a replica of the Briot bowl, but also some German examples as well as other material tending to settle the vexed question of priority. Of all this Dr. Lessing makes use to such purpose that, as he himself says, the German side must henceforth range itself with French opinion. France thus receives for the first time, we believe, a share of the attention of those who write for the Prussian 'Year-Book,' and the example set by Dr. Lessing has been followed by Dr. Dehio, whose essay on the Basilica of St. Martin of Tours is by no means the least valuable contribution to the present volume. We have put this paper last on our list of selected articles, but it is, notwithstanding, one of those which we have read with the greatest interest, for the writer takes occasion to trace the influence of this Basilica on the construction of the churches of the Middle Ages. He contests the accuracy of the current description of the choir with attendant chapels and passage behind the high altar as specially characteristic of French Gothic cathedrals, and maintains that this construction is Romanesque, and an attribute of all great cloister churches as well as of cathedrals. The Bishop Perpetuus, says Dr. Dehio, having built St. Martin's in the fifth century as a sepulchre and pilgrimage church, added to the normally planned Basilica a choir, the form of which was borrowed from Roman sepulchral architecture; the Carolingian restoration added the chapels and cross aisles. Of this combination he supposes the old chief church of Clermont-Ferrand and all her offspring in Auvergne to have been adaptations, which spreading gradually over France were finally carried, with Gothic, into the rest of Europe.

THE Bulletin des Musées, the first number of which came out in February last, is to make its monthly appearances under the joint protection of the Government Department of the Fine Arts and the administration of the National Museums. The Bulletin is edited by M. Édouard Garnier and M. Léonce Benedite, and, in a modest way, will fulfil the same functions in relation to the museums and galleries of France as have been admirably discharged for some time past at Berlin by the 'Year-Book of the Royal Prussian Art Collections,' the last volume of which is noticed in the preceding review. Under the heading "Mouvement des Musées" the Bulletin makes a laudable innovation, for it not only gives news of the French, but also includes notes on other national galleries and collections; in a second division we find notes and documents concerning various art treasures in the possession of France; some space is next devoted to bibliography; and various miscellaneous information on current events in the art world closes and completes a scheme which, if fully developed on the lines indicated, would make of the Bulletin des Musées a thoroughly comprehensive review and medium of communication for the directors and guardians of art collections throughout Europe.

THE GROSVENOR GALLERY. (Second and Concluding Notice.)

JOHN N. SARTORIUS, a little-known painter, was the ablest of a family of German extraction whose works are almost forgotten. Beyond question he was never so well or so fully represented as by the sixteen examples in this gallery, among which are several of his hunting pieces; see Nos. 22, 49, and 133. The Pointers (No. 5) is a favourable specimen of his numerous contributions to the Academy and earlier exhibitions, which, like those of his father, Francis Sartorius, were mostly pictures of dogs, several of which, as well as of his racing scenes, have been engraved. No. 5 is a warm example, the figures are animated and natural, and the landscape background is harmonious.—There is a vast difference between these unpretending and weakly painted, if lively works, and that modern fishing idyl, which is as ugly as it is energetic and spirited, as cleverly painted as it is bold and ungraceful, the well-known "Steady, Johnnie, Steady!" (7) of Mr. E. Nicol, which Mr. Simmons engraved with skill too fine for such a subject, and for the vulgarity of the frowy old fisher who bids his boy be cautious. Still the picture's technical merits almost redeem the hideousness of the chief figure.

Few animal painters of our time have so much skill as Mr. J. Wolf, or excel him in sympathy with the fierce eagerness of the birds and beasts of prey he depicts; few draw so finely or finish so highly the furs, feathers, and faces of the creatures, or design their combats with so much energy as is displayed in Kite-Hawking with Northern Falcons on a Suffolk Heath (9). This was the kind of subject Snyders delighted in, and delineated with a sense of space and of the volition of the flying birds which Mr. Wolf has not attained. The hardness and flatness of Mr.

Wolf's work must not prevent the student from seeing how fine an artist he is. In the Fifth Room, which is devoted to falconry, will be found a number of drawings which prove the abilities of this artist, his feeling for nature and his exhaustive draughtsmanship. We admire especially Iceland Falcon (322), Ptarmigan (332), Snow, Leopard, and Wild Sheep (338), and Gyr-falcons (348).—The Grouse Shooting (24) of P. Reinagle well represents his feeling for the spaciousness of the air, and the effect of morning light upon vapours slowly creeping over the well-painted landscape. The colour is good, and the dogs are designed with rare spirit and intimate knowledge.—Mr. C. Haag's Evening at Balmoral Castle (28) is, technically, the reverse of Reinagle's sincere, studious, and sympathetic draughtsmanship and designing. The colour is unpleasing and the drawing showy. It is not a graceful incident that ladies en grande tenue should be brought from the dinner table to witness the delivery at the palace gate of the poor bleeding carcasses of the deer slain by the prince, who, according to the artist, demonstrates his own skill to an audience of courtiers in evening dress. The effect is meant for torchlight, but fails to be true, yet there is a meretricious cleverness about the figures of the men and women.—Lord Ashburton's famous Rubens called The Wolf Hunt (32) is the very antithesis of the drawing-master style of art that characterizes Mr. Haag. Here is the vigorous master himself on the prancing dapple-grey he gave to Van Dyck. The wild beasts are Snyders's, and betray his peculiar touch, but the grandiose design and amazingly vigorous composition, both of which owe something to Da Vinci's 'Battle of the Standard,' are those of the great Sir Peter Paul, who undoubtedly painted the charging riders and their eager steeds. No one ever came near him in that sort of work. The lady on the brown horse, with a falcon on her hand, is Isabella Brandt, Rubens's first wife. So furious and true are the wolves that, like the huntsmen, they must be portraits. The badness of the catalogue of this exhibition, which does not give even the sizes of the pictures, affords no help to the history of this great picture. It is Michiel's No. 1119 and Smith's 925. The latter author tells us that it was painted expressly for General Legranes, an artilleryman under Spinola in Flanders, in 1612, from whom it descended in direct inheritance to Count Altimera at Madrid. It was taken to the Louvre in 1814, and returned to the Altimera family in 1815; sent to Paris again for sale, it was bought, in 1824, for 2,000*l.* by Smith himself. Smith sold it to the late Mr. A. Baring (Lord Ashburton), who placed it in Bath House. It was engraved by Pieter Soutman and by Vander Leuw. It was No. 110 at the Academy in 1871. At Corsham, Lord Methuen's place, is another and smaller version of the same design, Michiel's 1120, and mentioned, as a duplicate, by Smith under No. 925. Both Smith and Waagen ('Supplement,' p. 395) say that Snyders painted the animals in the latter picture, but no judge of "hands" will fail to recognize that pupil's vigorous touch also in the fine work before us. Lord Methuen's picture was at the Academy in 1877. The Duke of Northumberland lends his Diana returning from the Chase (62), ascribed to Rubens.

Whether it is a Snyders or not, The Race between the Hare and the Tortoise (35) is a very good picture. It is lent by Lord Darnley. Snyders's The Eagle mobbed by other Birds (17) is good; so are the Boar's Head (79), also by him, and Nos. 89 and 102, all from the Royal Collections. The bold and vigorous No. 79 is from Hampton Court, and named in King James's catalogue by Chiffinch as "No. 932, Snyders. A piece, being a boar's head." It is signed "F. Snyders fecit." The Wild Boar Hunt (89), a large picture of great merit, though rough and somewhat crude in style, is full of passion and vigour, deserving more attention than it is likely to receive here. It was "No. 802, The hunting of wild boars," in the royal catalogue above named—a sort of picture King James assuredly delighted in. 'The Group of Several Dogs' of the old Hampton Court catalogue is Dogs on Scent (102) before us.—An exceptionally fine Kneller is the Portrait of Henrietta (born Holles), Countess of Oxford (42). She was the only daughter and heir of John Holles, Duke of Newcastle, and married in 1713 Edward Harley, second Earl of Oxford, the great bibliophile (ob. 1741); she sold the Harleian Library to the British Museum, 1754, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. She wears a graceful riding habit of olive embroidered with silver, and her picture is in Sir Godfrey's best manner, painted with excellent colour, taste, and a spirit uncommon in his later works.—In the Morland, A Fishing Party (39), the figures are almost tasteful enough to be worthy of Stothard. Among the men in a punt is Morland himself. An excellent picture, such as accounts for the popularity of the painter, its merits led to its being engraved with skill and commercial success. The colour is rich and harmonious, but the whole work has darkened in an unusual degree. Innocence Alarmed (73), a good Morland, contains the portrait of his pretty and buxom wife, poor Fanny Ward, or of his sister, who married the engraver William Ward. It is an excellent specimen of the finer and prettier phase of old English popular genre painting. The dogs are nearly as good as the girls. Rabbiting (80), a good hunting piece, illustrates another mood of Morland and old-fashioned taste. All the G. Morlands here (see Nos. 3, 57, 76, 83, 98, and 104) are good specimens of an able artist to whom modern high pressure and "hot-pressed" refinement are unjust.

James Ward has not been overlooked here. The Bloodhound (39) is original and scholarly. Despite its slight uncouthness, Landseer in his best days would have been glad to have painted it. The wonderful go of the white horse in Cub-Hunting (58) recommends the picture to artists as well as hunters. The Dead Hare (84) is better than any dead animal by Snyders. Some of Ward's studies, for instance A Swan (168), are in style, vigour, and carefulness worthy of an old master.—Jan Breughel's St. Hubert (51), although it has been restored out of all likeness to its original state, is a fine picture of its kind, and contrasts very quaintly indeed with the Morlands and Wards in the neighbourhood. The story is told with a quaintness and passion even Albert Dürer hardly attained to in the noble and famous design of which we have yet to speak.

The well-known Hare (55), lent by the Duke of Westminster, is no Dürer. It is a work of Dürer's time, but by a hand differently trained and differently skilled. Unfinished as it is, it is delicate, accomplished, and deft enough for any one not an inventive genius. It is, of course, not a picture at all, but a drawing, and the moths, flowers, and reptiles which accompany it were delineated as studies after nature on a pure white ground by some laborious and unflinching student, not a master. Its history is well known since it was in the collection of the late King Louis Philippe, and before then it represented a somewhat numerous class of so-called studies attributed to Dürer, which the German dealers foisted on their customers as genuine. When the King of the French fled this drawing was brought to England with many pictures and other objects, most of which are in the possession of the Duc de Nemours at Bushey Park. The packer of the 'Hare,' misled, as later writers have been, thought it was an oil painting, and to preserve it in travelling pasted strong soft paper on the surface. Naturally, when the case was opened on the owner's behalf by Messrs. Dominic Colnaghi & Co., the paper was found to have stuck to the surface, so that the Duc, thinking the 'Hare' was utterly ruined, sold it to Colnaghi & Co. for 12*l.* With infinite pains the late Mr. C. Buttery removed the paper and repaired the damages; the firm then sold the drawing to Mr. J. Heugh for 40*l.*, and later bought it back again, and again sold it (for 60*l.*) to the Duke of Westminster. As Messrs. Colnaghi & Co. are not accustomed to sell Dürer's drawings for 60*l.* apiece, we know they thought of it as we do.

Another work attributed to Dürer is St. Hubert (61), wisely described in the Catalogue as "one of the many delineations of the Patron Saint of Hunting attributed to this great master." A beautifully executed piece, we do not feel justified in saying that it is an original merely because it is not in every detail a veritable copy of the celebrated etching. Little differences are often introduced in copies, and the unwary amateur is frequently taken in when ingenious dealers assert that works because they are altered must needs be original versions of renowned pictures. There is in Vander Doort's catalogue of King Charles's pictures a curious entry which illustrates the old practice of copying Dürers and indicates a renowned hand at work: "No. 5. Item. A little piece, whereon is painted a witch riding upon a black ram-goat in the air, with a distaff in her hand; four little Cupids, in several actions; said to be done by Elshamer [Adam Elzheimer] before he went to Italy; from a print of Albert Dürer; painted upon the right light. Given to the King by Sir Arthur Hopton." Lord Northbrook's Squirrels (72) is ascribed to Dürer without any better warrant than the cipher and date above the group, and is a drawing on vellum. Very animated and spirited, it belongs to the same category as the 'Hare,' and was probably not intended for a Dürer by the draughtsman. Mr. T. Baring bought it in 1854 of M. E. Joly de Bannemville for fourteen guineas. In the East Gallery there is another 'Hare' by Dürer, belonging to Mr. H. Smith Barry, M.P. The Series of Fifteen Original Drawings of Birds (362), which come from Chatsworth, are not, of course, by A. Dürer, to whom the Catalogue ascribes them, but by a Dutchman of the seventeenth century, and were probably executed for a book on birds.

We return to the old-fashioned English school in G. Stubbs's portraits of William, Duke of Portland, and Lord E. Bentinck (63). Marked by sincerity and homeliness, bright, pure in light and colouring, well and firmly drawn, veracious and quaint in its primitive way, this is sterling work, showing not the least respect for art traditions and conventions. By the way, the landscape is not by Stubbs. The modelling of the horse is worthy of the artist, of whose powers he knows nothing who has not seen the life-size portrait of Whistiejaquet which is the noblest ornament in the Blue and Silver Drawing-Room at Wentworth-Woodhouse. No. 60, The Old Riding School at Welbeck, by G. Stubbs, is worthy of the painter. We doubt if the background (buildings) is Stubbs's. Shark (81) is a true Stubbs, the portrait of a dark bay racehorse going forth and led by a boy groom. The exquisite modelling and finish of the horse's skin are worthy of the fine drawing they accompany. The Shark is said to have won 20,000 guineas in stakes. The Hunter and Arabian (82), also by Stubbs, is a thoroughly true example, solid, delicate, and strong in execution, but, like most Stubbses, unmitigated prose in painting. Great was the renown, not yet extinct, of Mambrino (91). This admirable portrait of a white horse in a meadow was engraved with universal acceptance by G. T. Stubbs, and framed impressions are, to this day, not seldom found in country inns.—Whoever turns to A. Cooper's Mare and Foals (94) will discover how closely that artist in his early life approached Stubbs. But he did not draw so well, and the proportions of his horses were not always correct.—One of the best possible Stubbses is the Portrait of Sir J. Nelthorpe (99), a bright, warm, soft, elaborate, and delicately touched picture. More illustrious than even Mambrino himself was that magnificent stallion the Godolphin Arabian (261). Yet Stubbs's picture does not, it must be confessed, inspire us with reverential awe for the celebrated ancestor of many celebrated thoroughbreds. Clearly the studious Academician was not a poet.—The Partridges Alarmed (101) of Stephen Elmer, of Farnham, an artist whose works are rarely seen nowadays, is smooth, delicate, and finished with taste and skill.—That the Royal Academy Club played at cricket in the Artillery Grounds in the queer fashion shown by F. Hayman's queer picture, No. 107, is questionable, and surprising to A.R.A.s of the present day.

Technically speaking, few pictures here excel the Queen's Wild Ducks (109), by Cuypp—a famous work, which is distinguished by the beautiful treatment of the birds floating on the smooth and lovely water, along the vista of which slow craft loiter with idle sails in the dreamy and golden summer calm. It formerly belonged to the Marquis of Hertford, and is Smith's 246.—The Wild Ducks (114) rising from a darkened pool is certainly not by D. Teniers, to whom it is attributed here, probably because there is a brilliant 'Wild Ducks' by him in the Bridgewater Gallery.—The solid and able work of Jan Fyt, one of the best painters of still life in the great Dutch school, is to be seen in the fine Dogs and Dead Game (123), lent by the Duke of Westminster, and including spaniels looking from our right at a hare, partridges, pigeons, and ducks. The Falcon and Ducks (132), from the same collection, is a renowned specimen of the same masculine artist.—Hoppner's R. Humphreys (143), a prizefighter preparing to receive his antagonist, is Romney-like in its breadth and massive touch: a fine and energetic conception.—There is a small picture by G. Courbet here of Roe-Deer in the Snow (175), with greyhounds running, which is worthy of study.—The Otter Hounds (166), by Mlle. R. Bonheur, a fine piece of brilliant sunlight and admirable dogs, shows how a great artist can treat what is called a sporting subject.—Another example of a similar kind is the strong and brilliant Fishing by Proxy (188), men using cormorants in an English river, with splendid colouring and a fine harmony of tone. It is by Mr. Hook.—An eminent member of the Liverpool school, of which Londoners are sadly ignorant, is tolerably well represented by W. Huggins's Portrait of Mr. Case (198).

More attractive than some of the bad and indifferent pictures most needlessly shown in this gallery are the numerous specimens of hunting weapons, implements, and trophies, ancient and modern. This collection might have been made much more instructive and copious than it is by loans from private owners. Some stupendous tusks of elephants, walruses, and narwhals occur here, and ought not to be overlooked by those who love the beauty of natural weapons. Conspicuous among these are a group of magnificent tusks of the narwhal, not less than eleven feet in length, and instances of nature's artistic engineering, admirable for the beauty and strength of their spiral growth.

MINOR EXHIBITIONS.

AMONG a number of works of no great merit to be seen in Mr. McLean's Gallery, the following are conspicuous for different qualities:—M. Grogart's Strictly Confidential (No. 3), a pretty and bright picture of girls gossiping; the Happy Family (15) of M. G. Vastagh, a lion tenderly licking his purring mate, while her hopeful offspring play tricks with her tail—a clever and well-executed design; Mr. McWhirter's Highland Road and River (16), which would be better if that very painty birch tree were away, which his admirers will never let him cease painting; Herr Bauernfeind's Jaffa (17), which illustrates the teaching of Prof. Müller, a good example of a dull but well-trained school; and Mr. Godward's Corner of a Roman Garden (18), remarkable for the clever audacity with which the artist has imitated Sir F. Leighton.—Mr. P. Graham has repeated himself in Scaring the Gulls (19).—Mr. E. A. Waterlow has in Caught this Morning (20) measured himself against Mr. Hook, which was rash of him, but the attempt has helped him to finer, purer, brighter, and more harmonious colour than he ever attained before.—M. L'Hermite's The Gleaners (23) is a minor, but highly artistic example.—Mr. Orchardson's If Music be the Food of Love, Play on (24), is exactly such a picture as we expect from him when he is not exerting himself. There is a good deal of flooring and much blank wall space.

In Messrs. Tooth's Gallery there are a few pictures of merit. The Dead Gull (1), by Mr. Hook, a seashore piece, is notable for colour and brightness, but is far from being his best work.—The Golden Sunbeams (2) of Mr. C. Bisschop delineates a brilliant effect with an excess of paint.—Herr H. T. Schäfer's The tender Charm of Poetry and Love (10), a pretty piece of sentiment, combines the characteristics of Mr. Alma Tadema and Angelica Kaufmann with the better qualities of neither.—M. de Blaas is himself in the group of Venetian lovers called The Spider and the Fly (12); but the brawny youth and the buxom wench with her inevitable thick ankles and white stockings are comparatively coarsely painted and crude in colour. We may mention the same artist's Temptation (14); The King Plays (18) of M. A. A. Learel; Mr. D. Farquharson's slight, dashing, and fallacious landscape On the Tummel (29)—a better example is his Frosty Morning (68), where the misty mid-distance is good; Mr. E. Parton's A Lily Nook (37); Mr. W. L. Wyllie's natural and artistic Winter on the Medway (41), a fine minor work—very brilliant and vigorous is the sea in his capital Torpedo Boats (83); Mr. B. Riviere's The Meeting (46) and The Farting (52), all of which deserve attention; and Mr. P. Graham's At Break of Day (56), where much mist and paint combine in a pot-boiler unworthy of the artist.—A fine French landscapist, M. V. Binet, is represented in a modest way by Near St. Aubin (66). The upland is somewhat too green.—The Still waters run deep (69) of Herr Heffner has nothing new about it, but the good subject deserved more research than the now inveterate mannerisms of the painter permit.—If it was as sincere as it is pretentious and painty, the Towyn Sands (70) of Mr. B. W. Leader would be charming; the subject is so fine, the artist's perception so poetic, and his facility so agreeable, that had the scene been dealt with under truer conditions here would be a picture made to hand. As it is, the whole is full of chic, yet lacks that delicacy which often gives a nameless grace to that artistic vice.—Although this gallery, like that of Mr. McLean, abounds in ambitious imitations of well-known painters, we hardly expected that Herr C. F. Ulrich would repeat the mannerisms of M. E. de Blaas—see his For the Battle of Flowers (24), a surprising production for a man of ability.

THE NEW RULES FOR STUDENTS OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

THE important regulations for the guidance and instruction of teachers and pupils in the schools which, without any aid from the State, the Royal Academicians maintain, have lately been altered and improved. Whatever is done in these schools has so wide an effect on similar establishments throughout the realm, and applies to so many thousands of pupils cultivating the higher branches of design, that a notice of the more important of them cannot but be welcome to a large number of our readers.

The new regulations limit to twenty-three years the age for admission of pupils as Probationers. This rule will in future be stringently enforced, and it is certain greatly to reduce the number of ladies competing for admission. Beginning late, few ladies reach the standards now in use until they have passed the age in question. It is generally quite otherwise with male students, who draw in their earliest teens, and think of little but their art.

On the 1st of January or 1st of July in each year painters must in future submit specimens of their abilities, consisting of a finished drawing in chalk, not less than 2 ft. high, of an undraped antique statue (male, we suppose); life-size drawings of a head and arm from the life; a drawing of an antique figure anatomized, showing the bones with the names attached, and another drawing of the same figure showing the muscles and tendons, with the names; all on imperial sheets of paper. Sculptors must send a model in the round, 2 ft. high, of an undraped antique statue; a medallion, life size, of a head from the life; and anatomized drawings as above. Architects must submit a geometric elevation of some part of an existing building, of which a portion must be drawn in free hand; geometric elevations of the Doric, Ionic, and Corinthian orders, with their entablatures complete, drawn to a half-inch scale, the columns to be 24 ft. high; an original perspective sketch in pencil of an existing building, or part of one, on a quarter-sheet of imperial paper; and a drawing of a piece of architectural ornament from a cast, shaded in pencil or chalk, or tinted, and of the size of the original.

The Council will select Probationers from the authors of the above-named works to compete for the vacant studentships. These competitors will be required to make in the Academy test works as follows. Painters: a life-size drawing of a head and an arm from life, to be finished in six days of four hours each; a time-drawing, not less than 2 ft. high, of a figure from the life partially draped, to be done in one day of four hours; and a sketch of a design in black and white, from a subject set by the Keeper, to be completed in one day of six hours. Sculptors: a model in the round, 2 ft. high, of a figure from the life, partially draped, to be executed in eleven days of four hours each, and a model of a design in clay or wax, from a subject set by the Keeper, to be finished in one day of six hours. Architects: a geometric drawing from memory only of one of the Orders to half-inch scale, the Order and height of the Order to be fixed by the Council, and no book or other aid allowed, to be done in one evening of two hours; a drawing from a cast, the size of the original, to be completed in seven evenings of two hours each; a geometric elevation, with or without a plan, of a building, or part of one, in London, from the Probationer's own notes and measurements, taken from the building itself, in two evenings of two hours each; and two studies in outline of two of the principal casts in the Architectural School, to be executed in two evenings of two hours each. Successful Probationers will be admitted as Students of the Royal Academy for three years, renewable for two further years. The five years' studentship will not be renewed.

It is further, we understand, in contemplation to carry on the schools for male and female students distinct from each other, probably in separate buildings, as well as to modify in a stringent manner the system of ladies drawing in the Life Schools, which is open to many objections.

The Academicians find their schools crowded with persons who, beginning too late or from other causes, rarely rise beyond an elementary stage. A life-size drawing of a head, hand, and arm will shut out not a few hopeless aspirants. More important still is the change requiring drawings done in given periods of time by the Probationers; the time-sketches will test the resources of the students, and the designs for given subjects will discover what are their notions of arrangement or composition, to say nothing of their recognition of the elements of a subject per se. In eight days all will in future be over as regards the painters, whereas till now the examination has occupied two months.

NOTES FROM CILICIA.

Mersina, March 14, 1890.

WHILST wandering about in the district known formerly as Cilicia Tracheiotia I have been able to identify several important sites. On the high land which rises above the sea between Mersina and Selefkeh (Seleucia) are the remains of several Greek cities. One of these was Olba, which Strabo tells us was ruled over by priest kings, most of them bearing the name of Teucer or Ajax. On a polygonal fortress I found one inscription, a dedication to the Olbian Zeus by the priest Teukros Tarkyarios, and another stating that the building was erected under the superintendence of Pleistarchos of Olba; thus the site of this ancient city is clearly established. A large tomb built on the slope of the hill contains an inscription with the name of Aba, a woman, Strabo tells us, who married into the ruling family, and was recognized by Antony and Cleopatra as the ruler of this part of Cilicia. From the site of another town, called in an inscription Eabbatia, we learned the names of two other priest kings, namely, Hermokrates and Lucius. This town contained two temples of Hermes—one in a deep gorge where three caves are walled in with polygonal masonry, and before it once stood a handsome propylæon erected at the expense of two noble ladies, who are depicted on the pediment with their spindles. The other temple of Hermes was in the town itself, and yielded several interesting inscriptions.

With regard to the question of the Corycian cave, I am inclined to believe that explorers have not yet identified the situation. Strabo tells us that it was twenty stadia behind Corycus. Now Olba is about that distance, and in the centre of the ruins of Olba, just beneath the above-mentioned fortress, is exactly such a hole as Strabo describes. It is about three-quarters of a mile round and two hundred feet deep, with precipitous cliffs around it, in which are carved several funereal bas-reliefs; it was approached by two roads—one a tunnel cut in the rock, descending from the spot where presumably the temple of the Olbian Zeus stood, and the other an open staircase cut in the rock. At the bottom of this hole are trees and vegetation—a much more likely place for saffron to grow, as Strabo tells us, than any cave as yet considered likely to be the cave of Corycus.

These towns on the hill slopes are mostly built on precipitous rocks, and are protected by fortresses of polygonal masonry. Most of them have distinguishing marks on the outer stones; that of Olba has a triskele, Eabbatia has a hunting horn, and another fortress town, the name of which I was unable to identify, has a club for its symbol.

J. THEODORE BENT.

SALE.

MESSRS. CHRISTIE, MANSON & WOODS sold on the 29th ult. the following pictures, from various collections: W. Muller, A Winter Scene, 120*l*. D. Cox, Bettw-y-Coed, 131*l*. J. Stark, A Landscape, with figures, sheep, and cows, 267*l*. J. Crome, sen., A Landscape, with man gathering faggots, 252*l*; The Porlington Oak, a man and a dog under a tree, and cows in the foreground, 787*l*. T. Gainsborough, The Harvest Waggon, with portraits of two of the artist's daughters, 220*l*; Gainsborough's Camera, with twelve original landscapes, on glass, 215*l*. L. B. Huet, Scotch Cattle, 100*l*. A. Moore, The Siesta, 162*l*. J. B. Burgess, Church Catechism, 252*l*. C. Stanfield, Macbeth and the Witches, 120*l*. F. R. Lee and T. S. Cooper, Kilchurn Castle, 189*l*. H. Merle, Charity, 115*l*. P. Graham, The Gentle Heaving Tide, 404*l*. R. Ansell, A Good Shepherd, 231*l*. G. Romney, Lady Hamilton ('Sensibility'), 3,045*l*; Portrait of a Lady, 294*l*; Head of Lady Hamilton, 189*l*; Head of a Lady, the companion, 162*l*. G. Barret, S. Gilpin, and P. Reinagle, The going out from Thornton Castle, near Aveimere, in the Highlands, 141*l*; The Display at the Return at Dulnon Camp, in the Highlands of Scotland, 168*l*; The Deer-Shooters, 126*l*.

Fine-Art Gossip.

THE summer exhibition of the New Gallery will be opened to the public on Thursday, May 1st, the private view being held on Wednesday, April 30th. Mr. E. Burne Jones's 'Adoration of the Magi,' a large and important example, intended for Regent Street, will not be ready, because he has been finishing his series of pictures illustrative of the legend of the Sleeping Beauty, to which we have more than once referred. He will contribute to the New Gallery between thirty and forty frames filled with drawings and studies from the life, made for his exhibited pictures, as well as for some which are still on the easel. Mr. Watts has promised his 'Ariadne' and three, if not four, other works. Mr. Alma Tadema will exhibit two beautiful examples, one of which, in its first state, we have already described, and one or two portraits. Sir John Millais has promised one of the two landscapes, probably the frosty morning scene, our readers have heard of. As he desires it should be shown under glass, a thing not allowed at the Academy, he will be more likely to send it to Regent Street than the moonlit subject. Mr. Poynter, whose 'Queen of Sheba's Visit to Solomon' will, as we have already stated, be shown in the Haymarket, sends to the New Gallery one or more less important works; Mr. Herkomer contributes three portraits; Mr. E. A. Waterlow a moonlight landscape; Mr. J. Waterhouse a quasi-Oriental garden scene with female figures. Mr. G. D. Leslie's girls watering flowers, we have mentioned before, are destined for the same place. Mr. R. W. Macbeth exhibits 'Gipsies crossing a Ford' and 'A Mother and Child.' Mr. Boughton will contribute two specimens; Mr. H. Moore one example; Mr. E. Barclay 'Girls caught in a Shower'; Prof. Costa four landscapes; Mr. A. East 'Furze,' a landscape; Mr. C. E. Hallé five pictures, being 'The Escalade,' the portrait of Mrs. Harry (not Harvey, as we gave it some weeks ago) Taylor, a new picture of a young girl reading a book of fairy tales, and 'The Silent Witness,' which we have previously mentioned; Mr. C. N. Kennedy a large 'Perseus and Andromeda'; Mr. D. Murray 'The Meadow Mirror' and 'When daisies pied,' the former a pool among rushes, reflecting the soft grey clouds and surrounded by willows, the latter a spring scene, a road strewn with daisies and running between a hedge in tender spring foliage and a land drain, beside which is a beautiful group of willows. Among the other exhibitors are Messrs. MacLaren, W. H. Hunt, A. Moore, J. Parker, A. Parsons, E. Parton ('When Daylight Dies'), Sargent, Shannon, W. B. Richmond, A. Stokes ('A Breaking Wave'), and C. Wyllie (a landscape). Pieces of sculpture will be sent by Sir E. Boehm, A. Gilbert, O. Ford, Mullins, and Dressler, and Miss Hallé exhibits her Stanley Medal in gold.

AMONG the finest pieces of sculpture we expect to see at the Royal Academy this year is Mr. H. Bates's life-size nude 'Pandora,' in which the artist has given a fresh reading of the subject, and instead of the customary elf-like or voluptuous woman has shown a tender, very gentle and happy maiden, whose features are charming. She is kneeling on one knee, and holds daintily with one hand the fateful casket that is closed with hinges and a lock of gold. Her face is bent towards the coffer, which she regards with a brooding and almost wistful look, but without alarm or a thought of evil. The virginal elegance of the figure, its graceful, spontaneous, and natural air, the simplicity of the attitude, and the finish of the whole work more than justify the reputation of the sculptor. The casket, which is made of ivory, bears upon the lid a beautiful group of Pandora descending earthwards, and carved upon its sides in low relief are panels representing scenes in her history.

MR. F. MADOX BROWN has completed the tenth of his twelve paintings for the Town Hall at Manchester, that is to say, the tenth in order of position, and the tenth in historical sequence, but the eleventh he has painted. This fine design will shortly be placed in its proper panel, and will be cemented to the wall, and thus become practically part of the building. In some respects, especially as regards its coloration and dramatic qualities, it is one of the best of the series. It depicts 'John Kay, Inventor of the Flying Shuttle, rescued from the Mob' by his wife and workmen, who concealed him in a sheet of wool, and had him carried out of his house by a back way, while the rioters were breaking in the front of the building. The scene is the interior of the workshop, while a glimpse of the brighter light outside is obtained through a window on the left, and on the right, in the garden, are placed a horse and cart and its driver. Kay's old clerk, an historical character, with a long white beard and face of striking energy, is hastily wrapping a sheet of wool about his master, who passionately kisses his wife, while she, stooping over him, looks with alarm towards the window and listens to the shouts of the mob and their blows upon the iron stanchions, which are already giving way. The weaver's loom occupies much of the middle of the picture; it is of the upright form suited to the use of the fly-shuttle. In front of it is a carpenter's bench, used for repairing Kay's primitive machinery. Stretching himself along this bench, and partly concealed from the mob by the loom, Robert, the weaver's son, watches the destruction of the window. Although his back is towards us and his face is hidden from us, his limbs show the intensity of his alarm. He is dressed in red, brown, and black. The fine expression of Mrs. Kay's handsome face, the hurried movements of the servants, and the excellent keeping of the whole demand admiration. So far as we have discovered, the only defects are the imperfect drawing of Mrs. Kay's bare arms, some disproportions between her hands and those of some of the other figures, and a slight excess in the light in which they are seen.

THE private view of the exhibition of the Society of Painters in Water Colours is appointed for Saturday, the 19th inst. The public will be admitted to the gallery on the Monday following.

THE history of English water-colour art, a large part of the materials for which were collected by the late J. J. Jenkins, secretary of the "Old Society," which Mr. Roget has long had in hand to complete, is now nearly finished. We hope it may soon be published.

THE amiability, long experience, and wide acquaintance of the well-known animal painter justify the expectations of his friends that the book on his life and its incidents which Mr. T. Sidney Cooper (encouraged by the success of Mr. W. P. Frith in a somewhat different mood) is writing, will be at once trustworthy and readable.

By the death at Worthing on the 25th ult., of heart disease terminating an illness of four weeks, of Mr. John Turtle Wood, the learned world has lost an energetic, devoted, and somewhat ill-rewarded servant. He was born in London, February 13th, 1821, and educated there as an architect, and for some years practised his profession in that city, exhibiting at the Academy in 1853, 1854, and 1857. In the last-named year he accepted the appointment of architect to the Smyrna and Aidin Railway, and went to Smyrna in 1857. In 1858, abandoning this employment, he began excavations at Ephesus for the discovery of the temple of Diana. Failing in this object on that occasion, he was successful in finding, on the south side of Mount Coressus, the Odeum, and on the west side the theatre of the city, likewise the so-called tomb of St. Luke. Four years' arduous toil, not a little discomfort, and considerable sacrifice of health attended these labours. The funds furnished to the excavator were exhausted, and he returned to England. In 1868, being refurnished with money, he was again at Ephesus, and, adopting a new and ingenious plan, followed the roads leading from the Magnesians and Coressian Gates, and on the 31st of December, 1869, came upon the Great Temple twenty-two feet below the surface. Continuing his excavations, Wood by 1874 had uncovered the whole site of the Temple, and proved that three temples had successively stood upon the site, and that within the last structure a Christian church had been erected. Popular jealousy of his excavations exposed the architect to considerable danger. On one occasion he was stabbed by a ruffian; but he suffered most from the climate, which permanently injured his constitution. Some of the sculptures secured by him are now in the British Museum, the Trustees of which institution had employed Wood. These works, although very far indeed from being of that supremely fine artistic character which over-zealous antiquaries have, not unnaturally, claimed for them—they belong, in fact, to a decaying school of sculpture as well as of architecture—are second to none in archaeological value. The results of Wood's explorations were published by him in his 'Discoveries at Ephesus,' 1877.

'SCOTTISH NATIONAL MEMORIALS,' the long expected memorial volume which forms the outcome of the archaeological and historical collection exhibited in Glasgow in 1888, will be issued this month by Messrs. MacLehose & Sons, of Glasgow. It deals with prehistoric and early Christian remains, the memorials of Queen Mary and the Stuarts, Scottish historic and personal relics, literature, burghal memorials, and monographs on such subjects as jewellery and plate, archery, furniture, weapons, and tortures. Sir Arthur Mitchell, Dr. Joseph Anderson, the Rev. Joseph Stevenson, S.J., and Prof. Ferguson are among those who have contributed to the volume, which will contain 300 illustrations and full-page plates.

It is our duty to record the death, in his seventy-third year and on the 24th ult., of Mr. Edward Hailstone, of Walton Hall and Horton Hall, Wakefield, a distinguished Yorkshire antiquary and collector of relics, including portraits and satirical prints, and the author of two volumes entitled 'Portraits of Yorkshire Worthies, selected from the National Exhibition of Works of Art at Leeds, 1868,' illustrated with two hundred photographs from authentic likenesses of the "worthies" which were collected on that occasion. We reviewed this book at the time. Mr. Hailstone's wife (S. H. Lilla) was an authority on lace, of which she formed a valuable collection. She published 'Designs for Lace-making,' forty plates, 1870.

AMONG the works intended, so say the French journals, for the new exhibition on the Champ de Mars, is one of the most important of M. Meissonnier's pictures, 'Napoléon et son État-Major à la Bataille d'Iéna.' M. Ribot, whose paintings have been of late scarce in the Salons, will send nine examples, including 'La Femme aux Lunettes'; M. A. Stevens, another abstainer from the Palais de l'Industrie, will send several of his productions; M. J. Beraud will contribute 'La Salle des Jeux de Monaco'; M. A. Roll, who deserts the Salon, proposes to appear in the rival gallery with portraits, including 'Madame Jeanne Hading,' in a ball costume, and 'M. Coquelin, cadet,' in a black dress, soliloquizing. The Salon will be enriched by a portrait of M. Carnot, by M. L. Bonnat; M. Munkacsy's ceiling for the Art Museum at Vienna, representing 'The Apotheosis of the Renaissance'; M. Moreau de Tours's 'Jeunesse,' a study of a young girl, and 'Les Fascinés de la Charité, 1889, Séance d'Hypnotisme'; M. Le Poitevin's 'Les Toiles d'Araignées'; M. Henri Cain's 'Les Chanteurs

Ambulants'; M. Fantin-Latour's portraits of 'Mlle. Sonia Y——' and 'Madame L. Gravier'; M. Benner's 'Un Soir d'Été' and 'Dans la Grotte Verte'; M. Bouguereau's 'La Résurrection'; M. V. E. Berthélemy's 'Glaneuses'; M. Gérôme's 'Poursuite' and 'L'Abreuvoir'; M. P. Sain's 'Matinée de Septembre, près d'Avignon'; and M. Yon's 'L'Étang de Cernay' and 'La Loire à Vouvray.'

A PIECE of decorative work executed by Boucher and Fragonard for Gilles Demarteau, who engraved most of Boucher's works, was sold the other day at the Hôtel Drouot for over 58,000 francs.

ON the 23rd ult. was destroyed by fire, due to over-heated flues, the curious church of Guestring, Hastings, a noteworthy twelfth century relic.

It is proposed to have a loan exhibition of works of art at Salford during the coming summer in the Peel Park Galleries, and a circular has been issued appealing to well-known collectors for loans of pictures, &c.

In our notice, p. 410, col. 2, ante, of "Holbeins," the note on the great collar of rubies which Charles I. sold in Holland to provide powder and shot for the destruction of his subjects during the Civil War is, by an accident, made to refer to the Earl of Yarborough's 'Edward VI.,' No. 174 at the Tudor Exhibition. It really belongs to Mr. Molyneux's 'Edward VI.,' No. 175, which is mentioned four lines higher up in the column.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

ST. JAMES'S HALL.—Philharmonic Society. The Popular Concerts.

THE subscribers to the Philharmonic Concerts will scarcely desire another such experience as they were called upon to endure at the second concert on Thursday last week. It may have been permissible to afford an opportunity for passing judgment upon the so-called modern Flemish school of music, of which M. Benoit is the acknowledged chief; and this having been done the directors will at any rate know in future what to avoid. It is difficult to write calmly concerning the four movements from the incidental music to a drama on the subject of Charlotte Corday from the pen of the above-named composer. We do not dispute their appropriateness to Ernest Vander Ven's play, for which they were written in 1876. Melodramas are produced in London, and incidental music of a far more pleasing character than that of M. Benoit is written for them by competent theatrical composers; but work of this class is not suitable for performance by the Philharmonic Society, and that from 'Charlotte Corday' is of the most vulgar sort, fragments of the 'Marseillaise' and the revolutionary tune 'Ça ira' being mingled with original matter full of sound and fury, but totally destitute of every quality that is looked for in a work of art. The Philharmonic Society, once so ultra-conservative in its policy that it seemed likely to perish from inanition, must be careful not to err in the opposite direction. Belgian music was further represented at this concert by three songs from the pen of M. Huberti with M. Blauwaert as their executant. Huberti is a disciple of M. Benoit in maintaining the existence of a distinct Flemish school of composition; but if we may judge by these songs he is no more successful than his master. They are lengthy and pretentious, but devoid of either beauty or originality. In their desire to emancipate themselves from the influences of French art Belgian composers have adopted a turgid, monotonous, and wholly unprepossessing mode of utterance. Vieuxtemps, as represented by his Violin Concerto in D minor, No. 4, was content to write like a Frenchman, and though his music is trivial, it is, at any rate, harmless, and can be listened to without a feeling of irritation. M. Ysaÿe's performance of the concerto was an executive display of no ordinary kind. The tone was superb, and the technical difficulties of the work were mastered with apparent ease, the intonation never being at fault. M. Ysaÿe is one of the most gifted violinists of the present generation, and if he were to emulate Herr Joachim in artistic reverence for the creations of the great masters he might attain the highest rank in his profession. Possibly he has already repented of the eccentricities which marred his rendering of classical works last season, and we shall be glad to hear him in compositions of greater value than Vieuxtemps's concerto. The most enjoyable portion of last week's concert consisted in the performance of such familiar masterpieces as Haydn's Symphony in B flat, 'La Reine de France,' Sterndale Bennett's overture 'The Naiads,' and the Prelude to 'Die Meistersinger.' In these the orchestra seemed to recognize that they had music worthy of their powers, and the rendering entitles Mr. Cowen to considerable praise. It only remains to be mentioned that the pieces by M. Benoit and M. Huberti were conducted by their respective composers, and so obtained a more favourable reception than would otherwise have been accorded to them.

A Beethoven programme was presented at the last of the Saturday Popular Concerts, the works selected being the Quintet in C, Op. 29, the 'Serenade' Trio in D, Op. 8, the Violin Romance in F, Op. 50, and the 'Moonlight' Sonata. The last-named work was played by Mlle. Janotha in perhaps the quickest time on record. It is possible, of course, that she may have some authority for the extremely rapid pace she adopts in the first movement. Mr. Norman Salmond improved his position by his excellent rendering of Handel's "O ruddier than the cherry." His enunciation was particularly good, and his delivery sufficiently bold and energetic without exaggeration.

On Monday the scheme was miscellaneous, and included Spohr's Concerto in B minor for two violins, Op. 88, for the first time. The accompaniments were, of course, played on the piano, but it cannot be said the work suffered greatly, for the interest of it lies chiefly in the solo parts, which are written in Spohr's best manner—that is to say, as brilliantly as music could be written for the violin. The execution of the concerto by Madame Néruda and Herr Joachim was, of course, superb. The remaining works were Mozart's Quintet in G minor, Schumann's in E flat, and Rubinstein's Sonata in D for piano and violoncello, Op. 18. Miss Fanny Davies and Miss Agnes Zimmermann were the pianists, but neither of them played any solos. Miss Liza Lehmann sang two French songs with her customary charm. The season has been singularly devoid of special features of interest. Only one novelty of importance has been produced, Prof. Stanford's Sonata in D minor for piano and violoncello; and only one new artist, M. de Greef, has taken part in the performances. Mr. Chappell, however, presumably consults the wishes of his subscribers in these matters.

Musical Gossip.

At last Saturday's Crystal Palace concert Beethoven's 'Mount of Olives' was performed, with Miss Annie Marriott, Mr. Henry Piercy, and Mr. Watkin Mills as the principal vocalists. Dr. Bridge's setting of Toplady's hymn 'Rock of Ages,' first performed at the Birmingham Festival of 1885, Mendelssohn's 'Reformation' Symphony, and Macfarren's Overture to 'St. John the Baptist' were included in the programme.

The programme of next Saturday's Crystal Palace concert will be selected entirely from the works of Wagner. On Saturday, May 3rd, the summer season will be inaugurated by a special performance of 'The Golden Legend,' with Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Marian McKenzie, Mr. Henry Piercy, and Mr. Watkin Mills as the principal vocalists.

The fifty-fourth performance of new works by the Musical Artists' Society took place at the Princes' Hall last Saturday evening. The leading features of the programme were a weak and commonplace Quartet in G, entitled 'Country Scenes,' by Mr. J. Jacques Haakman; a rather laboured Sonata in G for violin and piano, by Mr. Erskine Allon, Op. 21; a Mendelssohnian Sonata in D for the same instruments, by Mr. Walter Macfarren; and a pleasing and unpretentious Sonata in D for piano and violoncello, by Mr. E. H. Thorne. Some charming duets for female voices by Mr. F. H. Cowen were nicely rendered by Mrs. Campbell-Perugini and Miss Mary Hutton.

The orchestral concert of the Royal Academy of Music at St. James's Hall on Friday last week was chiefly noteworthy for the performance of 'The Lay of the Brown Rosary,' a cantata by Miss Ethel Boyce, adapted from Mrs. Browning's poem with the same title. Though the work does not call for notice as the effort of an experienced musician, it is considerably above the average of students' compositions. The comparative weakness of the declamatory portion is by no means surprising, but the general freshness of the subject-matter and the well-considered orchestration—the colouring of which is more French than German—give assurance that with further study and experience Miss Boyce will have it in her power to take high rank among female composers. The performance of the cantata, under the direction of Dr. A. C. Mackenzie, was in all respects satisfactory, the male contingent of the choir being strengthened by some members of the late Novello Choir. The rest of the concert does not call for comment.

The first public appearance of the Bristol Choral Society—a distinct body from the Bristol Festival Choir—will take place on May 7th at the Colston Hall, when Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul' will be performed under Mr. Riseley's direction.

The free performances of sacred music in Gloucester Cathedral, under Mr. C. L. Williams, concluded on Thursday last week with a rendering of his cantata 'Bethany.' Since November last these performances have been attended by nearly 30,000 persons, mostly of the poorer class.

The following artists have been secured for the Bayreuth production of 'Tannhäuser' next year: Tannhäuser, Herren van Dyck, Alvary, and Winkelmann; Wolfram, Herr Reichmann; the Landgrave, M. Blauwaert; Elizabeth, Frau Sucher, and Frau Termina, a new artist from Bremen. The mise en scène will be a precise imitation of that in Paris in 1861, when the work was produced under Wagner's own direction.

WAGNER'S 'Der Fliegende Holländer' was reproduced last week at Brussels with striking success. It was first played there in 1872 in an abbreviated form, and failed decisively. It is now given, however, in its integrity. M. Renaud as the Dutchman and Madame Fierens-Peeters as Senta are highly praised.

CONCERTS, &c., NEXT WEEK.

MON. Carl Rosa Opera Company, 'The Bohemian Girl,' 2; 'Carmen,' 3, Drury Lane.
— Mr. J. W. Turner's Opera Company, 'The Bohemian Girl,' 2; 'Mariana,' 3, Standard Theatre.
— Mr. W. Carter's National Concert, 3, Albert Hall.
TUES. Carl Rosa Opera Company, 'Faust,' 3, Drury Lane.
WED. Carl Rosa Opera Company, 'Romeo and Juliet,' 3, Drury Lane.
THURS. Carl Rosa Opera Company, 'Mignon,' 3, Drury Lane.
FRI. Mr. Lamond's Pianoforte Recital, 3, Princes' Hall.
SAT. Carl Rosa Opera Company, 'The Bohemian Girl,' 3, Drury Lane.
— Crystal Palace Concert, 3.
— Carl Rosa Opera Company, 'Carmen,' 2; 'Lurline,' 3, Drury Lane.

DRAMA

GLOBE THEATRE.—Sole Lessee and Manager, Mr. F. R. BENSON.—REOPENS EASTON MONDAY.—'A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM,' with the Mendelssohn Music, EASTON MONDAY and EVERY EVENING at 8 (Thursdays and Fridays excepted), and THREE MATINEES (Children under Twelve half-price to Stalls and Dress Circle), MONDAY, April 7th; WEDNESDAY, April 9th; and SATURDAY, April 12th, at 2.30. Doors open at 2. THURSDAY and FRIDAY EVENINGS, April 10th and 11th, 'HAMLET.' Doors open at 7.30. Commence at 8. Box Office now Open Daily, 10 to 5.—GLOBE THEATRE.

THE WEEK.

LYCEUM.—Afternoon Performance by the Irving Amateur Dramatic Club: 'King Henry IV.,' Part I.

THOUGH one of the most brilliant and effective of Shakspeare's plays, the First Part of 'King Henry IV.' has never been a favourite with actors or managers. The reason for this is that there is so slight feminine interest. Mrs. Quickly, in this play at least, is a cipher. The scenes between Hotspur and Mortimer and their wives are pretty, but post-nuptial endearments are rarely stimulating. Another reason is that in this case Shakspeare has not succeeded in carrying over the sympathy of the audience to the side for which he seems to claim it. Just as the average reader of the Iliad takes the side of Hector rather than that of Achilles, so the playgoer who has been enchanted with the fiery spirit of Hotspur grudges his conquest by the prince whose associates have been cutpurses and drunkards, and whose reformation is so unconvincing in its suddenness. Henry's excuse to his father—

Percy is but my factor, good my lord,
T' engross up glorious deeds on my behalf;
And I will call him to so strict account,
That he shall render every glory up—is the finest conceivable. It does not, however, carry with it our sympathies, nor do we quite understand where this rakehell youth got the strength and skill in arms on which he so confidently relies.

To the present generation of playgoers, then, 'King Henry IV.,' Part I., is practically unknown. Under these conditions we are glad to see it presented. Ordinarily the doings of amateurs inspire but little interest. Now, however, at a theatre long associated with Shakspeare, they furnish us with an opportunity of strengthening the conviction that great as are Shakspeare's plays in the closet, it is on the stage alone that their full greatness is realized. In an amateurs' interpretation even 'King Henry IV.,' Part I., shows itself a great play, and the managers who turn from it with apprehension or scorn are misled.

Upon special impersonations undertaken for a single occasion and for a charitable purpose it is needless to dwell. It is, however, but just to say that the general presentation was quiet, interesting, and effective. It was weakest in the comic characters. An amateur who takes the part of Falstaff is most heavily handicapped. The rendering given was intelligent. It lacked, however, breadth, colour, and unction, and the same may be said of Bardolph and the other associates of Falstaff. In the more heroic characters there was a gallantry of bearing and a correctness of delivery by the study of which professional actors might benefit. Rarely of late have Shakspeare's lines been so well spoken. We own to preferring the inexperience of these untrained actors to the too much knowledge and the mouthing proclivities of those who took secondary parts in the well-remembered revival of the play at Drury Lane, in which, however, Walter Montgomery won laurels as Hotspur. In case, as is desirable, the actors should repeat the performance, we will venture on one or two hints. Lady Mortimer in singing her Welsh song should have a small Welsh harp. It would occupy her hands when she sits in a very awkward position, and would fill out the picture. Dame Quickly, in giving the speech, "He doth it as like one of these harlotry players as ever I see," must not omit the qualifying adjective, which is full of colour and indispensable. We must be judicious and not too squeamish in pruning. Let those, moreover, who pour sack out of a huge black-jack into a small measure, show they are dealing with a full and not an empty vessel. At present they turn it bottom upwards every time, completely destroying the illusion. When they have made these corrections we may, perhaps, venture on further counsels.

COLERIDGE'S 'OSORIO' AND 'REMOSE.'

40, West Hill, St. Leonards-on-Sea.
ALTHOUGH it is in some respects one of the most interesting of his works, Coleridge's drama of 'Remorse' finds few readers nowadays, and is chiefly remembered by Sheridan's misquotation from a speech in 'Osorio'—the first draft of 'Remorse':—

Drip! drip! drip! there's nothing here but dripping!
Had the original text really been that which, in telling his version of the story, Coleridge pretended,

Drip! drip! a ceaseless sound of water-drops!

Sheridan's caricature would have been unfair, if not altogether pointless; but since the discovery of Coleridge's MS. revealed that he had permitted himself to write

Drip! drip! drip! drip! in such a place as this
It has nothing else to do but drip! drip! drip!

one is inclined to consider Sheridan's version an excellent summary rather than a travesty.

I have recently become acquainted with some new facts regarding the published text of 'Remorse' (1813) and the MS. of its first draft called 'Osorio,' which may interest those of your readers who are students of Coleridge, and perhaps induce them to help me to unearth something of which I am in want for the preparation of a new edition of his poems on which I have been engaged for some time past.

In after life Coleridge was accustomed to complain loudly, if not bitterly, of the treatment he had received from Sheridan in connexion with this early dramatic attempt—how he could get neither answer nor MS. from the gay lessee of Drury Lane. I find, however, that he did get an answer, and that after a delay of only about six weeks, for I have seen an unpublished letter of the poet written on the 2nd of December, 1797, in which he informs his correspondent that he had received his answer from Sheridan—his tragedy was rejected on account of "the obscurity of the three last acts"—a tolerably extensive objection, the justice of which the poet was not slow to perceive on re-examining his composition. It is quite true that he never received back his MS., for I have learnt on excellent authority that many years afterwards, after the poet had passed away, the MS. was found in a chest, packed full with similar matter, which had formed part of the scanty salvage from the fire at Old Drury in 1809. The MS. soon after passed into the keeping of a well-known collector of that period, while the remaining contents of the chest, including a MS. of Charles Lamb, found their way, at a still later date, into the British Museum, through the generosity of Mr. Coventry Patmore. When Mr. Pearson printed 'Osorio' from this MS. in 1873, he was probably unaware of its history, for nothing was said about it, nor was the fact that the MS. is not in Coleridge's own hand prominently mentioned. It is now before me by the kindness of its present owner. It is written on one side of quarto paper in a clear "engrossing" hand, and I find but one trace of the poet's revising pen. Mr. Pearson's editor had it interleaved, and on the interleaves has recorded the results of his collation of the text with that of the recast 'Remorse.' This was done sometimes by transcription of the lines with the pen and sometimes by cuttings from the book itself. One of these cuttings shows that the copy of 'Remorse' used by the editor of 'Osorio' differed, as regards the latter part of the fifth act at least, from any other I have seen, whether of first, second, or third edition, and I have examined a good many. Two issues of a first edition, undistinguished by anything on the title-page, is unusual; but in the case of 'Remorse' there must have been a third issue prior to the publication of the "second edition"! for in the copy used by the editor of Pickering's (now Macmillan's) four-volume edition of Coleridge's 'Poems' (1877) the scene describing the murder of Ordonio differs from the text both of the ordinary copies and of the one used in editing 'Osorio.' All three differ from 'Osorio' and from the "second edition"—the "third" is a mere reprint—of 'Remorse,' and, without counting the few alterations in the collected edition, we have five texts of part of the last scene! No wonder Sheridan found it "obscure," for in the MS. the dramatist forgot to kill, and even to stab, the villain; and it is worth noting that in one of the "first" editions of 'Remorse' the reader is left to infer that the stab proved mortal, for Ordonio is nowhere stage-directed to die.

It is a thousand pities the editor of 'Osorio' cut up his copy of 'Remorse,' but he may still possess the scraps unused, and the copy used in editing the Pickering edition may still exist intact. There may, I trust, remain other specimens of both of these issues, and, as they may reveal other various readings, I hope your readers who possess copies of the 1813 pamphlet will examine them carefully to see if they are of the normal or abnormal issues. Should any one discover a copy with any of the peculiarities noted below I should feel extremely obliged if he would lend it to me for a few days.

In what I have called the normal copies of the first edition of 'Remorse' (1813)—those ordinarily met with—at p. 71 the circumstances surrounding the murder of Ordonio are described thus.

After Alhadra has delivered her revengeful speech, and Teresa has begged her to spare Ordonio's life, shouts of "Rescue!" "Alvar!" &c., are heard, on which Alhadra resumes:—

ALHAD. Rescue?—and Isidore's Spirit unrevenged? The deed be mine! (suddenly stabs ORDONIO) Now take my Life!

ALV. [AH] (while with TERESA supporting ORDONIO). Arm of avenging Heaven! Thou hast snatch'd from me my most cherish'd hope—

But go! my word is pledged to thee. Away! Brave not my Father's Vengeance!

[The Moors hurry off ALHADRA.]

ORD. She hath aveng'd the blood of Isidore! I stood in silence like a slave before her That I might taste the wormwood and the gall, And satiate this self-accusing heart With bitter agonies than death can give. Forgive me, Alvar!

Oh!—could'st thou forget me! [Dies. The stage fills with armed peasants, and servants, ZULIMEZ and VALDEZ at their head, VALDEZ rushes into ALVAR'S arms.]

ALV. Turn not thy face that way, my father [&c., three lines], —after which the play ends with Valdez blessing Teresa and Alvar, followed by a little speech of Alvar's, mostly in couplets, beginning "Delights so full," &c.

In one of the abnormal issues—the one used in editing 'Osorio'—immediately after Alhadra has exclaimed "Now take my Life!" Ordonio speaks:—

ORD. (with great majesty). 'Tis well thou hast revenged thyself. O Woman!

and then comes Alvar's speech as above ("while with Teresa supporting Ordonio"), and immediately after that comes the stage direction—the two directions of the above text combined—"The Moors hurry off Alhadra. The stage fills with armed peasants," &c., as above—the speech of Ordonio, beginning "She hath aveng'd the blood of Isidore!" being omitted. The play closes as in the ordinary copies. It will be observed that in this text the stage direction "Dies" is omitted.

As regards the above, I have the testimony of the actual cutting from the book. I now come to the other abnormal text, respecting which I have only the testimony of the editor of Pickering's edition of the poems, but the genuineness of which I accept without question. I believe 'Osorio' (1873) and the 'Poetical and Dramatic Works' (1877) were edited by the same anonymous gentleman, and cannot help being struck by the strange fortune which not only put under his eyes two distinct abnormal texts of the same edition of 'Remorse'—one for each piece of work—but altogether concealed from him the normal one, for there is no sign of his having seen that, any more than of his having noticed the differences existing between the two he used at an interval not exceeding three or four years.

To the text of 'Remorse' as printed in 'The Poetical and Dramatic Works' (1877, iv. 154-5) is appended this note:—

"In the first edition of 'Remorse,' after the cry of 'No mercy!' Naomi advances with the sword and Alhadra snatches it from him and suddenly stabs Ordonio. Alvar rushes thro' the Moors and catches him in his arms. After Ordonio's dying speech, there are 'shouts of Alvar! Alvar! behind the scenes. A Moor rushes in.'

MOOR. We are surprised! Away! away! this instant! The country is in arms! Lord Valdez heads them (four lines more).

ALHADRA. Then thou art Alvar? to my aid and safety Thy word stands pledged.

ALVAR. Arm of avenging Heaven! I had two cherish'd hopes—the one remains, The other thou hast snatch'd from me: but my word is pledged to thee; nor shall it be retracted.—1813."

It will be seen at once that this account of the incidents differs from both the others. In neither of these is there any cry of "Mercy!" Naomi does not hand on the sword to Alhadra in either (he did in the 'Osorio' MS.), nor does he appear at all in the scene, according to the normal text. But I need not point out all the discrepancies.

J. DYKES CAMPBELL.

P.S.—I believe no complete autograph MS. of 'Osorio' exists, but I have seen one of the first act, which was found among Thomas Poole's papers. The first act of 'Remorse,' though not used in 'Osorio,' was probably composed at the same time, for in Coleridge's famous description of Dorothy Wordsworth, written to Cottle in July, 1797 ('Early Recollections,' i. 252), he quotes a line belonging to 'Remorse,' Act I.:—

"In every motion, her most innocent soul outbeams so brightly, that who saw would say, 'Guilt was a thing impossible in her.'"

Dramatic Gossip.

MR. IRVING announces for the 9th of May the last performance of 'The Dead Heart.' 'The Bells' will then be given for eleven performances, and 'Louis XI.' and 'Olivia' for seven each. During June and July the theatre will be in the hands of the Daly Company, who will open in farcical comedy. The first of the ten readings of 'Macbeth' will be given by Mr. Irving and Miss Terry at Liverpool on June 3rd, and the last at the St. James's Hall on July 16th.

Two revivals of 'The School for Scandal' are in contemplation. Mr. Thorne will shortly give it, with Miss Emery as Lady Teazle, Mrs. Billington as Mrs. Candour, and with a cast including, in addition to his own company, Mr. Henry Kemble. It will also be played at the Criterion, it is assumed with Miss Mary Moore as Lady Teazle, Mr. Wyndham as Charles, and Mr. Farren as Sir Peter.

'PEDIGREE,' a farcical comedy by Messrs. Bowring and Court, produced on the afternoon of Friday in last week at Toole's Theatre, is poorly conceived and garnished with intolerable puns. It begins most lamely and it ends ineffectively. Its second act, however, has some droll dialogue, to which full justice was done by Miss Vane Featherston and Mr. Righton. Miss Sylvia Grey also played with some spirit, and the whole escaped failure.

'FOR HER CHILD'S SAKE,' a one-act comedy by the late Sir Charles Young, given on Saturday last at Terry's Theatre, shows the conquest by a mother of the very natural instinct that prohibits the marriage of her daughter to the son of the woman by whom her domestic peace has been wrecked. The subject seems French, and the moral is forced, but the play is not unsympathetic. Miss Helen Leyton acted agreeably as the daughter, but Miss Giffard made little of the part of the mother.

In the Athenæum, February 9th, 1889, is an article on the 'Local Nomenclature of Shakespeare,' which has been reprinted in Shakspeareana of New York. Since this date the Rev. T. P. Wadley, M.A., of Pershore, has met with other coincidences of names in the locality with characters in the dramas. "I lately met," he says, "with the mention of 'Master Fenton' in the will of one of the Kempston family, who lived three and a half miles from Stratford-on-Avon in the year 1585. In the 'Merry Wives' it is 'Master Fenton' without the Christian name. And in the will there is a blank space between Master and Fenton, showing that the Christian name was not known to the testator. About three years after the date of the will a gentleman named Kempson, or Kempston, married a Webbe in the Stratford-on-Avon district. Webbe was the name of Shakespeare's near relatives." Again, "Not long since I examined at the Edgar Tower in Worcester the accounts of William Moore, Prior of Worcester just before the Dissolution. Some entries appear to have an important bearing on the history of Shakespeare. The village of Crowle, near Worcester, was under the wing of the priors. The manor of Crowle passed to the Combe family, of Stratford-on-Avon, after the Dissolution. Shakespeare was intimate with the Combes, and if I mistake not," continues Mr. Wadley, "one of the Combes presented one of the Stratford Whateleys to the vicarage of Crowle in the reign of Elizabeth. Shakespeare married Anne Hathaway alias Whateley. The said prior makes frequent mention of Richard Combe, apparently connected with Crowle, in A.D. 1533 and earlier, and mentions John Slye, one of 'the quene's players,' in 1534."

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—W. C.—W. B. K.—A. L. M.—J. H.—J. W.—W. L. S.—J. T. P.—A. K. M.—H. C. M.—received.

C. M. W.—You should send such questions to a paper that is in the habit of answering such inquiries.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

SATURDAY, APRIL 12, 1890.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
THE THIRD REPUBLIC	459
THE STUART DYNASTY	460
THE GROWTH OF CAPITAL	461
MR. VENN'S PRINCIPLES OF LOGIC	462
THE ANNALS OF SCOTCH PRINTING	464
THE ABBEY OF ST. THOMAS	466
NOVELS OF THE WEEK	466
OUR LIBRARY TABLE—LIST OF NEW BOOKS	467-468
TO RICHARD LOVELACE; MISS BOYLE; THOMAS GUY, PETER PARKER, AND THE UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD; THE 'DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY'; MR. GLADSTONE'S MODEL LIBRARY; MR. E. LLOYD; THE NEXT ORIENTAL CONGRESS; BISHOP CALLAWAY	468-471
LITERARY GOSSIP	471
SCIENCE—PHYSICIANS IN OLDEN TIMES; ASTRONO- MICAL NOTES; SOCIETIES; MEETINGS	472-473
FINE ARTS—THE TUDOR EXHIBITION; GOSSIP	473-476
MUSIC—THE WEEK; GOSSIP; CONCERTS, &c., NEXT WEEK	476-477
DRAMA—THE WEEK; GOSSIP	477-478

LITERATURE

France and the Republic. By William Henry Hurlbert. (Longmans & Co.)

MR. HURLBERT is a readable, but not a safe guide to the political state of France. He has prefixed to his record of his journeys in the French provinces (chiefly in Northern France, for he tells little indeed about the centre and south) an introduction which bristles with statements to which his readers will be inclined to take exception. He thinks that the present French Republic was born in revolutionary violence and exists against the will of the people. He speaks of Gambetta as "an active promoter of the insurrection against the authority of the Empress Eugénie"; and it would be difficult to give a more amusing example of Mr. Hurlbert's habit of assuming that his view alone is tenable. As a matter of fact the Empress Eugénie had no authority left after the surrender at Sedan, and the deputies of Paris, who were well aware of the risk they ran in accepting power, could not by any possibility have avoided so doing on the 4th of September, 1870. Mr. Hurlbert thinks that "a wholesome breeze of national feeling stirs in the 'murders grim and great' by which the victorious army of Versailles" marked its entry into Paris after the Commune. When Mr. Hurlbert has in his mind something which is a little too startling even for himself, he puts it into the mouth of some one else—as, for example, when he tells his readers that he has been assured by one of the most distinguished public men of France that M. Thiers was with difficulty restrained from bringing against Marshal MacMahon an accusation similar to that which led to the condemnation of Marshal Bazaine. Mr. Hurlbert seems to have been willing to listen to every malevolent story that is told upon one side in France. Impartiality forces us to declare that stories of the same nature are told upon the other side as well—as, for example, that the most moderate and respectable members of the Conservative party are deeply compromised in attempts by the Comte de Chambord to raise insurrections by the distribution of money among mobs—and very probably there is as little reason for believing the one set of stories as the other. The spirit in which our author writes is shown by his speaking of the action of "the 363" as a "revolutionary conspiracy," to which Marshal MacMahon gave way when he relinquished his post rather than allow it to be degraded—the fact being that "the 363" were simply the majority of the Chamber acting together to prevent a military coup d'état which is now admitted to have been contemplated by at least one powerful member of the last MacMahon cabinet—a friend of Mr. Hurlbert's.

Mr. Hurlbert has so sharp a quarrel with the French Revolution that he will not even admit that it had much to do with fusing France together. He is right in stating that both in history and in race the people of Provence differ greatly from the people of Brittany, the people of French Flanders from the people of Gascony, and the people of Savoy from the people of Normandy; but he is a little paradoxical when he states that "the French nation was the work, not of the French people, but of the kings of France." It is even more the creation of the Revolution and of Napoleon than of the kings. Our author, over and over again, writes of "the antagonism which exists between France and the Third Republic," although by his own figures (incorrect as they are) there exists a clear majority in France favourable to the Republic, and opposed by a monarchical party in a distinct minority. Mr. Hurlbert thinks "the mass of the French people to be at heart monarchical," which is, we venture to assert, certainly not the private opinion of a person much better informed upon the subject, namely, the leader of the monarchical party, the Comte de Paris. The fact is that France is not Parliamentary, and never has been, and that the weakness of Parliamentaryism is a weakness to the Republic, which will probably be driven one day to adopt a plebiscitary system in self-defence. Weak, however, as is Parliamentary Republicanism in France, the anti-monarchical sentiment is so overwhelming that hardly any fault on the part of the French Republicans is sufficient to strengthen the monarchical party; and it may be confidently asserted that were a monarchy restored in France, through the unpopularity of parliamentary institutions, its rule could not by any possibility be lasting, unless it adopted republican forms and ruled by constant use of the Referendum.

Mr. Hurlbert is under the impression that the whole of the Home Office of Great Britain costs less than half the amount which the French Chamber votes as home-service secret service money. Mr. Hurlbert names a figure for Great Britain which includes little except office salaries, and he does not take into account our own home-service secret service money, which he does not so much as mention. The analogy between the French Home Office and the English Home Office is a thoroughly false one, most of the work of the English Home Office being work which is performed in France by the Ministry of Commerce or the Ministry of Justice, and almost the whole of the work of the French Home Office being similar to the work which is performed in England by the Local Government Board, in Scotland by the Board of Supervision, and in Ireland by the Local Government Board, Ireland. In order to make out that the Republic is declining in strength, Mr.

Hurlbert asserts that in 1885 the monarchists did not everywhere and openly attack the Republic as a form of government, and implies that in 1889 they did. This is not the case; and, moreover, a large number of Conservative candidates, whose votes are counted by Mr. Hurlbert under the head "Conservative Monarchists," most carefully abstained from raising in 1889 the question of Monarchy versus Republic, while many of them even distinctly inserted in their addresses a declaration to the effect that the form of government was not in question. Mr. Hurlbert thinks that if General Boulanger had appeared in Paris on the 21st of September, 1889, the next day would have seen "the funeral of the Third" Republic. We fancy that the only result of the appearance of General Boulanger in France would have been that he would have been put in prison at the frontier, or that, if he had reached Paris in disguise, he would have been put in prison there. Our author also commits an error in implying that the cost of the French army is greater than the cost of the German military service. France keeps on foot in Europe a force equal to the German army, but maintains out of her military budget a far larger force than Germany, because she provides for a large army in Algeria, and for a considerable army in further India. In spite of this fact, the total military expenditure of France (adding together her ordinary and her extraordinary budgets) is not superior, but inferior to the total military expenditure of Germany, and it is highly creditable to the French Republic that this should be the case.

When Mr. Hurlbert writes of finance he has more to say for himself. His account of the treatment of M. Leroy-Beaulieu by the Republican leaders has much to justify it, and his condemnation of the financial policy of the Republic is powerful and less incorrect than are his purely political remarks. Mr. Hurlbert's special quarrel with the Republic, however, appears to be less financial than religious. He has taken up finance as a weapon, and a powerful weapon it is in his hands, but that which is in his mind is the treatment of the Roman Catholic Church by the Republican majority. Upon this point we are with him; but the fact that we believe that the treatment of the Church by a dominant majority in France has been politically unwise, as well as revolting to the minds of great numbers of good people, does not blind us to the consideration that it is far from having been unpopular. Mr. Hurlbert is very bitter against the striking out of allusions to the Christian faith from textbooks supplied at the cost of Christian parents to their children educated in schools supported out of taxes or of rates; but in Mr. Hurlbert's own country precisely the same thing has happened, and even the works of an American poet, Longfellow, have been doctored in the fashion which he describes. Mr. Hurlbert is, indeed, in consequence of such facts driven in another part of his work to attack most bitterly the common-school system of the United States. Moreover, Mr. Hurlbert exaggerates. He declares that "it is simply impossible to overstate the virulence and the violence of this official Republican war against religion which began under the Waddington Ministry." We regret the policy to which Mr. Hurlbert alludes; but as a matter of fact it was but feebly acted upon, and even the "expelled" monks were almost immediately allowed to return, and the state of things now existing does not greatly differ from that which preceded the "expulsion."

Another singular exaggeration in the Introduction concerns a different subject. Mr. Hurlbert thinks that "the Third Republic is to combine the Socialism of 1848 with the Atheism of 1793, the national workshops with the worship of reason." It is the case, however, that, so far from being Socialistic, the present French Republic is upon social questions the most conservative Government in the world—fossilized as compared with the Government of this country. Mr. Hurlbert in another passage seems to compare the Freycinet scheme of public works with the national workshops proposals of 1848; but the objections to the Freycinet scheme are very different from those which may be brought against the plans advocated at the Luxembourg under the Second Republic. The national workshops proclaimed the right to labour, as well as the right to relief recognized by our own poor law. Nothing of the kind is admitted in the France of the present day, and the lavish expenditure upon railroads is disbursed without any abnormal interference with the labour market, the workmen who profit by it being, indeed, chiefly Italians, Belgians, and Swiss. The same tone of exaggeration is observable in Mr. Hurlbert's statement that up to the present day the Republic has "steadily lost ground with every passing year"; for the Republic has certainly grown in strength in the last twelve months, and this in the opinion of the French monarchists themselves. Another specimen of over-statement lies in calling the present Republic the Republic of religious persecution, so made by four persons, of whom M. Carnot is given as one, in face of the notorious fact that one of the principal reasons which led to the choice of M. Carnot was that he and his wife would reassure by their opinions the Republican Catholic minority. The ecclesiastical ceremonies connected with the making of cardinals have been reintroduced into the Élysée by M. Carnot since he has been President, and are now virtually the same as they were under the Second Empire. If Mr. Hurlbert were to confine himself to fair and moderate criticism of French governmental acts, combined with attacks upon the recklessness of French finance, and the statement of his natural and profound dislike for all manifestations of anti-religious spirit, his teachings might be most useful. But by exaggeration he defeats his own purpose. Mr. Hurlbert is indignant at the statement repeated to him by some one (by whom he must mean either Lord Salisbury or Mr. Gladstone) that there are in France five millions of professed atheists. It is, however, undoubtedly the fact that the great majority of Frenchmen are, in a more or less considerable degree, throughout their lives given to expressing sentiments which may be fairly described in the language quoted, although a large proportion of them are married in church and buried with religious rites. Mr. Hurlbert would not weaken his argument were he to admit—what is, in fact, the case—that it is difficult for the parliamentary candidates of the majority in most parts of France to attend mass, owing to the fierce opposition and accusations of hypocrisy which are provoked by such action. Those, indeed, curiously enough, among provincial republicans in France who would expect the wife of the public man to attend mass, and who would be somewhat shocked if she did not do so, nevertheless, as a rule, are almost equally shocked where the husband goes with the wife to church.

The main body of Mr. Hurlbert's work consists of interminable conversations with the leading local clerical Conservatives of the northern departments of France, in which, generally speaking, their opinions are somewhat crudely expressed. He will carry his English readers with him in his repeated quotation of the attacks made by the enemies of the Republic upon successive Governments of France for dismissing civil servants who do not share their views; but it must be remembered that monarchic Governments do not as a rule tolerate the expression of republican sentiments by their servants, and it is difficult to say why a different measure should be meted out to republics. The rulers of Austria and of Germany would not for a moment permit the holding of high judicial office by persons avowedly holding anti-monarchical views, and the wholesale dismissal of magistrates in France may be justified by continental usage. Mr. Hurlbert is, however, hardly a fair controversialist, for he attacks the Republic for having dismissed all the prefects of the Government of Combat or Government of the 16th of May, whereas he does not attack Marshal MacMahon's Government for dismissing, as they did, the greater portion of the prefects who had held office under M. Jules Simon or under M. Thiers.

Mr. Hurlbert goes out of his way to make a violent onslaught upon a gentleman, now a senator, for having been "the founder at Amiens of the secret society known as the 'International,'" and complains that he was never prosecuted. Perhaps our author hardly knows what were the doctrines of "the International"; but if he would read their early declarations and proceedings he would, we think, find it difficult to discover upon what ground a prosecution could have been instituted, for it is the fact that the founders of the International were moderate men (one English metropolitan member of Parliament who was among them could tell Mr. Hurlbert how moderate), and that none of the early documents of the society contained a trace of any revolutionary suggestion, unless the resuscitation of Poland can be counted as such. The International, founded at the Freemasons' Tavern during the Exhibition of 1862 and organized at St. Martin's Hall in 1864, was never even a secret society. It was, indeed, prosecuted by the Second Empire in 1868, but simply as a non-authorized society, not secret, and its members were sentenced only to a fine of 4*l.* each, without imprisonment. The society became Socialistic in 1868, and virtually broke up in 1870, during the war. Since before the Commune it has been represented by several societies, all of which have departed from the principles held by the International at the time when this senator from Amiens was among its members.

Mr. Hurlbert condemns the Republic for supporting "clans, each taking the name of its chief. There are Ferryists and Clementists" (sic); the fact being that there exist no bodies of politicians conferring such designations upon themselves. Our author denounces the Government of France for refusing to allow gifts in mortmain to the Church, and fails to remember that nearly all other governments, republican or monarchic, Protestant or Roman Catholic, do the same. He also discusses the Clignancourt election, without pointing out that the candidate second on the poll was pronounced duly elected on the ground that the candidate at the head of the poll was ineligible, in exactly the same way as was done in the case of Rossa by the House of Commons against a powerful speech in defence of the Fenian leader's eligibility by the present Home Secretary.

A merit of the book is that the author understands the French tongue, which makes us wonder when we notice that he uses the phrase "a Republican of yesterday," in translating a speech of one of his friends, in exactly the opposite sense to that in which the words would be used according to English custom. Another merit lies in the extremely interesting account given of the great plate-glass works in the north-east of France. There is, however, a total want of arrangement in the volume, and we go from glass works to the Revolution, and from the Revolution to coal mines and ruins, with an utter absence of all order.

The Stuart Dynasty: Short Studies of its Rise, Course, and Early Exile. By Percy M. Thornton. (Ridgway.)

SINCE 1858 more than thirty sumptuous volumes have been published on the great Scottish houses—the Douglasses, Scotts of Buccleuch, Carnegies, Grants, Maxwells, and others. Thus far, however, none has been devoted to the greatest house of all, the Stuarts; nor can Mr. Thornton's work be held to supply the deficiency. Misfortune still waits on that most unfortunate race, unfortunate even in this its latest historian. His task, it is true, was one of very great difficulty. To sift the vast mass of materials, selecting what is personal and pertinent, whilst discarding the extraneous and irrelevant, and then to weave a lucid narrative that should be something more and something a great deal less than a set history of Scotland and of Great Britain—this would require no common knowledge and ability. Mr. Thornton's knowledge is very easily gauged. He retells the old story of Earl Douglas's "black dinner" at Edinburgh Castle, but a boar's, not a bull's head is "placed on the table, according to the method of the times." He makes James V. "only two years and five months old" at the date of Flodden; and the "Princess Madeline," James's destined bride in 1521, is for him quite distinct from the "Princess Magdalen," whom James wedded sixteen years afterwards. Then James II. is King of England in 1683, and imprisons "the six bishops, because they refused to read the Declaration." These blunders are glaring, patent to "every schoolboy"; but there are dozens of others, less patent, and therefore more dangerous. For instance, Edward Balliol is made to invade Scotland in 1334 (1332). "The Earls of Castle-Stewart [who are they?] claim to be representatives of this branch." Burgundy in 1449 is "a powerful dependency of France." In the fifteenth century "wild Highlanders reside in the rugged and distant territories of Renfrew and Bute." The ninth Earl of Douglas marries "his brother's widow, declaring that he needed no papal dispensation." (A dispensation was granted by Nicholas V.) Norham and "Werk" castles are placed on the north of the Tweed. "In 1535 the death of Pope Clement brought about a complete alienation of England from Rome." Stow writes his 'Survey of London' "during the reign of Edward VI." Caxton practises printing in England "as early as 1474." Margaret Tudor flies from [with] Angus her husband across the Border. James V. becomes "aware outside Corstorphine village that he was nearing the field of battle." (Corstorphine is more than fifteen miles distant from Manuel.) Johnnie Armstrong is hanged in 1528 (1530). Ker of "Fawcinside" (Faudonside) threatens Queen Mary with violence. Bothwell's "confession" is accepted as authentic. Kilsyth lies north-west of Glasgow. Cromwell's victory at Dunbar was perhaps "in some degree owing to the ardour of the Puritan divines, who are said to have forced the battle on." Boscobel is in Staffordshire. And Mar's "advance-guard" still holds "Burnt Island" and Leith weeks after Mackintosh of Borlum had marched away to Kelso.

Mr. Thornton has gone, he tells us, to "accredited authorities." Among them we notice "Mr. Rymer, the author of the famous 'Fœdera,'" "Burton's 'History of Scotland,' edition 1841," and "Chalmers's 'Domestic Annals of Scotland.'" For one-half of the strange duality of his Princess Madeleine-Magdalen he is indebted to a review in the Athenæum; for an "Abbey of Roxburgh" to (he says so) Dr. Hill Burton. As to Mary, Queen of Scots, he has studied, among others, Mr. Hosack, Mr. Skelton, and Mr. Henderson, of the first of whom he entertains an almost exaggerated opinion. "If this impression," he says, "prevails in our own time among writers impregnated with knowledge of the period, such as Mr. Froude, how much more may the natural doubts [as to Mary's innocence] of friendly contemporaries stand excused when they wrote and spoke without the light of nineteenth century research, such as that of Hosack the unanswered!" The mark of admiration stands in the original, inserted doubtless by the puzzled compositor. Assuredly there is something puzzling here, though it is easy compared with a previous statement, that at Flodden James IV. "was setting aside the best military traditions of his family, as well as ignoring the teaching of more modern tacticians." For this seems to land the reader in Wonderland. Anyhow, of Mr. Henderson's 'Casket Letters' Mr. Thornton makes singular use; he deduces therefrom that "Bothwell's servant Dagleish [Dalglish] was arrested at Sir James Balfour's instance, and appears, under torture [threat of torture], to have revealed the fact, and ultimately to have produced the casket."

If such is our author's use of "accredited authorities," what when he goes not to Eytton's 'Shropshire,' but to Douglas's 'Peerage,' for Alan Fitzflaald of Oswestry; not to Prof. Skeat's edition of the 'Kingis Quair,' but to Chalmers's impudent piracy of Tytler, for James I.'s poetry; not to Sir W. Fraser's 'Douglas Book,' or even the articles in the 'Dictionary of National Biography,' for various episodes in the Douglases' history, but to "Henry's 'History of Great Britain,' quoting Ferrarius"? One wonders whether he has really satisfied himself that "Ferrarius" is an accredited authority, just as one wonders where he locates "Arkinholme, in the valley of the Esk." Queen Mary, he still will have it, did sojourn at Dundrennan, and he backs his opinion by several references—to Burton, Froude, and "Robertson, quoting Keith," not, however, to Lord Herries's 'Historical Memoirs' (Abbotsford Club, 1836). That contemporary account of the flight from Langside is the only real authority, and it does not "leave the place of departure for England doubtful." According to it,—

"So soon as the Queen saw the day lost, she was carried from the field by the Lords Herreis, Fleming, and Livistoun. Prettie George Dowglas and William the Fundlin escapt also with the Queen. She rode all night, and did not halt until she came to the Sanguhir. From thence she went to Terregles, the Lord Herreis' house, where she rested some few dayes, and then, against her friends' advyce, she resolved to go to England and commit herself to the protection of Queen Elizabeth; in hopes, by her assistance, to be repossessed again in her kingdom. So she embarked at a creek near Dundrennen, in Galloway, and caused the Lord Herreis to attend her with his counsel, and landed at Cockermouth, in Cumberland."

We have left little space for praise, yet space enough. The six portraits are really good, though that of Claverhouse is rather an impertinence, and might well have made room for those of James III. and IV. from the famous altarpiece on which David Laing wrote a masterly monograph, unknown, apparently, to Mr. Thornton. The appendix also is valuable, though scarcely so valuable as our author seems to imagine. It consists of 128 letters and extracts from letters, relating chiefly to the '15, and taken from the Stuart papers at Windsor. Many of these papers are absolutely trivial; of some Lord Stanhope has long since given us the cream; but others again are possessed of no common interest, and might, if properly edited, have formed a very useful monograph. None is more curious than Mar's account of the manner in which he and the Chevalier sneaked away from Montrose to the Continent; but surely it was for Mr. Thornton to point out that this account is widely at variance with Marshal Keith's well-known narrative. Did the Chevalier communicate his final resolve to the Earl Marischal? Lord Mar says, Yes; Marshal Keith says distinctly, No.

Dealing with a theme so enthralling as the Stuart dynasty, and published under royal auspices, this work is likely to command many readers; the greater was the need for common care. Mr. Thornton may think we have dwelt too much upon details, to the exclusion of general effects; but his conclusions seem to us as faulty as his premises. His Studies, indeed, are portraits of a kind—the kind in the long gallery at Holyrood—very like one another, and very unlike the originals. Take, for instance, his Robert III., a king whose "excessive humility, a virtue estimable at all times, seems to have been carried to such an extent that it destroyed his usefulness as a feudal ruler, although as a Christian man his record stands clear." Yet King Robert was father, we know, of two natural sons.

The Growth of Capital. By Robert Giffen. (Bell & Sons.)

THERE is to many persons a kind of fascination in statements respecting property. Few paragraphs in newspapers are conned more carefully or discussed more eagerly than those concerning the wills of persons lately deceased. A desire to know in what direction a neighbour or an eminent person has disposed of his wealth is partly at the bottom of this; but a large portion of the interest excited arises simply from a wish to ascertain the amount disposed of. Such an estimate as Dr. Giffen has made in this volume takes its origin, however, from higher considerations. There are many reasons why it is desirable to frame a valuation of the entire property of the country. It is, indeed, as advisable to do this as it is to form a census of the population, for comparisons of the numbers of the people with the wealth they possess give as distinct an idea of the progress of the nation as any that can be obtained.

The present estimate is the second which Dr. Giffen has made, the earlier one, formed in 1878, being included in the first series of the well-known 'Essays in Finance.' This has enabled him to compare not only the estimated accumulations, but also the estimated rate of progress at each date relatively to the previous decade. This point is at the least as important as the estimate of the actual property of the country can be; and as it forms a most useful portion of the information supplied in this volume, we refer to it first.

The same basis, or nearly so, has been employed on both occasions—we must not weary our readers with too many details—the general result shown being that the progress of the country in wealth has during the last ten years under review been less than half as rapid as during the ten previous years. That land and farming are less prosperous is, unhappily, known to all; but not every one would have expected to find that mines and ironworks also show a decline. Mining and the iron industries have been among the main props of the wealth of the country. If these fall off and the drop in agricultural matters continues, the next ten years will tell a sad story. As it is, we probably see in these significant figures some part of the explanation of the increased difficulty in obtaining remunerative occupation which many already feel.

We have taken this part of the contents of this interesting volume first as it will be the most generally instructive. The method on which Dr. Giffen has based his estimates, which are mainly built on the returns of the Income Tax, is highly ingenious, but it gives apparently rather too optimistic a view. The estimate of the value of land, though taken at 15 per cent. less than ten years previously, appears considerably too high, and that of farming capital even more so. A comparison of the acreage under cultivation with the usual estimates of farming capital would reduce this last about a half, which would probably be far nearer the real figure. Solicitors and others engaged in land agency could tell many a dismal tale of mortgages which now exceed in value the land on which they are charged, of interest reduced, or not paid. These matters, however, are naturally rarely spoken of by those most closely concerned. Again, the value of the capital employed by those engaged in trades and professions seems exaggerated. It must be borne in mind when considering the Income Tax returns that a large part of "income" is derivative. The manufacturer obtains, we will say, a picture from an artist; the shopkeeper employs, like the rest of mankind, the dentist or the doctor. The "incomes" of the manufacturer and the artist both appear in the returns, but the proportion of "capital" employed by each is very different; so it is also with the shopkeeper and the professional men whose services he engages. Hence we believe that the capital assigned by Dr. Giffen to the trades and professions is at least a third too high. Again, the care and skill with which the officers of the Inland Revenue trace "income" are so constant and so intelligent, that it may be doubted if the "foreign investments" which escape them can be half the amount supposed. Taking all these items into consideration, we should roughly consider the total to be fully a tenth too high. Nor does the apportionment of property between the three portions of the United Kingdom seem at all probable. The proportion of that belonging to England is probably distinctly less, and that belonging to Scotland and Ireland distinctly more, than Dr. Giffen estimates. Both the death duties and the statistics of deposits in banks support this view. But though, owing to the nature of the subject, no two readers of this volume will probably come exactly to the same conclusion on the view of the position of the country which it presents, it is most interesting reading, and the collection of similar estimates as to the condition of other countries is very valuable. Should our own country be approaching more nearly to the "stationary" condition which economists describe, it may still take courage from the past, and trust that with prudence the wants of the future will be provided for.

The Principles of Empirical or Inductive Logic.
By John Venn. (Macmillan & Co.)

THE interest of this work is largely critical, but its object in the first place practical, being, in fact, to determine the assumptions, principles, and methods by which man, apart from direct perception, advances in knowledge. The current statement, however, of these is so loose and imperfect as to supply an ample field for criticism, in which, as also in the more original parts of the volume, Dr. Venn displays the patience, acuteness, and comprehensiveness that his earlier works have led us to expect. His general view of logic is that its basis is dualistic; that it assumes without hesitation that there is an independent world to be known and a mind to know it, but brings these two into relation by assigning in detail the objective conditions required to make the world knowable, and the subjective conditions, aspirations, tendencies, and principles which make our minds capable of apprehending—but only gradually apprehending—a knowable and systematic universe. In so doing logic, of course, supplies data for metaphysics, of which it may even be regarded as a section. But as it proceeds logic turns its face in another direction, and addresses itself rather to determine the way in which our piecemeal and imperfect apprehension grows in its grasp of the world. Such an idea of logic must always have been in some degree present to the minds of men who defined it as an art or science of thinking, a method for the investigation of truth, or by any similar phrase. But we know of no one who has so steadily and consistently held it before his eyes as Dr. Venn, rejecting at once the theory of the Hamiltonian school, who affect to consider thinking in and for itself alone, and the theory of the objective school, who regard all correct thinking as a mere reproduction of external nature, perfect in each part, instead of what it is, a very slow and gradual approximation to the production of a picture truer than we shall ever reach.

By his clearness and truth of view Dr. Venn invests with a fresh interest and reality such time-worn topics as connotation, definition, hypothetical propositions, and the nature of the subject in assertion. He is, we think, somewhat further removed from Mill than he takes himself to be. Progressive knowledge has even a wider function than "to reduce to order, to interpret and forecast the complex of external objects which we call the phenomenal world"; nor can we, even at Dr. Venn's bidding, "adopt Mill's general attitude towards phenomena as the soundest and most useful." Progress in knowledge, if we look to the facts, means often the discovery and determination of new "objects," the perception or recognition of fresh "phenomena." On the whole, since the word "phenomena" cannot be got rid of, it would, we think, be well to recognize its purely relative character. If it is opposed to "causes"—as it is as early as Aristotle—it must be remembered that the "phenomena" are in their turn "causes"; if it is explained as "the perceived," it must be remembered how much that was yesterday "unperceived" will rank to-morrow as "perceived." If we are right in thinking that such observations should have found a place in Dr. Venn's book, it is but fair to him to admit that it is by his own book that they have been suggested. It is part of the same vein of thinking to doubt if Dr. Venn has chosen the best possible title for his work. To the adjective "empirical" there is no objection, but the adjective "inductive" constitutes a limitation at once real and groundless to the subject as he has treated it.

In accordance with the ideas above expounded, Dr. Venn begins with four chapters on "The Physical Foundations of Inference, or the World as the Logician regards It," and then subjoins a chapter on "The Subjective Foundations of Induction, or the Principal Postulates demanded on the Mental Side." Thus logic postulates "the existence and familiar recognition of 'objects,'" and leaves it to metaphysics to discuss the relation of these to the sensations, which we can hardly doubt to have been the earliest forms of our consciousness. Logic recognizes not merely that there are "objects" independent of our momentary consciousness, it recognizes also the unity and separateness of objects, some of which, indeed, seem of themselves to stand out in complete isolation, as, e.g., sun and moon; others obviously demand no little effort for the mind to perceive them as unities, e.g., "the progress of democracy," or the geometrical patterns made by the overlapping spokes of opposite wheels of a passing carriage. Dr. Venn asks, Is a rainbow among a dog's "objects"? It is clear the dog may be affected by the prismatic colours without regarding the rainbow as a whole and a unity. We might fairly have cited the savage's conception of the moon, which to him is not one, but many, the old moon being broken up each month into stars, and a literally "new" moon being substituted in its place. The great instrument for dividing the world into "objects," for fixing this division, for transmitting it to our children, is, of course, language; and with language we are so early imbued that it is only by analogies and by reflection on exceptional cases that we can realize how considerable a postulate is involved when we insist that prior to all logic the existence and separation of objects has to be conceded, unless the logician proposes "to discuss the rational development of the human race from its first commencement."

The material world being thus with comparative completeness meted out into separate "objects," what else must be assumed about it? As it would be impossible here to offer anything like an analysis of a lengthy volume, we will touch only special points in Dr. Venn's answer. We note with pleasure his careful and guarded description of the general assumption by logicians that "the world must be postulated as being essentially the same to all observers," though it is admitted that the savage did not view the world as we do, and that it is only by a projection of our own language and thoughts into a time when they would not have been understood that we can picture to ourselves the savage's mental state with regard to the world; while with regard to the future not even such projection and picturing is possible to us, since we can in no way have the thoughts of those who are more advanced than ourselves. We must commend, too, the assault on Mr. Spencer's attempt to "over-objectify" logic by his description of it as "formulating the most general laws of correlation among existences considered as objective"—a description which would make short work of most chapters of logic, of definition, and of inference. To this topic we have already alluded. Addressing himself to the much-disputed point how far considerations of truth and falsehood are attended to in logic, Dr. Venn points out that we may regard the criteria as different in different inquiries, but that we cannot suppose criteria to be absent altogether. The formal logician has his criterion, that of consistency, and while seeming to admit all concepts universally, he yet discards such as blend contradictory attributes, while in judgment and reasoning his standard applies itself even more widely and peremptorily, rejecting propositions whose terms might by mere possibility cohere with another, and conclusions which could cohere with the premises, but are not involved in them. Another standard of truth and falsehood is in the creations of pure imagination, or the supposed verities of an unenlightened understanding. In such a world premises may be borrowed from the tales of Dickens or the once trusted, but now disproved figments of mediæval travellers. Nor can logic in general refuse to recognize such data, or the definitions and inferences based on them, without cutting itself off from a certain though limited portion of human interests. But, of course, the larger and most important section or application of logic, though not logic in its entirety, consists of what we may call objective or material logic, in which the final criterion is that of perception. It is in the interests of this that Dr. Venn's own book is written; but he shows his acuteness and comprehensiveness by rejecting and confuting Mill's assumption that logic is concerned with no other material whatever. We may note here with commendation the way in which the close connexion in actual thought and speech between the term and the proposition—so absolutely severed in technical logic—is pointed out.

An elaborate and careful discussion is given of the postulate of order in the material world, that attribute which makes possible the drawing of inferences in respect to it. This order or orderliness is found in sequences and coexistences. Beginning with sequences, we find that logicians insist on two improvements in the popular recognition of sequences, a more complete analysis of the antecedent and consequent, and what Dr. Venn aptly calls "screwing up the cause and effect into close juxtaposition," so that none but immediate consequents are attended to—a course most unnatural and unprofitable, as Dr. Venn acutely remarks, to the primitive practically-minded man. That this "screwing up" is justifiable needs no proof. A more difficult point is the admission all logicians have to make of plurality of causes. Why do we all grant that effect x may be due either to \overline{ABC} or \overline{PQR} (we use our author's symbols as obviously superior to those in common use), but allow no similar plurality in regard to effects? Does not this suggest that the discarded notion of "efficiency" in the cause must be recalled, so that we may have it in our power to say that the "efficient cause" must produce its effects, but that the effect can have nothing to say as to the various efficiencies which might have produced it? It will be enough to cite Dr. Venn's illustration. Where, as in a law court, we want to decide not the consequents, but the antecedents of a given state of things, we assent finally to no plurality of causes; but admitting them only in our preliminary view, we gradually reduce their number one by one as unable to produce the effect as in its full detail we have come to know it. On the excellent pages concluding this chapter, relating to views of the law of causation, which reduce it to "an identical proposition" (G. H. Lewes), and make it unfit for any practical determination of nature, we cannot dwell (though we must wonder at the opening section of chapter iii., the language of which apparently contradicts the conclusions reached in chapter ii.). Two valuable illustrations of the subject are drawn from the elements of the differential and of the integral calculus—subjects which, duly understood, render far more accurate the logician's grasp of his own special topic.

On the acute but somewhat halting chapter on coexistences we shall not dwell. A general chapter on uniformity in nature follows, in which it is shown how much more it includes than the principle of causation, with which it is often identified. The importance of repetition in nature is insisted on in a striking passage (p. 96 sqq.), and the frequency of cycles of events, e.g., the cultivator's cycle of seed-time and harvest, though the necessity of cyclical repetition in nature seems asserted on insufficient grounds by Mr. Spencer. The value of the principle of the conservation of energy is discussed, and its power to explain much that the ordinary law of causation, appropriate only to concrete cases of abrupt change, could not elucidate; and an elementary discussion is finally given to the principles of probability and of continuity. Altogether it is impressed on the reader how much wider is the basis on which inference in general is built than could be gathered from common text-books; it is left undecided how far this basis may be considered general to all progressive knowledge and proper matter for logic, and where it must be held to have already commenced the construction of a special science.

There follows an examination of the subjective conditions of inference. Here we postulate observation, with all the subtle half-recognized processes covered by that familiar name; we postulate memory, without which no proposition, and still more no syllogism, could be grasped; above all, we postulate that tendency, impulse, or belief which makes man an inferring being. At this point Dr. Venn supplies a useful correction to Mill. Admitting with Mill that the apprehension of universal uniformity is gradual, he denies altogether that it is the result of reasoning, it being, in fact, its basis. We act, and must act, from the first on supposed uniformities, which, as our sphere of action becomes wider, and our powers of reflection on our acts more comprehensive, are themselves conceived in a larger way, till, in the scientific mind, they attain the full breadth of the great generalization that nature as a whole is uniform. The familiar problem of the reference of language is handled by Dr. Venn with his usual good sense; the convenience of making the word designate the notion is admitted, with the acute remark that this limitation could hardly have seemed a limitation to the scholastic logicians, "a professional class of thinkers dealing with a stock-in-trade of notions whose exchange value was thoroughly familiar to them all," and seldom "correcting and extending them by an appeal to experience." We, however, must give our terms an objective reference, regarding them as attributes of a "thing," but "a limited, conventionally accepted group of attributes out of the indefinite number of actually existing ones." Even so-called "imaginary things," e.g., a centaur, we are not driven to describe as notions purely subjective to the speaker who names them; they are objective to him, but objective as expressing not an external reality common to all mankind, but only a common belief of men of a former age, whose views we must be understood as reproducing or explaining whenever we speak of such objects. The whole discussion on the purpose, character, and growth of language puts the well-known commonplaces in a clear and concise form, while the study of the possibilities open to us in the way of language-making is distinctly original and, in the good sense, imaginative. An exposition, fuller than usual, of the classes of terms or names is followed by a consideration of connotation. The balance here is preserved with judgment between the too subjective view which would make the connotation of a term arbitrary and the opposite view, which, defining the connotation as the sum total of the common attributes possessed by all the designated objects, makes it not only uncertain and intolerably fluctuating, but positively perverts the natural movement of thought, as if we marked down a group of objects purely at random by a common name and then set ourselves to determine their common attributes, and so for the first time give the name a meaning. The sense of "denotation" is also well examined in its only puzzling cases, those of "concepts"—the only objects recognized by the formal logicians—and "imaginary things." "Abstract" and "concrete" are justly regarded as purely relative terms, between which we cannot, speaking universally, assign any priority in regard to their presence in the individual mind.

Coming to the proposition, we find valuable remarks on its common logical form. Attention is called first to its economy, next to its necessity, if language is to be used as a means of advancing knowledge.

"Our actual acquirement in almost every department of thought is an intricate web, shading through doubt to utter ignorance..... Such a state of things can only be grappled with by starting with a subject, throwing into this all or part of what we feel certain about, and then tentatively attaching predicates to it..... If we cannot attain certainty, then we can with equal convenience give expression to our doubt."

A reasonable account is given of the import to our minds of the ordinary form of proposition, and of the degrees of appropriateness with which it fits the various kinds of matter we express in it. In scheduling propositions the true character of the particular forms, from the scientific point of view, as merely steps to universals, is stated, while the needed protest is made against Jevons's attempt to banish them altogether. "Modals" are barely described, and reference made for their further treatment, so far as they can be logically treated, to the author's work on 'Probability.' The treatment of hypothetical propositions is fresh and original. Their occurrence depends not on the objective nature of the universe, but on the imperfection of our knowledge, which has reached the stage of confidently affirming certain uniformities, but doubts their applicability to a special set of circumstances. Absolute ignorance would know nothing of the uni-formities, absolute knowledge would be certain as to their applicability. The purely conceptualist logician should recognize no hypothetical propositions, for he recognizes no uniformities, "nothing in the way of material consequence." It is noticed that though it is quite contrary to common usage to regard all propositions as hypothetical on the ground that they do not assert the existence of their subject, yet even the "plain man" allows some subjects to be hypothetical—those, namely, described by a combination of terms. The boundary between categorical and hypothetical propositions in actual speech thus turns out to be less sharp than might have been expected, as we might also have shown by cases converse to the above, where a purely categorical proposition is expressed hypothetically. In dealing with definition Dr. Venn concludes that all definitions are nominal, as giving the meaning of a name or the contents of the notion embodied in that name, and he justly rejects the distinction sought to be set up by Hamilton between "name" and "notion." But he also holds that names are never used except as denoting things objectively existent; only the existence may be either genuine physical existence, or existence as recognized things of the imagination, or as half-recognized survivals from a more ignorant age, or as products of mere convention, which Mill would view as merely subjective. Holding this broader view, Dr. Venn can state quite generally that the difference between "thing" and "notion" is that between a complex, perhaps infinite mass of attributes, and one narrowly limited; the limitation gives the contents of the notion and the meaning of the name; but it gives also the nature of the thing, so far as it is convenient or possible to hold this before our minds, and it is at any time liable to be called up for, and revised by, comparison with the thing. Again, how far can definition be called for? According to the Aristotelians, not above the categories nor below the "infimæ species"; and they also excepted other things from its sphere, as God, fictions, and entia rationis; according to Mill, even things (like sensation) which admit of no further analysis may be defined genetically (a view reminding us of Spinoza with his genetic definitions from which the whole actual universe could be deduced). Against both these views Dr. Venn protests, holding that definition is mere analysis; that in purely formal logic it has no proper place, since a postulate of such logic must be that all thinkers use the same words in the same meaning, and therefore need no definition of them; finally, and as a consequence of the above, that definition is a purely practical need:—

"You have no right to a definition at all; the mere fact that you ask for one is in itself an admission of the general truth of our postulate about language, that is the definition involves confessedly an admission that you consider yourself sound on the subject of language generally and merely want a partial blank supplied. All that definition can do is to supply a link connecting the defective notion with the proximate ones presumed to be sound."

Dr. Venn adds some excellent remarks on the relative importance of attributes, the changes of view that may take place on this topic, the consequent change in the definition, a change which should, however, not be undertaken lightly or without considerable research; and he justly protests against the levity of Dr. Bain's proposal to alter the definition each time some one discovers or believes himself to have discovered a fresh attribute.

A general preliminary chapter on induction mediates with judgment between the views of Whewell, Mill, and Jevons. Each is shown to be exhibiting in a one-sided way some one of the essential elements in all discovery, Whewell enforcing novelty of conception, Mill accuracy of generalization, and Jevons verification. This last in its most convincing form takes the shape of deduction; and Jevons, dwelling mainly on this, insisted that discovery in nature was an "inverse" process—given a conclusion to find the premises. But such a problem is, as Dr. Venn points out, quite indeterminate unless certain arbitrary restrictions are imposed; and Jevons's own restrictions are such as to make his solutions "mere parodies" of those obtained in genuine scientific inquiry. The well-worn problem of the nature of Kepler's discovery is again discussed in this chapter, but with no exception to the rule that it seems to bring confusion to all who handle it.

To the rest of the volume we can afford but the briefest notice. It considers the relations of induction and deduction to analysis and synthesis; it points out in regard to the inductive methods the contrast between their shape in actual investigations and in their formal completeness. Under the head of standards and units some information is given of Fechner's attempts to measure psychical phenomena. "Explanation" is itself explained, and some notice given to the attempts made to construct a general, because truly logical language. A highly original chapter on the differences between science and art concludes the work. Rules for action, it is pointed out, stand on a totally different footing from physical laws, because their very purport must vary—since their consequences will vary—with the numbers to whom they are addressed. What is a sound rule to be adopted by few might be pernicious if accepted by all; what is justifiable if intended as a general rule cannot be peremptorily required of an individual who has no assurance, but rather the reverse, of its general adoption. Such considerations, Dr. Venn thinks, might be systematized in a "practice" or "logic of action." But we must finish. We will but add that hardly a page of this work can be read without instruction; that while it is invaluable to the academic student, it is hardly less profitable as a discipline in sobriety to the professional thinker, in breadth and enlightenment to the man of practice.

Annals of Scottish Printing from the Introduction of the Art in 1507 to the Beginning of the Seventeenth Century. By Robert Dickson, L.R.C.S.E., and John Philip Edmond. (Cambridge, Macmillan & Bowes.)

The history of printing in Scotland has recently been attracting the attention of bibliographers, and the magnificence, both in typography and illustration, of the work the title of which we have just recorded, might well lead the casual inquirer to suppose this subject exhausted for many years to come. Whatever may have been the level of printing in Scotland before 1600—and we are inclined to think that the average workmanship was scarcely rivalled in badness by that of any other European country—there can yet be no doubt of the excellence of Scottish printing at the present day. Few English provincial presses could turn out such good work as the Aberdeen printers of these 'Annals,' and we can only wish that they had had a worthier subject for illustration than the barbarous home-made woodcuts or the imprints from the worn-out blocks of foreign printers which appear to have contented the early Scottish book-producers and book-buyers.

Those who are accustomed to look upon 1500 as the extreme limit of the dates within which a book must be printed to be classed with the incunabula will perhaps be inclined to deny the existence of any early printing in Scotland at all. Not till 1507 is there any record of a work printed in Scotland, and within a hundred years after the discovery of printing Messrs. Dickson and Edmond have only managed to give the titles of twenty-five Scottish works, an average of about one in two years after the introduction of printing into Scotland! Doubtless more books were printed, and have either totally disappeared or else escaped the authors of the present work. But "early" is only a relative term, and we may accordingly ask what Scotland has to show in the first century and a half of printing. These 'Annals' cite 325 titles, due to the following fourteen printers: Walter Chepman, Andrew Myllar, John Story, Thomas Davidson, John Scot, Robert Lekpreuk, Thomas Bassandyn, Alexander Arbuthnet, John Ross, Henry and Robert Charteris, Thomas Vautrollier, Robert Waldegrave, and Robert Smyth. Of these printers the last three can hardly be considered as Scottish, while the claims of Scotland to Scot are rendered more than doubtful by his orthography. We do not understand how the authors pass this difficulty by, and the following words occurring on p. 199 have surely no place in a treatise laying claim to scholarship:—

"It was surely hard enough to find Chalmers, Beloe, and others, attempting to make out that John Scot was not a Scotsman; but it is more galling to our national feelings to find the venerable doctor regarding Lekpreuk as an Englishman."

Principal Lee, "the venerable doctor," was doubtless in error; but the question of "national feelings" has no bearing whatever on a point of antiquarian research.

We may, then, consider that Scotland had some dozen native printers in some hundred and fifty years, who produced three hundred odd works. The annals of early Scottish printing are thus confined within moderate bounds, and suggest no problems of the extent and complexity of those which abound in the history of early printing in the land of its birth. It is a limited and well-defined subject, which can be readily dealt with by a single bibliographer in the space of an average lifetime. With what success then have our authors accomplished a really possible task? It is to be feared that they have scarcely reached the highest standard of modern bibliographical research, although their work would be of undoubted service, were it only as a record of titles and of libraries where the recorded books can be examined. Dr. Dickson wrote in 1885 a small monograph entitled 'Introduction of the Art of Printing into Scotland,' which was published by Messrs. J. P. Edmond & Spark. The first ten chapters of the present 'Annals' may be looked upon as an extension of that work; the following ten chapters were also more or less anticipated by Dr. Dickson in a series of articles in the Printers' Register. Owing to failing health, Dr. Dickson's share in the compilation ends here, and the remaining eighteen chapters, as well as a revision of the earlier ones, are due to Mr. J. P. Edmond. In the Introduction the authors acknowledge in general terms an obligation to Mr. George Chalmers for his researches in Scottish bibliography. He "left behind him a vast amount of unpublished information relative to it, from which very many of the facts submitted in this work have been obtained." On only one or two occasions in the course of the work is special reference made to Chalmers's manuscripts. Considerable use is made of Dr. Laing's published investigations, especially of his edition of the wills of Scottish printers in the Miscellany of the Bannatyne Club. These, with Ames and Herbert, form the chief authorities cited in the 'Annals.' A reference might, we think, under Thomas Bassandyne, have been given to Dobson's 'History of the Bassandyne Bible,' not a very scholarly work, but one which might, indeed, have been worse.

With the exception of Myllar and Chepman's press, printing in Scotland is practically post-Reformation. It was developed at a time when the artistic spirit, which had imbued in succession the German, Italian, and French printers, had been crushed out with the abolition of the Catholic liturgy and ecclesiastical ceremonial. Perhaps it is as well that the authors of these 'Annals' had not to deal with many mediæval or Catholic topics, or we might have had more passages like the description of a woodcut, which is naively copied from Herbert without other comment than

"Herbert has given a very accurate description of this engraving, and we cannot do better than make use of his words in explaining its beautiful symbolism."

His words are these:—

"Without the circle, in the upper corner on the right is a priest kneeling before the altar, on which is represented Christ rising from the tomb; in the opposite corner is an angel appearing to some holy person on his knees, drawing him as it were to him with four strings."

How a "very accurate description" of the "beautiful symbolism" of St. Gregory's mass and St. Francis's stigmatization can be supposed to be conveyed by this paragraph, it is difficult to understand.

The woodcut itself is perhaps the best of Davidson's strange assortment. It is hardly, however, of Scottish manufacture, but probably a worn-out block bought from some foreign printer, and it might very likely be found in an earlier and better state. The same remark applies to Davidson's collection of French initials, which may have been "most exquisitely designed and skilfully executed"; but the beauty had vanished before they fell into the hands of the Scottish printer. Another of Davidson's cuts, reproduced on p. 115, our authors describe as "the upper half of a male and female figure, the latter holding the sceptre in her left hand." It looks to us like a cut used in some edition of the folk-book of 'Solomon and Marcolphus,' and the "female figure" that of the worthy monarch. The crude cut of 'Death and the Young Man' on p. 116 is probably of Scottish make. It would be difficult to match it from the very infancy of German woodcutting. Perhaps it was an early production of the artist who did the Crucifixion for Bellenden's 'Croniklis,' where the hatchings on the body of our Lord present an almost equal crudity of conception. Davidson's woodcuts represent the press at a low artistic ebb. A considerable portion of his ornaments, especially his remarkable little hands, spades or acorns, and "daisies" for filling up, passed to John Scot, who supplemented them by a set of woodcuts as worn out and crude as can well be imagined. The only interest such woodcuts can have, beyond showing the low level of printing in Scotland, is as a guide towards the true relationship between Scottish and foreign printers, or as enabling us by noting the state of the woodcut to place undated books. Messrs. Dickson and Edmond do not seem to have traced any of these cuts to their origin either in make or design; still less do they seem to have made use of them for the purpose of dating books. Thus in 1541-2 Davidson printed 'The Nevv Actis and Constitvtionis of Parliament,' and somewhat about the same time Bellenden's 'Croniklis,' which is undated. Our authors give various bibliographical opinions as to the latter work having been published in years from 1536 to 1541, and conclude:—

"Our opinion is, that Davidson commenced the work many months before he executed the 'New Actis,' but that he did not complete it till after he had finished them in February, 1541-2. We believe, therefore, that 1542 was the year in which the 'Croniklis' was published."

They give no reasons for this opinion whatever. Now the two works contain impressions from the same blocks of several woodcuts, and a careful examination of their relative chippings would almost certainly have enabled the authors to decide how much of the one work was printed before or after the other. The authors reproduce the title-pages of these works; but the cuts of the arms of Scotland which appear upon both are so absolutely alike that it would seem as if they had for these 'Annals' been printed from one and the same reproduction. An examination of all the known copies of both works would probably, however, have led to some definite conclusions. The same careful inspection of the state of the woodcut devices of Chepman and Myllar in the several copies known of their undated works would surely have thrown light on the order of the works of the Southgait Press. The two reproductions of Chepman's device given on pp. 12 and 62 seem to us to be again printed from the same block. It is the want of any statement in the present work that attempts of this kind have been made (even if they have possibly failed) that leads us to doubt whether all has been done by our authors to form as complete a chronological record as possible of Scottish printing. Scotsmen may perhaps be forgiven for some enthusiasm over Davidson's 'Croniklis,' the Aberdeen Breviary, and the Bassandyne Bible (from which, by-the-by, our authors give no reproductions); but as samples of fine printing in the continental sense these works are at best only second class, and the prices which copies of them fetch in the United Kingdom can hardly be attributed to their artistic merits, still less to any importance that may be claimed for them in the general history of printing.

If we turn from the purely bibliographical side of the present volume, we find a good deal of matter of historical and antiquarian interest, although much of it has been previously published. Notably we may draw attention to the inventories attached to the wills of the various printers, which are all republished here. Bassandyne's inventory gives us a very good idea of the books which found favour in 1577. It is interesting to note that the Reformation had not destroyed the interest of Erasmus's 'Colloquies,' but the Fathers and Schoolmen find representation only in one copy of St. Thomas Aquinas! Further characteristic details are given of the way in which the Bassandyne Bible was forced by Act of Parliament on all "substantious houshalderis." It is obvious, too, that the same "substantious houshalderis" attempted to evade the law by passing one Bible about among themselves, so that the provost and baillies somewhat later, "for eschewing of all fraude, ordanis sic as sall bring thair bybilles and psalm buikis to hafe their names writtin and subscriuet be the clerk." But even this did not settle the difficulties of selling the book; the canny "redare of the burgh," Jhone Cairnis, having got his Bible "bund in blak lether," refused to pay the printer Arbuthnet for the binding, arguing that a Bible meant a bound Bible. The matter was ultimately decided by a lawsuit in which the reader was discomfited. Another interesting point, which had almost been forgotten, but will be recalled by the present work, is that John Napier of logarithmic fame endeavoured like Newton to interpret the Apocalypse. His work was entitled 'A Plaine Discouery of the whole Reuelation of Saint John,' &c. He was, however, more successful in calculating logarithms than the end of the world, which he unwisely fixed between 1688 and 1700. Lastly we may cite a quaint little bit of pleading for Protection:—

".....that na strayngeris or vnfremenis may top or sell in smallis within the fredome of the burgh ony kynd of merchandice or wairis, vther wayes it wer nocht possibill to frie burgessis to leif and ber chairges with the burgh, and better it wer to be vnfrie than frie, for gritter is thair skayth and gritter is the vnfremenis commoditie than vtheris."

It is obvious that there is much of real interest in this work, and if it does not seem to us so good as it might have been in some particulars, it is still a valuable addition to Scottish bibliographical literature, and one the general appearance of which is highly creditable to authors and printers alike. The misprints are few; but among them we do not know whether to include the date in the last line of p. 326, and the strange use of the word "same" (repeated again in the course of the work) in l. 15 of p. 360.

Register of the Abbey of St. Thomas, Dublin.
 Edited by John T. Gilbert, F.S.A. (Eyre & Spottiswoode.)

SCARCELY five years have elapsed since Mr. Gilbert gave to the world a transcript of the chartularies and annals of the Cistercian Abbey of St. Mary at Dublin, and he has recently increased the obligation of scholars to him by a similar work with respect to the Augustinian Abbey which grew out of a church founded by Henry II. in honour of St. Thomas of Canterbury, once situate in the western suburb of the city of Dublin. In both cases the editor has had to resort to the Rawlinson Collection of MSS. preserved in the Bodleian Library. Charters of Henry II. and of John, both as Earl of Mortain and as King, confirming privileges to the Abbey of St. Thomas, have appeared in other works edited by Mr. Gilbert; but he can fairly claim for the register, which, by the way, contains much matter hitherto unpublished, that it is the earliest record extant bearing upon the Anglo-Norman settlement in Ireland.

By far the greater part of the volume consists of deeds of grant of churches, tithes, lands, and tenements to the abbey during the first century of its existence, such donations being often made expressly for the purpose of enabling the abbey to continue its hospitality and charitable works for which it was famous. The deeds are for the most part arranged according to dioceses, an arrangement with which there is little fault to find; they, however, possess one great drawback, namely that, except in some few instances, they are undated. Approximate dates of several of the deeds could doubtless be arrived at with the help of the attesting names, but this would involve considerable labour, and more than could be fairly demanded of the editor. Matters are made worse by the original compiler of the register, who in some cases has manifestly placed documents out of their chronological order, as, for example, the documents numbered respectively CXXVIII., CXXIX., and CXXX. These deeds are especially interesting as mentioning Basilia, sister of Earl Richard FitzGilbert, otherwise known as Strongbow, the "great molar tooth" which occasioned her so much pain during his lifetime, to use her own expression as related by Giraldus Cambrensis. They, moreover, contain the first historical record yet known of the fact that Basilia, after the death of her husband, Reimund FitzWilliam, surnamed "le Gros," whose body was interred in St. Thomas's Abbey, married Geoffrey FitzRobert, Anglo-Norman Seneschal of Leinster. Basilia had intended, upon the death of her first husband, to devote herself to the religious life, but apparently changed her mind and married again. The abbey, however, was much indebted both to her and her husbands for large grants.

The name of Giraldus Cambrensis appears attesting a grant to the abbey made by his brother Philip de Barri, Robert de Barri, another brother, also witnessing the same. Gerald was probably in Ireland at the time, and the date of the document is thus approximately arrived at, being c. 1183-5. The Geraldines, the Carews, the Cogans, the FitzStephens, and others, who crossed over to Ireland at the time of its so-called conquest, with the view of carving out estates for themselves, in which it must be allowed they were eminently successful, were all related to each other by blood, being, as Mr. Gilbert has elsewhere pointed out, more or less direct descendants of a princess of South Wales whose alliances, matrimonial or other, were not always of the most regular order. It is also a remarkable fact that no sooner were they settled in the country than many of them took to combining their own Anglo-Norman names with those of Irish localities, and affected Irish dress and fashions; for this, however, they had some excuse, seeing that beyond the English Pale the King of England's writ did not run.

The Abbot of St. Thomas was not behind other abbots in vindicating the rights and privileges of his monastery, and he resented any undue interference, whether from king, bishop, or the municipality of Dublin. There is among the records of the city of Dublin an undated memorandum of a general acquittance from the mayor and commonalty of all claims against the Abbey of St. Thomas and its tenants whatsoever. Some doubt, however, appears to have arisen about the genuineness of the seal appended to the document, and the abbot thought it advisable not to use it in evidence. The vexed question as to whether the abbey was situate within the city's liberties was set at rest in 1326-7 by an inquisition, the jury finding that both the Abbeys of St. Thomas and St. Mary were within the liberties and subject only to the city's coroners. On more than one occasion the abbot and the Archbishop of Armagh or the Bishop of Meath appear, from documents in the register, to have had differences respecting vicarages, procurations, &c. These were usually settled by a compromise, in which the abbot did not always come off second best.

There are one or two little slips in editing, such as must always occur in a work of this kind, be the editor never so careful; as, for instance, the printing of "fuit" for sint (p. 56, line 6 from top). These, however, detract but little from the value of the book, which is a useful contribution to early Irish history. Mr. Gilbert will perhaps forgive us for taking exception to his note to "heibote" (p. 177) explaining it to mean a supply of wood and grass. It is not clear how the latter could serve for keeping up a haie, or fence.

NOVELS OF THE WEEK.

The Emancipated. By George Gissing. 3 vols. (Bentley & Son.)

Cross-Roads. By May Crommelin. 3 vols. (Hurst & Blackett.)

In her Earliest Youth. By Tasma. 3 vols. (Kegan Paul & Co.)

Suspense. By H. S. Merriman. 3 vols. (Bentley & Son.)

A Very Strange Family. By F. W. Robinson. (Heinemann.)

Hauntings: Fantastic Stories. By Vernon Lee. (Same publisher.)

Concealed for Thirty Years: being the Narrative of one Edward Grey. (Remington & Co.)

The Treasure Tower: a Story of Malta. By Virginia W. Johnson. (Fisher Unwin.)

Is it on the whole a good or a bad thing for a woman to be emancipated from the weak dependence and manifold restrictions of sex? And if so, who has the best chance of happiness—the woman who emancipates herself by eloping, or the young widow with plenty of money? These amongst other questions on the subject of emancipation Mr. Gissing incidentally answers in his last three volumes of fiction. The eloper and the widow are the heroines in chief of Mr. Gissing's book; but there is a bevy of women who play in and out of the chapters, some emancipated and some not. To tell the truth, the former class are a good deal nicer than the latter; though when they enter the bonds of matrimony after one emancipation, they are generally the nicest of all. Mr. Gissing, indeed, shows his readers an awful example to the contrary of this; but it is unmistakably the man's fault. The moral is that the husband of an emancipated woman must be a strong character, whereas in the case referred to Reuben Elgar is the weakest man who ever erred along the line of the emotions. He is one of the most interesting persons in the book, though all are more or less interesting. Mr. Gissing is a painstaking student of human nature; and perhaps the painstaking is a little too conspicuous.

Miss Crommelin's new story has the merit of increasing in interest as it proceeds. The first volume, introducing us to the Johnson family (the squire is good in his very commonplaceness, though with little of the squire about him), and the early travels of Margaret Aylmer and her cousin through continental scenes that are pretty familiar, is a trifle dull; but the heroine steadily improves on acquaintance. Although our author's descriptions of scenery are a little prolix, at least in the first volume, she has a painter's eye, and the human interest once raised in her characters is well maintained. It is impossible not to have a friendly feeling for "old Mr. Brown," or Sir John Aylmer, although we know he is an old roué; and Roy, his childish companion, who roars when Margaret is again engaged, and speculates so quaintly on the absurdity of his three-legged stool, is a masterly sketch of a real child. His American mother, too, is lifelike and womanly. We could have spared the Goldrings, perhaps, two conventional Yankees, and the rather dreary Mr. Bunce; but on the whole the minor characters are substantive enough, and Reggie's unworthiness is compensated by the sterling manliness of Dick Somers, Margaret's second choice. The women, however, are better than the men throughout.

Pauline Vyner, "in her earliest youth," marries the giddy-pated George Draughton—who boasts a few more years, but scarcely as much stability of character—out of gratitude for his rescue of her uncle Chubby, who is considerably younger than herself. The couple are not particularly well assorted, and George is an infatuated gambler, so that mischief begins to brew soon after they are married. To make the mischief worse, Pauline's father—the untimely fugitive from justice who often crosses the path of young married ladies in fiction—turns up, and is seen kissing her under the rose. This incident, however, is only a sort of rehearsal for something more serious in the same line of business. Sir Francis Segrave gives Pauline a good deal of trouble, and makes play by encouraging George to gamble and drink. There is very nearly a catastrophe. Segrave has all the skill, Pauline all the ingenuity and inexperience, and George all the blindness required to make such a thing possible. But in the nick of time Uncle Chubby comes to the rescue again. In Melbourne, on the eve of an elopement, she gets a telegram to say that Chubby is dangerously ill, and asking for her every moment. There is no resisting that. She goes, and is saved; and others are saved with her. Tasma still improves in her manner of telling a story. 'In her Earliest Youth' is full of good feeling and artistic touches.

Mr. Merriman did not choose badly when he fixed on 'Suspense' as the name of his latest novel. There is, indeed, more suspense about it than one quite appreciates, for there is really nothing else. Uncertainty as to the upshot of the whole and excessive reticence of handling are distinguishing features till the end, which is a singularly unsatisfactory one. It might be a more harrowing ending, perhaps, were one ever really in sympathy with the actors. But these young people have all along proved themselves so painfully restrained, guarded, and far-seeing, so given to looking before leaping, to staying their hands, and husbanding their strength instead of acting, that the reader has a sort of unholy longing just to see somebody or other run amuck, as it were, and make a "good ending." It scarce seems worth while to put figures on a canvas with a certain amount of elaboration only to wipe them out almost without putting them through their facings. Probably, however, the cleverness of the picture lies in its negative rather than positive aspect. There is certainly a good deal of quick observation and insight in parts of it. Mr. Merriman ("the present writer" as in sundry asides he calls himself) deprecates being classed with the dissecting school of novelists. He does not seem to be free of the taint; and for absolute talent in the matter of staving off strong emotions, especially love crises, he is second to none, not even Mr. James himself. The hero is a war correspondent of enormous mental capacity and strength of character; the heroine is a nineteenth century damsel, also "strong in her intellects." The two employ so much strategy and minor tactics over events that demand none that they have no time left for more natural and human pastimes. Mr. Merriman is, perhaps, afraid of not reaching a fitting climax after so much advertisement of and insistence on the personalities of these two, for they are never brought together after all.

Mr. Robinson has done better work before now than 'A Very Strange Family.' Of it we need not say much, except that it is by no means unreadable nor, in its way, unexciting. As a family the Darrells are certainly rather 'leading on' and mysterious; the whole thing, indeed, is well presented though not very carefully worked out. One does not feel quite certain if the author is doing all he intended to do with his material, or if he is simply "drifting." The mystery which introduces the teller of the story himself is either forgotten or avoided; at any rate, nothing seems to come of it. 'A Very Strange Family' is, on the whole, rather a shadowy performance, yet there are strong feelings and strong situations portrayed in it, especially in the case of the Darrell brothers.

Vernon Lee admits that her four little tales are "of no genuine ghosts"; her ghosts are "what you call spurious ghosts," which haunt the brain rather than the physical senses. One at least, 'Amour Dure,' has already appeared in print, and possibly the other three as well. There is a certain sameness in these stories—the central figure in three of them is a lure-woman, who draws her lovers to death or madness. The garments change, but the actors are the same—a living doom and unresisting victims. If it were not for their literary savour, the monotony of Vernon Lee's quartet of "fantastic stories" might be a little oppressive.

Edward Grey, who recounts his adventures on the island of Solterra, of unknown longitude and latitude in the Pacific, is imbued with a strong sense of the strangeness of his story; and indeed, if not quite so strange as truth, it is stranger in its way than the average of romantic fiction. The island of fantasy on which Mr. Grey was shipwrecked, where the people speak English as she never was spoke, and work themselves up to such a pitch of feeling that gout of perspiration plash upon the floors, excites amusement rather than interest. The author has given himself some trouble in working out his idea, but the average reader will have to take almost as great pains if he is determined to find out what Mr. Grey is driving at.

Slight and simple is Virginia W. Johnson's story of 'The Treasure Tower' of Malta. Jacob Dealtry, an English miser who trafficks in curiosities of various kinds, including "clay and jasper talismen," has a lovely granddaughter. Arthur Curzon, a naval lieutenant, sees the girl and develops a taste for curiosities. There is only one ending for such a tale, and when it comes the young folk are happy, and living on the grandfather's money. A few scenes of Anglo-Maltese life diversify this artless story, which is hardly enough to occupy half an hour of idleness.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

MR. GOLDWIN SMITH always writes well, and he is at his best when dealing with historical subjects. Despite the cleverness of the whole, his Life of Jane Austen (Walter Scott) is disappointing. It is difficult to say anything new about Jane Austen, and it is quite as difficult to say anything which her admirers will deem adequate. The first chapter, which is the best of the nine in this small volume, contains an excellent sketch of the incidents in her life. The other chapters are devoted to analyzing her novels, and this is done by Mr. Goldwin Smith with the object of furnishing "not only an introduction, but a guide to the treasure-house of Jane Austen's writings." Possessing a delicate taste and a fine critical faculty, Mr. Goldwin Smith says many true things of Jane Austen's characters, and he displays his superiority as a commentator over Lord Brabourne, who has written things which are commonplace when true, and which are pointless when original. It was scarcely necessary for Mr. Goldwin Smith to say that Lord Brabourne "has justly observed that the heroines of Jane Austen's novels are better than the heroes." Nobody can deny this, but it is not criticism. Mr. Goldwin Smith appears to question an historical fact when he writes at p. 36 that George IV., having fallen in love with Mrs. Fitzherbert, "would have made her his wife, if he had been allowed." Surely the marriage of the Prince Regent with Mrs. Fitzherbert is not open to question! It may have been illegal, but it occurred. Mr. Goldwin Smith also says that Lord Brabourne cannot endure Knightley in 'Emma'; what matters it whether he can or not? Neither are we comforted by learning that Darcy in 'Pride and Prejudice' is the only one of Lord Brabourne's great-aunt's heroes "for whom he feels much regard." A 'Life of Jane Austen' of which three-fourths consist of critiques upon her writings is misnamed. One slip we have noted. Mr. Perry, the medical practitioner in 'Emma,' is misprinted "Parry." In the bibliography at the end a long article in the Times on Jane Austen's 'Letters' is not mentioned.

A VERY small book containing sixty-seven pages has a title-page exciting expectations which are not satisfied by the contents, it being entitled Thomas Robinson Woolfield's Life at Cannes and Lord Brougham's First Arrival (Kegan Paul & Co.). Mr. Woolfield first saw Cannes in 1838; soon after he made it his home, and he died there in 1888. His nephew has compiled the notes of his life which form the greater part of this work. They tell little more than that he was a good man who built a church and more than one villa, and who entertained many persons of eminence who visited Cannes. Among those who were his guests the late German Emperor and the Empress Frederick and their children are the most notable. When the present German Emperor was there with his parents in 1869 he was eleven years old, and is thus described: "Prince William's bright, frank, and cordial manner always won golden opinions. He had unbounded spirits—which contrasted strangely with the sweet, gentle, calm disposition of Prince Henry. I remember Prince William showing us with much pride the 'beautiful gold watch and golden chain' which his 'grandmother, the Queen of England,' had given him; but he also confided to us that what he thought best of all was a 'beautiful golden pound,' which Her Majesty had also sent him." Lord Brougham visited Cannes for the first time four years before Mr. Woolfield, and nothing is told of his sojourn there which is not already known. In short, this little book contains very few things which are new, and the same number of pages might have been filled with really interesting details if the compiler had known how to treat the subject which he has taken in hand.

DR. TAYLOR'S Wanderings in Search of Health (Lewis) is a sensible, well-written volume, but so many books of the kind have been produced that there seems little room for a new one. As it is now a fashion to go to Teneriffe Dr. Taylor's matter-of-fact account is worth reading by those who expect an earthly paradise. Of Grand Canary he speaks unfavourably: "Before Grand Canary can be looked upon as a desirable health resort for invalids, a more satisfactory spot than the windy, dusty and populous town of Las Palmas, must be discovered and opened up."

MR. ACWORTH has republished from Murray's Magazine a lively series of articles on The Railways of Scotland (Murray), which form a suitable pendant to his account of English railways. Among other forgotten incidents of the early days of steam travelling he mentions Mr. Scott Russell's bold attempt to run "steam coaches" along the high road between Glasgow and Paisley. Mr. Acworth writes about railways with an evident zest which makes his book pleasant reading, but "loco-superintendent" is a horrible word.

In his sketch of the career of Peterborough that appears in the series styled "English Men of Action" (Macmillan) Mr. Stebbing has felt his way prudently and carefully. Peterborough's biography is exceedingly difficult to write, and to write it in a thoroughly satisfactory manner Mr. Stebbing would have needed a large volume, in which he could have given references to authorities and printed documentary evidence in appendixes. Of course these things are out of the question in a volume at half-a-crown, and Mr. Stebbing has been able only to print the results he has arrived at, not the evidence on which they are based. His account will recommend itself to the reader as reasonable and probable, even if the author does not claim to have solved the riddle which his hero's character presents. In his narrative of Peterborough's Spanish campaign he adopts much the same view as was expressed in this journal when we reviewed Col. Parnell's volume. He neither exalts Peterborough into a hero of romance, nor does he make him out to be a mere braggart impostor. In his general account of the war Mr. Stebbing has perhaps not sufficiently grasped the fact that the immense majority of Spaniards outside Catalonia were on the side of Philip V., and that the English were engaged in trying to force on the country a monarch it had no inclination to accept. Mr. Stebbing does not go so far as Col. Parnell, and call the Spanish troops "the Bourbons"; but he seems to suppose that if King Charles had only followed Peterborough's advice, and proceeded by Valencia to Madrid, he would have gained the crown he was contending for. The truth is he had to reduce an unwilling nation to submission, and to that the resources of the allies were unequal.

MR. LANG'S amusing lecture, How to Fail in Literature, has been reprinted by Messrs. Field & Tuer in an enlarged shape.

MESSRS. WARD & LOCK have added to their excellent "Minerva Library" Mr. Wallace's delightful Narrative of Travels on the Amazon and Rio Negro. It is a wonderfully cheap book which deserves to have an immense sale. Another volume that has reached us from the same publishers, Conquerors of the World: a Popular Account of the Peoples and Races of Europe, by Mr. G. T. Bettany, is written with a good deal of cleverness, but indifferently illustrated.

We have on our table The Story of Waterloo, by Major H. D. Hutchinson (Chatham, Gale & Polden),—Emin Pasha: his Life and Work, by W. Pimblett (Methuen & Co.),—A Sketch of the Life and Reminiscences of John Rogers, written by Himself (Southampton, Gilbert),—The Simple Sentence in Greek, by W. J. Harding (Livingtons),—Livy, Book XXI., with Introduction and Notes by A. H. Allcroft and W. F. Masom (Clive & Co.),—Music and Action, by J. Donovan (Kegan Paul),—Modern Gymnastic Exercises, Part II., by A. Alexander (Philip & Son),—The Psychology of Attention, by T. Ribot (Chicago, Open Court Publishing Company),—The Public Regulation of Railways, by W. D. Dabney (Putnam),—Habit and Health, edited by G. Beddoes (Sonenschein),—About Ireland, by E. L. Linton (Methuen & Co.),—Political Prisoners at Home and Abroad, by G. Sigerson, M.D. (Kegan Paul),—The Celebrated Janet Homfrey, by P. Fendall (Gardner & Co.),—Fair Phyllis of Lavender Wharf, by J. Greenwood (Simpkin),—Seven Song Stories, by C. Bingham (Eglington & Co.),—The Kings of the World, by R. Smith (Nisbet),—Whispers from Fairyland, by W. L. H. Radcliffe (Stock),—"Come, ye Children," by the Rev. B. Waugh (Cassell),—Flowers from the Catholic Kindergarten, by F. Hattler, S.J., translated from the German by T. J. Livesey (Burns & Oates),—The Sunday School Manual, by J. Palmer (C.E.S.S.I.),—A Buddhist Catechism, by S. Bhikshu (Redway),—The Sling and the Stone, Vol. IX., by the Rev.

C. Voysey (Williams & Norgate),—Faith and Duty, by the Rev. T. Turner and T. Rutt (C.E.S.S.I.),—Christ and His Time, by E. White (Macmillan),—and Les Résultats de l'Exégèse Biblique, by M. Vernes (Paris, Leroux). Among New Editions we have Astronomy with an Opera-Glass, by G. P. Serviss (Appleton & Co.),—Corner's History of France (Dean & Son),—Troublesome Daughters, by L. B. Walford (Spencer Blackett),—Delicia, by the Author of 'Miss Molly' (Blackwood),—Boilers, Marine and Land, by T. W. Traill (Griffin),—Earth's Eventide, by the Rev. J. G. Gregory (Partridge),—School Geography, by J. Clyde (Edinburgh, Oliver & Boyd),—Moffatt's How to Prepare Notes of Lessons, by T. J. Livesey (Moffatt & Paige),—and The Poetical Works of Elizabeth Barrett Browning, Vol. I. (Smith & Elder).

LIST OF NEW BOOKS.

ENGLISH.

Theology.

Farrar's (F. W.) Truths to Live By, a Companion to 'Every-day Christian Life,' cr. 8vo. 5/6 cl.
Parker's (J.) The People's Bible: Vol. 12, The Psalter, 8/ cl.

History and Biography.

Journal of Marie Bashkirtseff, translated by Mathilde Blind, 2 vols. 8vo. 24/ cl.
Wylie's (Rev. J. A.) The History of the Scottish Nation, Vol. 3, A.D. 843 to A.D. 1286, 8vo. 9/ cl.

Geography and Travel.

Guinness's (Mrs. H. G.) The New World of Central Africa, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.
Through the Wordsworth Country, Plates by H. Goodwin, Text by Prof. W. Knight, cheap edition, cr. 8vo. 5/ cl.
Wolff's (H. W.) Rambles in the Black Forest, cr. 8vo. 7/6 cl.

Science.

Burton (W. K.) and Pringle's (A.) The Processes of Pure Photography, 8vo. 4/6 swd.
Forth Railway Bridge, being the Expanded Edition of the 'Giant's Anatomy,' 4to. 6/ cl.
Gomme's (G. L.) The Village Community, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl. (Contemporary Science Series.)
Owen's (E.) A Manual of Anatomy for Senior Students, 12/6

General Literature.

Conspirator (edited by F. Harkut, 2 vols., cr. 8vo. 21/ cl.
Dewey's (C. M.) Orations and After-Dinner Speeches, 7/6
Ellwanger's (G. H.) The Garden's Story, with Introduction by Rev. C. Woolley Dod, 12mo. 5/ cl.
Jessopp's (A.) The Trials of a Country Parson, cr. 8vo. 7/6 cl.
Taylor's (J. O. H.) Chess Skirmishes, cr. 8vo. 5/ cl.
Wigston's (W. F. C.) Hermes Stella, or Notes and Jottings on the Bacon Cipher, 8vo. 6/ cl.

FOREIGN.

Theology.

Amelineau (E.): Les Moines Égyptiens, 3fr. 50.
Milloué (L. de): Précis de l'Histoire des Religions, 3fr. 50.

Fine Art and Archaeology.

Collection (La) Spitzer, Vol. 1, 250fr.
Fabricius (E.): Theben, 1m. 60.
Mittheilungen aus den Orientalischen Sammlungen der Königl. Museen zu Berlin, Part 2, 24m.
Richer (F.): Formes Extérieures du Corps Humain, 2 vols. 50fr.
Wachsmuth (C.): Die Stadt Athen im Alterthum, Vol. 2, Part 1, 12m.

Poetry and the Drama.

Bernay (B.): La Danse au Théâtre, 5fr.
Hertz (W.): Aristoteles in den Alexanderdichtungen des Mittelalters, 4m.
La Fontaine: Œuvres, Notes de Henri Régner, Vol. 6, 7fr. 50.
Vasquerie (A.): Futura, 7fr. 50.

History and Biography.

Bataille (A.): Causas Criminelles et Mondaines de 1889, 3fr. 50.
Cahiers d'un Rhétoricien de 1815, 7fr. 50.
Dronsart (M.): Le Prince de Bismarck, 3fr. 50.
Goethe's Gespräche, hrsg. v. W. Frhr. v. Biedermann, Vol. 5, 5m.
Hanserecense, bearb. v. D. Schäfer, Part 3, Vol. 4, 22m.
Haussmann (Baron): Mémoires, Vol. 1, 7fr. 50.
Troubat (J.): Souvenirs du Dernier Secrétaire de Sainte-Beuve, 3fr. 50.

Geography and Travel.

Leclercq (J.): Du Caucase aux Monts Alai, 3fr. 50.
Pontevès de Sabran (J. de): Notes de Voyage d'un Hussard, 3fr. 50.
Strabon: Géographie, Traduction de A. Tardieu, Vol. 4, 3fr. 50.

Philology.

Canabutz in Dionysium Halicarnassensem Commentarius, 1m. 80.
Homeri Odyssea, rec. A. Ludwich, Vol. 1, 6m. 75.
Klotz (K.): Grundzüge Altörmischer Metrik, 12m.
Müller (H. D.): Zur Entwicklungsgeschichte d. Indogermanischen Verbalbaus, 4m.
Mueller (L.): De Acoli Fabulis, 2m.

Science.

Götte (A.): Zur Entwicklungsgeschichte der Tiere, Part 5, 36m.
Münsterberg (H.): Beiträge zur Experimentellen Psychologie, Part 3, 3m.
Renan: L'Avant de la Science, 7fr. 50.

Tissandier (G.): Histoire des Ballons, Vol. 2, 50fr.
Wild (H.): Neue Form Magnetischer Variationsinstrumente, 2m. 50.

General Literature.

Bergerat (E.): Le Rire de Caliban, 3fr. 50.
Brunetière (F.): Nouvelles Questions de Critique, 3fr. 50.
Feuillet (O.): Honneur d'Artiste, 3fr. 50.
Maupassant (G. de): L'Inutile Beauté, 3fr. 50.

TO RICHARD LOVELACE.

AH, Lovelace, what desires have sway
In the white shadow of your heart,
Which no more measures day by day,
Nor sets the years apart?

How many seasons for your sake
Have taught men over, age by age,
"Stone walls do not a prison make,
Nor iron bars a cage!"—

Since that first April when you fared
Into the Gatehouse, well content,
Caring for nothing so you cared
For honour and for Kent,

How many, since the April rain
Beat drear and blossomless and hoar
Through London, when you left Shoe Lane,
A-marching to no war!

Till now, with April on the sea,
And Sunshine in the woven year,
The rain-winds loose from reverie
A lyric and a cheer.

BLISS CARMAN.

MISS BOYLE.

IN the death of Miss Mary Louisa Boyle, which took place at one o'clock on Monday morning at her new residence in Oakley Street, Chelsea, the world of art and letters loses a figure which at one time was almost prominent, and has always continued to be interesting. Born in November, 1810, she was the daughter of Vice-Admiral Sir Courtenay Boyle, third son of the seventh and brother of the eighth Earl of Cork and Orrery. Belonging to an illustrious family, "by one or other of which," as Dr. Johnson has declared, "almost every art has been encouraged or improved" (the very name of the planetarium of the astronomer is taken from the title of Lord Orrery), Miss Boyle could hardly fail to be thrown across the most important people of her time. Hence there is no doubt that had she lived to complete the book of reminiscences upon which she was engaged at the very moment of her death, she would have left behind her a work of quite exceptional interest and value.

In her childhood and girlhood she moved mainly, almost entirely, in court life, English and continental; but somewhat later she passed into literary sets, and became the intimate friend of such immortals as Landor, Tennyson, Browning, Russell Lowell, and Charles Dickens. With the last of these her companionship was at one period almost that of a sister with a brother, and her reminiscences of her daily country walks with the novelist were more interesting than are even those letters of Dickens to her which have already appeared in print. Of Landor and Browning, too, she had a rich store of anecdote. With Lord Tennyson (who in his latest volume has, it will be remembered, dedicated an important poem to her) she was associated in the 'Tribute,' a miscellany got up under the editorship of Lord Northampton to aid the widow and family of the Rev. Edward Smedley. And it is a remarkable fact that although among her fellow contributors were such poets as Tennyson, Wordsworth, and Landor, her single contribution, 'My Father's at the Helm,' far outshone in public favour any and all of the poems by the great writers. Its popularity, indeed, was, and perhaps still is, very great. Besides poems, Miss Boyle wrote one or two novels, under the influence largely of Scott, and still more largely, perhaps, of G. P. R. James, whom also she numbered among her literary friends. But besides this kind of work she went through the drudgery of cataloguing and commenting on the family portraits in the galleries of her friends, and as these friends included the owners of some of the most important of the historic mansions of England, her books can hardly fail to have a permanent and, indeed, an increasing value.

Her knowledge of English history was considerable, and among those few who of late years have had the privilege of seeing much of our great poet—whose eldest son married a niece of hers—she unquestionably is at the head. He, like every one who knew her, found her society perennially refreshing and interesting; for, although she was far from assuming the manners of a young woman, and indeed was somewhat fond of dwelling upon the subject of her years, she retained to the last the vivacity of youth. This gave to her conversation a charm that was indescribable, and perhaps unique. Her judgment and her common sense were so sure and so ready that those solid qualities delighted her audience with all the pleasurable surprise of wit. Outside his own family (if, indeed, Miss Boyle was outside it) Lord Tennyson could not have lost a friend who would have made a greater gap in his life. Quite lately she underwent a successful operation for cataract, and had become once more able to use her pen, though only quite sparingly. Her death was the result of an apoplectic stroke.

THEODORE WATTS.

THOMAS GUY, PETER PARKER, AND THE UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD.

II.

I AM indebted to Mr. F. Madan, of the Bodleian Library, for informing me of the existence of important manuscripts in the Ballard Collection, in which Guy's name figures in connexion with the University. One only of these documents has been printed, in a most unlikely book, namely, Derham's 'Philosophical Experiments, &c., of Robert Hooke and others,' 1726; and on reading this, and being kindly furnished with a précis of the related manuscripts by Mr. Madan, I decided to go through the whole carefully at Oxford. The chief results of my inquiry come out in the following narrative, most of which will be quite new to students.

Early in Charles I.'s reign an agreement was made between the London Stationers' Company, Oxford University, the King's Printers, and Mr. Norton, whereby the University agreed to forbear printing certain books, and the Company to pay 200*l.* a year for such forbearance. This was paid up to the Commonwealth period, when the University still forbore printing, but the Stationers did not pay. In 1653 the University gave their printers (Litchfield & Hall) liberty to print certain books, and this brought the Londoners to terms; they paid at first 120*l.*, and after 1660 200*l.* Some years after, when Bishop Fell was in power at Oxford, the agreement was broken off, by the King's Printers telling the University they might print Bibles if they pleased. Meanwhile the Stationers' Company and Mr. Norton continued to pay their proportion of the 200*l.* Dr. Yates some time afterwards brought into the Oxford Press 4,000*l.* or 5,000*l.*, which enabled a variety of Bibles to be printed at Oxford, notably the Oxford quarto of 1675. The King's Printers thereupon began selling Bibles at a heavy loss, to drive Oxford out of competition. The Bishop and Dr. Yates consequently found it advisable to have allies among the London booksellers, and first took into partnership Moses Pitt and another (probably W. Leake); but Pitt becoming financially embarrassed, Peter Parker and Thomas Guy were introduced to the University business. Parker was already a leading London bookseller and publisher; but it says much for Guy's early success and established business capacity that Parker should have admitted him to share in this business, and that the University, i.e., practically Bishop Fell and Dr. Yates, should have accepted him when he was little over thirty years old. These London men took off the stock the University had accumulated to the value of 5,000*l.*, and expended 3,000*l.* in materials for Bible printing. In a short time the printing of Bibles recommenced at Oxford, and I have examined a large series of Bibles, mostly bound up with Prayer Books and Metrical Psalms, at Canterbury, the British Museum, and the Bodleian, ranging from the smallest duodecimo to the largest folio, dating from 1679 to 1691, bearing the imprint of Guy, of Parker, of these two, or of the four London agents, Parker, Pitt, Leake, and Guy. The majority of the Bibles are noticed by Mr. Loftie in his 'Century of Bibles,' but without distinguishing the varied way in which different editions of Testaments, Prayers, and Psalms are bound up together; and some additions to the collections have been made since his book was written. In particular there may be noted at Canterbury a fine folio of 1688, with the royal arms on title, and on the cover the cipher WR crowned in the centre and at the corners, which evidently belonged to William III.; and the fine folio of 1680, which belonged to George III., in the British Museum. There were few years in this period in which several new editions were not printed, and though the workmanship is not equal to that of more famous editions, some of the folios are really excellent. Besides Bibles, a great number of Greek and Latin classics were printed; but I have not come across any of these bearing Guy's personal imprint.

The Stationers' Company in 1679 brought the University before the Council, endeavouring to get it prohibited from printing Bibles. In defending this suit Parker and Guy were very industrious, and bore great part of the expense. Indeed, while they held the Oxford printing press they spared no time and money in defending the University privilege, which but for them ran great risk of collapse. The Stationers and King's Printers then continued their old policy of flooding the market with very cheap Bibles, in which they were vigorously met by Parker and Guy; and at last these latter obtained through Bishop Fell a complete appointment as University Printers, on paying the rent which the Stationers had failed to pay.

After the death of Bishop Fell, in 1686, the University constituted his three executors their printers, granting them the same powers the bishop had in his lifetime, for three years; and Parker and Guy continued to be the real printers, and were reappointed as University printers under seal in 1688. This appointment terminating about Lady-Day, 1691, the Stationers' Company, through a number of their principal members—notably Isted, Bellinger, and Mortlock—resolved to make a strong effort to oust their rivals. They won over some of the delegates whom the University had appointed, by bringing charges of improper actions and bad printing against Parker and Guy, and by making extravagant promises as to what they would do if the Oxford privilege and press were transferred to them; and finally the Vice-Chancellor, Jonathan Edwards, resolved to oust Parker and Guy, but at first could not gain a majority among the delegates. What followed I cannot express better than in the words of the Ballard MSS., xlix. p. 240, being part of the draft case of Parker and Guy against Edwards, Aldrich (of Christ Church), and other defendants:—

"The Vice-Chancellor in April, 1691, in an unstatutable manner (as their own civilians advised) caused a new delegacy to be appointed, wherein some of Parker & Guy's friends were left out, and others added who were for the Vice-Chancellor's purpose.

"Parker & Guy seeing this, and having provided paper and other materials for printing 35,000 Bibles and many thousand other books, ordered their servants before they began printing them to wait upon the Vice-Chancellor and his new delegates, to let them know what they were about, and that they would not begin that work unless they could be assured they should finish without disturbance. The Vice-Chancellor and all the delegates bid them go on in God's name, and promised they should not be disturbed.

"In confidence of this the work was begun; nevertheless the Vice-Chancellor and three of nine of his new delegates contracted with the company to be their printers, and to oust Parker & Guy.

"And in October last (1691) the Vice-Chancellor came into the Theatre printing-house with the defendants Sherwin, Hall, and Hughes, and commanded Sherwin, Hall, and Hughes to beat down the presses; who presently beat down and carried away four printing presses, and scattered and threw under foot their Bibles and about the letters and materials of printing, and threatened the workmen to send them to prison if they worked any more, whereupon many of the workmen gave off and would work no more; and afterwards Edwards (Vice-Chancellor) and Aldrich came again to the Theatre and threatened to lay the men by the heels if they did not forbear. Shortly afterwards, notwithstanding all this in October last, the Vice-Chancellor received 50*l.* of Parker & Guy for rent due at Christmas last (i.e. 1691)."

This was followed by the imprisonment of Robert Elliot, apparently the foreman printer, and when Parker himself appeared in Oxford he was admonished to forbear printing, and to remove everything from the Theatre in four days; and on claiming his privilege as printer under the seal of the University the Vice-Chancellor sent him likewise to gaol, where he and Elliot remained till, some time in January, they were discharged by the Court of King's Bench on habeas corpus. Guy came to Oxford also, and he was pretty certainly occupied in getting up the case against the University, who claimed the right to judge the cause in their own court. In the end the Vice-Chancellor prevailed so far as to get Parker and Guy removed on January 27th, 1691/2.

The new printers, who were appointed for a few years, soon showed that they were far less in the University interest than Parker and Guy had been. They fell behind in payments, and failed to fulfil their promises in many respects. But the contract with Parker and Guy was never renewed. Guy in 1695 was returned to Parliament for Tamworth, and his thoughts became largely occupied with politics and philanthropy. There are many interesting details of these Oxford transactions which I cannot here go into, but must give in the book I am working upon. On the whole, I see no reason to dissent from Dr. John Wallis's conclusion in 1691: "Now as to Parker and Guy, they have been also true and firm to us, and very diligent (sparing no cost or pains) to defend our rights; in all our pleadings in law suits they were our printers, and have never faltered with us (that I know of) in anything." Thus we may credit Guy with an important share in defending and establishing the printing rights of Oxford University, and in developing successfully the business which laid the foundation for the Clarendon Press.

G. T. BETTANY.

THE 'DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY.'

THE following is part of the list of the names which it is intended to insert under K (Section II.) in the 'Dictionary of National Biography.' When one date is given, it is the date of death, unless otherwise stated. An asterisk is affixed to a date when it is only approximate. The editors of the 'Dictionary' will be obliged by any notice of omissions addressed to them at Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co.'s, 15, Waterloo Place, S.W. They particularly request that when new names are suggested, an indication may be given of the source from which they are derived.

Kiallmark, E., musician, b. 1781, fl. 1828
Kiaran, St. (of Clonmacnoise), 549. See Claran.
Kicham, Charles Joseph, Irish nationalist, 1830-82
Kidd, James, professor of law at Toulouse, 1612
Kidd, James, D.D., Orientalist, 1761-1834
Kidd, John, mathematician, 1758-79
Kidd, John, M.D., F.R.S., physician, 1776-1851
Kidd, Joseph B., R.S.A., painter, 1808-89
Kidd, Rev. Samuel, M.A., Sinologist, 1801-43
Kidd, Rev. Thomas, M.A., classical scholar, 1770-1850
Kidd, Capt. William, pirate, ex. 1701
Kidd, William, R.S.A., painter, 1863
Kidd, William, naturalist, 1803-67
Kidd, William Lodge, M.D., physician, 1784-1851
Kidder, Richard, D.D., Bishop of Bath and Wells, 1635-1703
Kidderminster, Richard, D.D., Abbot of Winchcombe, 1531.
See Kedernymster.

Kidley, William, poet, fl. 1624
 Kidman, Charles, B.D., theological writer, 1740
 Kiffin, William, Baptist minister, 1616-1701
 Kilburn, William, artist and calico printer, 1745-1818
 Kilburne, Richard, Kentish topographer, b. 1606
 Kilby, Richard, minister at Derby, 1617
 Kilbye, Richard, D.D., Biblical scholar, 1560*-1620
 Kilconath, William, Bishop of Brechin, 1274
 Kildare, 1st Earl of. See Fitzthomas, John, 1316.
 Kildare, Earls of. See Fitzgerald.
 Kildelith, Robert, Abbot of Melrose, fl. 1273
 Kilgour, Robert, Bishop of Aberdeen, 1707-90
 Kilham, Alexander, founder of Methodist New Connexion, 1798
 Kilham, Mrs. Hannah, née Spurr, Quakeress, 1832
 Kilian, St., Apostle of Franconia, 697. See Cilian.
 Kilkenny, William de, Bishop of Ely, Chancellor of England, 1266 Kilkerran, Lord. See Fergusson, Sir James.
 Kilian, John, Irish rebel, ex. 1803
 Killigrew, Anne, poet and painter, 1660-85
 Killigrew, Catherine, linguist and poet, 1530*-90*
 Killigrew, Charles, Master of the Revels, 1719
 Killigrew, Sir Henry, diplomatist, 1603
 Killigrew, Henry, D.D., divine and dramatist, 1612-90*
 Killigrew, Henry, admiral, 1712
 Killigrew, James, captain R.N., 1695
 Killigrew, Thomas, King Charles's jester, 1611-83
 Killigrew, Thomas, the younger, dramatist, 1719
 Killigrew, Sir William, dramatist, 1606-95
 Killingbeck, John, B.D., Vicar of Leeds, 1650-1716
 Killingworth, Grantham, theological writer, 1699-1778
 Kilmaine, Charles Jennings, general in the French army, 1754-99
 Kilmarnock, William Boyd, 4th Earl of, 1704-46. See Boyd.
 Kilsyth, James Livingstone, 1st Viscount, 1616-61. See Livingstone.
 Kilvert, Rev. Francis, M.A., biographer, 1793-1893
 Kilvert, Richard, monopolist, 1649
 Kilwarby, Robert de, Cardinal, Archbishop of Canterbury, 1279 Kilwarden, Arthur Wolfe, Viscount, 1739-1803. See Wolfe.
 Kimber, Edward, novelist and compiler, 1719-69
 Kimber, Isaac, Dissenting minister, 1692-1758
 Kimhi, Jacob, Hebraist and peddler, 1739-1820
 Kinaston, Sir Francis, poet, 1558-1649*
 Kincaid, Mrs. Jean, commonly called Lady Waristoun, ex. 1600
 Kincaid, Capt. Sir John, 'Adventures in the Rifle Brigade,' 1787-1862
 Kincaid, Earls of. See Bruce.
 Kinkersley, Sir Richard Torin, Vice-Chancellor, 1792-1879
 King, Anthony, LL.D., Irish lawyer, fl. 1795
 King, Augusta Ada, Countess of Lovelace, Lord Byron's daughter, 1815-52
 King, Charles, 'British Merchant,' fl. 1721
 King, Charles, Mus.Bac., composer, 1687-1748
 King, Rev. Charles William, M.A., 'Antique Gems,' 1888
 King, Daniel, 'The Vale Royal of England,' fl. 1660
 King, Rev. David, LL.D., Scotch divine, 1606-83
 King, Sir Edmund, M.D., physician, 1629*-1709
 King, Edward, poet, friend of Milton, 1637
 King, Edward, Jacobite conspirator, ex. 1696
 King, Edward, F.R.S., F.R.A., miscellaneous writer, 1735-1807
 King, Edward, Viscount Kingsborough, 1795-1837
 King, Mrs. Frances Elizabeth, 'Female Scripture Biography,' 1757-1821
 King, Geoffrey, Hebrew Professor at Cambridge, 1616
 King, Gregory, heraldic and commercial writer, 1648-1712
 King, Henry, D.D., Bishop of Chichester, 1591-1669
 King, James, Lord Elytham, 1559-1652
 King, Capt. James, LL.D., F.R.S., 'Continuation of Cook's Voyages,' 1752-82
 King, John, D.D., Bishop of London, 1559*-1621
 King, John, D.D., Canon of Windsor, 1639
 King, Sir John, M.P., Irish politician, 1657
 King, John, 1st Lord Kingston, 1676
 King, Sir John, lawyer, 1640-77
 King, Rev. John, Covenantant, ex. 1679
 King, John, M.A., physician and classical scholar, 1696-1728
 King, John, D.D., Prebendary of York, 1652-1732
 King, John, money broker, 1624
 King, John, painter, 1768-1847
 King, Capt. John Duncan, painter, 1780-1863
 King, John Glen, D.D., 'Ceremonies of the Greek Church,' 1731-87
 King, Joshua, LL.D., President of Queens' College, Cambridge, 1797-1857
 King, Matthew Peter, musical composer, 1773-1823
 King, Oliver, LL.D., Bishop of Bath and Wells, 1503
 King, Paul, Irish Franciscan, fl. 1654
 King, Peter, 1st Lord King, 1669-1734
 King, Peter, 7th Lord King, 1775-1833
 King, Philip Gidley, Governor of New South Wales, 1758-1808
 King, Philip Parker, F.R.S., admiral, 1791-1866
 King, Sir Richard, Bart., admiral, 1780-1806
 King, Rev. Richard, M.A., divine, 1749-1810
 King, Sir Richard, Bart., vice-admiral, 1774-1834
 King, Richard, M.D., founder of Ethnological Society, 1810-76
 King, Richard John, topographer, 1879
 King, Robert, bishop, Abbot of Thame, 1557
 King, Sir Robert, Irish soldier and statesman, 1657
 King, Robert, LL.D., Royalist divine, 1676
 King, Robert, 2nd Lord Kingston, 1693
 King, Robert, Mus.Bac., composer, 1711*
 King, Robert, Earl of Kingston, 1799
 King, Thomas, actor and dramatist, 1730-1805
 King, Thomas, antiquary and engraver, 1845
 King, William, organist and composer, 1624-89
 King, William, D.C.L., miscellaneous writer, 1663-1712
 King, William, D.D., Archbishop of Dublin, 1650-1729
 King, William, D.C.L., Principal of St. Mary Hall, 1685-1763
 King, William, D.D., Dissenting minister, 1701-69
 King, William, M.D., medical writer, 1786-1865
 Kingham, —, admiral
 Kinghorn, Joseph, Dissenting minister, 1758-1832
 Kinghorn, Patrick Lyon, 3rd Earl of, and 1st Earl of Strathmore, 1620*-90. See Lyon.
 Kinglake, Robert, M.D., medical writer, 1765-1842
 Kingsale, Lord. See Courcy.

Kingsborough, Viscount. See King.
 Kingsbury, William, Dissenting minister, 1744-1818
 Kingscote, Henry, philanthropist, 1801-82
 Kingsdown, Thomas Pemberton-Leigh, Lord, 1793-1867. See Pemberton-Leigh.
 Kingsford, Mrs. Annie, M.D., physician, 1846-88
 Kingseley, Rev. Charles, miscellaneous writer, 1819-75
 Kingsley, Henry, novelist, 1830-76
 Kingsley, William, general, 1769
 Kingsmill, Andrew, Puritan divine, 1538-69
 Kingsmill, Sir Robert Bruce, Bart., admiral, 1731*-1805
 Kingsmill, Thomas, M.A., Hebrew Professor at Oxford, fl. 1605
 Kingnor, Richard, Baptist minister, 1677
 Kingthorpe, Richard, Franciscan, fl. 1224
 Kingston, Lord. See King.
 Kingston, Viscount. See Seton.
 Kingston, Sir Anthony, Provost-Marshal in Cornwall, 1556
 Kingston, Elizabeth Ogleigh, calling herself Duchess of, 1720-89. See Chudleigh.
 Kingston, Richard, M.A., divine, fl. 1666
 Kingston, Robert Pierrepont, 1st Earl of, 1643. See Pierrepont.
 Kingston, William Henry Giles, writer of books for boys, 1814-80
 Kinloch, Charles, Jacobite, fl. 1746
 Kinloch, George Ritchie, 'Ancient Scottish Ballads,' 1877
 Kinloch, William Penney, Lord, Scotch judge, 1801-72. See Penney.
 Kinloss, Edward Bruce, Lord, 1549*-1611. See Bruce.
 Kinnaird, Arthur Fitzgerald, 11th Lord Kinnaird, 1814-87
 Kinnaird, Charles, 8th Lord Kinnaird, 1780-1826
 Kinnaird, Hon. Douglas James William, friend of Byron and Sheridan, 1788-1830
 Kinnaird, George, 1st Lord Kinnaird, 1689
 Kinnatellus, King of Scotland, 570
 Kinner, David, editor of the Montreal Herald, 1807-62
 Kinner, Mrs. Sarah Harriet, actress, 1868
 Kinner, William Erskine, Lord, 1769-1822. See Erskine.
 Kinnier, Sir John Macdonald, traveller and diplomatist, 1830
 Kinnoull, Earls of. See Hay.
 Kinreth, Maurice, Irish priest, ex. 1585
 Kinsey, William Morgan, B.D., 'Portugal Illustrated,' 1789-1851
 Kinsius or Kinsine, Archbishop of York, 1060
 Kintore, John Keith, 1st Earl of, 1785-1866. See Keith.
 Kip, John, engraver, 1652*-1729
 Kipling, Thomas, D.D., Dean of Peterborough, 1822
 Kippis, Andrew, D.D., 'Biographia Britannica,' 1725-95
 Kirby, Miss Elizabeth, writer for the young, 1873
 Kirby, John, 'Suffolk Traveller,' 1690-1753
 Kirby, John Joshua, F.R.S., F.S.A., 'Perspective of Architecture,' 1716-74
 Kirby, Rev. William, M.A., F.R.S., entomologist, 1759-1850
 Kirby, George, musical composer, fl. 1801
 Kirkehooven, Katharine, Countess of Chesterfield, 1667
 Kirk, John, D.D., Catholic divine, 1760-1851
 Kirk, Thomas, painter and engraver, 1797
 Kirk, Thomas, sculptor, 1784-1845
 Kirkall, Edward, engraver, 1695*-1728*
 Kirkby, Rev. John, mathematical and miscellaneous writer, 1706-54
 Kirkby, Richard, colonel, fl. 1702
 Kirkcaldy, Sir William, of Grange, ex. 1573
 Kirkcaldy, Robert McLaren, 1st Lord, 1641. See McLaren.
 Kirke, Edward, M.A., editor of Spenser's 'Shepherd's Calendar,' fl. 1597
 Kirke, Percy, colonel of 'Kirke's Lams,' temp. Will. III.
 Kirke, Rev. Robert, Gaelic scholar, fl. 1690
 Kirke, Thomas, F.R.S., virtuoso, 1650-1706
 Kirkeby, John de, Bishop of Ely, 1290
 Kirketon, John de, Bishop of Carlisle, 1353
 Kirkham, Walter de, Bishop of Durham, 1260
 Kirkland, Thomas, M.D., physician, 1721-98
 Kirkman, Francis, bookseller and author, fl. 1673
 Kirkman, Jacob, musical composer, fl. 1775
 Kirkpatrick, Major-General William, Orientalist, 1760-1812
 Kirkstall, Hugh de, of Fountains Abbey, fl. 1247
 Kirkton, Rev. James, 'Church History of Scotland,' 1699
 Kirkup, Baron Seymour, painter, of Florence, 1789*-1880
 Kirkwood, James, minister at Astwick, fl. 1693
 Kirkwood, James, grammarian, fl. 1698
 Kirward, Rev. Charles, Dissenting minister, 1810-85
 Kirwan, Francis, Catholic bishop, 1589-1661
 Kirwan, Owen, Irish rebel, ex. 1803
 Kirwan, Richard, LL.D., chemist and geologist, 1734-1812
 Kirwan, Walter Blake, Dean of Killala, 1754-1805
 Kitchen, John, M.A., Presbyterian divine, fl. 1661
 Kitchin, Anthony, Bishop of Llandaff, 1565
 Kitchiner, William, M.D., miscellaneous writer, 1775*-1827
 Kitchingman, John, miniature painter, 1741*-81
 Kite, Charles, surgeon, 1811
 Kite, John, Archbishop of Armagh and Bishop of Carlisle, 1537
 Kitto, John, D.D., 'Pictorial Bible,' 1804-54
 Klitz, Philipp, musician and author, 1805-54
 Klose, F. J., musician and composer, 1790*-1830
 Knapp, William, musical composer, b. 1699
 Knapp, John Leonard, F.S.A., botanist, 1767-1845
 Knapp, William, parish clerk of Poole, 1698-1768
 Knaptown, Charles, engraver and publisher, 1700-60
 Knaptown, George, painter, 1698-1778
 Knaptown, Philip, musical composer, 1788-1833
 Knappell, Richard, Dominican, fl. 1286. See Clapwell.
 Knatchbull, Sir Norton, Bart., M.P., 'Annotations on the New Testament,' 1685
 Knell, Paul, M.A., Puritan divine, fl. 1680
 Knell, Thomas, divine and poet, fl. 1576
 Knell, William Adolphus, marine painter, 1875
 Kneller, Sir Godfrey, Bart., painter, 1648*-1723
 Kneller, John Zachary, painter, 1635-1702
 Knevet, Sir Edmund, politician, fl. 1541
 Knevet, Sir Thomas, naval commander, 1512
 Knewstubs, John, Rector of Cockfield, Suffolk, 1544-1624
 Knibb, William, Baptist missionary, 1803-45
 Knight, Sir Arnold, physician, 1789-1871
 Knight, Charles, engraver, fl. 1803
 Knight, Charles, publisher and author, 1791-1873
 Knight, Edward, comic actor, 1774-1826
 Knight, Miss Ellis Cornelia, preceptress to the Princess Charlotte, 1758-1838
 Knight, Gawin, M.D. F.R.S., physician, 1772

Knight, Henrietta, Lady Luxborough, 1756
 Knight, Henry Galby, writer on architecture, 1784-1846
 Knight, James, Arctic voyager, 1721
 Knight, Rev. James, theological writer, 1793-1863
 Knight, John, voyager, 1606
 Knight, Sir John, Jacobite, fl. 1695
 Knight, Sir John, K.C.B., admiral, 1748-1831
 Knight, John Baverstock, painter, 1755-1859
 Knight, John Prescott, R.A., painter, 1803-81
 Knight, Rev. Joseph Philip, composer of songs, 1812-87
 Knight, Miss Mary Anne, miniature painter, 1851
 Knight, Richard, Gresham Professor of Music, 1651
 Knight, Richard Payne, M.P., miscellaneous writer, 1750-1824
 Knight, Samuel, D.D., biographer, 1675-1746
 Knight, Samuel, M.A., Vicar of Halifax, 1759-1827
 Knight, Thomas, Chester Herald, 1618
 Knight, Thomas, actor and dramatist, 1830
 Knight, Thomas Andrew, F.R.S., vegetable physiologist, 1758-1838
 Knight, Titus, Dissenting minister, 1719-93
 Knight, William, Bishop of Bath and Wells, 1547
 Knight, Rev. William, M.A., divine, fl. 1612
 Knight, Dr. William, natural philosopher, fl. 1834
 Knight, William Bruce, Dean of Llandaff, 1785-1845
 Knight, William Henry, painter, 1823-63
 (To be continued.)

MR. GLADSTONE'S MODEL LIBRARY.

EXPERIENCE is better than arithmetic; and it is obvious that if 1,000 volumes can be packed into a given space, 20,000 can be got into twenty times that space. Mr. Cowper Ranyard is mistaken in supposing that the books upon which my measurement was based are all small volumes, since very considerable allowance was made for folios and quartos. It is well to remember that a library of general literature is likely to occupy much less space than, for example, a collection of legal or scientific books. I gathered from Mr. Gladstone's paper in the Nineteenth Century that he was not speculating upon possibilities, but describing what he had actually done at Hawarden. If that be so, it settles the question. Perhaps Mr. Gladstone will be good enough to explain.

J. PENDEREL-BRODHURST.

MR. E. LLOYD.

THE death is announced, after a long illness, of Mr. Lloyd, the proprietor of Lloyd's News. Mr. Lloyd started in life with a comparatively slender education, but enormous energy and resource. At the age of sixteen he was already a publisher, and brought out 'Lloyd's Stenography,' a sixpenny handbook of his own compiling. He then began printing Lloyd's Weekly Miscellany and other papers. In 1842 he issued an unstamped penny illustrated paper, but the authorities at Somerset House interfered, and he had to submit to the stamp and charge twopence. This was the beginning of Lloyd's Weekly London Newspaper, now usually styled Lloyd's News. The illustrations were soon dropped, and the price raised to twopence halfpenny as the twopence did not pay. Ten years afterwards Mr. Lloyd secured the aid of Douglas Jerrold's popular name, and his paper became a distinct success, still further increased when, on the removal of the paper duty, he reduced the price to a penny, since which time it has attained an enormous circulation. His other great undertaking was the purchase of the Clerkenwell News and his conversion of it into the Daily Chronicle, an enterprise that would probably have failed in the hands of a man of less capital and energy, but was undertaken by Mr. Lloyd when he was over sixty years of age. Besides being a newspaper proprietor Mr. Lloyd was a large paper-maker, having mills at Sittingbourne doing a considerable trade in supplying other newspapers besides his own.

THE NEXT ORIENTAL CONGRESS.

A MEETING of the French supporters of the project for holding the ninth Oriental Congress in London in September, 1891, took place on the 31st of March in Paris. There were present the survivors of the "Commission Administrative" and of the permanent international committee founded in 1873, as also sixty signatories of the circular we published in our issue of the 14th of December last.

In an opening address Baron de Ravisy sketched the history of the Oriental Congress since 1873, and complained of the violation of its principles and statutes at the last meeting in Christiania. A detailed statement of these breaches and of the action proposed to be taken was read by M. Madier de Montjau, and a resolution was passed, on the proposal of Prof. Maspero, seconded by Dr. Hamy, both of the "Institut," declaring the formation and action of the committee nominated at Christiania illegal, and giving full powers and offers of co-operation to the English organizing committee for the London Congress, the resolutions of which of the 15th of January were ratified. Prof. J. Oppert was appointed president, and Prof. Maspero and the Marquis de Crozier vice-presidents, of the French National Committee, in union with the English and other committees in various countries. The French Committee, besides its general and executive functions, has special sections for (a) the Aryan languages, (b) Assyriology, (c) Egyptology, (d) Central Asia, (e) comparative philology, (f) comparative study of religions, (g) encouragement of Oriental studies, (h) summary of Oriental researches since 1886, (i) colonial linguistics, (j) Sinology, (k) Indo-Chinese studies, (l) Semitic languages, (m) Dravidian languages, and (n) directions to travellers. The committee had, therefore, to be a large one, and, like the English and other committees, will commence operations immediately, so that the supply of papers may not be left to chance. Dr. Leitner has been elected delegate and organizing secretary.

About three hundred Orientalists now form the nucleus of the Congress, but all interested in any branch of Oriental learning will be admitted to it. Cards of membership may be obtained from Messrs. Hachette, King William Street, Strand; M. Leroux, 28, Rue Bonaparte, Paris; from the delegates in various countries; and from the secretaries, Dr. Leitner and Prof. Douglas.

BISHOP CALLAWAY.

On the 26th of March Bishop Callaway breathed his last at Ottery St. Mary, in Devonshire. Dr. Tylor was able to be present at the funeral ceremony, and he thus represented a large body of warm admirers among students of folk-lore and anthropology, to whom the labours of Bishop Callaway in collecting information about the Zulus will remain of inestimable value.

There is much in the life of the deceased bishop which is typical of all that is best among our missionary clergymen, and we are glad to think that there is some chance of a memoir being published which will place before the public one of those biographies which make us understand how it is that Englishmen are able to penetrate to the four corners of the world. Born in 1817, on the 17th of January, Henry Callaway began his education at the grammar school at Crediton. Very early in life he had taken hold of the idea that he ought to be a missionary. Of a deeply religious turn of mind, he was much influenced by the tenets of the Quakers, and he joined the Society. It was then that he conceived that he had received a call to enter the medical profession, and he became a student at St. Bartholomew's, and afterwards practised in London. Rejoining the Church of England, he was influenced by the consecration of Dr. Colenso as Bishop of Natal, and the urgent need of mission assistance in the new diocese. Dr. Callaway offered himself at once, in obedience to his old feeling, and he was ordained at Norwich Cathedral on the 13th of August, 1854. At once sailing for his new home, he began that life among the natives which has made his name a household word in South Africa.

His idea of duty led him to study the Kaffir language, the beliefs and traditions, and the laws and customs of the people. In 1868 he published the first volume of his 'Nursery Tales, Traditions, and Histories of the Zulus,' and in 1870

'The Religious System of the Amazulu.' Very little success attended these publications at first, and, except to the small band of folk-lorists then existing, they were for some time not generally known in England. This want of appreciation led to their remaining in their present incomplete state. Of the first publication no more has been issued than the first volume; of the second three parts only have appeared. Both are now exceedingly scarce. Materials for continuing these important works have been left in the hands of a friend in South Africa, and it is to be hoped that they will find their way to this country, so that they may be printed forthwith. In the mean time the annotated copies, full of MS. notes on native customs and beliefs, and on parallel European traditions and customs illustrative of points in the printed text, were handed over last year to the writer of this memoir, with a view of bringing out a new edition with the additional material.

The value of these collections of native Zulu traditions and customs has long been admitted. In December, 1880, Bishop Callaway was present at a meeting of the Folk-lore Society, when Mr. John Fenton gave a paper on the story of the Zulu god Unkulunkulu, and Dr. Tylor then drew from the bishop that his remaining unpublished MS. consisted of the charms of the Zulus, which he hoped in course of time to publish. Ill health prevented the accomplishment of this task, and in 1885 the bishop generously gave to the Folk-lore Society all the unsold copies of his two works. The society added an index to the volume on the 'Religious System of the Amazulu,' and in this form issued it to their members.

Dr. Callaway published, besides these books, several tracts on native history—'Some Remarks on the Zulu Language' in 1870, 'Polygamy' in 1882, and 'Religious Sentiment among the Tribes in South Africa' (undated), being the most interesting. His summary of native laws and customs, printed in the Report of the Government Commission in 1883, is a good example of his careful and correct information, while the view he took of the question of polygamy in relation to the conversion of the natives to Christianity was at once broad and religious.

It was during last summer that the writer of these memorial lines first had the pleasure of seeing Bishop Callaway in his home at Waddon. It was easy to see that all the best of his life had been spent over his duty in South Africa, and that he had returned to his native land to die. But his natural cheerfulness and the abiding interest he still possessed for the native folk-lore lent a charm to the two or three interviews which even the great shadow of death could not quite obliterate. He removed to Devonshire shortly afterwards, and the paralysis from which he suffered made this his last home on earth.

Literary Crossip.

MR. GLADSTONE, at the invitation of the editor (Mr. Thos. Catling), has just written a lengthy article for Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper. It deals with the social progress of the people—presenting a review of the past, a study of the present, and a hopeful anticipation of the future of labour. After maintaining its present form for forty-seven years, Lloyd's is about to be enlarged; and Mr. Gladstone's article will be the first of a series of contributions by leading writers.

MR. H. D. TRAILL is about to publish with Messrs. W. H. Allen & Co., under the title of 'Saturday Songs,' a selection from the political verse contributed by him in the course of the last few years to the Saturday Review.

WE regret to record the death of Mr. Henry Campkin, F.S.A., last Sunday, in his seventy-fifth year. Mr. Campkin was librarian of the Reform Club for upwards of thirty years, and the excellence of that large collection of books is due to the intelligent way in which Mr. Campkin followed the plan laid down for its formation by Sir Anthony Panizzi, one of the early members of the club. Owing to impaired health, Mr. Campkin had to retire about ten years ago, when he was succeeded by Mr. Charles W. Vincent. The committee then appointed him honorary librarian, with full salary, in consideration of his long and efficient service. A privately printed account of 'Grub Street' is one of Mr. Campkin's contributions to literature.

MR. LILLY's new volume, which we mentioned last week, will consist of ten chapters entitled: The Crisis of Ethics, Materialistic Ethics, Evolutionary Ethics, National Ethics, The Ethics of Punishment, The Ethics of Politics, The Ethics of Journalism, The Ethics of Property, The Ethics of Marriage, and The Ethics of Art. We were mistaken in saying last week that it consisted largely of articles reprinted from the magazines. The author has, indeed, drawn in the earlier part from four articles he has contributed to the Fortnightly, and a portion of the latter pages of the book has appeared in the United States; but the book was planned some considerable time ago as an organic whole. It is intended to treat a practical subject in a practical way, suited to intelligent men of the world. The volume is dedicated to Canon Creighton.

WE are sorry to hear that Mr. Edwin Waugh, the Lancashire poet, is seriously indisposed. Some time ago he underwent two operations.

HEREFORD CATHEDRAL SCHOOL claims to be the oldest grammar school in the country. It was in existence before Winchester and Eton had been founded, and must have done good work in its time. Yet the authorities, who have lately blazoned two tablets erected in its library with the names of its distinguished alumni, have produced a somewhat meagre list of great names. The ten men whom the school delights to honour begin with Miles Smith, reviser of the Bible 1611; he is followed by Gwillim the herald, Howell the letter-writer, and Lane the Orientalist. The rest it was perhaps needless to immortalize, and the list ends with the name of F. E. Weatherly, who is described as a poet. Apotheosis seems to have been granted on liberal terms. It must surprise many to find the late Mr. J. M. Herbert, county court judge, upon these records of fame; while Archdeacon Garbett, of Chichester, would have been amazed at joining the ranks of the immortals.

THE volumes of transcripts and abstracts in the Public Record Office which have been sent from the Vatican archives and other places in Rome are now more than a hundred in number, and contain about 25,000 items from A.D. 1066 to 1700. Fetter Lane is not inaccessible, and some students of history find their way there, but it is chiefly in France and Germany that documents from the Vatican are being printed.

IN 1891 Mrs. R. N. Crawshaw will offer, besides her annual prizes (amounting to 70l.)

for essays on Byron, Shelley, and Keats, additional prizes for oil and water-colour paintings of incidents in the lives of the poets. Those women who desire to compete should send an addressed halfpenny wrapper to Mrs. Crawshaw, Cathedine, Bwlch, Breconshire. It will be remembered that two years ago on the 19th of April, being the anniversary of Lord Byron's death and the centenary of his birth, the trust deed was signed by Mr. W. M. Rossetti, President of the Shelley Society; Mr. A. Spokes, of Pump Court; Mr. C. Hancock, of Queen's Gate; and by herself, endowing her prizes to the amount of 2,500l.

The old-established publishing and book-selling business of Messrs. MacLachlan & Stewart, of Edinburgh, has been wound up, and the copyrights, goodwill, &c., have been acquired by their near neighbour Mr. James Thin.

By the death of Mr. A. B. McGlashen, of the firm of Messrs. A. & C. Black, which took place at his house in Edinburgh on Sunday last, a well-known figure in the bookselling trade has passed away. It is now twenty-six years since Mr. McGlashen entered the employment of Messrs. Black, and for many years he has represented them in this country, on the Continent, in America, and in the colonies. He had a large experience in the bookselling trade, especially with regard to the relations between booksellers and publishers, and with the former he was very popular. The firm held him in high esteem, and about twelve months ago he was made a partner. Mr. McGlashen was a man of powerful physique, and had hitherto uniformly enjoyed robust health. About two months ago, however, he fell a victim to the prevailing epidemic of influenza, from which he was recovering when he was attacked by pleurisy, and succumbed after an illness of five weeks.

MR. EDWARD ARNOLD will publish immediately 'Egyptian Sketches,' being a record of several months' residence in Egypt last winter by Mr. J. Lynch, formerly President of the Californian Geographical Society and member of the State Senate.

MESSRS. METHUEN will shortly publish 'An Industrial History of England,' by Mr. H. de B. Gibbins, late Scholar of Wadham College. The book will aim at giving a concise account of the industrial development of England, with references to its connexion with politics and social movements, suitable for general readers and for those who have not time to study the subject in larger volumes. It will contain maps of England at various periods, representing the distribution of population and manufactures, &c. This volume will form the first of a series which Messrs. Methuen have in preparation of handbooks on subjects historical, literary, and economic, designed to meet the wants of University Extension students and home reading circles.

A NEW studio is being erected at 13, Kensington Square for the students of the Ladies' Department of King's College, as their number has much increased of late. It will be opened at the commencement of the Easter Term on April 21st. The Bedford College has also been enlarged by the addition of a new wing.

THE Dublin Union has been amalgamated with the London Conservative paper England. In future they will be known as England and the Union, with a special Irish edition. Mr. Philip H. Bagenal, author of 'Parnellism Unveiled,' 'The American Irish and their Influence on Irish Politics,' &c., has taken up the editorship of the new paper.

At the next meeting of the Library Association (to be held at the new rooms of the Association, No. 20, Hanover Square, on Monday, at 8 P.M.) Sir John Lubbock's Bill for amending the Public Libraries Acts will be discussed.

MISS ANNIE SWAN's story, 'A Vexed Inheritance,' which is now going through the press serially, will be published in volume form by Messrs. Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.

MR. FROWDE writes:—

"In speaking in the last issue of your journal of a new edition of Schiller's 'Wilhelm Tell,' you describe Dr. Buchheim's edition of that drama 'as being suitable for pupils who simply want to pass elementary examinations.' This can refer to Dr. Buchheim's 'school edition' only of Schiller's play. I trust, therefore, that you will allow me to remind you that Dr. Buchheim also has a large edition of 'Wilhelm Tell,' provided with full biographical and critical introductions and an elaborate commentary, upon which, by-the-by, you bestowed the highest praise at the time of its publication."

We were quite aware of the existence of the larger edition, but there was no necessity to mention it.

L'ABBÉ BATIFFOL, of Paris, has just discovered in a manuscript in the National Library the Greek original of the apocryphal 'Ascensio Isaie,' which was only known from the Ethiopic version edited by Prof. Dilmann. The Abbé proposes to publish this Greek text in one of the fasciculi of his 'Studia Patristica,' the first of which contains the 'Prayers of Aseneth.'

DR. JOHANN BERNOULLI, of Bâle, was sent to Rome in the autumn of 1888 to make researches in the Vatican Library for documents bearing upon the history of the city of Bâle. Bâle is the first of the Swiss cantons which has availed itself of the liberality with which the present Pope has opened the Vatican Library to historical students. The results of Dr. Bernoulli's labour will be found in the first volume of the new 'Urkundenbuch.' He found the documents expressly relating to Bâle to be fewer than he had expected; but as he examined and noted down as many as seven hundred, up to the pontificate of Clement IV., relating to Switzerland, and of great importance to the elucidation of the history of the Swiss Federation, he is particularly anxious that the Swiss Federal Council should appoint a commission to examine and report upon the Swiss documents in the Vatican. He states that they are rich in illustration of the morals of the clergy, the rise and progress of the mendicant orders, the conflict over celibacy, the legitimization of the children of priests, the history of local heresies, and the "literally countless endeavours for ecclesiastical reform."

DR. F. W. ROTH, of Wiesbaden, announces his discovery of three remarkable treasures during his researches in a private collection: (1) "four folio sheets, in a manuscript of the eleventh century, of the beginnings of Book XVIII. and Book XIX. of the history of T. Livius Patavinus"; (2) detached fragments of a fourteenth century edition of the 'Rolandslied,' by "the Pfaffen Kvonrad"; (3) fragments of a hitherto unknown edition by Gutenberg of the 'Euriolus and Lucretia.' It is either an Entville or Mainz impression in the types of the 'Katholikon.' Dr. Roth will give a full account of his finds in forthcoming numbers of two philological serials.

DR. L. BÜCHNER, the author of 'Kraft und Stoff,' will shortly issue a new work, entitled 'Fremdes und Eigenes aus dem Leben der Gegenwart.' The book will treat of Spinoza, Diderot, Schopenhauer, &c., and of several great problems of our time, including the utopian 'Völkerfrieden.' In an appendix the author will describe a visit to Darwin.

PROF. RAMKRISHNA GOPAL BHANDARKAR has undertaken the translation of the 'Vāyu Purāṇa' for Prof. Max Müller's "Sacred Books of the East."

MRS. ALEXANDER IRELAND's life of Mrs. Carlyle is to be published in the autumn. Some of the letters inserted will be given in facsimile.

THE Bookseller accompanies its account of the trade dinner held last month with a number of excellent likenesses of the chief persons present. It also gives a capital portrait of Mr. John Murray, the venerable president of the Booksellers' Provident Institution.

THE chief Parliamentary Papers of the week are Educational Endowments, Scotland, Seventh Report of the Commission (2d.); General Abstract of Marriages, Births, and Deaths for England, 1889 (1d.); and, of the Colonial Possessions series, the Reports on Ceylon (2d.) and Fiji (2d.).

SCIENCE

PHYSICIANS IN OLDEN TIMES.

4, South Street, Park Lane, W., April 2, 1890.

IS MR. Gladstone quite right in his account of the position of physicians in older days? In a large collection of old letters belonging to Sir Harry Verney, Dr. Mayerne, of the time of Charles I., is spoken of with the utmost consideration. It is true he was physician to the queen, but long after Henrietta Maria had retired to St. Germain and it was not a road to honour to belong to the court of poor Charles, Dr. Mayerne keeps his most honourable position in London.

In June, 1647, Lady Verney writes to her husband, "Dr. Mayerne's daughter, they say, is the greatest match in London"; and this at a time when rank and birth had still very great influence. F. P. VERNEY.

ASTRONOMICAL NOTES.

DR. BIDSCHOF, of the Imperial Observatory, Vienna, has computed the orbit of Brooks's comet (α , 1890), which will reach its perihelion about the beginning of June, at the distance from the sun of 1.87 in terms of the earth's mean distance. It is still approaching the earth, but its brightness will not be twice as great as it was at the time of discovery until the 23rd inst. Describing its appearance as seen at the Paris Observatory on the 28th ult., M. Bigourdan says: "La comète est une nébulosité ronde, de 40" à 50" de diamètre, avec condensation centrale assez prononcée, mais non stellaire"; and adds to a star

We of several near well known the scilicet the B. invest called which Erde Cir vatory lines that the v

GEORGE in the Brow D. D. were tions from Miss Hugh from Mr. I. (Poly G. R. — and clacit U.S.A. mian shire

BR 2.—M the a to co Mr. exhi which ram refer Brit state one Alle which It is scro som thet er cross R. C. rub der site gas chu this wit cha read by in t we far not ent of to cip tion up of the no ext sev

Go A. St. M. Go W. be Sh sp ric adds that its brightness is comparable to that of a star of the tenth magnitude.

We regret to announce the death, at the age of seventy-one, of M. Montigny, of Schaerbeek, near Brussels, on the 16th ult. His name is well known to astronomers for his researches on the scintillation of the stars, which were published from time to time in the Proceedings of the Brussels Academy. For the purpose of these investigations he devised a new instrument, called the scintillometer, the construction of which is described in the number of Himmel und Erde for last January.

Circular No. 26 of the Wokingham Observatory (Rev. T. E. Espin) states that "bright lines were seen in the spectrum of θ as well as in that of θ Orionis on March 26th," and adds that similar lines were suspected also in that of the variable star S Coronæ.

SOCIETIES.

GEOLOGICAL.—March 26.—Mr. J. W. Hulke, V.P., in the chair.—Messrs. I. Ashmore, D. Balfour, A. Brown, E. H. Davies, E. Greenly, J. Macpherson, D. D. Rosewarne, W. I. Thomas, and D. Tyack were elected Fellows.—The following communications were read: 'On a New Species of Cyphaspid from the Carboniferous Rocks of Yorkshire,' by Miss Coignou, communicated by Prof. T. McK. Hughes; 'On Composite Spherulites in Obsidian from Hot Springs, near Little Lake California,' by Mr. F. Rutley; 'A Monograph of the Bryozoa (Polyzoa) of the Hunstanton Red Chalk,' by Mr. G. R. Vine, communicated by Prof. P. M. Duncan; and 'Evidence furnished by the Quaternary Glacial-Epoch Moraine Deposits of Pennsylvania, U.S.A., for a Similar Mode of Formation of the Permian Breccias of Leicestershire and South Derbyshire,' by Mr. William S. Gresley.

BRITISH ARCHEOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION.—April 2.—Mr. J. W. Grover in the chair.—The progress of the arrangements for holding the congress at Oxford, to commence on the 7th of July, was detailed.—Mr. Loftus Brock, to illustrate Mr. Cart's lecture, exhibited a copy of Le Bruin's 'Travels in the East,' which contains curious seventeenth century panoramas of Smyrna and other places which were referred to.—The Chairman described two gold British coins, the obverse being imitations of the staters of Philip of Macedon, and the reverse of one of the coins a plain convex surface.—Mr. R. Allen described a remarkable base of a stone cross which exists in the churchyard at Rastrick, Yorks. It is covered with late Saxon interlaced work and scroll patterns of the same period, but very like some decorations of the thirteenth century. While there are many remains of the shafts of Saxon crosses, the bases do not frequently occur.—Rev. R. G. Irving, Vicar of Rastrick, exhibited full-sized rubbings of the ornamentation.—Mr. R. Peters rendered a description of further discoveries on the site of Launceston Priory, where to erect a new gasometer the site of the chapel of the priory church was excavated. The plans exhibited show this to have been 66 ft. long from east to west within the walls, and 19 ft. wide. There are transept chapels to the west of the chapel.—A paper was read on Gokewell Nunnery, Lincolnshire, prepared by Mr. E. Peacock, and read by Mr. de Gray Birch in the author's absence. The buildings stood to the west of the village of Broughton, on a site where a farmhouse now exists, but the remains which were noted in the seventeenth century have been entirely swept away, and the site has been a matter of conjecture.—Rev. H. Cart described his journey to Smyrna and Ephesus, when he visited the principal remains, and found that Mr. Wood's excavations of the temple of Ephesus were getting covered up, and will soon be difficult to trace. A fine series of photographs were exhibited, and also one of the supposed columns from the Temple of Diana, now in St. Sophia, Constantinople.—Mr. G. Patrick exhibited an Ionic volute which he found at Ephesus several years ago.

ENTOMOLOGICAL.—April 2.—Mr. F. Du Cane-Godman, V.P., in the chair.—Messrs. G. Bryant, A. E. Hall, J. J. F. X. King, H. C. Oakshot, A. E. Stearns, and G. Vigers were elected Fellows; and Mr. A. B. Farn was admitted into the Society.—Mr. Godman announced the death of Dr. J. S. Baly, of Warwick, the well-known coleopterist, who had been a member of the Society for forty years.—Dr. Sharp exhibited and made remarks on a female specimen of a coleopterous insect, Tymnochila quadricollis, Reitt, which was the subject of an unusual malformation of the nature termed ectromélie by

Lacordaire.—Mr. R. W. Lloyd exhibited three specimens of Elater pomona recently taken at Brockenhurst.—Col. Swinhoe exhibited and read notes on a number of butterflies of the genus Euthalia. He pointed out that the specimens described as a species under the name of E. sedera were only the females of E. balarama.—Mr. T. R. Billups exhibited male and female specimens of a species of Cecidomyia recently bred from galls received from Colorado. He also exhibited three species of Ichneumonidae new to Britain, and lately described by Mr. J. B. Bridgman in the Transactions of the Society.—Mr. C. G. Barrett exhibited specimens of Bryotropha obscurilla, Hein, and Doryphora elongella, Hein, two species of Micro-Lepidoptera new to Britain.—Dr. Thallwitz contributed 'Notes on some Species of the Genus Hilipus,'—Mr. E. Meyrick read a paper 'On the Classification of the Pyralidina of the European Fauna,' which gave rise to a discussion in which Capt. Elwes and Messrs. Kirby, McLachlan, Stainton, and Barrett took part.—Prof. Westwood contributed a paper entitled 'Notes on Certain Species of Cetonidae.'—Mynheer P. C. T. Snellen communicated a paper entitled 'A Catalogue of the Pyralidae of Sikkim collected by H. J. Elwes and the late O. Möller,' and Capt. Elwes read some supplementary notes to the foregoing paper.—Mr. W. L. Distant, Col. Swinhoe, Mr. McLachlan, and Herr Jacoby took part in the discussion which ensued.

ZOOLOGICAL.—April 1.—Dr. A. Günther, V.P., in the chair.—The Secretary read a report on the additions to the menagerie during March, and called special attention to a fine example of a rare passerine bird (Hypocolius amplinus) from Karachi, and to two Manchurian cranes (Grus viridirostris).—Mr. W. B. Tegetmeier exhibited a specimen of a Greek partridge shot in the Rhone Valley, and of an abnormal viper.—Mr. J. H. Gurney, jun., exhibited and made remarks on an hybrid between the tree-sparrow (Passer montanus) and the house-sparrow (P. domesticus), bred in captivity at Norwich.—And Mr. A. Smith-Woodward exhibited a specimen of a mesozoic palæoniscid fish from New South Wales, and pointed out that the structure of its pelvic fins seemed to confirm the recent opinion that the Palæoniscidae are related to the Acipenseridae and not to the Lepidosteidae. The author believed the specimen exhibited to be the only one of the kind in existence.—Mr. C. M. Woodford made some remarks on the fauna of the Solomon Islands, and exhibited a large number of photographs.—Communications were read: from Dr. R. W. Shufeldt, on Heloderma suspectum, containing a complete account of the osteology and anatomy of this venomous lizard, and a list of the literature on the subject,—by Dr. A. Günther, on a new species of deep-sea fish from the Cape (Lophotes fixii), based on a specimen sent to the British Museum by the Rev. G. H. R. Fisk,—and by Mr. E. A. Smith, on the marine molluscan fauna of the Island of St. Helena (based principally on a series of specimens collected by Capt. Turton), and on the marine mollusca of Ascension Island.

ROYAL INSTITUTION.—April 7.—Sir J. C. Browne, Treas. and V.P. in the chair.—Major-General C. V. Webber, C.B., Major P. A. Macmahon, Mrs. Joseph Shaw, Miss May Pollock, Messrs. A. E. Ash, R. Dobbie, and W. S. Hall were elected Members.

INSTITUTION OF CIVIL ENGINEERS.—April 1.—Sir J. Coode, President, in the chair.—It was announced that three Associate Members had been transferred to the class of Members and twelve Students had been admitted.—The monthly ballot resulted in the election of six Members, thirty-five Associate Members, and one Associate.—The paper read was 'On the Barry Dock Works, including the Hydraulic Machinery and the Mode of tipping Coal,' by Mr. J. Robinson.

MATHEMATICAL.—April 3.—Mr. J. J. Walker, President, in the chair.—Mr. E. J. B. Smith was elected a Member.—The following communications were made: 'On the Properties of some Circles connected with a Triangle formed by Circular Arcs,' by Mr. Lachlan, 'Some Properties of Numbers,' by Mr. Christie, and 'The Modular Equations for $n=17, 29$,' by Mr. R. Russell, communicated by Prof. Greenhill.

ARISTOTELIAN.—March 31.—Mr. S. H. Hodgson, President, in the chair.—Mr. R. J. Ryle and Mr. D. Sutcliffe were elected Members.—Mr. H. W. Blunt read a paper 'On the Philosophy of Herbert of Cherbury.' There is a harmonic or analogical correspondence of our faculties with things, but our truth is not itself the truth of things. Our truth is (1) of appearance, (2) of conception, (3) of that which organizes and judges of these, intellect. Intellect must infer rightly from right premises and can correct those which are wrong. Ultimate true premises are common notions not derived from experience, but given by natural instinct. These notions are made explicit by a method of interrogation based on a novel system of categories, and are verified, chiefly, by the consensus of all sane men. Applying this metaphysics to religion, Herbert establishes as common notions five catholic articles, which comprise monotheism—for ancient polytheism was symbolic—and personal immortality. The world is likened to a musical instrument where men must discern the single design of the maker and performer. Herbert's rationalism has in it no trace of pantheism, but he does not admit an evil principle.—The paper was followed by a discussion.

SHORTHAND.—April 2.—Mr. A. B. Sparkhall in the chair.—Mr. A. James read a paper 'On Clarkson's Shorthand.' Mr. Clarkson was for forty years on the reporting staff of the Daily News, and used a system of his own, the alphabet of which was compounded partly from Taylor and partly from Lewis. The double and treble consonant signs and the methods of abbreviation were for the most part his own. Mr. Clarkson died a few months since, but left his system in manuscript, from which Mr. James, one of his professional colleagues, compiled a description for the Society. Mr. Clarkson used three positions for grammalogues—above the line for words containing i as their first vowel, on the line for a and e, and below the line for o, u, and ou. A number of alphabetical arbitraries were obtained by the use of auxiliary dots and ticks for differentiation.—Mr. James also gave a brief account of his third edition of 'Shorthand without Complications' and of his 'Universal Cipher.'

MEETINGS FOR THE ENSUING WEEK.

- Mon. Society of Engineers, 7½.—Weighing Machinery and Automatic Apparatus in Connection Therewith, Mr. H. B. Brothers.
- Institute of British Architects, 8.
- Victoria Institute, 8.
- Aristotelian, 8.—'Beauty,' Rev. P. N. Waggott.
- Surveyors' Institution, 8.—Adjourned discussion on Mr. T. W. Wheeler's paper.
- Geographical, 8½.—'Journey to the Summit of Kilimanjaro,' Dr. H. Meyer.
- Tue. Royal Institution, 3.—'The Place of Oxford University in English History,' Hon. G. C. Brodrick.
- Society of Architects, 7½.
- Colonial Institute, 8.
- Civil Engineers, 8.—'Application of Electricity to Welding, Stamping, and other Cognate Purposes,' Sir F. Bramwell.
- Society of Arts, 8.—'Modern Indian Art,' Mr. C. F. Clarke.
- Zoological, 8½.—'New Fishes from the English Wealden and Furber Beds, referable to the genera Oligosaurus, Strobilodus, and Mosodon,' Mr. A. Smith-Woodward; 'Second Report on the Additions to the Batrachian Collection in the Natural History Museum,' Mr. G. A. Boulenger; 'The Structure of Protophys, and on its Relations to other Birds,' Mr. F. E. B. dard; 'A Remarkable Antler from Asia Minor,' Mr. R. Lydekker.
- Wed. Meteorological, 7.—'The Cold Period at the beginning of March, 1880,' Mr. C. Harding; 'Note on the Whitewind which occurred at Fultord, near York, March 8th 1900,' Mr. J. E. Clark; 'Possibility of Forecasting the Weather by means of Monthly Averages,' Mr. A. E. Watson; 'Rainfall of the Globe,' Mr. W. B. Trapp.
- Microscopical, 8.—'Freshwater Algae of North Wales,' Mr. W. West; 'The State in which Water exists in Live Protozoa,' Mr. M. M. Hartog.
- Geological, 8.—'Notes on some of the Palæozoic Rocks of North-Western Germany,' Prof. A. von Könen; 'Origin of the Basins of the Great American Lakes,' Dr. J. W. Spencer; 'Ornithosaurian Remains from the Oxford Clay of Northampton,' Mr. R. Lydekker; 'Certain Physical Phenomena exhibited by the so-called "Salted Branches" of Hope's Nose and the Thatcher Rock, Devon,' Mr. D. Pidgeon; 'Notes on a "Wash-out" found in the Fleasier and Teverall Collieries, Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire,' Mr. J. C. B. Hendy.
- Society of Arts, 8.—'Old and New Fashions in Typography,' Mr. T. B. Reed.
- British Archaeological Association, 8.—'Excavation of the Site of Vinium, Durham,' Rev. Dr. Hoopell; 'Byzantine's Castle, and Antiquities found on the Site, 1889-90,' Mr. J. H. MacMichael.
- THURS. Royal Institution, 3.—'Heat of the Moon and Stars,' Prof. C. V. Boys (Tyndall Lecture).
- Archaeological Institute, 4.—'Sixth Centenary of Dante's Birth,' Miss R. H. Bank; 'Bells: their History, Use, and Inscriptions,' Mr. J. J. Doherty; 'Roman Inscriptions found in Britain,' Mr. F. Haverfield.
- Royal, 4½.
- Numismatic, 7.
- Antiquaries, 8½.
- Historical, 8½.—'The King's House: a Retrospect from Burke's Act,' Mr. J. Hall.
- FRI. Royal Institution, 8.—'Welding by Electricity,' Sir F. Bramwell.
- Philological, 8.—'English Etymologies,' Rev. Prof. Skeat.
- SAT. Royal Institution, 3.—'Colour and its Chemical Action,' Capt. Abney.

FINE ARTS

THE TUDOR EXHIBITION, NEW GALLERY.
(Fifth and Concluding Notice.)

THE very fine and well-preserved portrait of Mary Hungerford, Baroness Hastings (No. 32), is by a Fleming of the early school, trained to draw with scientific care and able to work with delicate precision and exemplary neatness. She wears a white close coif, such as Quentin Matsys and his contemporaries delighted to paint, on her shoulders a pinner, while she holds a rosary of coral. As the lady became a widow in 1507, this picture must, if it really represents her, which we doubt, have been painted about that date. It was No. 66 at the National Portrait Exhibition, 1886, and was, as indeed it is now, one of the best works of art in the gallery.

No. 101, Henry VIII. and his Family, is an extremely curious picture, depicting a sort of corridor wainscotted in dark oak with richly carved panels, and detached columns decorated with arabesques in real gold, after that English mode of painting which is exemplified in 'Sir H. Guldeford' (90), 'Sir T. More' (94), and many earlier examples. Real gold is also seen on the dresses of the royal personages. Henry VIII. is seated on his chair of state, Katherine Parr seated on his left. The king's right hand rests on the shoulder of Prince Edward, then about nine years of age; the Princess Elizabeth, then fourteen years old, stands with a demure air apart on our right, while her sister Mary, thirty years old, is standing equally apart, on the opposite side. Each damsel looks reserved and dignified, and stands with her hands clasped before her. Mary looks younger than she should, Elizabeth older. The queen is, of course, well advanced in life, and she looks less comely than she really did; her hair is the same as in the 'Look of Queen Katherine Parr's Hair,' taken from her grave at Sudeley, which has been shamelessly violated over and over again (see 882-7, lent by Mrs. Dent). Naturally, she wears the Gothic headdress of an earlier period than c. 1547, when this picture was painted. Although he was only fifty-six years old, the harsh aspect of the king is accentuated by suffering and time. Very curious are the superb dresses and decorations, the marbles of the quaint pavement, the bright glimpses of the garden behind, and its formal parterres railed in with poles painted in spiral ribbons of brown and white, decked with slender pedestals on which are placed the statuettes of heraldic beasts grasping vases. The front of a building beyond the garden is enriched with pargetted patterns in scrolls such as we see to this day in parts of Kent. This picture is in its original frame. Although it has been conjecturally ascribed to G. Stretes, we may be quite certain it is not by the artist of the 'Earl of Surrey' (73), which has been guessed to be Stretes's simply because an order of the Privy Council commanded a picture of that unfortunate peer to be "fetched from the said Guillim's house." The building before us quite agrees with the descriptions of Nonsuch, begun for Henry VIII. by Toto del Nunziata. The Duke of Saxe Weimar, who saw it in 1613, Pepys, 1665, and Evelyn, 1666, all agree that it was "elegantly adorned with plaster-work" (pargetting) representing "histories." As this picture is not mentioned by Sir A. Denny in the catalogue of Henry VIII.'s collection, we may conclude it was not painted for him. In 1639 it had passed to Whitehall, where Charles I.'s Keeper of the Pictures described it as in the Privy Gallery, being "Item. No. 56. A Whitehall piece, on board. A long piece painted with gold, where King Henry VIII. sits with his Queen, and his son Prince Edward on the right side, and his two daughters, Queen Mary and Queen Elizabeth, standing at each side; and a fool at the left side in the door with a jackanapes on his shoulder, and on the other side a waiting-woman, little intire figures. 10 f. 0. 6 f. 0." The picture is on canvas, not on a panel. The fool and the waiting-woman are in the example before us, which, with the rest of Charles's collections, was sold October 27th, 1649. Col. Wells bought it for 15*l*. It was No. 532 in the collection of James II. Wornum suggested that it is a picture made up, perhaps, by Lucas de Heere for Queen Mary or Queen Elizabeth. This is by no means improbable, although one does not see why either of those queens should have desired to be painted alongside of Katherine Parr. Katherine Parr must be the queen depicted, as she was the only one who lived to see Edward grow up to be the boy here represented; yet it must be admitted that the face is quite as like Jane Seymour's, although that of a much older woman than she lived to be. The theory that it is a compilation from older portraits enables any one to account for the discrepancies of the ages of the ladies to which we have referred. Of course there is no warrant, technical, chronological, or historical, for ascribing this picture to Holbein, as some old catalogues (not Vander Doort's or Chiffinch's) have done.

It is not necessary to believe that Antonio More painted the curious, but clumsy and weak-kneed allegory Henry VIII. and his Family (158), which Mrs. Dent has generously lent. Who painted the capital Lady Anne Heneage (166), daughter of Sir Nicholas Poyntz, of Iron Acton (whom Holbeindrew—see Nos. 493 and 500—and, as we have already said, painted as No. 79 before us), we do not know. It belongs to Mr. C. Butler, and is an almost charming example of a class many ascribe to P. Pourbus. When in the possession of Mr. C. Wynne Finch it was No. 650 in the National Portrait Exhibition, 1868. The hood is not necessarily that of a widow, as stated in the Catalogue before us.

The Merchant Taylors were ill advised to call their admirable version of Henry VIII. with a Scroll (120) a Paris Bordone! It was hardly more rash to attribute its duplicate, or original, No. 563 at Hampton Court, to "Holbein or Janet." We are inclined to agree with Wornum, who ascribed it to an Italian painter, rather than with Dr. Woltmann, who attributes it to a Frenchman. The close-cut hair—it is a light golden brown in the picture—puts the date somewhere about 1535, when the king issued an order that all about his court should adopt this fashion. Henry was then forty-four years of age, while the Henry of this portrait is a man certainly not more than thirty-five. It is admitted that the Hampton Court version makes him look older. The inscription on the paper held by the king in each picture is a verse from Mark xvi., and this agrees very well with the date c. 1536, when Henry ordered the complete Bible to be placed in every church. No. 120 attracts the visitor by its pure and bright flesh and an animated and genial expression—very different indeed from that of the cartoon, No. 42, lent by Lord Hartington, and certainly due to the year 1537, which shows a worn and much older face enclosed by dense whiskers and a short beard of a very different nature from the whiskers and beard in No. 120, which are almost downy. The voluptuous lips of a bright red, the plump contours and clear blue eyes, add to the charm of this portrait, while they increase the difficulty of accepting it as a picture of the year of Anne Boleyn's death. In short, that is simply out of the question.

The portrait (123), by an anonymous artist, inscribed "Le Lempereur de Spayne"—a highly questionable legend—and lent by the Duke of Manchester, is not in the least like the well-known face of Charles V., but not unlike Henri IV. of France. The Portrait of a Man (124), which Mr. Boyce ascribes to that little-known painter Jan Joest (or Joosten) van Calcar, was No. 153 at the Academy in 1880, when it bore no painter's name. It is a fine head, treated with much pathos and rare skill in the manner of Van Cleve and approximating to the technique of Q. Matsys, but it shows greater softness and less vigour. We do not recognize in these qualities the technical qualities which most critics ascribe to the artist whose existing masterpiece is the wings of the magnificent retable in the church of St. Nicholas at Calcar, which distinctly refer to Memline's art for their type, some Italian influence being infused. Least of all is there any room for ascribing Mr. Boyce's valuable picture to the delicate-handed artist who painted the little 'Madonna and Child' at Ince Blundell Hall, which is not unfairly ascribed to Jan van Eyck, and was mentioned in 'The Private Collections of England: No. LXXVI. Ince Blundell Hall' (Athen., Oct. 6th, 1883). It was at the Academy in 1884. In no sense are the works of the painter of this Madonna and No. 124 before us alike; while it is an abuse of terms to say that the same hand produced the semi-Gothic Memline-like 'Madonna,' the Matsys-like picture before us, and the Italianized wings of the retable of St. Nicholas's. Jan Joest van Calcar (it is by no means certain there were not more than one painter so designated) was the subject of that stupendous blunder of Van Mander which made him the same as Jan Stevens van Calcar (1499-1546), an able pupil of Titian, whose admirable portraits are sometimes not unreasonably ascribed to his great master, and whose fate it has been to be confounded with all sorts of folks. The real Simon Pure is fairly supposed to have been born, probably at Haarlem or Calcar in Cleves, about 1463, and to have executed the pictures inside the wings of the St. Nicholas altarpiece between 1505 and 1508, while he resided in the house of the widow of a judge named Van den Berg; in the latter year he purchased the rights of citizenship at Calcar, which place he seems to have quitted a short time after. One Jan Joosten was in 1508 commissioned to paint certain still existing wooden statues in St. Bavon's at Haarlem, where in the register of the church the same person is finally mentioned thus: "Anno 1519. Item jan joosten scylder [painter] is begraven in de Kerck, dat opdoen van zijn graff, xxst." There is not enough evidence to prove that these John Jameses of Calcar and of Haarlem were the same person.

Very interesting is the Duke of Northumberland's Edward VI. as a Child (189), in a red dress standing upon a green cloth. It is inscribed with the verses borne by Lord Yarborough's very beautiful No. 174. No. 189 was engraved by Hollar, when it was in the Arundel Collection, and by Thane, and is doubtless Holbein's New Year's gift to Henry VIII.—see our second notice of this exhibition, p. 122, where we have suggested that the duke's portrait may be the one Evelyn saw at Sir W. Ducie's in 1649. A curious portrait of King Edward, "to be discerned only by the reflection of a cylindric mirror," and therefore, of course, an anamorphosis, has disappeared from the picture, which is mentioned among the paintings in store at Somerset Place, and was probably that seen by P. Hentzner, 1598, although he says nothing about a mirror, and remarks that the portrait is to be seen "by looking through a small hole in the cover which is put over it." It appears again in King James's catalogue as "No. 969, 'Prince Edward's Head in Perspective.'"

The portrait of the Duchess of Somerset (195) is a good example of the old Flemish school, painted in a manner not unlike Holbein's, but thin and dry; the hands are inadequately treated. A well-known picture, the Earl of Ashburnham's Queen Mary (200), has, though the queen is young, lips that seem to be shut like a steel snap; the eyes have less of that "bothered" and despairing look, and more resolution, than appears in later portraits of this unhappy woman. The picture, especially in the dress, has been much repainted, and, like many ancient portraits, the whole is over-varnished as well as flat. Of course, it is a comparatively modern replica with variations of Lucas de Heere's Queen Mary (206), belonging to the Society of Antiquaries, dated 1554, and renowned through various learned dissertations. The Queen Mary (204) from Durham, ascribed to Sir A. More, is in his larger and earlier style, if really by him, and not by De Heere. Its animated air and features are full of attraction for the student.

We must pass numerous portraits deserving of attention, and only stop again before Col. Finch's capital Queen Mary (235), which, painted with admirable care and finish, renders most wonderfully an angry, stern, and peevish look, the counterpart of her father's in his later life, without his force and resolution. The pale and flaccid features are, like his, swollen with disease; the queen is old and shrivelled before her time. Lord Carlisle's Queen Mary (240) is also ascribed to Antonio More, but looks more like a Lucas de Heere: a capital picture, with a more gracious and contented expression than most portraits of Mary. The hands are very good, and distinguished by the four fingers being gracefully locked together. The slashed gown with puffs of white cambric "pulled through" is elaborately embroidered in vermilion after the old English fashion. The technique closely resembles that of the picture of Mary Magdalen at Althorp, which was lent (No. 183) to the National Portrait Exhibition in 1866 by Earl Spencer as a portrait of Lady Jane Grey, and is ascribed on reasonable grounds to Lucas de Heere. In some technical respects it reminds us of No. 206 and No. 204. It is even more like the famous and admirable De Heere lent by Col. Finch, Frances Brandon, Duchess of Suffolk, and her second husband, Adrian Stokes (255) (N.P.E. 1868, No. 644). The lady looks much older than the thirty-six years which the date on the picture assigns her. There is not the least flattery about the portrait, and it was painted "to the life." The portly duchess in 1555 married her comely Master of the Horse, who was twenty-one years old; and when Queen Elizabeth, speaking to Burleigh, said, "So she has married her horsekeeper, has she!" she roundly declared that "Her Majesty longs to do likewise" and marry Leicester. The picture, a group of two small half-length figures standing side by side, is a capital example of De Heere's best manner. It is lively in design; the expressions are animated and intelligent; the drawing is sound and careful, the execution delicate, but so finished as to be hard; the accessories are exhaustively depicted, so that, on the whole, the painter's technique strongly reminds one of Maclise, and the more so because of a certain leathery quality in the flesh, the opaque carnations, smooth surface, and scattered unsystematized coloration. The strapping young husband is a thorough Englishman of the time; the dowager looks the woman who dared defy Queen Elizabeth. One of the evils of retrospective exhibitions is that owners naturally desire to make their pictures look their best, and consequently not a few have been, as we have already remarked, over-varnished. Col. Finch's fine De Heere is one of these unfortunates. It belonged to the Lord Treasurer Oxford, Swift's friend, and to Horace Walpole. It is thus mentioned in a priced catalogue of the Lord Treasurer's sale, Monday, March 8th, 1742, now before us: "11. The Duchess of Suffolk and her husband, Adrian Stokes, by Holbein, 15l. 4s. 6d. Mr. Walpole." Great was the joy of the purchaser, who, on the 22nd of the same month, wrote to Mann, then at Florence: "I have made a few purchases at Lord Oxford's sale; a small Vandike, in imitation of Teniers; an old picture of the Duchess of Suffolk, mother of Lady Jane Grey, and her young husband; a sweet bronze vase by Fiamingo, and two or three other trifles. The things sold dear; the antiquities and pictures for about 5,000l., which yet, no doubt, cost him much more, for he gave the most extravagant prices." Walpole, noticing the monogram of De Heere, ascribed this picture to that artist. On the twentieth day's sale, May 17th, 1842, at Strawberry Hill it was lot 37, and sold to the Hon. and Rev. H. Finch for 92l. 8s.

The Duke of Norfolk's Queen Mary as a Child (243), a very pretty and happy-looking child—let us hope she was happy at one time—may be rightly named, although there is no proof of it. She wears much Holbein jewellery. Most children make good subjects, as this picture, and Sir C. W. Dilke's Anne, Wife of Sir T. Dilke (ob. 1660) (463), which was evidently painted by a follower of Sanchez Coello, and is very quaint and excellent, rich in details of costume, serve to show. And yet, apart from Reynolds's and Romney's, few good portraits of children are known. Mr. G. P. Boyce's Portrait of a Lady (260) is noteworthy as a good example of the school of Antonic More, but much injured. Sir H. Lee (268) belongs to Lord Dillon, and, on the strength of certain terrestrial globes embroidered on the sleeves, used to be named 'Sir Francis Drake,' of all men in the world. The stern expression and the eyes that look sideways are full of character, and agree well with the manner in which the thumb is hooked in the red cord placed round the neck. The adust complexion, dry surface, thin impasto, reddish tones, and perfect draughtsmanship, to say nothing of the intensity of the expression, indicate the admirable workmanship of Antonio More. The needlework on the sleeves is English. A ring is tied about the left arm—a fact which is, we think, unique among the very numerous illustrations in portraiture of customs of wearing rings. Princess Elizabeth as "The Perfect Wife" (281), and its neighbour, No. 282, are curiosities which have not the smallest reference to the Virgin Queen, and Walpole was right in doubting the wisdom of those who employed John Faber to mezzotint the former picture. The Duke of Norfolk's Venerable Philip Howard, Earl of Arundel (286), may be by F. Zuccherro, to whom it is ascribed, or any other late member of the school of Titian. The much repainted Queen Elizabeth (288), lent by Mrs. Snare, is certainly not by Zuccherro, although the Catalogue says it is; it is a bad copy from an original which shows very curious details of costume. Anne Vavasour (304) shows a woman of dubious fame, and a beauty in her youth, or before she was thus painted with what were called "pulled" eyebrows (i.e., those features were narrowed and drawn in thin arches), and cheeks of which the sunken contours have been filled with "plumpers," and rouged even beyond the custom of her time. The shrunken hand attests how much the face has been "made up." It is an exceedingly curious picture of a woman whose career would supply half a dozen modern novels with plots. Mr. Thynne's Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex (308), once an excellent portrait of an intensely interesting personage, has been spoilt by recent repainting and over-varnishing. Thus one more precious historical document has been defaced. More fortunate is the charming Lady Mary Sidney (309), by M. Gheeraets, lent by Lord de L'Isle, a gentle face, set in a frame of flossy light brown hair, a slender figure clad in wonderful embroideries and jewellery, and holding a medal of St. George and the Dragon; she was celebrated by her brother, who dedicated 'Arcadia' to her, and Ben Jonson, who wrote her incomparable epitaph. Queen Elizabeth (310), by F. Pourbus (?), is distinguished by its stately gait and dignified presence. We are not quite sure it is the Virgin Queen. Hampton Court forms the background to the figure, and an interesting trait is indicated by the three lapdogs—see No. 465 for another dog with the queen. Queen Elizabeth (328) holds, one does not know why, a gold colander in her right hand. Perhaps the most curious portrait of her Majesty is No. 1410 B, by F. Zuccherro, lent by the Marquis of Salisbury, in which her robe of cloth of gold is embroidered with human eyes, ears, and lips in natural colours. Her right hand rests on a rainbow, and on her arm is a serpent of green enamel, richly jewelled. It is a famous picture, an allegory in the ornate taste of the time, hard to read now, and one of a numerous category of which her present Majesty has another, attributed like the last to Zuccherro, at Hampton Court (Manchester Art Treasures, Portraits, 35); the Duke of Devonshire has a third at Chatsworth, in a wonderful dress patterned with animals and flowers; Lord Hardwick has a fourth, and in a dress like that before us; and Lord Methuen has a fifth, in which the queen is crowned by angels while Time sleeps near her throne. The Earl of Verulam has a portrait of her Majesty wearing a dress of black brocade, evidently from the identical piece of which the doublet of Lord Leicester's portrait in the same collection was made. Such a fact is noteworthy, and it attests the friendship between the queen and the earl. We know that in her private cabinet, which was kept in her bedroom, Sir J. Melville, holding a candle for her Majesty, was shown by her divers "miniatures wrapped within paper, and their names written, with her own hand, upon the papers," including one which was inscribed "My lord's picture." "I pressed," said Sir James, "to see the picture so named; she seemed loath to let me see it; yet my importunity prevailed for a sight thereof, and I found it to be my Lord of Leicester's." This was in 1564, when Elizabeth was thirty-two years of age—the year in which she proposed to marry him to Mary, Queen of Scots. No. 1410 B was at the National Portrait Exhibition, 1866, with several of the above-named instances.

Sidney's sister, Pembroke's mother,

Having commented on the more important pictures, it remains for us to commend to the student the fine collection of Holbein's drawings, which are, as Wornum said, "the most valuable of all the Holbein treasures preserved to us." No doubt many of the names they bear (said to have been supplied by Sir John Cheke) are incorrect. They once belonged to the Earl of Arundel, and may have been those he coveted exceedingly as "a book of Holbens," concerning which he wrote to Sir H. Vane, then in the Low Countries, April 25th, 1629: "For the drawings I hoped to have had them for 30l., but rather then fayle, as I tolde y^e I would goe to 50l., but never thinke of 100l., nor 50l. without [being] sure to have it. If he [Abraham Bloemart] would let it come, upon security to send it backe, I should be gladd; if not, let it rest." Bloemart wanted 600l., but admitted he had given but 200l. See Sainsbury's 'Papers concerning Rubens,' pp. 269, 293. They were mentioned as being then in the Arundel Collection by the author—said to be N. Hilliard—of a MS. on miniature painting in the British Museum, the date of which is too late for Hilliard. Norgate mentioned them as having passed out of that collection. According to Walpole, a similar book of sketches, said to have belonged to Edward VI. and to have passed into France, was given to Charles I. through the French Ambassador. In exchange for a 'St. George' by Raphael, then belonging to Lord Pembroke, Charles parted with the drawings. Lord Pembroke transferred them to Lord Arundel, from whom it is supposed they again passed to the royal collection, where they remained forgotten till Queen Caroline found them in a cupboard at Kensington Palace. Here is what Vander Doort said on the subject in his catalogue of the pictures of Charles I. in reference to a famous painting by another master: "No. 14. Done by Raphael Urbin. Item. A little St. George, which the King had in exchange of my Lord Chamberlain, Earl of Pembroke, for the book of Holben's drawings; wherein are many heads, which were done with Crayons, which my Lord Chamberlain immediately, so soon as he received it of the King, gave it to my Lord Marshal, Earl of Arundel; in a black bone and speckled wooden frame, painted upon the right light, f. 11, f. 8½." The Raphael, Passavant's No. 14, painted in 1506, is now at St. Petersburg.

Among the curiosities of portraiture to be found in the New Gallery none is more interesting than those relating to ring-wearing and toys, of which we have already mentioned several noteworthy examples. The triple chain and jewel of 'Queen Mary as a Child' (No. 243), lent by the Duke of Norfolk, ought not to be overlooked. There is a gold pot in the right hand of 'Queen Jane Seymour' (117), its cover is in her left hand; there is a gold chalice on the table behind 'Queen Katherine Parr' (111); at the end of the chain of cameos extending in front of 'Queen Katherine Parr' (106), and attached to her belt, is a little clock; collars of SS occur in 'Sir T. Le Strange' (113) and 'Sir T. More' (94). 'The Procession of Queen Elizabeth to Blackfriars' (368), the subject of acute remarks and learned suggestions by Mr. G. Scharf in the Archæological Journal, xliii., is full of curious costumes, manners, and faces; the same may be said of Lord Dillon's 'Sir Henry Lee' (377), while the legend of the dog at the knight's side is romantic, resembling that of a portrait by Van Dyck of the unfortunate Duke of Richmond, which comprises the likeness of another faithful dog. The portraits of 'Shakespeare' (389, 390, and 391) seem to receive much less attention than their merits and curious histories, to say nothing of their subject, deserve; the archlute of 'Lady Mary Dudley' (396) is a fine example of the kind, remarkable for its great size; in the group called 'The Family of Erasmus' (407) a child is playing on the virginals; the ribbons and embroideries of 'Jane, Marchioness of Winchester' (423), are noteworthy almost as much as the fact that Milton wrote her epitaph; 'Lord Berners' (434), translator of Froissart, holds an apple (or pomander) in one hand, while 'Queen Elizabeth as a Child' (451) holds in her left hand a string attached to a bird; her Majesty's fondness for lapdogs is illustrated (if it is really her likeness) by the three such animals in No. 310; she wears a thumb-ring in No. 385, and this fashion is further illustrated by Viscountess Wingfield's portrait (420); 'Anne, Lady Dilke, as a Child' (463), a quaint and naïve picture of an infant, holds a whistle-coral and wears a little bag at her belt; No. 484, 'Queen Elizabeth,' has a ring pinned to her breast; in No. 483 a black ring is suspended by a chain about her neck. Many portraits here, as lately at the Royal Academy, indicate the very curious practice of ladies wearing rings, especially mourning rings, secured on their fingers by black cords which encircle the owners' wrists; a case occurs of a lady having a long black cord passed up her arm from a finger ring and about her neck. No. 288, 'Queen Elizabeth,' wears a curious Collini-like jewel, while the influence of Holbein as a goldsmith's designer is evidenced by very numerous ornaments in portraits of his age and the next generation. The vile taste of Elizabeth's later time put an end to all this. A ring is tied to the band-strings of 'Robert Cecil' (312) and the same (330). The office of 'George, Earl of Cumberland' (317), as Queen Elizabeth's champion, is shown by his wearing her jewelled glove in front of his hat. There is a gold trident in the black hat of 'Sir F. Drake' (322). What does it mean? 'Queen Elizabeth' (328) offers a greater puzzle because the pictured figure holds in the right hand a gold colander; 'John Fletcher' (397) appropriately holds a laurel-branch in his right hand. 'The Countess of Bedford' (412) has on the third finger of her left hand a ring attached to her wrist by a string, as above. We have not noticed any portrait in this numerous collection in which a human skull occurs, as was frequent during the Tudor and Stuart periods. Till it was observed that Evelyn described his own ad vivum portrait, "in which there is a skull," it was commonly supposed that this accompaniment affirmed a likeness to have been painted after the death of the subject, and not as a memento mori. Round the broad shoulders of Henry VIII. in Holbein's cartoon belonging to the Marquis of Hartington, No. 42, the student may recognize the historic "grate collar of ballast rubies" which we observed in the portraits of that monarch's son, Nos. 175 and 184; see p. 410, col. 2, ante. The famous jewel must have been altered to suit the slender form of the boy king.

Fine-Art Gossip.

MR. WOOLNER will be represented at the Academy by a bust only; it is a memorial of Sir Thomas Elder, of South Australia, and will be set up in Adelaide. It is very fine, expressive, solid, and highly finished, according to the artist's wont.

MR. ONSLOW FORD is to be congratulated on having the commission to execute the monument which is shortly to be placed above Shelley's remains in the New Protestant cemetery at Rome. The sculptor will take this task in hand immediately.

MR. ARMITAGE, who has suffered severely from the late epidemic, will not contribute to the Royal Academy this year. His large picture of 'The Woman taken in Adultery' remains unfinished till his return from the south of France. It is one of his most scientific and best conceived compositions, full of energy and dramatic action and expression. Mr. Marcus Stone has sent only a small picture of a genre subject to Burlington House. Mr. E. B. Browning will not exhibit anything in London this year. Mr. B. Riviere sends to the Academy a small picture called 'Rus in Urbe.'

THE approaching exhibition at Liverpool will be fortunate in comprising one of the most vigorous and dramatic pictures of Mr. Briton Riviere, which we briefly mentioned a few weeks ago as then unfinished. It is now complete, and entitled 'Daniel's Answer to the King Darius,' when that monarch went in the morning after the prophet had been cast into the den of lions, and demanded if, during the night, the beasts had spared the "servant of the living God." Then said Daniel unto the king, "O king, live for ever. My God hath sent his angel, and hath shut the lions' mouths, that they have not hurt me." The walls of the dungeon are of huge stones roughly squared, and dark with time and damp. From an opening near the ceiling on our left grey daylight pours upon the floor, and reflected thence breaks the gloom of the dungeon and reveals Daniel standing with his hands bound behind him at the wrists, and his face upraised, of which the full illumination enables us to see that he is speaking with an earnest and dignified, yet respectful air to some one without and above the chamber. He is dressed in dark blue. Behind him a number of lions and lionesses are grouped; their attention is concentrated upon the prophet, and their faces and attitudes express dread, wonder, and sullen impatience because they may not venture within the charmed space which divides them from him. Mr. Riviere never drew lions and lionesses better, nor painted or modelled their forms with more care and exhaustive skill. The varying textures and colours of their hides have been thoroughly rendered. Perhaps the most striking member of the leonine group is a huge beast in the foreground, who, with heavy feet and stiffened tail, paces slowly and warily from our right, looking uneasily over her shoulder at the prisoner.

AMONG the pictures that will be exhibited at the approaching Liverpool Exhibition will be Mr. Poynter's 'Diadumene,' which our readers remember at the Academy a few years ago. Mr. Poynter has placed a delicate white semi-diaphanous drapery on this once beautiful nudity. We preferred it in its original condition, although there is no denying its present loveliness.

ON the 15th inst. and three following days, and the 22nd inst. and two following days, Messrs. Christie, Manson & Woods will sell the very numerous and valuable collection of water-colour drawings formed by the late Dr. Percy, of metallurgical renown. Although the works in this collection are not of the universally high quality that characterizes the noble William Smith Gift to South Kensington—the existence of which seems to be ignored by those who are clamouring for a new National Gallery of British Art—it consists of 1,499 drawings by nearly 700 artists of the British school, and amply suffices to illustrate the history of art in water colours from the beginning of the last century till the present time. In some respects, therefore, it is more instructive than the otherwise incomparable William Smith Gift, which was formed with a stricter eye to the technical value and beauty of the examples. The Percy Collection comprises numerous instances to which attach anecdotal histories and personal memoranda. Regretting that this magnificent body of examples could not be kept intact, we congratulate collectors on the fact that it has been catalogued for sale work by work, each being a lot by itself, in the alphabetical order of the artist's names, beginning with "Lot 1, Adam (R.), A Lake Scene, with a Castle," and ending with "1430, Zuccarelli (F.), A Landscape," &c. With these are more drawings by old masters and others, and a few pictures in oil.

ON the 19th inst. Messrs. Christie, Manson & Woods will sell works by Creswick; Ansdell; E. W. Cooke, 'A Shipwreck off Deal,' a capital example; Landseer; J. Leech, three "studies"; J. T. Linnell, 'In the Mountains'; E. Nicol, 'Interviewing their Member,' R.A. 1879; P. F. Poole; J. Linnell, 'A Summer Evening'; Constable; Rossetti, 'The Lovers' and 'From the Blessed Damosel'; Plassan; Oakes; F. Holl, three portraits; Gonzales Coques, 'Charles II. dancing at the Hague'; Collins; and Nasmyth.

MR. WALTER CRANE, who is rapidly recovering from illness, and has been in the country for some weeks past, will not be represented at any of the exhibitions by important works. He will, nevertheless, contribute three studies to the gallery of the Society of Painters in Water Colours, which will be opened on the 21st inst.

THE Dudley Gallery Art Society has appointed to-day (Saturday) for the private view of its exhibition at the Egyptian Hall, Piccadilly; the public will be admitted on Monday next. At the Doré Gallery may be seen a new picture by Mr. E. Long, entitled 'The Market-Place at Nazareth.'

ON Monday next the public will be admitted to see at Messrs. Dowdeswell's, New Bond Street, the recently completed picture by Mr. F. Madox Brown, which we described last week as 'John Kay, Inventor of the Flying Shuttle, rescued from the Mob,' and several replicas of other paintings which the artist has executed for the Town Hall, Manchester, all of which we have described seriatim as they were finished.

THE third general meeting of the Hellenic Society for the current season will be held at 22, Albemarle Street, on Monday next at 5 P.M. The following papers will be read: 'The Alcmena Vase formerly in Castle Howard,' by Mr. A. S. Murray; and 'Funeral Wreaths discovered in Egypt,' by Mr. P. Newberry.

THE jury for painting in the Salon has admitted for exhibition 2,330 pictures and 900 drawings. The so-called repêchage will doubtless reduce the number of this host.

THE Committee (Bureau) of the Salon for this year comprises M. Gêrome, president; MM. Bussan and J. P. Laurens, vice-presidents; and MM. Robert-Fleury, Humbert, and F. Flameng, secretaries.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—Saturday Concerts. CARL ROSA OPERA COMPANY.—'Romeo and Juliet,' 'The Bohemian Girl,' 'Carmen,' 'Faust.'

THE reputation of Mr. Frederic Lamond, both as a pianist and a composer, will be enhanced by his share in the programme of last Saturday's Crystal Palace Concert. His Symphony in A, first performed at a concert of the Glasgow Choral Union on December 23rd last, is his initial effort in orchestral music, and if not so striking as that of Mr. Frederic Cliffe—which, by a curious coincidence, was introduced at the Crystal Palace on Easter Eve last year—shows great promise and some measure of accomplishment. The composer has evinced a wise discretion in that he has written, so to speak, within himself. He has neither employed a colossal orchestra nor sought to make complexity of detail atone for the absence of originality of idea. His music flows on with perfect smoothness, and pleases the ear by the sense of unlaboured expression which characterizes it throughout. Of the four movements the most effective is the second, which is virtually a scherzo, and this in spite of reminiscences of Beethoven in the principal section and of Brahms in the trio. The themes and the writing generally in the first movement are excellent, and the principal melody of the andante moderato is decidedly expressive. At a first hearing the finale seemed less spontaneous than the rest of the work; but as a whole the symphony deserves high praise, and Mr. Lamond's orchestration is really remarkable, displaying a knowledge of effect which, as in the case of Schubert, seems almost intuitive. The young musician might, perhaps, have selected a more interesting concerto as a means for executive display than that of M. Saint-Saëns in c minor, No. 4; but the work is a favourable example of the rhapsodical school to which it belongs, for despite its formlessness it is not extravagant, and there is a certain effectiveness in the quasi-religious character of the themes. Mr. Lamond's rendering of the work was worthy of unstinted praise. He produced a pure, rich tone, his phrasing was very expressive, and his manipulation irreproachable. Spohr's Overture to 'Jes-sonda' and a selection from Schubert's 'Rosamunde' music completed the instrumental portion of the programme. There were two vocalists—Miss Damian, who forced her voice unpleasantly in the air "My heart is weary" from 'Nadeshda,' and Miss Margaret Davies, who displayed a pure and well-trained soprano voice in the trivial waltz air from Gounod's 'Roméo et Juliette.'

Three years have elapsed since the Carl Rosa Opera Company last visited the metropolis, and it is sincerely to be wished that the London public may no longer withhold the support accorded liberally in every other place throughout the United Kingdom. Thus far the season, which commenced last Saturday night, has proved highly satisfactory in every sense. The audiences have been exceedingly large, and the performances have shown that the company has undergone no deterioration in consequence of the lamented death of its founder. A large number of works has been added to the repertory since the last London season, one of the most important of these being Gounod's 'Roméo et Juliette,' which was played on the opening night at Drury Lane. The work has been performed many times in Liverpool and elsewhere, and this accounts for the smoothness of the ensemble. Individually, the largest measure of success was won by Mr. Barton McGuckin as Romeo and Mlle. Zélie de Lussan as Juliet. Both embodiments are vocally excellent, and special praise is due to Mr. McGuckin for the striking progress he has made as an actor. The Friar Laurence of Signor Abramoff, the Capulet of Mr. Max Eugene, and the Tybalt of Mr. John Child come next in the order of merit, and the other parts have adequate representatives. The orchestra and chorus are both admirable, and Mr. Goossens showed himself a capable conductor, the accompaniments being played with welcome refinement. Mr. Augustus Harris is entitled to share in the general commendation, the staging of the opera being more Shakspearean in spirit than used to be the case at Covent Garden during the Gye régime.

Of the Easter Monday performances there is little to be said. Balfe's threadbare opera continues to please holiday audiences. Miss Fanny Moody was a very pleasing Arline and Mr. John Child an efficient Thaddeus. The Count of Mr. F. H. Celli, the Devils-hoof of Mr. Aynsley Cook, and the Gipsy Queen of Mlle. Tremelli are familiar embodiments. The general performance of 'Carmen' was excellent, and Mlle. Zélie de Lussan in the principal rôle, Mr. McGuckin as Don José, and the Toreador of Mr. Leslie Crotty were unimpeachable. Miss Amanda Fabris as Michaela was less successful, her voice being of somewhat unpleasant quality.

The performance of 'Faust' on Tuesday suffered in some degree from the tendency of the principal artists to force their voices and overact their parts. Signor Runcio was the worst offender in these matters, but Madame Georgina Burns also subjected her voice to unnecessary strain. Signor Abramoff as Mephistopheles, Mr. Crotty as Valentine, and Miss Lucille Saunders as Siebel were fairly acceptable, however, but the merit of the performance consisted chiefly in the excellent service rendered by the orchestra and the chorus.

Musical Gossip.

A VERY large number of sacred concerts were given on Good Friday, but they do not call for notice in this place, and the same may be said of Mr. William Carter's national concert at the Albert Hall on Easter Monday.

MR. LAMOND'S pianoforte recital, announced to be given on Friday this week, is postponed until Monday, the 21st inst.

THE Polish pianist M. Paderewski will pay his first visit to London shortly, and will give four recitals at St. James's Hall on the 2nd, 9th, 20th, and 29th of May, and the 6th of June.

M. SCHARWENKA will also come to London this season, and will give recitals on June 10th and 17th.

TWO of the large recently formed musical societies in Bristol are about to give public performances. On Thursday next the Society of Instrumentalists—the largest amateur orchestral body in the kingdom—will give a concert, Beethoven's Symphony in D, No. 2, being the most important feature of the programme. On May 7th the Bristol Choral Society will perform Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul.' Both concerts will be conducted by Mr. George Riseley.

M. BOURGAULT DUROUDRAY has been commissioned by the French Minister of Fine Arts to compose a work in two acts for the Paris Opéra.

VARIOUS modifications having been introduced into the Austrian National Hymn as performed by military bands, the original version as composed by Haydn is to be restored throughout the empire. A similar reform was carried out two years ago in France with respect to the 'Marseillaise.'

HERR PAUL SIMON, manager of the firm of C. F. Kahnt, Leipzig, has discovered among some bundles of old papers a number of letters of Liszt, Wagner, Cornelius, and other eminent musicians.

HERR GEENSHEIM, the well-known composer, has been appointed choir director of the Stern Conservatorium at Berlin. The post was for some years held by Herr Stockhausen.

CONCERTS, &c., NEXT WEEK.

MON. Carl Rosa Opera Company, 'Roméo et Juliette,' 8, Drury Lane.
TUES. Herr Carl Sachs's Violoncello Recital, 3, Steinway Hall.
— Carl Rosa Opera Company, 'Lurline,' 8, Drury Lane.
— Miss Marguerite Hall and Mr. William Nicholson's Vocal Recital, 8, 30, Steinway Hall.
WED. Young People's Orchestral Concert, 3, St. James's Hall.
— Carl Rosa Opera Company, 'Carmen,' 8, Drury Lane.
THURS. Mr. R. C. Willis's Shakspearean Dramatic and Vocal Recital, 9, Steinway Hall.
— Clapham Philharmonic Concert, 8, Clapham Assembly Rooms.
— Carl Rosa Opera Company, 8, Drury Lane.
FRI. Carl Rosa Opera Company, 8, Drury Lane.
SAT. Carl Rosa Opera Company, 2 and 8, Drury Lane.
— Crystal Palace Concert, 3.
— Madame Frickenhau's Pianoforte Recital, 3, Prince's Hall.

DRAMA

GLOBE THEATRE.—Sole Lessee and Manager, Mr. F. R. BENSON.—F. R. BENSON'S Shakspearean Company in 'A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM,' with the Mendelssohn Music, EVERY EVENING at 8 (Thursdays and Fridays excepted) MATINEES (Children under Twelve half-price to Stalls and Dress Circle) EVERY WEDNESDAY and SATURDAY at 2.30. Doors Open at 2. N.B. THURSDAY and FRIDAY EVENINGS 'HAMLET.' Doors Open at 7.30; Commence at 8. Box Office Open 10 to 5.—GLOBE.

THE WEEK.

HAYMARKET.—'A Village Priest,' Drama in Five Acts, suggested by 'Le Secret de la Terreuse' of Busnach and Cauvin. By Sydney Grundy.
SHAFESBURY.—'Dick Venables,' a Drama in Four Acts. By Arthur Law.

IN adapting to the English stage 'Le Secret de la Terreuse,' a melodrama of MM. Busnach and Cauvin, produced last year at the Château d'Eau, the aim of Mr. Grundy has apparently been to depart as widely as possible from his original. Except, indeed, in a few scraps of dialogue of no special importance and in the central figure of an innocent convict, the two works have nothing, or next to nothing, in common. The most significant character in the French play, the criminal the burden of whose guilt is borne by another, is omitted from the English, and the most distinguished and interesting figure Mr. Grundy presents is in the original the shadow of a shade. Whether Mr. Grundy has been judicious in the course he has adopted is hard to say. In all that constitutes psychology, in dialogue and in dramatic situation, 'A Village Priest' is immeasurably superior to 'Le Secret de la Terreuse.' In probability it is inferior, and to a certain extent in sympathy also. A thoroughly conventional and commonplace piece has, indeed, been charged by Mr. Grundy with a portentous message. At one period it seems as if Mr. Grundy was as relentless as the Eumenides. Only at the very last moment does he—unwisely we are disposed to think—christianize a play pagan in conception, and end with a lesson of self-sacrifice instead of one of justice. Here is his weakness. He has gone too far for relenting. Hideous wrong has been committed. A man has been murdered, and the murderer, who is a judge, has passed sentence of death, subsequently commuted into penal servitude, upon a human being he knows to be innocent. One person only knows the truth, the village priest. He has learnt it, however, under the seal of confession, and he holds his peace. The convict escapes, and succeeds in interesting in his favour a young lawyer who is the son of the murderer. Slowly but surely the evidence is sifted, and Armand d'Arçay ascertains that his father was one of the most abject of criminals, and that the mother of the girl he is about to marry was his accomplice in a portion of his crime. He is resolute in the discharge of his duty. At any cost right shall be done, the wronged man shall be rehabilitated, his own hopes of happiness shall be foregone, his own mother's heart must be broken, and the mother of the woman he loves shall be publicly branded as an adulteress. Here we have "an ancient Roman," and we sympathize with him, and with some little awe applaud his inflexibility. At this moment the parish priest somewhat superfluously relents. Moved by what he thinks a direct manifestation from on high, he quits the Church just at the moment his testimony is unneeded and betrays the secret of the confessional. Matters are at this point when the convict comes to the rescue. He will return to the hulks, work out the remainder of his sentence, and bear with his daughter for life the reproach of a crime which is not his. Very noble is this, but it is superfluously noble, and it defeats the great lesson of the play. One person only benefits by this. The young lawyer is separated for ever from his love, who is heartbroken at his loss. Her mother is exposed to agonizing humiliation; the priest is separated eternally from the Church to which he has given his life, and is cast, dishonoured and occupationless, on the world; the convict's own daughter carries for ever the stigma of parental crime. Against this what is to be put? One blind and benevolent old lady is permitted to die in the belief that her husband, who was, in fact, infamous, was a model of integrity and honour. There is nothing here to vindicate the nod of the deity. Consequently the play, which begins admirably, has many strong scenes, and much excellent dialogue, ends weakly, lugubriously, and inconsistently. For this cause, though it is admirably acted and mounted to perfection, it will not take permanent rank. Nothing can be better than the performance by Mr. Tree of the priest, which is supremely touching and beautiful. The better it is the more difficult is it to reconcile us to his closing action. Mr. Fred Terry and Mr. Fernandez played in excellent fashion, and Mrs. Gaston Murray, Miss Rose Leclercq, Mrs. Tree, and Miss Norreys made the most of the female characters. Very much is there to admire in piece and performance, and not a little is there in both that enforces admiration. To those ignorant of the original piece it will be difficult to grasp how much that is new, daring, and dubious Mr. Grundy has imported into the play.

Mr. Law's drama supplies Mr. Willard with a part admirably suited to his capacities. In other respects it is unsatisfactory. Its characters are eccentric without being either natural or amusing, its situations are undramatic, and its dialogue commonplace. That a reception favourable in the main was accorded it is attributable to a manifestation of remarkable force on the part of Mr. Willard as the escaped convict, and its future fate depends upon the ability of that actor, with the revelation of no new power, but with a simple repetition of what he has done before, to support its weight upon his own shoulders.

In previous performances Mr. Willard has shown his capacity behind a plausible and polished exterior to reveal ferocity and greed. This he once more does in capital style, and he has an admirably effective entrance on the stage, creeping on in the shadow after murdering one of his pursuers. Here, however, is all that is vital in the play. The predatory archdeacon is not very convincing; a German collector who engages his servants by their "bumps," and hires a thief as his valet, steps out of Marryat's 'Midshipman Easy.' The convict's wife is a poor, spiritless creature, and the remaining characters are colourless or conventional. Add to this that much that needs explanation remains nebulous, and that probability is defied, and it will be seen how arduous a task awaits the actor. Miss Olga Brandon showed in a thankless part her brilliant abilities; and Miss Annie Rose, Mr. Bishop, Mr. Garden, and other actors exerted themselves.

Dramatic Gossip.

'NIXIE,' a new play in three acts, by Mrs. Hodgson Burnett and Mr. Stephen Townsend, produced at Terry's Theatre on the afternoon of Monday, is a not very successful attempt to provide a feminine counterpart to 'Little Lord Fauntleroy.' The girl of eight or nine years of age to whom her father trusts the honour of her mother is as displeasing as Lord Fauntleroy is pleasing. The serious tableaux introduced into the play are unwelcome, and the character of the tempted wife is as weak in conception as it is repellent in presentation. The one acceptable portion of the play is the episode of 'Editha's Burglar,' which is clumsily lugged in. Miss Webbing, Miss Forsyth, Mr. Herbert, Mr. Julian Cross, and Mr. Lewis Waller took part in the representation.

UNDER the management of Mr. Horace Lennard the theatre which forms a portion of the new Castle Assembly Rooms, Richmond, was opened on Monday afternoon with a miscellaneous entertainment, the principal features in which were the delivery by Mrs. Langtry of an occasional address, and the performance of the farce of 'Namesakes,' the scene of which is laid in Richmond. Miss Amy Roselle and Messrs. H. Nicholls, A. Williams, and J. G. Taylor took part in the performance. In the evening 'Jim the Penman' was given by Lady Monckton and Messrs. Arthur Dacre, Crauford, Gerald Maxwell, and Ben Greet. On Thursday 'A Scrap of Paper,' Palgrave Simpson's version of 'Les Pattes de Mouche,' was given, with Lady Monckton and Mr. Dacre in the principal parts.

WHAT is called a "second edition" of the "travestie" of 'Ruy Blas' was given on Thursday at the Gaiety, at which house, owing to the exceptional talent of Miss Ellen Farren and Mr. Leslie, burlesque is once more paramount.

MR. BUCHANAN'S adaptation of 'Théodora' will, according to the latest decision of Miss Grace Hawthorne, be given next month at the Princess's, instead of at Drury Lane as formerly proposed.

A RATHER conventional story of the Commune in Paris, by Mr. C. H. Dickinson, was produced on Wednesday afternoon at the Comedy. It is entitled 'Released,' is in one act, and was competently played by Misses Ada Neilson, Emmerston, and Hetty Dene, Messrs. Lablache, Bassett Roe, and Julian Cross. With it was revived 'April Showers,' a slight three-act comedy by Messrs. Romer and Bellamy, first seen at an afternoon performance in the course of last summer. Miss Maude Millett, Miss Annie Hughes, Mr. Reeves Smith, and Mr. Nutcombe Gould gave a bright interpretation, and secured for it a favourable reception.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—J. H.—J. C.—F. A. D.—C. J. C.—received.
No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

NEW NOVEL AT ALL THE LIBRARIES.

THE CONSPIRATOR:

A ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

By COUNT PAUL P.

Edited by FRANK HARKUT.

2 vols. crown 8vo. cloth, 21s.

POETRY of the ANTI-JACOBIN, comprising the Celebrated Political and Satirical Poems, Parodies, and Jeux-d'Esprit of Canning, Wellesley, J. H. Frere, Ellis, Gifford, Carlisle, Pitt, and others, with Explanatory Notes, &c. By CHARLES EDMONDS. Entirely New Edition, with additional matter, and 6 Plates by James Gillray. Ordinary Edition, crown 8vo. cloth extra, 7s. 6d.

An Édition de Luxe of 250 copies, for England and America, numbered and signed, printed on hand-made paper, with extra Plate Illustration, crown 4to. cloth extra, One Guinea nett. Full Prospectus on application.

The ENGLISH CATALOGUE of BOOKS for 1889. Containing a complete List of all the Books published in Great Britain and Ireland in the Year 1889, with their Sizes, Prices, and Publishers' Names; also of the principal Books published in the United States of America, with the addition of an Index to Subjects. Royal 8vo. 5s.

A CENTURY of PAINTERS of the ENGLISH SCHOOL. Abridged and continued to the Present Time. By R. REDGRAVE, C.B. R.A., and S. REDGRAVE. New Edition. Large crown 8vo. cloth, 10s. 6d.

ART in the MOUNTAINS: the Story of the Passion Play at Oberammergau. By HENRY BLACKBURN, Editor of 'Academy Notes,' &c. New and Cheaper Edition, with numerous Illustrations, and Information for Travellers in 1890. Demy 8vo. cloth, 5s.

New Additions to Low's Standard Novels.

SIX-SHILLING SERIES.

THE PENANCE of JOHN LOGAN,

and OTHER STORIES. By WILLIAM BLACK, Author of 'A Princess of Thule,' 'A Daughter of Heth,' &c. Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

"The Penance of John Logan" is so well contrived, so brightly told, and so lifelike, that its simple pathos is irresistible.—Athenæum.

AGNES SURRIAGE. By Edwin

LASSETTER BYNNER, Author of 'Damen's Ghost,' 'Penelope's Suitors,' &c. Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

THE CHOICE SERIES:

BEING

CHOICE EDITIONS OF ENGLISH CLASSICS
IN PROSE AND VERSE.

ILLUSTRATED WITH 300 ENGRAVINGS ON WOOD.

Drawn by C. W. Cope, R.A., T. Creswick, R.A., E. Duncan, Birket Foster, J. C. Horsley, A.R.A., G. Hicks, R. Redgrave, R.A., C. Stonehouse, F. Taylor, G. Thomas, H. J. Townshend, Harrison Weir, Charles Keene, John Gilbert, &c.

Uniform 8vo. Volumes, cloth elegant, 1s. each, now ready.

Goldsmith's Vicar of Wakefield.

Gray's Elegy in a Churchyard.

Tennyson's May Queen.

Bloomfield's Farmer's Boy.

Campbell's Pleasures of Hope.

Coleridge's Ancient Mariner.

Goldsmith's Deserted Village.

Milton's L'Allegro.

Poetry of Nature. Harrison Weir.

Rogers's (Sam) Pleasures of Memory.

Shakespeare's Songs and Sonnets.

Keats's Eve of St. Agnes.

Elizabethan Poets.

Wordsworth's Pastoral Poems.

Additional Double Volume, price 2s.

BUNYAN'S PILGRIM'S PROGRESS.

"Such works are a glorious beatification for a poet."—Athenæum.

London:

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON, SEARLE & RIVINGTON
(LIMITED),
St. Dunstan's House, Fetter-lane, Fleet-street, E.C.

SATURDAY, APRIL 19, 1890.

CONTENTS.

COL. DAVIDSON'S REMINISCENCES ...	493
THE ISLANDS OF THE ÆGEAN ...	494
FRANCE DURING THE HUNDRED YEARS' WAR ...	495
NOVELS OF THE WEEK ...	497
THE NAVAL COMMISSIONERS, 1660-1760 ...	498
THEOLOGICAL BOOKS ...	498
OUR LIBRARY TABLE—LIST OF NEW BOOKS ...	499-500
THE TEACHING OF LANGUAGES; THE SPRING PUBLISHING SEASON; THE 'DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY'; BENEDICT OF OXFORD; MR. W. MASKELL ...	501-502
LITERARY GOSSIP ...	503
SCIENCE—RECENT LITERATURE; ASTRONOMICAL NOTES; GEOGRAPHICAL NOTES; SOCIETIES; MEETINGS ...	504-505
FINE ARTS—EARLY PERSIAN LUSTRE WARE; NEW PRINTS; NOTES FROM ATHENS; GOSSIP ...	505-507
MUSIC—THE WEEK; GOSSIP; CONCERTS, &c., NEXT WEEK ...	508-509
DRAMA—THE WEEK; GOSSIP; NEXT WEEK'S NOVEL-TIES ...	509-510

LITERATURE

Memories of a Long Life. By Lieut.-Col. David Davidson, C.B. (Edinburgh, Douglas.)

COL. DAVIDSON is not well known outside of Edinburgh, he has not held high appointments, and his career has been uneventful. Nevertheless his reminiscences are of considerable interest, for accident brought him into contact with such celebrities as Carlyle, Mrs. Carlyle, and Outram. Some, too, of his recollections of life in India sixty years ago may prove amusing to the present generation of Anglo-Indians, although the author's account of his religious views will interest only a limited public. The autobiographer spent his early life at Haddington, where he grew up in intimacy with the Jane Welsh who eventually became Jane Carlyle. Educated at the burgh school, where three centuries previously John Knox had received the elements of learning, David Davidson in 1827 obtained at the age of sixteen a nomination as cadet in the Bombay army, and in November of that year travelled up to London by stage coach. Campbell the poet, who was one of his fellow travellers, beguiled much of the tedium of the way by relating a series of anecdotes about his college days.

After a long voyage young Davidson arrived at Bombay, and was in due course posted to the Bombay Native Infantry, with which he did duty—several years as adjutant—till 1837. When he first reached India the expense of living (in a native regiment, at all events) was infinitely less than at present:—

"In these primitive times we did our messing on very economical principles. We had no flash kit, merely the tables and dishes to serve the dinner on, the rest being constituted 'camp fashion,' and I am sure, if Sir Charles Napier had dined with us, he would have signified his approval. When the first bugle for mess sounded, a number of servants might have been seen making their way to the mess bungalow equipped as follows:—A chair on his head, in one hand a large bundle containing plates, tumbler, wine-glass, two muffineers, knives, forks, and spoons, and, if the master could afford it, a bottle of Hodson's beer. The other arm not only supported the chair, but carried a 'cooza,' or porous earthen vessel of water. These were arranged at his master's accustomed place at the table. At Asseergurh the Hodson's beer supplied by the stores of the mess was so expensive that few could afford that luxury, and water tinged with brandy sometimes took its place."

Other things, too, were managed in a simple way. For instance, there was in the 18th Bombay Native Infantry only a "drum and fife" band, and with the cheap messing an ensign could live comfortably on his pay. Col. Davidson speaks highly of the Sepoys, and especially of their marching powers:—

"Our ordinary sixteen-mile marches were done regularly in the four hours; and, had we pressed the men, might have been done in less. I was told the regiment once marched on an emergency ninety miles in thirty-six hours. And I know, when we had, at Kaladgee, a requisition for a party to quell an expected disturbance at a place fifty miles off, the light company started at eight o'clock in the evening, and were on their ground ready for service by noon next day, not one man having fallen out."

Col. Davidson was a most ardent sportsman, and he relates many interesting sporting anecdotes, with some of which Sir James Outram is associated. The following is worthy of extract:—

"Outram had to receive some Bheel chiefs. He did so with as much courtesy as if the half-naked chieftains had been princes of royal blood. In the evening we took a stroll with our guns. There was a long low height close at hand, which terminated through its whole length in a crest of scarp rock, from ten to twenty feet high; and this rock was rent in many places by fissures, which afforded admirable shelter for big game. The Bheels beat along below the scarp while we walked along the flattened top. We had not gone far before a hyena bolted, which I killed with a shot from my double 'Haddington.' As the others did not wait for me, I, loading in a hurry, put down a ball without powder. As I was hastening after the rest of the party, I heard a noise from below, and, looking over the edge of the rock, I saw a bear climbing up. I fired my remaining shot into his eye when within three feet of the muzzle of my gun, and paused a moment, expecting to see him roll over. Instead of that, up he came, so I took to my heels, thinking my friends in front might as well share in the adventure. Two shots were fired, but the bear followed me so closely there was danger of hitting me, so the bear was missed. We were now, pursued and pursuer, close on the opposite edge of the rocky platform, and, to avoid the bear, I was twisting round a tree, when I tripped and fell. I felt the hair of the beast uncomfortably near, when a shot was fired, and over went the bear, down some ten feet of drop, and lay quite dead. When I got up and shook myself, Outram, who had fired the shot, said he was glad to see me sound upon my limbs, as he was not sure, when he pulled the trigger, whether he could quite clear my leg. Afterwards, when the bear was examined, it was found that my shot had entered the eye, and part of the bullet was found among the brains. Such is the vitality of these animals, and the mischief they may do after being mortally wounded."

Col. Davidson "passed in the language," but though he relates how a certain sportsman when crossing a river said to his native attendant "bandook dho," which means "wash the gun," instead of "bandook do," which signifies "fire the gun," and had the annoyance of seeing his gun plunged into the water, he is guilty of a similar mistake himself. Speaking of the "fair people," as the natives call Europeans, he makes use of the phrase "ghora log," which means "horse people," whereas he should have said "gora log."

Col. Davidson wound up his regimental service with a cholera march, the tragic events of which he relates in a most vivid manner. In 1837 he was appointed to the "Revenue Survey," and in 1848 practically terminated his Indian career, for he only returned subsequently for a few months to complete his time for pension.

The most valuable part of this book is that which relates to the author's intercourse and correspondence with the Carlyles. In 1854, being in London, he called on his old child playmate Jane Welsh, but failed to find her at home. A few days later he received the following charming letter from her:—

"5 Cheyne Row, Thursday.

"MY DEAR—David is what nature prompts me to write! But then comes the recollection of that tall grave stranger I met in the railway carriage to Haddington, and I could scream at the idea of such a liberty! 'Thirty years makes a great odds on a Boy as well as on a Girl!'—and it takes more than one good talk to get accustomed to the odds. Still the boy and the girl that knew one another thirty years ago must always, I think, have a certain interest for one another, independent of personal sympathies. So I do not hesitate to beg you to come again, tho' you have already tried the distance. When I found your card, I could not leave it in the customary plate, but put it safe by, till I wrote to you next day. Now, I do not know if it is a peculiarity; but for me, the result of putting anything safe by, is to make it undiscoverable when wanted, so, with your address; I have hunted for it twenty times since, and only found it this morning in a china mug! And now I make haste to tell you that I have missed no call for six months—or a whole year if you like!—that I so regretted—and that I shall rely on your coming again. The best time for finding me, and when we may make one another's grown acquaintance without interruption, is any time before one o'clock. Does that suit your Indian habits? I generally, at this time of the year, go out at one—not of necessity, but for the same reason the Scotch Professor gave for drinking whisky, 'because I like it, and because it is cheap'—if you come so as to find me before I go out, there would be no need for me to go after—Don't you think it would be pleasing to our mothers—dear friends as they were—that we should be meeting again in this great foreign London?—If you cannot come before one any day, write to me appointing any other time you like and I shall wait for you.

"Affectionately yours,

"JANE WELSH CARLYLE."

Some months afterwards he received an invitation to dine with Carlyle and meet Lord Tennyson:—

"In the course of conversation they spoke about the difficulty of making speeches; when Tennyson said if allowed to sit he might manage it, but it was severe upon the nerves to stand up when every one else was sitting. The question was discussed as to whether they would accept titles if offered. Tennyson was disposed to decline such honours for himself, and said no title could excel the simple name of 'Thomas Carlyle.' After dinner long clay pipes were laid on the table, and a smoking parliament commenced. When we went up-stairs, it was most interesting to hear these two men talk, and I noticed that when Carlyle was at a loss for a poetical quotation, Tennyson promptly supplied

In 1856 Mrs. Carlyle, on receiving an invitation to pay a visit to Col. Davidson's house in Scotland, says:—

"It would be a pleasure to visit you, and make acquaintance with your wife; and decidedly I for one, will not be in Scotland without inquiring how you are situated, and going to spend a day or two with you, 'if convenient.' But Mr. C. has such a physical horror of travelling, and of any change, even for the better, in his arrangements, that our journeys are few and far between. It has become through a long course of years, a part of our life, like any other, to spend a month every winter at Lord Ashburton's in Hampshire, and that one visit Mr. C. thinks quite a sufficient year's visiting for both himself and me, in which notion I do not always agree with him."

In a subsequent undated letter occurs a passage which is highly characteristic of the writer:—

"You never acknowledged the photographs I sent you at New Year. Ever since I have been a close prisoner. Obligated to take care of my health, the most tedious and insipid of all earthy [sic] occupations."

Writing on the 5th of November, 1857, she unconsciously gives strong evidence of her combined sympathy and conscientiousness, and at the same time tells us how Miss Craik first began her career as a novelist:—

"I should have thanked you for your letter before to-day; had not a girl called Georgina Craik had the smallpox some thirteen years ago! a case of Tenterden steeple causing the encroachment of the Goodwin Sands! But you remember there was discovered a good many years ago a real connection of cause and effect between the steeple and the Sands! So is there between little Miss Craik's smallpox and my delay in writing. The smallpox made a very pretty girl into a very plain one, and the consciousness of her spoiled looks drove the girl's exuberant young life all inward, which has raged and erated under a shy embarrassed self-conscious exterior, till finally, after thirteen years it has burst out in a passionate, all-for-love three-volume novel! Which novel having been presented to me by the young authoress, I was bound in common politeness, not to say kindness, to write her a letter of acknowledgment. But what to say, that would not hurt her feelings and at the same time not hurt my own conscience, was a difficulty. The Book is 'thrilling,' 'enchanted,' 'absorbing,' all a novel needs to be in interest; but to have written even a 'successful' novel is a fault as well as a misfortune for a young Lady, I think; and given this persuasion to be expressed in delicate unwounding terms, and no such terms suggesting themselves, I had day after day written '5 Cheyne Row' at the top of a sheet, and then not 'My dear Georgina,' but 'My dear somebody else,' on quite the 'voluntary principle,' till at last, ashamed of my off-putting, I took a solemn engagement with myself that I would not write to man, woman, or child till that other letter was despatched! So now you see how Georgina Craik's smallpox thirteen years ago prevented your getting a speedier answer."

Several years after Mrs. Carlyle's sudden death Col. Davidson wrote to Carlyle about a visit made to the attached and faithful friend and servant—Betty Braid—of his late wife, and received in reply a letter in which occurs the following passage:—

"Not for many a long day have I read any letter so interesting and affecting to me;—a letter which I shall carefully keep among my valuable records! Good old Betty is at this time the most venerable woman I know in the world. So much of loyalty, of piety, of patient endeavour—in a word, of noble human worth, and fine old Scotch practicality, and simple wisdom to be found there. She belongs to me also, as the last living link of scenes and persons now all departed, but dear and sacred to me as no others are."

Having indulged in extracts to excess from Mrs. Carlyle's letters, we may conclude with a few sentences about Col. Davidson himself. Apart from those who gave him their friendship his chief claim to be remembered rests on his inventions. With a view to reducing the curve of the trajectory of a rifle bullet he nearly sixty years ago diminished the bore, increased the charge, and constructed a conical bullet with a cannellure round the thickest part. The new device found great favour in India among sportsmen, and even in England was used with success, but it was not taken up by the authorities, who even appear to have been ignorant of it.

In 1839 he sent home a paper (which was laid before the Duke of Wellington) on the subject of rifled cannon. The Duke handed over the paper to his son—we are not told which—who possessed some knowledge of rifles. In a lengthened criticism the latter informed the inventor that,

"owing to the shortness of the piece, the twist could not be given to the projectile, and that rifled cannon were an impossibility. My proposal was to make the shell with projections to fit into the grooves of the gun, so as to give the spinning motion without damage to the piece, copper slides being driven into dovetails cast in the shell. The system that was subsequently adopted was a row of copper studs instead of one continuous bar, but the principle was the same, and when I showed it to Sir Joseph Whitworth, he said I had anticipated that other method by some twenty years."

During the Crimean War Col. Davidson devised a collimator for night firing with artillery at a siege:—

"In the beginning of 1855 my instrument was inspected by the select committee at Woolwich; which, while commending its ingenuity, stated that the existing mode of night firing was sufficiently accurate. However, when Lord Panmure was appointed Secretary of State for War, he directed that my method should have a fair trial. This was made at Woolwich with perfect success; and twenty-six breeching guns furnished with my apparatus were ordered for the Crimea; but such was the delay I encountered, that Sebastopol was taken before they left Woolwich. Sir J. H. Lefroy, a distinguished Artillery officer, was then on Lord Panmure's staff at the War Office, and gave me his most cordial support. When the war was over, he visited the Crimea, and in a note I had from him on his return he says: 'My visit to the East has not abated my sense of the value of the application.' Ten of my unfortunate instruments, some thirty in number, were distributed for practice and report among the artillery stations at home and abroad, and copies of the reports were to be furnished to me, but not one ever reached me; and the invention, in the absence of any interested person at headquarters to look after it, was allowed to slumber and be lost sight of. My plan included the use of the same telescope for direct aim during the day; and lately, when an Engineer officer's telescopic sight for direct aim was submitted for adoption into the service, my request that mine, which had so many years before been tried, approved, adopted, and sealed for further use, should be tried against the other, as much more simple and equally efficacious, was refused without any reason assigned, and that of the other inventor, who had adopted my principle, it may be independently, was accepted and rewarded."

Col. Davidson has had several other dealings with the authorities, and his experiences of the War Office are much the same as those that have fallen to the lot of most inventors.

The Islands of the Aegean. By the Rev. Henry Fanshawe Tozer, M.A., F.R.G.S. (Oxford, Clarendon Press.)

We are indebted to Mr. Tozer for another excellent book on the subject which he has made peculiarly his own. The vacation tours of the indefatigable Fellow of Exeter College, since he first commenced his course of travel in 1853, have taken him to regions of surpassing interest throughout South-Eastern Europe and Asia Minor from Albania to Armenia, and his observations have been modestly recorded and favourably received at several intervals during the last twenty years. It may be remembered that Mr. Tozer delivered a course of lectures on Greek geography at Oxford in 1872, in which he attempted to enable his hearers (and readers) to form a more realistic conception of Greece, ancient and modern, from his own personal impressions gathered during his holiday rambles. In continuation of the small book containing these lectures, and in further illustration of the same ideas, the description of the principal islands of the Archipelago, now issued from the University Press, forms a necessary sequel. It does not pretend to be more than a sketch of personal impressions; but the numerous references to the modern authorities enable the student to follow up his investigations in the library with considerable ease.

Mr. Tozer's first visit to the Cyclades was made in company with Mr. Crowder (senior major of the Oxford Militia) and the indispensable dragoman; but, as the account of this journey has already appeared in the pages of a contemporary, we need not further allude to it, beyond noticing that our travellers were surprised to find the old shepherd, the solitary inhabitant of Delos, incredulous as to the existence of vampires and speaking an extraordinary dialect of Greek! This trip was made in 1874, and twelve years elapsed before Messrs. Tozer and Crowder were able to visit the Turkish islands of Lesbos, Chios, Samos, Patmos, and Rhodes. The details of Mr. Tozer's impressions of this group have also appeared before, so we may pass them over on this occasion with remarking that Mr. Tozer found in several islands the highest mountains named "Hagios Elias"; and he notices as a fact that "in Asia Minor, in continental Greece, and in the islands, there were as many as fourteen mountains called Olympus in ancient times"; and that Sedulius, a Christian writer of the fifth century, had argued that by the alteration of ι into ϵ Helios was changed into Helias, which accounted for the names of the various mountain summits on which sanctuaries of Helios had formerly existed.

It was not until 1889 that Mr. Tozer (now only accompanied by a dragoman) had an opportunity of visiting those islands which are the most difficult of access in the northern portion of the Aegean; and the starting-point chosen for this purpose was Chanak-kaleesi, in the Dardanelles. Here, says Mr. Tozer, the only thing of interest is the manufacture of earthenware. As every one who has visited Constantinople knows this peculiar pottery, which gives the name to the place, it needs no notice; but we must protest against the remark that it is the only thing of interest in Chanak-kaleesi. We know not whether the ancient brass cannon of huge dimensions have been all removed or broken up, but at all events some of the gigantic stone projectiles remain there and at the fort Kilit Bahar, on the European side of the straits. Doubtless these guns, of which seventeen were in existence when one was presented to the Queen twenty years ago, have been removed from their embrasures to make way for the modern rifled ordnance which threatened Admiral Hornby's fleet in 1878; but some of these ancient relics surely remain in evidence of Sir John Duckworth's memorable action in 1807, when it was shown that they could bite as well as bark. Such reminiscences had no interest, however, for Mr. Tozer.

From inspection of the map it is difficult for the student to realize the relative proportions of an islet like Lemnos, which our travellers first proceeded to visit from the Dardanelles; yet a paragraph of Mr. Tozer's at once serves to give a rational idea of its magnitude and of the ancient importance of its position:—

"Though the area of Lemnos is less than that of the Isle of Wight, yet the space of sea which it seemed to cover produced the impression of great extent, and the long line thus formed completely justified the descriptive epithet tenuis which a Roman poet (Valerius Flaccus) has applied to it. A still more impressive object revealed itself towards the north, as soon as we had cleared the westernmost point of Imbros. This was the grand mass of Samothrace, which stood up from the sea like one great mountain broken into several peaks, with flecks of snow lying in the rifts of its steep sides, and now diversified by a long bar of cloud which hung halfway up its heights throughout its whole length. Again far away to the north-west the summits of Thasos were dimly seen; and thus in one view I had before me all the islands which were the objects of my present tour. The relative importance of these in history was determined by their geographical position; for those that lay near the mouth of the Hellespont, Imbros and Lemnos, were of necessity brought more into connexion with the commercial and political life of Greece than those which were more remote."

Mr. Tozer subsequently points out that these islands with Scyros formed stepping-stones in the line of communication between Athens and the Chersonese, and thus they held the same position in the colonial and mercantile policy of that state which is occupied by Gibraltar and Malta at the present day in securing the trade from Great Britain to the East.

Naturally Mr. Tozer was curious to examine the site whence the famous "Lemnian earth," the Λημνία γῆ of Dioscorides, the Λημνία μίλτος of Galen and Pliny, and the terra sigillata of the Middle Ages, was derived. An old potter guided him to the spot, where a cavity some fifty feet in circumference and ten feet deep, apparently full of dried thistles and now neglected and disused, was so filled in that the layer of wonderful earth itself was unapproachable. Specimens, however, were shown, and Mr. Tozer obtained some small bowls made by his guide the potter, and impressed with the Arabic inscription "Tin machum," from a seal obtained for him from Constantinople by an exiled pasha. Mr. Tozer quotes the old French traveller who witnessed the ceremonies connected with the digging of this sacred earth in the sixteenth century, when it was in great demand, even ambassadors prizing it as a valuable antidote to poison. This traveller, M. Pierre Belon, wrote in 1553; and it may interest Mr. Tozer and his readers to learn that more than a hundred years later, in 1661, the Sieur de Flacourt described the discovery of similar clay in Madagascar: "Il y a de diuerses sortes d'excellent bol & de la vraye terre sigillée, aussi bonne que celle de l'Isle de Lemnos, & se nomme, Tanelisse." The late Dr. Seemann has described a steatitic clay jabonda, which he found was eaten by a class of natives at the gold mines of Chontales, in Nicaragua, and in connexion with this substance he compared it to an edible earth of Syria, mentioned by Ehrenberg in the Pharmaceutical Journal some twenty years ago. At present this earth in Lemnos has fallen into disrepute; but now that attention has been drawn to it, and that the Lemnians have established a connexion with Egypt and thereby come in contact with Western civilization, we shall doubtless hear of some speculative promoter obtaining a concession of the quarry, and advertising the all-healing earth as a patent drug.

In Thasos Mr. Tozer visited the ruins of the ancient capital, the shrine of Pan, and the sites which have lately been excavated by Mr. Bent and described in the Classical Review; while in Samothrace he went over the ground so fully explored by the French and Austrian professors between 1863 and 1875. Mr. Tozer deserves credit for his energy in climbing to the summit of Phenari, the highest peak in Samothrace, with an elevation of 5,248 feet, which was covered with snow at that time of year, April 11th. "This peak," he reminds us,

"was the station of Poseidon, from which he regarded the combats of the Greeks and Trojans. There, we are told, the mighty Earthshaker held no blind watch, who sat and marvelled on the war and strife, high on the topmost crest of wooded Samothrace, for thence all Ida was plain to see; and plain to see were the city of Priam and the ships of the Achæans."

In these mountain recesses ibexes still linger, a small remnant of a fauna now fast becoming extinct. Mr. Tozer brought away with him a pair of their horns measuring three feet in length. He noticed also a snake, called by the natives σαῖρα, i.e., sagitta; but he does not describe its appearance nor mention whether it is rightly figured in the illustration given of this reptile in Pierre Belon's quaint work, which he previously quoted.

Whilst reading Mr. Tozer's book we have had the excellent Admiralty charts before us to refer to, for without them it is almost impossible to fully enter into the descriptions, vivid as they are, given by the author. A fair index map of the Ægean Sea serves as a frontispiece, but the small diagrams in outline of Delos, Santorin, and Patmos can hardly be called maps. Facsimiles of maps can now be reproduced by various processes at so little cost that a work giving geographical and topographical information ought to be properly illustrated, especially when materials are to hand which are, so to speak, national property and officially guaranteed by the Hydrographic Department. Apart from this drawback the student, tourist, dilettante, and archaeologist must equally be pleased with this book, and it will certainly tell every one a great deal that is new in a highly enjoyable manner.

La France pendant la Guerre de Cent Ans: Épisodes Historiques et Vie Privée. Par Siméon Luce. (Hachette & Co.)

"THERE is a kind of wild animal, male and female, frequent in the country: creatures livid and nearly black with sunburn, attached to the earth they dig and delve with an unwearied pertinacity. They have a sort of articulate speech, and, when they rear themselves up on their feet, they show a human face—and, in fact, they are men. At night they hie to their lairs, where they feed on roots and water and black bread. They spare other men the pains of seedtime, harvest, and the labour of the fields, and merit a better fate than to lack the bread they sowed." This passage, which two hundred years ago struck so strange a note in La Bruyère's caustic idyls of the court, might serve for a motto to several of the great histories which our age has produced. And perhaps, when our century shall have retreated into its due perspective, its chief originality will be found to consist in that unique fusion of poetry and science by which it has deciphered the life of those long dead who living were not held of much account. The great current of history has been turned into a new channel, and what preoccupies the student of to-day is less the account of battles, ministries, or the chronicles of reigning houses than the patient annals of the long development of a people. The least little register of accounts, the commonest town hall or vestry document which may serve to tell the wages a man earned in the Middle Ages, the sort of dinner he paid for, the average length of life he lived, is more precious to this new school of historians than such a triumph of narrative as Commynes's account of the battle of Fornovo. It is conceivable that this cult of fact might have resulted in a Gradgrind dryness. But the first initiator of the movement was a man of singular poetic insight, born into a world influenced by the dreams of fraternity which sprang up in '89. And Michelet has left a shred of his mantle to his disciples or successors, great and small, from M. Duruy and J. R. Green down to Dr. Jessopp. Nor has any among them shown a severer worship of the document, or a profounder devotion to the poetry of the past, than the editor of Froissart, the historian of Jeanne d'Arc and Bertrand du Guesclin: we have named M. Siméon Luce.

To-day M. Luce presents us with a volume singularly characteristic of the tendencies we have mentioned. In this study of France during the Hundred Years' War there is scarcely a word about Crécy or Poitiers, scarcely a mention of the Black Prince or Dunois, barely an allusion to the division of Burgundy and Orleans. Politics and war are expressly set aside. But in the four hundred pages of this little book (scarcely larger than the yellow-backed novel it resembles) the reader will find a faithful picture of the private life of every day, at almost every stage of the social scale, of fourteenth century and fifteenth century France. Here we dine with the monk and live the laborious days of the miner, cultivate our garden with a dilettante prince of the blood, or overhear the bad language of an irate and tipsy copyist; visit the wards of the Hôtel Dieu, and become acquainted with a whole world of vanished figures, Jews, kings, harpists, heroes, workmen, but all of them in their every-day garb as they go about their daily tasks, mixing with them in Haroun al Raschid fashion, not viewing them in a pageant on such a festal day as Froissart and the chroniclers deigned only to describe.

The book of M. Luce is distinguished not only by its character, but by its method. He might have made it still more interesting and yet more valuable had he annotated the variety of new and virgin facts which he has gathered from manuscript sources by others gleaned from printed volumes accessible to few, such as Pichon's edition of the 'Ménager de Paris', the documents of Douët d'Areq, the five published volumes of the ballads of Eustache Deschamps, and the novels and poems of the time. His picture might thus have been made infinitely fuller, more brilliant, and not less accurate. But M. Luce is a fastidious scholar: he has made a point of giving his readers only what they could not get for themselves. And save, perhaps, the well-known narration of the heroic death of Le Grand Ferré, all that his book contains is fresh matter, the spoil of many years' research in the manuscripts of the great Parisian archives.

The volume opens with the disorders, the despair, the isolated flashes of heroism, which ensued upon the great defeat of Poitiers. Paris is in arms against the Dauphin, and the king is a prisoner in England. In the year 1356 the house of Valois was still a new-comer on the throne of France; it was not forty years since the clerks of the kingdom had decided that, since "the lilies neither sew nor spin, yet are arrayed like Solomon in all his glory," the word of Christ forbade the crown of France to such as hold the spindle. In the eyes of the people the King of Navarre had as good a right to the crown as the distant branch of Valois, if not a better; and while the burghers of Paris were plotting to deliver the capital into his hands, the King of Navarre himself was arranging to betray Paris into the hands of Edward III. of England, another grandson of a king of France. M. Luce gives us several pictures of this discontented and rebellious Paris, and of the wealthy grocers and clothweavers who were the soul of its resistance. Suddenly, in the sixth chapter, these turbulent figures disappear, and we find ourselves in the infinitely serenest Paris of King Charles V.

There is reason to think that, might a lover of the Middle Ages choose the period and the country of his lifetime, he would select Paris in the later days of Charles V. The capital was but a little town then, as the new wall of King John enclosed it, running from the Arsenal gardens by the riverside to the Porte de St. Denis, and thence by the Rue des Fossés-Montmartre, crossing the Palais Royal gardens and the Carrousel, to the riverside again, near the first gate of the Louvre. But this tiny city, not one-twentieth of the Paris of to-day, was fresh and beautiful with gardens and running waters, with churches and palaces rising every day, with room for all and fresh air for all, free of coal smoke and overcrowding. If there was room for the body, no less for the soul and the mind was the Paris of those days already a spacious and abundant city; there were many mansions in it—the Paris of the guilds and the Hôtel de Ville; the island Paris of Notre Dame, of the bishop's palace and the bishop's prison; the Paris of the court along the river, between the Louvre and the roses and lavender bushes of the great new gardens of the king's Hôtel de St. Pol; last, but not least, the Paris of the university, where students of every nation came to discuss all matters of philosophy and speculative science.

The last were especially in honour at the court of King Charles, whom Christine de Pisan has shown us surrounded with "clercs solempnels," and discoursing with them of Aristotle and the stars. Of this side of the king's character M. Luce gives a charming glimpse in his paper on the elective principle. It is known that twice in the reign of Charles V. the Grand Chancellor of France, and on one occasion the President of Parliament, was elected to his position by the votes of the Council, and not appointed by the king—an excess of Liberalism which no constitutional government of the present day would sanction, and which has hitherto appeared doubly extraordinary amid the traditions of the fourteenth century. M. Luce supplies the clue of the puzzle—one singularly characteristic of Charles V., the scholar king, the crowned idealist, to whom nothing realizable by the mind appeared impossible in action, and by whom no course admitted to be theoretically preferable could be allowed to be inexpedient in practice. In the year 1370 the king commissioned Master Nicholas Oresme, of Rouen, to translate for him the 'Politics' and 'Economics' of Aristotle, "very necessary to me and for reasons," as one of his mandamuses has it. Now, in the sixth chapter of the third book of his 'Politics,' Aristotle affirms the virtue of the elective principle. "Although individually they (the masses) are worse judges than the experts, in their collective capacity," to quote Mr. Welldon's translation, "they are better, or at least as good." To have the authority of Aristotle for a course of conduct was (with King Charles) the best of reasons for adopting it. And so three officers of the Crown were elected by vote to their positions, because the king, in 1372, was reading the 'Politics.'

The liberal nature of Charles is manifest in every action of his reign. Never was a king more abundantly endowed with that "sweet reasonableness" which in the end is bound to win. All his triumphs came from the fact that he was naturally in the right, and so kindly and persuasively in the right that other men longed to follow his leading. "By his great good sense he attracted to himself the greater portion of his enemies," we read in that 'Chronicle of the First Four Valois' which M. Luce was the first to rescue from the oblivion of its five hundred years of seclusion. "Comment fut-il?" wrote the burgher poet Eustache Deschamps—

Comment fut-il? Humble et plein de douceur, Dévot vers Dieu, doux vers sa maisonnée.

Among the gallant King Johns, the brave Black Princes of his age, he strikes us as a man of a different planet: a Prospero still young, gentle, and even timid in address, who, secluded in his study, plumbs the deepest secrets of the time by the aid of pure reason, and then, radiantly tranquil, effects the serene result of his deliberations. Beyond his frontiers, desperate men began to turn to the Wise King as to a saviour; and Aquitaine was virtually regained before a French sword left its scabbard. M. Luce shows some further instances of the liberality and good government of Charles in home affairs. His dealings with the Jews might serve as a pattern to certain monarchs of to-day; and we wish that, in addition to the new and precious information which he deals in, M. Luce had quoted a certain ordonnance where King Charles, writing to the Procurator of the Jews of France, makes all his promises, not by the Trinity, which to his correspondent would appear an unmeaning symbol, but simply and solemnly by that Almighty Father in whom they both believe. On this point of anti-Semitism, as on many others, the book of M. Siméon Luce is a new link in the ever-lengthening chain of evidence which goes to prove that the fourteenth century was not indeed, as we imagine, a time of discomfort, darkness, and ignorance, but rather (at any rate in the capital cities) a false dawn, an era of wise and liberal thought, of comfort diffused through many classes, destined to be clouded over by the conflicts of the succeeding century and the enmities and bitternesses of the Reformation.

'L'Hôtel Dieu de Paris' shows the fourteenth century in its struggle against the misery of the poor, and also the private contention, not unfamiliar to our own times, between the surgeons and the nurses of a great hospital. The terrible mortality of the Middle Ages (in which the average life of man was seventeen years) may be gauged from the fact that in one single year (August, 1368—July, 1369) the Hôtel Dieu of Paris buried over twenty-two thousand of its patients. It is true that the number of sick people received was exceedingly great. The accounts of the prioress of the Hôtel Dieu show that no fewer than 3,500 sheets were daily supplied in the wards. Another Paris hospital during the same year gave shelter, in addition to its ordinary patients, to nearly seventeen thousand pilgrims on their way to St. Michael's Mount and other shrines. If the medical means were slight, there was no lack of shelter; a good bed with clean sheets and six warm blankets, the kind service of refined women, and such tisane or theriac as the science of the time could furnish, were apparently within the reach of all who needed them.

The condition of the poor, even at a later date, when the price of all common things had grievously increased with no corresponding expansion of the price of labour, appears most favourably to whose reads 'Les Mines et les Mineurs en 1455' with a mind still fresh from the impression of Zola's dismal epic on the same theme. It is true that the proprietor gained so much less that the king, having confiscated the mines of Jacques Cœur, found the transaction so unprofitable that he graciously restored the mines to the children of their former owner. But the miners were infinitely better off. In the first place, the very inferiority of fifteenth century engineering made the mines far safer dwelling-places. In those days it was impossible to sink a shaft nearly a mile into the bowels of the earth, or to construct subterranean galleries for several miles in area. When one vein, comparatively near the surface, was exhausted, the engineers of those days sought some other in a different place; and in these galleries, scarce deeper than the burrows of mole or rabbit, the miners were securer from accident, less exposed to firedamp, inundation, or explosion. The workmen of those days were not only housed—by night in dormitories well warmed in winter, with for each his narrow bedstead, feather bed or mattress, pillows, sheets, and blankets; by day in vast kitchens where there steamed for them an ample fare of meat, bread, cheese, wine, and on fast days fish and eggs; their washing was paid for them, their clothing found. And in addition to this they received high wages—the principal workmen from thirty to fifty livres a year, the most insignificant from five to ten. The lives of those days, as M. Siméon Luce remarks, must be estimated for its purchasing power (though not for its intrinsic value) at forty francs or livres of to-day. Thus a good workman or foreman must be imagined as gaining from 48% to 80% a year, beyond every possible outlay in health or sickness, while his sons, scarce out of childhood, would each gain a few pounds a year besides their keep and clothing. Thus it happened constantly that the workman of yesterday became the small proprietor of to-morrow, still labouring with his men, and earning justly whatever profit he reaped from his possession. We hear nothing of the labour of women in the mines. No Catherine, no Philomène, owed her blighted youth to the foul air and fouler company of the mines of 1455. In those days, indeed, a company of miners was not the revolutionary band of ruffians that we witness in the "documents" of M. Zola. A blow or a bad word, still more a blasphemy, was punished by a fine. Punishment was meted out to whosoever introduced a woman of ill fame into a society of miners. A special article condemned those unruly spirits who in all times have endeavoured to prevent their comrades from working. The regulations were strict; but the miners had their redress, their civic rights; they might appeal from the decisions of their director to the baillie of the town. In truth they had little to complain of, least of all of the fact that they were not wholly miners. In June and in September, when labour was wanted in the fields, the mines were closed; and through the weeks of haymaking and harvest the pallid miners, reaping and swathing out of doors, refreshed the memories of their childhood, and laid in a store of health for the long, chill, subterranean labour of the winter months.

In the hospital, in the ghetto, in the mine, M. Luce shows the poor man of that earlier day; in the fields we scarce perceive him, and there in truth the picture were less fair. The devastation of the Companies, the disproportion between the revenue and the taxes of the peasants, had ruined the agriculture of France. In Normandy many villages were completely abandoned. In the south of France the "Ordonnances" (1370-1380) show us that in the unfortified towns and villages not more than two-thirds of their ancient inhabitants survived. The ploughs were guided by children and old men; the sons of the peasants enlisted in the Companies (for it is ever preferable to be the hunter than the hunted). They said: "Nous ayons mieux faire le gallin gallant que labourer sans riens avoir," as Gerson heard them remark in his countryside. But this is the reverse of M. Luce's medal—another face not less real or more real than that he shows us. The interest, the complexity, and the difficulty of the Middle Ages are in their infinite variety, their lack of synthesis or a uniform standard.

NOVELS OF THE WEEK.

The Heriots. By Sir Henry Stewart Cunningham, K.C.I.E. 3 vols. (Macmillan & Co.)

Two False Moves. By Jean Middlemass. 3 vols. (White & Co.)

The Nugents of Cariconna. By Tighe Hopkins. 3 vols. (Ward & Downey.)

The Lloyds of Ballymore. By Edith Rochfort. 2 vols. (Chapman & Hall.)

The World and the Cloister. By O. J. Simon. 2 vols. (Same publishers.)

Prince Dick of Dahomey. By James Greenwood. (Ward & Downey.)

'THE HERIOTS' belongs to the very small class of novels which a grown-up person can read for recreation without being bothered by problems. In the earlier part it sparkles with wit and epigram; in the latter part everything happens pleasantly and makes the reader feel grateful for the privilege of living in a world where people are so good-natured, so anxious to help young lovers, and so ready to perpetrate a job for providing them with an income. It takes a man of wide experience and ripe judgment to be so juvenile and so free from cynicism. The freshness and the simplicity of mature years, which youthful omniscience regards with pity, are thoroughly enjoyable in 'The Heriots,' existing as they do in Sir Henry Cunningham's case along with a sound knowledge of men and books, a cultivated taste, and an agreeable and correct style. The conversation is not strictly taken from real life. It is too elaborate and much too brilliant for that, but the lively jests which the various speakers throw off so easily give the reader many a pleasant laugh. A critic, of course, looks out for specks to point at. Sir Henry Cunningham does not give him much chance. But a distinguished lawyer might perhaps have explained one difficulty which is left. The old family place of the Heriots had to be sold. A purchaser had at last been found, and in a few days the sale was to be completed. At the nick of time a windfall comes in, and the necessity for selling is removed. But how was the purchaser persuaded at the last moment to throw up his contract? In Sir H. Cunningham's delightful world purchasers must be unusually accommodating.

It is doubtful whether Miss Middlemass has not made a third "false move" in the publication of her latest story. Derek Horne, the hero, is a fatuous kind of person, who, besides a passion for Dorothy Bellingham (a lady who so readily believes calumny against him that she waits for no explanation before she marries a scoundrel whom she detests), entertains a rational affection—the true sentiment we are given to understand—for Ruth Churchill, a little school-mistress of humble birth, and has more than a little tenderness for a feline young person named Da Costa, a singer of rare charms and bad reputation. Except this susceptibility, which causes him much discomfort and a certain amount of conflict internally, there is nothing tangible in the character of Derek Horne. His Christian name is his most distinctive attribute. Dorothy Bellingham is a more natural creature, being simply a woman of unbridled passion, who, being exposed to a cruel temptation, commits an act which embitters and finally destroys her life. The kind of impulsive character attributed to her is properly associated with a keen susceptibility to remorse, and so far this sketchy delineation is well imagined. The humdrum little heroine Ruth Churchill deserves small praise. She is self-sacrificing and generous, but self-effacement is not a particularly dramatic quality. For the minor characters still less can be said. The provincial dialect which some of them affect belongs to no province, and the general vernacular of the narrative is of the most slipshod type.

The three charming volumes of 'The Nugents of Cariconna' are all that can be desired by those who enjoy light character studies divorced from too much plot and incident. The opening chapter is quite delightful, nor is the rest disappointing. It has lately been our fate to read more than one so-called Irish novel with no Irish flavour at all about it. But 'The Nugents of Cariconna' is distinctly Irish in feeling from first to last, with a whimsical yet not exaggerated air that is Erin in essence. The effect is produced by artistic and quite simple means. There is no description in the ordinary sense—the whole thing is "conveyed" to the reader in the surest and happiest manner. Humour, truth, kindness of feeling, and good taste are the principal ingredients. Miss Barbara, who keeps house for her brother Anthony, and Anthony himself are an excellent pair. In a certain quality, which we can only call quaintness for want of a less hackneyed word, these two are not alone. Most of the people in the story are human, natural, and individual to an uncommon degree, and their talk is like them. The opium episodes are a little too serious for the rest of the story.

'The Lloyds of Ballymore' is a commonplace story, but not otherwise objectionable. It will not do much in the way of exciting or amusing the reader, for it seems to be quite without imagination or humour. For some reason the scene passes in Ireland; but there is nothing in it to suggest Ireland more than any other part of the United Kingdom, except, indeed, a case of shooting, and any other form of demise would have answered equally well. It is just one of the many stories that seem to show no promise for the future and no particular present skill of any sort or kind, and it requires, therefore, neither analysis nor description.

'The World and the Cloister' is one of the most uncompromisingly tedious of a tedious class of book—the theological novel of the day. This one is nearly unreadable. The style is heavy and laboured, the dialogue is unnatural and forced, and the characters are wooden. The religious and controversial parts are dragged in by the head and shoulders in a most unskilful and insufferable fashion. To be brief, we are utterly unable to echo the cuckoo cry, "How very interesting!" of the heroine, Miss Irene Cassandra, when the hero, Mr. Roderick Huguenot, discourses by the hour on "disorganized" religions and other matters of that kind.

Mr. Greenwood seems to be more at home in the casual wards and such like haunts than on the West Coast of Africa. Anyway, he is scarcely sufficiently well acquainted with the ground to build on it a successful tale of romance and adventure. What imagination the story displays is rather tame and matter-of-fact; the principal incidents have been better treated elsewhere, and the descriptions of certain natural features are, to say the least, questionable. The first page of 'Prince Dick of Dahomey' gives an incorrect impression of the coast of the kingdom of Dahomey, and would more properly apply to the parts known as the Oil Rivers territory. And this is not the only discrepancy to be noted. How, for instance, the royal canoe is got through a surf in which no such frail craft could live a moment, and how the king (who is not permitted to leave the capital except in time of war) pays his visit to the oil hulk, are episodes which Mr. Greenwood may explain, though we cannot. Neither is his view of the inner significance and working of "the grand custom" the one generally accepted by those who have had much experience in the manners and customs of the Dahomians, more especially of their religious ceremonies. There are doubtless boys who will read 'Prince Dick' with some amount of interest, however, and who will not show too critical a spirit as regards Mr. Greenwood's treatment of things generally and his somewhat bald narrative style.

Naval Commissioners from 12 Charles II. to 1 George III., 1660-1760. Compiled from the Original Warrants and Returns by the late Sir George Jackson, Bart., Secretary of the Admiralty and Judge-Advocate of the Fleet. With Historical Notices by his Grandson, Sir G. F. Duckett, Bart. (Printed for the Author.)

SIR GEORGE JACKSON'S connexion with naval affairs extended over a great part of the last century. He was born in 1725, and entered the Navy Office about 1743. There he seems to have remained for the next twenty-three years, and in 1766 he was appointed Deputy-Secretary to the Admiralty. This employment he held till 1782, when he retired on a pension of 400*l.* a year, exceptionally granted "in consideration of his long service." He was latterly also Judge-Advocate of the Fleet, and acted in that capacity at the courts-martial on Admiral Keppel and Sir Hugh Palliser in 1779. In 1791 he was created a baronet, and in 1797 he assumed, by royal licence, the name of Duckett. He lived to the extreme age of ninety-seven, and died in December, 1822.

The mere mention of such a career is sufficient to give rise to a wish that a fragment of the modern craze for writing reminiscences had fallen to the share of Sir George Jackson. What yarns of the old navy and of the eighteenth century heroes might he not have told us if he had given his attention that way after his retirement from the public service! Cook he had known as a poor country lad, and had early befriended, and consequently his memory is embalmed in our atlases in the name of Port Jackson. With Howe and Keppel and Hawke, Anson and Boscawen, Sandwich and his brother, Mad Montagu, Mathews and Vernon, and Smith—Tom of Ten Thousand—and scores of others, he must have been more or less familiar. But he departed and, as far as we know, left no memorial of what he had seen and heard. It seems, indeed, the persistently hard fate of the navy that—with few, very few exceptions—those who know won't write and those who write don't know. Hence the number of myths that pass current as naval biography, the mass of absurdities or incongruities that ranks as naval history. One little bit of biographical work, however, Sir George Jackson did accomplish; though, as he seems to have drawn it up for his own personal ends, the gratitude of posterity is due not to him, the writer, but to his grandson, Sir George Duckett, the editor. It is a series of lists of naval commissioners, arranged alphabetically, chronologically, and by their several offices; and it is this which Sir George Duckett has now had printed for the use and benefit of those who wish to study the details of our naval organization. No lists of such detail have before this appeared in print. Those which are given in Schomberg's 'Naval Chronology' (vol. v.), though more comprehensive in point of time, are often extremely questionable in point of accuracy, and do not even profess to give the dates with any exactness. These, on the other hand, supply the dates of patent and of pay repeated in three different tables, so that the few inaccuracies of the press, almost inseparable from such a mass of tabulation, can be easily checked and corrected. The lists appear, from their own evidence, to have been drawn up about 1748. How Mr. Jackson came to assign the date 1760 is not stated. The title, at any rate, must have been written after the death of George II., but no appointment later than 1747 is mentioned; while George Doddington, the treasurer, and Sir Richard Haddock, the comptroller, who are shown in the lists as still holding office, both retired in 1749. Haddock died in 1751.

The editor's historical and biographical notices are interesting and suggestive, and he supplies many quaint references to the Rawlinson MSS. in the Bodleian Library, where they now rest, thanks to the jackdaw-like propensities of Mr. Secretary Pepys. A few errors of haste or confusion almost correct themselves by their very obvious nature. That under existing circumstances and the difficulties with which the editor has had to contend there are not more such, and of a more serious nature, is what we may chiefly wonder at, whilst we very sincerely thank Sir George Duckett for this result of his care and pains.

THEOLOGICAL BOOKS.

The Minister of Baptism: a History of Church Opinion from the Time of the Apostles, especially with Reference to Heretical, Schismatical, and Lay Administration. By Rev. Warwick Elwin, M.A. (Murray.)—Mr. Elwin begins his chapter of "Practical Conclusions" with the following sentence: "No one who has laboured through the tedious history of this question of the minister of baptism will presume to dogmatize rashly as to what the united mind of the Church is likely to be on irregular baptism, in every respect, if he reflects upon the variety of opinions which have been expressed at different times and in different places, and if he weighs carefully the wording of decrees and canons on the subject, with a view of marking not only what they say, but also what they leave unsaid." This is true. The history is unquestionably tedious, and no reader will get through it without much labour. And at the end one feels compassion for the state of mind in which it must have left the writer. He attaches supreme importance to baptism, and therefore it is of the utmost moment to him that the act shall turn out a real baptism. On what does this depend? This is the question which he hopes to solve by history. But history gives no solution. The Roman Church from the earliest times held that real baptism was effected when the person was baptized with water in the name of the Trinity. It was not of essential consequence who administered it. And when in the Middle Ages baptism was deemed necessary for salvation, midwives were instructed in the right method of administration, so that the newborn infant, if seized with mortal disease, might be sure to pass to heaven through their administration of baptism. From this point of view the Roman Church admitted the validity of lay, heretical, and schismatical baptism, if properly administered, and it cannot object to the baptism of Dissenters. But the Greek Church with some exceptions held that the efficacy of baptism depended on the title of the administrator to administer it, and refused to acknowledge lay, heretical, or schismatical baptism. Here is the dilemma for Mr. Elwin. The Roman Catholic, the Greek, and the English Churches according to him constitute the Catholic Church, although the Roman Catholic Church would probably regard Mr. Elwin as a heretic. The Church is thus rent asunder. Mr. Elwin prefers the Greek Church and Cyprian in opposition, as he himself tells us, to the opinion of the present Archbishop of Canterbury. And his solution of the difficulty is by adopting an innovation unknown to the Greek and Roman Churches, and one of modern invention, which he calls conditional baptism. The administrator is to say to a repentant Dissenter, "If you have not been baptized, then I baptize you," &c. The book contains a full history of the various opinions that have prevailed at various times. It is written with great earnestness. The author has taken pains to gather together all references to the subject from the earliest times to the present day. The largest portion of his materials had been already accumulated by Bingham and the controversialists of his time, and Mr. Elwin has little to add to the history of the controversy up to their day, except some facts in regard to the Greek Church. But he has re-edited the passages with care, and has generally consulted good editions. Still here and there, as might be expected, he shows that he is borrowing without knowledge of the authors, as when he twice refers to Nicetas Choniates as "Nicetas Chroniates," and repeats the mistake in his index.

The Church History Series.—Athanasius: his Life and Life-Work. By H. R. Reynolds, D.D. (The Religious Tract Society.)—Dr. Reynolds possesses some high qualifications for being the biographer of Athanasius. He has read the works of the great Father in the original with care, he has studied the best recent books on the subject, he has visited the lands in which St. Athanasius lived, and he has entire sympathy with his dogmatic beliefs. But his little book is not a success. He is too fond of big words. He calls, for instance, an historian an "historiographer," a partaker a "participator." And this fondness for grandiloquence extends to phrases and sentences. He speaks of the "dislocation of the Trinity." And here is a specimen of his sentences: "A demonstrative ability of no mean order was displayed by the Ptolemaic princes, the descendants of Alexander's general, Lagos, upon whom this sumptuous appanage of the Macedonian victories descended." Besides this the author evidently hoped to make his book interesting by strong epithets and brilliant description. Athanasius is in his pages nearly immaculate, but his enemies, including all kinds of unorthodox bishops, are guilty of every form of enormity—of "incredible baseness," of using "treacherous and lying calumnies," of placing all their charges "in most malevolent form," of practising "most hideous and atrocious cruelties," of forging letters, of "malicious slanders," of "proceedings" that "were clamorous and indecent in the extreme," and such like in abundance. The desire to make a brilliant picture leads Dr. Reynolds to pervert the facts of history. We take our instances from the references to Julian, though they might have been taken from almost every part of the book. Dr. Reynolds says: "The success of his ministry forced from the eccentric and petulant Emperor the avowal that 'he hated' (Jul. Ep., vi.) Athanasius." In the letter referred to there is no such expression. It is a mere unwarranted paraphrase of Dr. Reynolds, which is not justified by the epithet "abominable" which Julian applies to Athanasius. In this same letter Julian speaks of the Alexandrian archbishop as "hateful to the gods"; Dr. Reynolds paraphrases this "great foe of the gods." In the following paragraph Dr. Reynolds refers to another Epistle as indicating that Julian recognized "that in a very special sense the cause of Christ and that of Athanasius were in his judgment identical." Such a statement is a wild inference. In Letter xxvi. Julian describes Athanasius as "most impudent" and as "stimulated by his usual boldness," and in a subsequent letter "as a busybody" and "a shabby little man," but there is no trace of respect for his character or of fear of his influence. Notwithstanding these drawbacks the reader will find much valuable information about St. Athanasius in the book and will get a tolerably accurate notion of his life-work.

Christianity in relation to Science and Morals. By Malcolm MacColl. (Rivingtons.)—This is an extremely clever and ingenious exposition of the Nicene Creed, and naturally deals with questions outside the province of a literary journal. The main object of the author is to meet the objections to the supernatural which the diffusion of scientific knowledge has undoubtedly called forth, and the author shows much dialectic skill in expounding his own view of miracles, and showing its compatibility with modern scientific theories. We must, however, remark that he has not avoided the temptations under which controversialists labour of hazarding occasionally general assertions which hardly bear scrutiny. For instance, he says, "Sorrow for the dead is also an instinct which no animal shares with man." This is rather too sweeping a statement.

The Language of the New Testament. By the late Rev. William Henry Simcox, M.A. (Hodder & Stoughton.)—The aim of this book is stated in the preface to be "to indicate, not exhaustively, but representatively, the points wherein the language of the New Testament differs from classical and even post-classical usage; to classify such differences according to their origin, and thus to vivify the study of purely verbal grammar and bring it into connexion with wider intellectual interests and sympathies." The author has carried out his aim in a masterly way. He shows a thorough knowledge of the niceties of classical Greek, and points out with accuracy wherein Hellenistic usage differs from that of the classical period. He is judicious in tracing these differences to the influence which Hebrew or Latin or the novelty of Christian ideas exerted on the language of the writers of the New Testament. He confesses that he is not so well acquainted with modern Greek, but his scholarly instinct is sure, and he makes no mistake. Occasionally he might have added illustrations from modern Greek, as in his remarks on ἰδιος, if his knowledge of that language had been wider. But the supreme merit of the book is that its opinions are everywhere pervaded by sound common sense and freedom from bias. Mr. Simcox's interpretations seem to us to hit exactly the meaning of the words and sentences. And he knows precisely how far grammar can go in suggesting the explanation and where its province ceases. Mr. Simcox had the materials of his book at hand in the New Testament grammars of Buttmann and Winer, but in all cases he has gone to the originals, examined the evidence for the readings, and judged for himself. It is a pity that the material is given in such a condensed form. The student of the book must constantly turn up his New Testament, and he is often left to translate for himself where he would have been much aided by having the author's own interpretation. These defects mar the value of a book which deserves, and will well repay, the attention of all students of the New Testament.

KARAITIC writings appear so seldom that we may welcome Prof. Margoliouth's edition of Japhet ben Ali of Bosrah's Arabic commentary on Daniel, which forms vol. i. part iii. of the Semitic Series of the "Anecdota Oxoniensia" (Oxford, Clarendon Press). The professor has added an English translation with notes, and a preface in which the life of the author is given, together with the description of the MSS. utilized for the edition. Japhet, who wrote at the end of the tenth century, was perhaps a contemporary of the famous Saadia of the Fayyoom, who composed an Arabic commentary on Daniel, fragments of which exist in the Bodleian Library; Japhet's commentary will be a help for an edition of that of Saadia. The critical school, however, will learn little from these early commentaries; only now and then some lexicographical remarks found in them will be of interest. But without early commentaries there would not be a critical school, and they are therefore important for the history of exegesis. Prof. Margoliouth has enhanced his excellent edition by giving at the end a vocabulary of uncommon Arabic words used by Japhet, which were most likely common in the spoken dialect of the time.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

WE have received from Messrs. Field & Tuer King Squash of Toadyland, by an Envoy Extraordinary, an amusing little volume. King Squash, who represents a debased society, rules Toadyland (that is England) with the apparent support of Mr. "Tufthunter Carryshaw," in whom some will be disposed to find the distinguished permanent secretary of a Government office, Baron Ferdinand de Rothschild, and Sir Wilfrid Lawson. Her Majesty the Queen is in retirement at Osborne, and the Prince of Wales continues to live at Marlborough House, regretting, but unable to put an end to, the usurpation, supported though he is by no less a friend than Mr. Labouchere, while Lord Randolph Churchill joins in denunciation of the state of things established by King Squash. We have given some of the real names thinly veiled in the volume, which relates the revolution carried out on behalf of the Queen and Prince against crowned stupidity in the form of Squash. The book appears to be the work of a Tory Democrat, and its political allusions cannot be treated here. It contains some rather well-written passages, one or two of which are, perhaps, worth quoting. This description of Belgrave Square strikes us as amusing: "In the centre is a beautiful garden, shaded by noble trees, and intersected by smooth gravel paths, upon which no human foot has ever trodden." So is this explanation of the Socialist policy:

"If we do kill the goose with the golden eggs," they seem to say, "at least we shall get a good dinner on Michaelmas Day." And the following words, if flippant, will be thought by many to be true: "When a lady asks you to 'come and have a cup of tea quietly,' she means that you are to be one of about twenty persons, mostly women—for I never saw any country so prolific of women as Toadyland; they literally swarm like bees." London on Sunday is well hit off: "It was Sunday morning. A lethargy had fallen on a busy world. The streets were empty; vehicular traffic was all but suspended; the long vista of irregular and hideous houses stretching in every direction was unrelieved by a single sign of life. It was a grand moment for cats; but cats were too sleepy to avail themselves of the opportunity." And King Squash becomes almost brilliant in the following passage: "'Thanks to the newspapers, everything is known. We have no secrets. All our fortifications, the manufacture of our guns, the construction of our ships, the numerical and physical strength of our army and navy—all are public property. We pride ourselves on having no secrets, except in biscuit-making; so long as we can keep that dark, we are satisfied.'"

THE extreme difficulty (we might, perhaps, say the utter impossibility) of reviewing seriously the Letters of Madame du Noyer, translated and edited by Florence Layard (Bentley & Son), may be illustrated by two excerpts from the preface and one from the body of the book. "Tea," writes the editor, "does not seem to have come into fashion [in England] until 'good Queen Anne' and her 'dear Mrs. Masham' (the strong-minded Duchess of Marlborough) had hobnobbed over their court gossip and dishes of tea." Elsewhere she speaks of Voltaire's father as "old M. de Voltaire." In the text we read: "As you are aware, the Swiss are, as Sosia was, 'all things to all men,' so it is no matter for surprise that a Switzer should be allowed to travel through countries which are inimical to each other." On "Sosia" we have this note: "Sosia Galla, a licentious Roman lady at the court of the Emperor Tiberius, from which she was ultimately banished.—Trans." What, in the name of Tenterden steeple, poor Sosia Galla's peccadilloes and misfortunes could have to do with Switzerland, might have struck "Trans.," one would think. We have not the French original before us; but it is as certain as anything can be that the reference is to the well-known opening speech of Sosie in Molière's "Amphitryon," where the terrified slave supposes himself to be challenged, and replies as a passsword, "Messieurs, ami de tout le monde." But this is a trifle to the confounding of Abigail Hill with Sarah Marlborough—we should be sorry for "Trans." if the duchess had known of it—or the stupendous blunder of calling Arouet le Vieux "old M. de Voltaire." For the latter, at least, shows that the editor and translator knows absolutely nothing of the times and people with whom and which she undertakes to deal—an ignorance, we may observe, equally evidenced by her calling Henri de Sévigné "Field-Marshal" (of course for Maréchal de Camp). This being the case, it is not surprising that she has been deluded into the idea that these letters of, or attributed to, "Pimpette's" mamma, the very wideawake literary lady who tried to catch Voltaire in his salad days, are genuine documents. We do not know that they have ever been seriously criticized in France, though no doubt they have. But it is impossible to read them without seeing that they form part of that immense literature of their time—the end of the seventeenth and beginning of the eighteenth century—which supplied the want of newspapers by gossiping pamphlets and sham memoirs. Undated, addressed to an anonymous and unidentified correspondent, and totally destitute of those vital marks which always testify to real correspondence, they are as obviously "gazettes" as anything could be. They are not unamusing though the translator—by most conscientiously excluding the naughty stories, and with equal conscientiousness indicating their place—has lessened their attractions for the frivolous. They contain a number of borrowings from published memoirs, possibly some unpublished but current gossip, and no doubt a good deal of sheer fiction. An edition of them by (if such a person could be found to take the trouble) M. Chérueil, M. de Boislisle, or any one else thoroughly versed in the printed and unprinted miscellanies and biographies of the end of Louis XIV.'s reign, might not be valueless. Edited by a person who talks of "the almost obsolete court French of the reign of Louis XIV.," and who has written a note on La Fontaine fuller of blunders than anything of the kind we have recently seen, we fear that "valueless" is the only adjective they merit.

The Story of an Old Farm (Brentano's) is, as the sub-title implies, the history of New Jersey during the eighteenth century. Mr. Andrew D. Mellick, junior, who is the author of the book, is the descendant of those who left Germany to settle on the old farm, and whose names have been changed from Moelich to Mellick. The documents, showing life and manners in the early colonial days, which have been preserved, contain many curious particulars, and if the information in them had been properly used this book would have been much more valuable. The author thinks that in its present form it is "calculated to interest lovers and students of general history." Now those persons do not care about perusing a thrice-told tale, and much of the contents of this portly volume has been printed again and again. There was much fighting in the Jerseys during the revolutionary war, yet most of it is but remotely connected with the old farm. However, those who can find time for reading the 624 large pages which form this work will have their patience and industry rewarded.

In his Simple Shorthand: a Revised Edition of Taylor's Original System (Groombridge & Sons), Mr. Wm. Heather, although taking Taylor's well-known alphabet as his basis, has departed from Taylor's principles in nearly every particular. He has gained something in brevity by sacrificing the distinctiveness of Taylor's characters and by introducing a large number of alphabetical prefixes, terminations, and signs for words, which have very little to fix them on the memory. Joined characters for vowels are used—seven in number—consisting of straight strokes and vertical or horizontal curves; and as numerous hooked characters are employed for double consonants, there will be danger of clashing upon does not claim to have proved the efficacy of his system by actual use, but appears to be one of the numerous class who seek to test the value of their ideas by experimenting on the public. We have searched the book in vain either for any marks of originality or any characteristics that could recommend the system to the favourable attention of learners.

THE object of Mr. David Ross's Mnemonic Time Charts of English History (Stanford) is to show at a glance the chronological relations of the leading men and important events in our annals. The idea is ingenious, and is carried out with commendable accuracy; but one or two of the abbreviations are rather obscure; for instance, "Cg" for Canning. On the whole, the atlas may be cordially recommended to students as a companion to their text-books, more especially as it would be for the most part unintelligible without some previous knowledge, and so cannot be used for purposes of mere cramming.

MR. MURRAY has done well in publishing a Handbook to the Riviera, containing those parts relating to Provence, from Marseilles to Mentone, which appear in the second part of the 'Handbook to France.' A laudable desire is displayed to keep the new book up to date, a fly-leaf stating that a new hotel called "Métro-pole" has been opened at Cannes, an event which must have occurred after the book had been printed. Places so popular as Cannes and Monaco undergo changes at short intervals, and some entries regarding the latter already require revision. It is said that on the south side of the town [of Monaco] "is the church of St. Nicholas, rebuilt on the site of the old one by M. Blanc." The old Cathedral of St. Nicholas stands where it did, being some distance from the site of the new one. The reading-room at the Casino is not open to all, as is stated here, those who visit it requiring tickets. The author of the guide-book seems to be unaware of the fact that there are three sets of tickets issued, one ticket admitting a stranger to the concert and reading rooms, another to the gaming rooms, and a third to all three. The following sentence should be recast: "The Prince [of Monaco] and his territories now depend entirely on the Casino at Monte Carlo for their revenues." The Prince is an autocrat. Every payment is made to him. We have called attention to the slips which will be noticed by most of those who use this hand-book. Notwithstanding, it will prove most useful to those who confine their travels in France to the coast from Marseilles to Mentone.

A SPECIAL edition of the Year-Book of New South Wales, prepared for the New South Wales Government and dated 1890, apparently intended to form a section of Trübner's 'Year-Book of Australia,' is interesting, for it contains an excellent prize essay entitled 'The Future Position of Australia among Nations.'

WE have received from Messrs. Harrison & Sons The India Office List for 1890, in which we can find no errors. The India Office, Colonial Office, and Foreign Office Lists form excellent reference books, and it is difficult, indeed, to find grounds upon which to criticize them unless it be the presence at the end of too large a bulk of advertisements, generally torn out by readers before the works find a place upon their shelves. In the present volume the maps are, perhaps, on the whole less useful than those in the 'Colonial Office List'; and it is a question whether one good map of the whole of India, clearly showing the railways, would not have been better than the somewhat imperfect maps (which, however, as railway maps, are good) in the 1890 issue of the 'India List.' We note that while Kashmir is marked as part of India, Baluchistan is not so marked, which is contrary to present usage.

WE are glad to see that Mr. Stock has again issued Mr. Slater's useful serial Book Prices Current, the third volume of which is now before us. Foreign works have been more extensively noticed than in the preceding issues. The volume is one that collectors will do well to buy, as they will soon save the price of it if they are guided by the information it supplies.

WE have on our table A Visit to the Transvaal, by P. Morrison (Sonnenschein),—Beyond the Argentine, by May Frances (Allen & Co.),—Life of Honoré de Balzac, by F. Wedmore (Scott),—Morgante le Lesser, by Sirius (Sonnenschein),—The Gift of D. D. Home, by Madame D. Home (Kegan Paul),—A Biographical Dictionary of Freethinkers, by J. M. Wheeler (Progressive Publishing Company),—A Guide to the Study of Nineteenth Century Authors, by L. M. Hodgkins (Boston, U.S., Heath & Co.),—Cæsar, Gallic War, VI., edited by C. Colbeck (Macmillan),—Economic Morals, by W. Richmond (Allen & Co.),—A Theory of Lunar Surfacing by Glaciation, by S. E. Peal (Thacker & Co.),—New Light from Old Eclipses, by W. M. Page (St. Louis, U.S., Barnes Publishing Co.),—Wrinkles and Notions, by Mrs. de Salis (Longmans),—How to be Beautiful, by T. H. Dean (Trübner),—New Amazonia, by Mrs. G. Corbett (Tower Publishing Company),—The Man-Hunter, by D. Donovan (Chatto & Windus),—"Heigh ho! for a Husband", by S. Leighton (Remington),—The Guardians (Boston, U.S., Houghton & Co.),—

A Mexican Girl, by F. Thickett (Boston, U.S., Ticknor & Co.),—Christmas Eve, by Schleiermacher, from the German by W. Hastie (Edinburgh, T. & T. Clark),—Mont Orgueil Castle, by J. E. Corbière (Biggs & Debenham),—The Wreck of a World, by W. Grove (Digby & Long),—Parodies and other Burlesque Pieces, edited by H. Morley (Routledge),—The Smoker's Garland, Part I. (Liverpool, 'Cope's Tobacco Plant' Office),—Voices from the Holy Sepulchre, and other Poems, by A. Gurney (Kegan Paul),—The Harp of Jesus, by the Rev. M. Russell (Dublin, Gill),—Sermons to Boys, by J. T. Bramston (Sonnenschein),—The Indian Religions; or, Results of the Mysterious Buddhism, by H. Jennings (Redway),—La Philosophie de Lamennais, by P. Janet (Paris, Alcan),—Étude sur l'Argot Français, by M. Schwob and G. Guieysse (Paris, Bouillon),—Laguet or Laghetto, a Historical Sketch of its Shrine, by Dr. G. A. Muller (Nice, Malvano-Mignon),—Essai sur les Données Immédiates de la Conscience, by H. Bergson (Paris, Alcan),—and Latinitische Semasiologie oder Bedeutungslehre, by F. Heerdegen (Berlin, Calvary). Among New Editions we have Dictionnaire Latin-Français, by L. Quicherat and A. Daveluy, revised by E. Chatelet (Hachette),—A History of Art, by W. H. Goodyear (New York, Barnes & Co.),—Prehistoric Times, by Sir John Lubbock, Bart., M.P. (Williams & Norgate),—Parallel Translations of Lines and Surfaces, by D. Mavor (Aberdeen, Brown & Co.),—An Introduction to the Study of Browning, by A. Symonds (Cassell),—and Poems, by G. T. Coster (Stock).

LIST OF NEW BOOKS.

ENGLISH.

Theology.

- Bairstow's (J. A.) Sensational Religion, in Past Times and the Present Day, cr. 8vo. 2/6.
Gough's (E.) The Bible True from the Beginning, Vol. 3, 16/6.
Jefferies's (Rev. E. H.) Diabology, the Person and Kingdom of Satan, 4/6 (The Bishop Paddock Lecture, 1889).
Ross's (A. H.) The Lord's Prayer and other Sermons for Children, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
Tymms's (T. V.) The Mystery of God, cheaper ed. 4/6 cl.
Vaughan's (Rev. H.) Stones from the Quarry, a Volume of Sermons, cr. 8vo. 4/6 cl.
Wolfe's (Rev. J.) The Preacher's Homiletical Commentary on the Book of Chronicles, 8vo. 5/ cl.

Poetry and the Drama.

- Dawson's (J.) The Makers of Modern English, Handbook to the Greater Poets of the Century, cr. 8vo. 5/ cl.
Harris's (D. G.) Essays in Verse, 12mo. 3/6 cl.
Hind and Odysseus of Homer, translated by A. Pope, Notes and Introduction by Rev. T. A. Buckley, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.
Macready (William Charles), by W. Archer, cr. 8vo. 2/6 bds.
Nettleship's (J. T.) Robert Browning, Essays and Thoughts, cr. 8vo. 7/6 cl.

Shakespeare, New Variorum Edition, edited by H. H. Furness: Vol. 7, 'As You Like It,' roy. 8vo. 18/ cl.

History and Biography.

- Davidson's (Lieut.-Col. D.) Memories of a Long Life, 6/ cl.
D'Aubigné's (J. H. M.) The Story of the Reformation, translated by Rev. J. Gill, 8vo. 3/6 cl.
Lane's (L. M.) Life and Writings of Alexander Vinet, with Introduction by the Ven. F. W. Farrar, 8vo. 7/6 cl.
Meiklejohn's (J. M. D.) A New History of England and Great Britain, Part 2, 1509-1890, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.

Geography and Travel.

- Du Chaillu's (P.) Adventures in the Great Forest of Equatorial Africa, Map and Illustrations, cr. 8vo. 7/6 cl.
Gillmore's (P.) Through Gasa Land, and the Scene of the Portuguese Aggression, 8vo. 7/6 cl.
Lane's (E. W.) An Account of the Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians, 12mo. 2/ cl.
Seton-Karr's (H. W.) Ten Years' Travel and Sport in Foreign Lands, or Travels in the Eighties, cheap edition, 5/ cl.

Philology.

- Picard (E.) and Fremantle's (S.) Nautical Terms and Phrases in French and English, cr. 8vo. 3/6 bds.
Pindar, the Olympian and Pythian Odes, with Introductory Essay, &c., by B. Gildersleeve, cr. 8vo. 7/4 cl.
Sonnenschein's (E. A.) Latin Grammar for Schools, in 2 Parts, Accidence and Syntax, cr. 8vo. 3/ cl.

Science.

- Cole's (W. H.) Notes on Permanent-Way Material, Plate-laying, Points, and Crossings, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.
Dixon's (C.) Annals of Bird Life, a Year-Book of British Ornithology, illustrated, cr. 8vo. 7/6 cl.
Gibson (G. A.) and Russell's (W.) Physical Diagnosis, a Guide to the Methods of Clinical Investigation, 10/6 cl.
Hoffman's (J. W.) Cyclopedia of Foods, Condiments, and Beverages, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
Martin's (E.) Glances into Nature's Secrets and Strolls on Beach and Down, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
Mullin's (Lieut.-General J.) Irrigation Manual, 84/ hf. calf.
Obersteiner's (H.) Anatomy of the Central Nervous Organs in Health and Disease, trans. by Hill, illust., 25/ cl.
Robinson's (W.) Gas and Petroleum Engines, a Practical Treatise on the Internal Combustion Engine, 8vo. 14/ cl.
Rudolf and Jakesch's (Drs.) Clinical Diagnosis, translated by J. Cagney, roy. 8vo. 25/ cl.

Thornton's (A.) Advanced Physiography, illust. cr. 8vo. 4/6
 Thurston's (R. H.) Handbook of Engine and Boiler Trials, &c., 2vo. 2/1 cl.
 Tripplitt's (J.) Watch and Clock Making in 1889, 8vo. 2/sd.
 Watt's (E.) Modern Practical Gardening, Vegetables,
 Flowers, and Fruits, how to Grow Them, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
 Winckel's (Dr. F.) Text-Book of Obstetrics, translated under the supervision of C. Edgar, roy. 8vo. 28/ cl.

General Literature.

Alexander's (Mrs.) A Life's Interest, cr. 8vo. 2/ bds.
 Baring-Gould's (Rev. S.) Eve, a Novel, cr. 8vo. 2/ bds.
 Baring-Gould's (Rev. S.) The Pennycomequicks, a Novel, 3/6
 Barrie's (J. M.) My Lady Nicotine, cr. 8vo. 6/ buckram.
 Boldredwood's (R.) The Miner's Right, a Tale of the Australian Goldfields, 3 vols. cr. 8vo. 31/8 cl.
 Bradshaw's (B.) Dictionary of Mineral Waters, &c., 1890, with a Map, 12mo. 2/6 cl.
 Butler's (E.) Consideration of Gentle Ways, and other Essays, 12mo. 3/6 cl.
 Claverling's (V.) Till the Great Assize, 3 vols. 31/8 cl.
 Donovan's (D.) The Man from Manchester, illust. cr. 8vo. 6/Doyle's (A. C.) The Firm of Girdlestone, a Romance of the Unromantic, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.
 Fletcher's (J. P.) Mr. Spivey's Clerk, a Novel, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.
 Gordon's (A. J.) Ecce Venit, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
 Handcraft, a most Reliable Basis of Technical Education in Schools and Classes, Intro. by Horsfall, 4to. 7/6 cl.
 Hutton's (A.) Fixed Bayonets, a Complete System of Fence for the British Magazine Rifle, illustrated, 4to. 7/6 cl.
 Johnston's (D. L.) The Paradise of the North, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.
 Kettle's (R. M.) The Old Hall among the Water Meadows, 6/
 Landon's (W. S.) Pericles and Aspasia, edited by G. C. Crump, Etchings by H. Raitton, 2 vols. 12mo. 10/8 cl.
 Lang's (A.) Old Friends, Essays in Epistolary Parody, 6/6 cl.
 Marryat's (F.) A Scarlet Sin, 2 vols. cr. 8vo. 21/ cl.
 Moilliet's (S. H. K.) Broad Lines, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
 O'Brien's (W.) When We Were Boys, a Novel, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.
 Payn's (J.) The Burnt Million, 3 vols. cr. 8vo. 31/6 cl.
 Philip's (A.) The Function of Labour in the Production of Wealth, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
 Radical Cure for Ireland, a Letter to the People of England and Scotland, demy 8vo. 7/6 cl.
 Rajah's Heir (The), 3 vols. cr. 8vo. 31/6 cl.
 Riddell's (Mrs. J. H.) Daisies and Buttercups, cr. 8vo. 2/ bds.
 Stephen's (C. E.) Quaker Strongholds, cr. 8vo. 5/ cl.
 Stowe's (H. B.) Uncle Tom's Cabin, cr. 8vo. 2/ cl. (Chandos Classics.)
 Taylor's (W.) Progressive Object Lessons for Infant Schools,
 cr. 8vo. 2/4 cl.
 Two Kinds of Truth, a Test of all Theories, by F. E. T., 7/6
 Tytler's (S.) Logie Town, cheap edition, cr. 8vo. 2/ bds.
 White's (Mrs. T. W.) A Romance of Posilipo, cr. 8vo. 2/ bds.
 Worboise's (E. J.) Our New House, or Keeping up Appearances, cheap edition, cr. 8vo. 3/ cl.

FOREIGN.

Theology.

Aruch Completum, edit. A. Kohut, Vol. 6, 20m.
 Böhl (E.): Die Reinfertigung durch den Glauben, 7m.
Fine Art and Archaeology.
 Luebeck (E.): Das Seewesen der Griechen u. Römer, 3m.
 Lützow (C. v.): Raffaels Bildungs- u. Entwicklungsgang, 12m.
 Naquet (F.): Fragonard, 3fr.

History and Biography.

Glasson (E.): Les Communaux et le Domaine Rural à l'Époque Française, 4fr.
 Houghton (A.): Les Origines de la Restauration des Bour- bons en Espagne, 7fr. 50.

Philology.

Galiens II Restorés, veröff. v. E. Stengel, 14m.
 Henzen (W.): Träume in der Altnordischen Sagalitteratur, 2m.
 Middendorf (E. W.): Die Einheimischen Sprachen Perus,
 Vol. 1, 16m.
 Sammlung der Griechischen Dialekt-Inschriften, hrsg. v. H.
 Collitz, Vol. 2, Part 2, 2m. 60.

Science.

Eisler (P.): Das Gefäß- u. Periphere Nervensystem d.
Gorilla, 20m.
 Grashof (F.): Theoretische Maschinenlehre, Vol. 3, 6m.

General Literature.

Compayré (G.): Organisation Pédagogique, 3fr. 50.
 Cyon (E. de): La France et la Russie, 1fr. 50.
 Fabre (F.): L'Abbe Rottelet, Dessins de Laurens, 2fr. 50.
 Laforet (D. de): La Femme d'Affaires, 3fr. 50.
 Macé (G.): Mon Musée Criminel, 3fr. 50.
 Mirbeau (O.): Sébastien Roch, 3fr. 50.
 Perret (P.): Les Derniers Réveurs, 3fr. 50.
 Valmore (J.): Les Mirages, 3fr. 50.

THE TEACHING OF LANGUAGES.

University, Edinburgh, April 11, 1890.

It is the wisdom of reviewers to enter into no public communications with the writers whose works they review; nevertheless, in the interest of the public an exception may occasionally be allowed. It is for the sake of the public, not for any pleasure or profit of my own, that I have for years advocated a radical reform in the method of teaching languages, especially the classical languages in this country. My reform consists simply in putting into practice Bacon's celebrated maxim, "Speaking makes a ready man, reading makes a full man, and writing makes an accurate man." You will observe that, while my method has no objection either to the reading or the writing, in their proper place, it protests against the habitual neglect of the speaking element, that is, of the use of the ear and tongue as the point to start from. While approving this method in theory you express a doubt whether it can be carried out in practice; you say it requires more talent and energy than can generally be found in teachers. As a practical man, I feel called on to controvert this. It is not more difficult, but rather more easy, to commence by hearing and speaking and thinking in a foreign tongue than by reading and by rules. My principle is to shake hands directly with the new medium of expression, and bring in the rules only as you acquire material on which to use them. This is the method of nature, and the easiest way of acquiring a living familiarity with a strange medium of expression. It is a mere trick of nature, demanding no special genius or talent in the person who uses it. Only the teacher must teach himself in this way before he can teach others. He must give up his bookish habits and look nature and living speech in the face. Then, again, you seem to think that the colloquial method would throw all the burden on the teacher and give the learner no spur to self-exertion. Yes, no doubt it might, if it were used alone; but I have already said that I commence with the ear and the tongue only to give the understanding familiar material on which its formative function may be exercised. With me the grammar rules, and the principles of comparative philology, follow on the colloquy as certainly and as closely as the nave of a cathedral follows on its porch. Man is a speaking animal, no doubt, and so is a parrot; but he is a great deal more, and as such must be treated by every intelligent teacher, who may never forget that he must measure his success in his work only by the degree in which he has taught the learner to teach himself. Like the gardener, he knows how to stimulate and manure the plant; but the plant does its own part in the business, and that is to grow stoutly and independently from its own root. J. S. BLACKIE.

 Prof. Blackie's system is undoubtedly ideal for the learner, but in effect he admits that not many teachers able to carry it out are to be had at present. Consequently they must fetch a high price. He does not controvert the statement that his system of teaching would in general require for a given number of pupils a relatively large staff of teachers.

THE SPRING PUBLISHING SEASON.

MR. DAVID NUTT will publish in the course of the spring 'The Women of Turkey and their Folk-lore,' by Lucy M. J. Garnett, with introduction on the ethnography of Turkey by Mr. Stuart Glennie, 'Views and Reviews: Essays in Appreciation: Literature,' by Mr. W. E. Henley, author of 'A Book of Verses,'—a second instalment of Dr. Sommer's edition of the 'Morte d'Arthur,' comprising bibliographical introduction, list of various readings, notes on Malory's language, index raisonné of personages, glossary, &c., 'The Origin of Civilization,' by Mr. Stuart Glennie, and 'An Attic Vocabulary,' by E. Dawes. The reprint of Painter's 'Palace of Pleasure' and Mr. Jacobs's edition of Howell may be looked for in the summer.

THE 'DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY.'

THE following is the end of the list of the names which it is intended to insert under K (Section II.) in the 'Dictionary of National Biography,' and the first part of those under L (Section I.). When one date is given, it is the date of death, unless otherwise stated. An asterisk is affixed to a date when it is only approximate. The editors of the 'Dictionary' will be obliged by any notice of omissions addressed to them at Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co.'s, 15, Waterloo Place, S.W. They particularly request that when new names are suggested, an indication may be given of the source from which they are derived.

Knightley, Sir Richard, Puritan, fl. 1588
 Knighton, Henry, historian, temp. Richard II.
 Knighton, Sir William, Bart., M.D., G.C.H., physician, 1776-1836

Knightsbridge, John, D.D., founder of Casualty Professorship, 1661.

Knill, Richard, Dissenting minister, 1857
 Knipe, Thomas, D.D., Master of Westminster School, 1638-1711

Kniverton, Daniel, Royalist, ex. 1643
 Knivet, Thomas, Lord Knivet, 1622
 Knolles, Richard, 'History of the Turks,' 1610
 Knolles, Sir Robert, military commander, 1317-1407
 Knolles, Thomas, President of Magdalen College, Oxford, 1548

Knolls or Knowles, Sir Francis, K.G., statesman, 1593
 Knollys, Charles, styled Earl of Banbury, fl. 1693
 Knollys, Hansard, Nonconformist divine, 1599-1691
 Knollys, William, Earl of Banbury, 1631
 Knollys, William, styled Earl of Banbury, general, 1834
 Knollys, Sir William, Usher of the Black Rod, 1797-1883
 Knott, Edward, Jesuit, 1580-1656

Knowler, Rev. William, LL.D., editor of the Stratford, Letters, 1669-1772

Knowles, Sir Charles, Bart., admiral, 1704-77

Knowles, Sir Charles Henry, Bart., admiral, 1754-1831

Knowles, Gilbert, botanist and poet, fl. 1724

Knowles, Herbert, poet, 1798-1817

Knowles, James, Nonconformist divine, 1685

Knowles, James, lexicographer, 1759-1840

Knowles, James Sheridan, dramatist, 1784-1862

Knowles, John, Scotian, fl. 1668

Knowles, John, Nonconformist divine, 1685

Knowles, John, F.R.S., biographer of Fuseli, 1781-1841

Knowles, Richard Brinsley, journalist, 1820-82

Knowles, Thomas, D.D., divine, 1723-1802

Knowlton, Thomas, botanist, 1692-1782

Knox, Alexander, lay theological writer, 1831

Knox, Andrew, Bishop of Raphoe, 1559*-1633

Knox, John, Scotch Reformer, 1505-72

Knox, John, the younger, Scotch Reformer, fl. 1681

Knox, John, bookseller, 1720-91

Knox, Robert, traveller, b. 1641*, fl. 1720

Knox, Robert, geologist, antiquary, and hydrographer, 1775-1858

Knox, Robert, M.D., anatomist and zoologist, 1791-1862

Knox, Robert, D.D., Presbyterian minister, 1883

Knox, Thomas Francis, D.D., Catholic divine, 1822-82

Knox, Vicissimus, D.D., miscellaneous writer, 1752-1811

Knox, William, politician and author, 1732-1810

Knox, William, Scottish poet, 1789-1825

Knox, William, D.D., Bishop of Derry, 1762-1831

Knyvet, Sir John, Lord Chancellor, 1300

Knyvet, Thomas, Lord Knyvet of Esrick, 1622

Knyvet, Charles, musician, 1752-1822

Knyvet, William, musical composer, 1779-1856

Kollman, Augustus Frederick Charles, organist and composer, 1765-1829

König, Charles, K.H., F.R.S., mineralogist, 1774-1851

Kotzwara, Franz, musician, 1793

Krabtree. See Crabtree.

Kratch, Nicholas, mathematician, fl. 1550

Kuerden, Richard, M.D., antiquary, 1622*-1701*

Kuper, Sir Augustus Leopold, G.C.B., admiral, 1809-85

Kyan, Esmond, Irish rebel, ex. 1798

Kyd, Stewart, politician and legal writer, 1811

Kyd, Thomas, dramatist, fl. 1599

Kydermyster. See Kedermyster.

Kyffin, Morris, Welsh translator, fl. 1595

Kyle, James, D.D., Catholic prelate, 1788-1869

Kyllington, Richard, theologian, 1361

Kymer, Gilbert, M.D., Dean of Sarum, 1468

Kynaston. See Kinston.

Kynaston, Edward, actor, fl. 1702

Kynaston, Herbert, D.D., Master of St. Paul's School, 1809-78

Kynaston, Rev. John, M.A., Fellow of Brasenose, 1728-83

Kynder, Philip, 'The Surfeit,' 1597-1655*

Kynewulf, poet, 1008

Kynnesman, Rev. Arthur, M.A., grammarian, 1682-1770

Kynton, John, D.D., Divinity Professor at Oxford, 1539

Kynwelmarch, Francis, poet, fl. 1576

Kyngraham or Cuninghame, John, Carmelite, 1399

Kyrie, John, the Man of Ross, 1634-1724

Kyte, Francis, engraver, fl. 1725

Kyte, John, Archbishop of Armagh. See Kite.

Kyteler, Dame Alice, sorceress, fl. 1324

Kytson, Sir Thomas, citizen and mercer of London, 1455-1540

Labelye, Charles, civil engineer, 1762

Lablache, Frederick, vocalist, 1814-87

Lablache, Louis, vocalist, 1794-1855

Labouchere, Henry, Lord Taunton, 1798-1869

Lacey, William, D.D., divine, 1671

Lackington, George, bookseller and publisher, 1768-1844

Lackington, James, bookseller, 1746-1815

La Cloche, James, son of Charles II.

Lacy, Hugh de, Anglo-Norman invader of Ireland, 1186

Lacy, Hugh de, the younger, warrior, 1234 or 1243

Lacy, John de, Earl of Lincoln, 1240

Lacy, John, Dominican, 15th cent.

Lacy, John, actor and dramatist, 1681

Lacy, John, French prophet

Lacy, John, vocalist, fl. 1818

Lacy, Michael Rophino, musician and composer, 1795-1867

Lacy, Peter, Count, field-marshal, 1678-1751

Lacy, Roger de, justiciar, 1212

Lacy, Mrs. Walter, née Taylor, actress, 1874

Lacy, William, Jesuit, 1584-1673

Ladbrooke, Henry, painter, 1800-70

Ladbrooke, John Berney, painter, 1803-79

Ladbrooke, Robert, painter, 1770-1842

Ladyman, Samuel, Presbyterian divine, fl. 1658

Laeghaire, monarch of Ireland, 457

Laffan, Sir Joseph de Courcy, Bart., M.D., physician, 1787-1848

Lafore, Sir John, admiral, 1796

Laguette, Jean, painter, engraver, and vocalist, 1700*-48

Laguette, Louis, painter, 1868-1721

Laidlaw, Anna Robena, vocalist, 1819-40*

Laidlaw, William, friend of Sir Walter Scott, 1781-1845

Laing, Alexander, antiquary, 1778-1833

Laing, Alexander, the Brecon poet, 1787-1857

Laing, Major Alexander Gordon, African traveller, 1793-1826

Laing, David, F.S.A., architect, 1774-1856

Laing, David, LL.D., Scotch antiquary, 1793-1878

Laing, Henry, engraver, 1800-83

Laing, James, D.D., Doctor of the Sorbonne, 1502-94
 Laing, John, Bishop of Glasgow, Chancellor of Scotland, 1482
 Laing, Rev. John, bibliographer, 1880
 Laing, Malcolm, historian, 1782-1818
 Laing, William, bookseller and printer, 1764-1832
 Laird, John, M.P., shipbuilder, 1805-74
 Laird, Macgregor, African explorer, 1861
 Laithwaite or Scott, Thomas, Jesuit, 1579-1655
 Lake, Arthur, Bishop of Bath and Wells, 1550-1626
 Lake, Sir Edward, Bart., Royalist, 1600-74
 Lake, Edward, D.D., Archdeacon of Exeter, 1704
 Lake, Gerard, 1st Viscount Lake, 1744-1808
 Lake, Sir Henry Atwell, K.C.B., colonel, 1809-81
 Lake, John, D.D., Bishop of Chichester, 1824-89
 Lake, Sir Thomas, Secretary of State, 1630
 Lakenheath, John de, monk of Bury, temp. incert.
 Lakes, Rev. Osmond, divine, 1621
 Lalor, J. F., editor of the Feloa, 1849
 Lalor, John, journalist and author, 1814-56
 Lalor, Robert, Irish priest, fl. 1607
 Lamb, Andrew, Bishop of Galloway, 1634
 Lamb, Benjamin, organist and composer, fl. 1720
 Lamb, Caroline, Lady, novelist, 1758-1828
 Lamb, Charles, essayist and poet, 1775-1834
 Lamb, Edward Buckton, architect, 1803-69
 Lamb, Frederick James, Lord Beauvale, afterwards 3rd Viscount Melbourne, 1782-1853
 Lamb, Hon. George, M.P., Under-Secretary of State, 1784-1854
 Lamb, James, D.D., Orientalist, 1598-1664
 Lamb, Sir James Bland, miscellaneous writer, 1752-1824. See Burges.
 Lamb, Sir John, LL.D., Dean of the Arches, 1647
 Lamb, John, D.D., Dean of Bristol, 1780-1850
 Lamb, Mary Anne, sister of Charles Lamb, 1764-1847
 Lamb, Sir Matthew, Bart., M.P., politician, 1768
 Lamb, Robert, Bishop of Peterborough, 1769
 Lamb, Thomas, Puritan divine, 1672
 Lamb, William, Viscount Melbourne, 1779-1848
 Lambard, William, 'Perambulation of Kent', 1536-1601
 Lambart, Charles, Earl of Cavan, 1660
 Lambart, Oliver, Lord Lambart, 1618
 Lambart, Richard Ford William, 7th Earl of Cavan, 1763-1837
 Lambie, Dr. John, astrologer and impostor, 1628
 Lambie, William, citizen of London, 1496-1580
 Lambie, William, M.D., physician, 1765-1847
 Lamberd, John, minister of Eltham, fl. 1550
 Lambert, Archbishop of Canterbury, temp. Offa
 Lambert, Aylmer Bourke, F.R.S., botanist, 1761-1842
 Lambert, Daniel, corpulent man, 1769-1809
 Lambert, George, painter and engraver, 1710-65
 Lambert, James, musician and artist, 1725-83
 Lambert, Rev. James, Greek Professor at Cambridge, 1741-1823
 Lambert, alias Nichols, John, Protestant martyr, 1538
 Lambert, John, major-general in the Parliament army, 1619-94
 Lambert, John, "Launcelot Langstaff," fl. 1814
 Lambert, Mark, Benedictine, 1601. See Barkworth.
 Lamberton, William, Bishop of St. Andrews, 1328
 Lamborn, Reginald, D.D., astronomer, fl. 1363
 Lamborne, Peter Spendelowe, engraver and miniaturist, 1722-74
 Lambton, John, M.P., general, 1794
 Lambton, John George, Earl of Durham, 1792-1840
 Lambton, William, M.P. for Durham county, 1724
 Lambton, William, lieutenant-colonel, 1748-1823
 Lamont, David, D.D., divine, 1753-1837
 Lamont, John, of Newton, chronicler, fl. 1671
 La Motte, John, Alderman of London, 1655
 Lampe, John Frederick, musical composer, 1703-51
 Lamphire, John, M.D., Principal of Hart Hall, 1615-88
 Lamplugh, Thomas, D.D., Archbishop of York, 1615-91
 Lampson, Sir Curtis Miranda, Bart., advocate of Atlantic cable, 1806-85
 Lancaster, Edmund, Earl of, 1245-93
 Lancaster, Henry, Earl of, 1345
 Lancaster, Thomas, Earl of, ex. 1322. See Thomas.
 Lancaster, Henry, Earl of, 1392
 Lancaster, John of Gaunt, Duke of, 1340-99. See John.
 Lancaster, Henry Hill, essayist, 1829-75
 Lancaster, Hume, marine painter, 1850
 Lancaster, Sir James, navigator, 1620
 Lancaster, Joseph, 'Improvements in Education,' 1771-1833
 Lancaster, Nathaniel, D.D., essayist and poet, 1775
 Lancaster, Thomas, Archbishop of Armagh, 1584
 Lancaster, Thomas William, B.D., Bampton lecturer, 1859
 Lancaster, Rev. Dr. William, Provost of Queen's College, Oxford, 1716
 Lance, George, flower and fruit painter, 1802-64
 Lancey. See De Lancey.
 Lancrick, Prosper Henry, painter, 1628-92
 Land, Edward, vocalist and composer, 1876
 Landells, Ebenezer, wood engraver, 1809-60
 Landells, Robert Thomas, artist and war correspondent, 1854-77
 Landen, John, F.R.S., mathematician, 1719-90
 Lander, John, African traveller, 1807-39
 Lander, Richard Lemon, traveller, 1804-34
 Landmann, George, colonel, fl. 1854
 Landmann, John, F.R.S., writer on fortification, fl. 1814
 Landon, afterwards Maclean, Letitia Elizabeth, poet and romancer, 'L. E. L.,' 1802-33
 Landor, Rev. Robert Eyres, M.A., dramatist, 1782-1869
 Landor, Walter Savage, miscellaneous writer, 1775-1864
 Landsborough, David, D.D., naturalist, 1781-1853
 Landsborough, William, Australian explorer, 1886
 Landseer, Charles, R.A., painter, 1790-1879
 Landseer, Sir Edwin Henry, R.A., animal painter, 1802-73
 Landseer, Miss Jessica, painter and engraver, 1880
 Landseer, John, A.E., F.S.A., engraver and antiquary, 1781-1852
 Landseer, Thomas, A.R.A., engraver, 1795-1880
 Lane, Charles Richard William, C.B., general, 1786-1872
 Lane, Rev. Edward, M.A., theological writer, fl. 1680
 Lane, Edward William, Orientalist, 1801-76
 Lane, Hunter, M.D., medical writer, 1853
 Lane, Jane, heroine, fl. 1666
 Lane, John, poet, fl. 1603
 Lane, John Bryant, history painter, fl. 1834
 Lane, Ralph, navigator, temp. Jac. I.
 Lane, Sir Richard, LL.D., Lord Keeper, 1650

Lane, Richard James, A.E., engraver and essayist, 1800-72
 Lane, Samuel, painter, 1780-1859
 Lane, Theodore, painter and etcher, 1800-28
 Lane, Thomas, LL.D., advocate, fl. 1704
 Lane, William, painter, 1747-1819
 Laney, Benjamin, Bishop of Ely, 1675
 Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury, 1005-89
 Lang, John Dunmore, D.D., writer on Australia, 1878
 Langbaine, Gerard, D.D., Provost of Queen's College, Oxford, 1608-58
 Langbaine, Gerard, 'Dramatic Poets,' 1656-92
 Langdale, Alban, D.D., Catholic divine, fl. 1584
 Langdale, Charles, Catholic writer, 1787-1888
 Langdale, Lord, 1783-1851. See Bickersteth, Henry.
 Langdale, Marmaduke, Lord Langdale, 1661
 Langdale, Marmaduke, Lord Langdale, 1703
 Langden, John, Bishop of Rochester, 1434
 Langdon, Richard, Mus.Bac., organist and composer, 1803
 Langdon, Rev. Tobias, writer on music, temp. George I.
 Langford, Abraham, dramatist, 1711-74
 Langford, Thomas, D.D., 'Universal Chronicle,' fl. 1320 Langham, John, B.D., Augustinian, temp. incert.
 Langham, Reginald, D.D., Franciscan, fl. 1410
 Langham, Robert, merchant, fl. 1585
 Langham, Simon de, Cardinal, Archbishop of Canterbury, 1376
 Langhorne, Daniel, B.D., antiquary, 1681
 Langhorne, John, D.D., poet and divine, 1735-79
 Langhorne, Richard, Catholic barrister, ex. 1679
 Langland, Robert, Bishop of Lincoln, 1473-1547. See Longland.
 Langland, William, author of 'Piers Plowman,' fl. 1369
 Langley, Batty, architect, 1751
 Langley, Edmund of, Duke of York, 1402
 Langley, John, M.A., grammarian, 1657
 Langley, Thomas, Benedictine, fl. 1430
 Langley, Thomas, Cardinal and Lord Chancellor, 1437
 Langley, Thomas, D.D., Puritan divine, 1679
 Langley, Rev. Thomas, M.A., topographer, 1769-1801
 Langrich, Browne, M.D., F.R.S., physician, 1676-1769
 Langshaw, John, organist, 1763-98
 Langston, John, Puritan divine, 1640-1704
 Langtoft, Peter de, historian, temp. Edward II.
 Langton, Bennet, friend of Dr. Johnson, 1737-1801
 Langton, Christopher, M.D., physician, 1576
 Langton, Miss Jane, friend of Dr. Johnson, 1776-1854
 Langton, John de, Bishop of Chichester, Chancellor of England, 1337
 Langton, John, Carmelite, fl. 1400
 Langton, John, Bishop of St. David's, 1447
 Langton, John, calligrapher and glass-painter, fl. 1713
 Langton, Robert, D.C.L., pilgrim, 1524
 Langton, Simon, Archdeacon of Canterbury, 1248
 Langton, Stephen, Cardinal, Archbishop of Canterbury, 1228
 Langton, Thomas, D.C.L., Bishop of Winchester, Archbishop elect of Canterbury, 1501
 Langton, Walter de, Bishop of Lichfield, Lord Chancellor, 1321
 Langton, William, Lancashire antiquary, 1803-81
 Langton, Rev. Zachary, M.A., divine, 1698-1786
 Langwith, Benjamin, D.D., antiquary and natural philosopher, 1744
 Lanier, Sir John, military commander, 1693
 Lanier, Nicholas, painter and musician, 1568-1646
 Lanigan, John, D.D., Irish ecclesiastical historian, 1758-1828
 Lankester, Edwin, M.D., LL.D., F.R.S., coroner for Middlesex, 1814-74
 Lanquet or Lankester, Thomas, chronicler, 1522-45
 Lansdowne, Lord. See Granville.
 Lansdowne, Marquis of. See Fitzmaurice and Petty.
 (To be continued.)

BENEDICT OF OXFORD.

IN the current number of the Jewish Quarterly Review Dr. Neubauer, as promised in the Athenæum of March 8th, gives the reason why chronology is against my identification of the Berachyah Nakdan (the Punctuator) who wrote a number of Æsopic fables similar to those of Marie de France. It may be remembered that I identified him in my edition of Æsop with an Oxford Jew named Benedict le Puncteur mentioned in the English records of the year 1194. Against this Dr. Neubauer produces a colophon of Berachyah's son Elijah, which has been dated by Steinschneider 1333, and yet seems to imply that Berachyah was still living in that year, as the formula for the dead is omitted after his name. This would, of course, render it impossible that Berachyah could have been living in 1194. But a careful scrutiny of the colophon has convinced me that the manuscript is a hundred years older than the usually accepted date. The pertinent words of the colophon run as follows: "I, Elijah, son of R. Berachyah the punctuator.....grammarianwho.....set in order many fables, and he spake of trees and stones, hewn stones..... I the son of his old age wrote this book.....on the fourth day [i.e., Wednesday], the one-and-twentieth day of the month Marcheshvan [October], in the year 94 of the era the fourth thousand, in the country Rodom." [? Rouen = Rodomagus], i.e., 21 Marcheshvan, 4094. Now there is obviously something wrong in this date, for the Jewish year 4094 corresponds to 333 A.D. Dr. Neubauer assumes that the thousand is given incorrectly, and that Elijah wrote "fourth" when he meant "fifth," so that the date would run 21 Marcheshvan, 5094 = October 31st, 1333. Against this is the fact that all Jews were expelled from France in 1301, and were, therefore, not likely to be in Normandy in 1333. I have, therefore, suggested in a short rejoinder which, by the courtesy of the editors, I was allowed to append to Dr. Neubauer's demurrer in the Jewish Quarterly Review, that the more probable explanation of the enigmatic colophon is that Elijah had forgotten to put in the hundreds, which could only be 900, so that the year would be 4994 = 1233. I am now in a position to substantiate this suggestion by using the day of the week as a crucial test between the alternative dates. For 21 Marcheshvan, 5094 (= October 31st, 1333), fell on a Sunday, whereas 21 Marcheshvan, 4994 (= October 26th, 1233), fell on a Wednesday, the fourth day of the week, on which day indeed Elijah says he finished his manuscript.

This clinches the matter of chronology, I think, and with it goes every objection to counting Berachyah Nakdan among English authors of the twelfth century, and to regarding him as one of the most distinguished of them. For among his works are the 'Fox Fables,' translated from the Arabic in collaboration with Alfred the Englishman, the source of Marie de France; a Hebrew translation of Adelard's 'Questions Naturales,' a translation of a Latin or French Lapidarium (the "hewn stones" of the colophon), an ethical treatise now at Munich, and a commentary on Job, declared by good judges to be the best in existence in Hebrew. Mr. Aldis Wright was to have edited this last some years ago from the Cambridge unique manuscript, and it is to be hoped that the discovery of its English origin will arouse his editorial energies anew, while it may be expected that the other three works still inedited (the Adelard, the Lapidarium, and the ethical treatise) may attract the attention of English Rabbinical scholars, who have a first claim to them. I may myself try my hand at a new edition, with translation, of the 'Fox Fables,' now that Dr. Landsberger's regretted death has removed his prior rights.

Finally, I feel sure that Dr. Neubauer will himself welcome this solution of a difficulty that has always puzzled Jewish bibliographers and prevented them from finding an appropriate place in Jewish literature for Berachyah Nakdan, or, as we may now style him, Benedict le Puncteur of Oxford. JOSEPH JACOBS.

P.S.—I have just received the confirmation of the above dates from M. Isidore Loeb, the greatest living authority on Jewish chronology, by the aid of whose excellent 'Tables du Calendrier Juif' I worked out my results.

MR. W. MASKELL.

WE regret to announce the death of Mr. W. Maskell, the well-known authority on matters of ritual and liturgy. Mr. Maskell was educated at Oxford, and was ordained in 1837. In 1842 he became rector of Corscombe, and in 1844 he made his reputation by the publication of his monograph 'The Ancient Liturgy of the Church of England.' A 'History of the Martin Marprelate Controversy' followed in the next year; and this was succeeded by his learned and exhaustive 'Monumenta Ritualia Ecclesie Anglicane.' Mr. Maskell sold his collection of Service Books to the British Museum in the year the 'Monumenta' was completed. It and the work first named were reprinted by the Clarendon Press in 1882 with the author's sanction. In 1847 he became chaplain to the Bishop of Exeter; he took an active part in the examination of Mr. Gorham when he was presented to Bramford Speke, and when the Privy Council reversed the decision of the Court of Arches Mr. Maskell joined the Roman Communion. He seldom referred to this the most notable passage in his life, but he always retained a certain contempt for Bishop Phillpotts, who had talked loudly of what he would do in the event of the case going against him, but showed little disposition for martyrdom when the time came to make good his declarations.

Mr. Maskell, after his withdrawal from the Anglican Church, amused himself with collecting mediæval ivories and the study of various forms of art. Only once again did he meddle with theological controversy. When the question of the Papal Infallibility was raised he wrote two pamphlets, marked by keen irony and great controversial power, that caused considerable horror among the English Ultramontanes. After this Mr. Maskell employed himself upon his excellent 'Dissertation on Ancient and Mediæval Ivories,' and he edited the art handbooks of the South Kensington Museum. He contributed occasional reviews to the Athenæum, and when Mr. Baring Gould published his biography of Stephen Hawker, Mr. Maskell, an old friend of Hawker's, exposed in this journal the flimsy nature of that egregious piece of book-making. For many years Mr. Maskell lived at Bude, but of late he had resided at Penzance, and his weak health forbade all literary labour. He was a man of unusual accomplishments, who had read widely and accurately, a most entertaining companion, who possessed great gifts of sarcasm which were kept in check by the amiability of his nature, but showed themselves in the epigrams which studded his conversation and rendered it remarkable beyond that of most men. His, too, was a most sincere and devout spirit; he endured much obloquy for the sake of his religious convictions at the hands both of those who thought he believed too much and those who deemed he believed too little; but he was never untrue to his convictions. His last effort was a little volume of Lenten meditations, which he printed privately for distribution among his friends about twelve months ago. He will not be widely missed, for he had lived too long out of the world to be widely known; but no one who had the privilege of his friendship will ever forget him.

Literary Gossip.

MR. LOWELL's many friends, while rejoicing in his recovery, will hear with regret that his medical advisers have absolutely forbidden his coming to England this year.

MR. WHISTLER has been persuaded to confound his enemies by publishing a portion of the pirated letters which he has successfully suppressed, in a volume which will immediately be issued in London and New York. It will contain a reprint of one or two early pamphlets of Mr. Whistler's, not taken into consideration by the editor of the spurious edition, and also of the 'Ten o'Clock' lecture. It may, possibly, be also adorned by an etching from the graver of the artist.

ARCHDEACON WATKINS is going to publish through Mr. Murray the Bampton Lectures he lately delivered. His subject is 'Modern Criticism in its Relation to the Fourth Gospel.'

THE May number of Macmillan's Magazine will contain a review by Mr. Goldwin Smith of the last two volumes of William Lloyd Garrison's biography; an account by Mr. J. D. Rees (private secretary to H.E. the Governor of Madras) of Prince Albert Victor's shooting party in Travancore; and one of Mr. Warde Fowler's little essays in natural history.

THE Dean of Gloucester, who is at present in attendance upon Her Majesty at Aix-les-Bains, is busy with an article upon that neighbourhood for the English Illustrated Magazine. Archdeacon Farrar contributes an article on 'Fasting' to the May number.

MISS EMILY LAWLESS intends to bring out a new book in one volume called 'With Essex in Ireland.' It will be published by Messrs. Smith & Elder. Messrs. Smith & Elder will also be the publishers of 'A Woman of the World,' a new novel by Miss M. Robinson, the author of 'Disenchantment' and 'The Plan of Campaign.' Messrs. Hurst & Blackett will issue on the 25th inst. a novel by Mr. John Cordy Jeaffreson, entitled 'Cutting for Partners.' Miss Bradton's recent novel 'The Day Will Come' will be published as a cheap volume early in May by Messrs. Simpkin & Co.

MR. J. E. C. BODLEY has undertaken to write for Messrs. Macmillan a comprehensive work on France, following the same lines, mutatis mutandis, as Mr. Bryce's book on 'The American Commonwealth' or Sir Charles Dilke's 'Problems of Greater Britain.'

SIR HENRY RAWLINSON will be honorary president of the International Congress of Orientalists to be held in London in September, 1891, and Sir Mountstuart E. Grant Duff, who presided over the Turanian Section at the London Congress of 1874, will be president. Sir George Birdwood will be president of the Reception Committee, and will, it is understood, also accept the vice-presidency of the Congress.

THE next volume of the "Minerva Library" will be a reprint of Lane's 'Modern Egyptians' from Charles Knight's edition of 1842, with eighty illustrations in the text and sixteen full-page plates. This will be followed by Mr. W. M. Torrens's 'Life of Lord Melbourne,' revised, with some new matter, by the author. The next volumes of travels in the series will be Dr. Barth's remarkable travels in Central and Northern Africa, which first made known the civilization of Bornu and Sokoto.

MR. F. A. CRISP has just added to his privately printed registers in the Hundred of Ongar the "lost register" of Lambourne, Essex, which was sent anonymously by parcel post to the rector on the 4th of June last, containing an enclosed slip with the words written upon it: "Found in an old box; please acknowledge in Standard." As material for county historians these reprints of parish registers are invaluable.

THE death is announced of Sir J. H. Lefroy, who deserves mention in these columns as the author of a history of 'The Discovery and Settlement of the Bermudas.' He was Governor of Bermuda for some years.

THE process by which the Russian censors of literature expunge whatever they do not choose shall be read will be exposed by Mr. G. Kennan in an illustrated article entitled 'Blacked Out,' to appear in the Century for May. Walt Whitman has arranged with this magazine to contribute a poem entitled 'A Twilight Song.' It is dedicated to the unknown buried soldiers in the United States war of the North and South.

MESSRS. KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRÜBNER & Co. are about to publish a memoir by Sir

Charles Gavan Duffy of Thomas Davis, one of the founders of the Nation, and the author of 'The Sack of Baltimore.' The same publishers will shortly issue a new book by Mark Rutherford, the author of 'The Revolt in Tanner's Lane.' It will consist of a couple of stories and some other papers. They have also in the press a volume of lectures on 'The History of the Reformation,' by the late Rev. Aubrey Moore, and also a second series of essays as a companion volume to his well-known 'Science and the Faith.'

AMONG the contributions to the forthcoming number of the Scottish Review, in addition to Prof. Rhys's ethnological article, will be 'The Nile and its Work,' by the late Mr. F. R. Conder, C.E.; 'Coptic Church Music,' by the Archpriest Natherly; 'The Stewarts in Orkney'; and 'An Old Scots Society,' by Mr. J. Mackay, of Cambridge, Massachusetts. The musical article is founded on Fr. Blin's recently published work, in which the traditional music of the Coptic Church has been committed to paper for the first time.

MR. W. HEINEMANN will publish the English edition of 'The Genesis of the United States,' a narrative of the movement in England, 1605-16, which resulted in the settlement of Englishmen in North America, by Mr. A. Brown. It is claimed that the work contains much new material. Of 365 documents used, 294 are said to be printed for the first time.

THERE is to be a "Conférence du Livre" at Antwerp, consisting of bibliophiles, librarians, publishers, printers, booksellers, and writers on copyright, in August next, when the tercentenary of Plantin is celebrated.

THE death is announced of Mr. John R. Wise, at Lyndhurst, on Tuesday, April 2nd. He was the author of several works, the best known being a 'History and Scenery of the New Forest,' illustrated by Mr. Walter Crane, and the 'High Peak of Derbyshire.'

THE parish of Chiswick is taking steps to provide a suitable strong room for its records, and the surveyor was instructed at the recent Easter vestry to prepare plans. The churchwardens' accounts date from 1620, and the documents belonging to the parish are numerous, many of them being of considerable interest.

MR. J. TAVENOR-PERRY writes:—

"As any fixed dates in connexion with Carlyle or Mazzini are worth recording, I send you memoranda of two documents I have in my possession and which I should be pleased to show you. The first is the original agreement under which Carlyle took his Chelsea house, which is therein described as 'No. 5, Great Cheyne Row.' It is dated July 2nd, 1834, and Carlyle is described as 'Thomas Carlyle, of 47, Fredrick Street, Gray's Inn Road, in the County of Middlesex, Gentleman.' The second document is also an agreement, contained in a letter addressed to Mrs. Carlyle, in which she is asked to get 'her friend' to sign it. It is the agreement to take a house in York Buildings, King's Road, Chelsea, in July, 1840, and is signed 'Giuseppe Mazzini,' and 'Thomas Carlyle, Witness.' The number of the house is not stated, and I am unable to identify York Buildings with any existing houses in the King's Road."

THE May number of the United Service Magazine will contain a poem by Mr. Swinburne; and that of the National Review a poem by Mr. Alfred Austin, entitled 'On Returning to England.'

THE first part of 'Luther's Werke für das Christliche Haus,' the publication of which we announced some time ago, has just appeared. It contains the 'Reformatiorische Schriften.' The editors of the serial publication are, as we mentioned before, the well-known theologians Buchwald, Kawerau, Köstlin, Rade, and Schneider.

THE prospects of the Copyright Bill in the United States do not appear particularly good. There is apparently little interest felt in it in Congress, and various newspapers are appealing to their readers to urge their representatives to vote for it—no very good sign. On the other hand, the pirates have pushed matters so far that piracy is a losing game to everybody concerned. Mr. Lovell, of New York, has lately bought up the plates of some twenty reprinters who are glad, doubtless, to quit an unprofitable business. Whether this species of amalgamation will be of benefit to the British author remains to be seen.

THE most interesting Parliamentary Papers this week are Trade and Navigation Accounts relating to the United Kingdom for March, 1890 (6d.); Statistical Tables relating to Emigration and Immigration, 1889, and Report (4d.); Welsh Sunday Closing, Report of the Royal Commission (5d.); Despatch on the Subject of the Liquor Traffic among the Natives of Natal (2d.); Report for 1889 on the Foreign Trade of Italy (2d.); Report for 1889-90 on the Agricultural Condition of the Argentine Republic (1d.); Education Department, Revised Instructions issued to Her Majesty's Inspectors (3d.); and Friendly Societies, Trade Unions, &c., Reports of the Chief Registrar for 1888, Part C, Appendix N, Trade Unions (2d.).

SCIENCE

RECENT LITERATURE.

Mount Vesuvius. By J. Logan Lobley, F.G.S. (Roper & Drowley).—No mountain probably has been more frequently described or more accurately investigated than the picturesque volcano which fascinates Mr. Lobley, and which has an ever-fresh interest for the geologist and mineralogist as well as for the antiquary and historian. Mr. Lobley gives an account of the Neapolitan volcanic region before giving his readers a record of the geology of Vesuvius itself. The salient features of the Phlegrean Fields are described, and then we are taken to the surroundings of Vesuvius. The mountain itself is encircled by a carriage-road connecting the thriving and populous towns situated at the base of the volcano; the towns on the southern side, between the base of the cone and the sea, are so numerous as to be almost contiguous. It is a rather curious fact that certain zones on the flanks of Vesuvius and on those of its more stupendous rival in Sicily are among the most densely populated areas in Europe. The topography of the mountain and its neighbourhood is described so clearly and in such detail that travellers visiting Vesuvius could hardly have a better guide-book than Mr. Lobley's volume. A comprehensive history of the recorded eruptions—from that in which the elder Pliny perished to the slight activity of last year—is given, and numerous illustrations of the volcanic cone at different periods and in different states elucidate and explain the text. In considering the geology of the mountain Mr. Lobley passes in review the older and the current theories of the rise and formation of volcanic cones, and, finding them more or less unsatisfactory, offers in place of them an hypothesis of his own—one which deserves careful consideration, although we do not feel inclined to accept it as in all respects sound and sufficient. The long and painfully involved sentence forming the opening paragraph of the chapter devoted to the geology of Vesuvius does not lead the reader to expect so succinct and methodical an arrangement of conflicting views in vulcanology as Prof. Lobley sets before him. It appears to us that Mr. Lobley, naturally enough, exaggerates the weak points in the current theories and the strong points in that which he substitutes for them. At present judgment must remain suspended. A thoroughly comprehensive and conclusive theory has not yet been advanced, although we readily admit that many volcanic phenomena are satisfactorily colligated by the "physico-chemical" hypothesis advanced by Mr. Lobley. The descriptions of Vesuvian minerals and rock products will be found useful to the collector on the spot and to the student at a distance; and in the interest of numerous readers who are not mineralogical specialists, Mr. Lobley wisely determined to use as few technical terms as possible, and to adopt the older chemical formulæ which still obtain in mineralogy. The crystallography is not always up to date, as, for instance, in the case of graphite and leucite. Speaking of the mineral leucite, Mr. Lobley seems to imply that it is an exclusively Vesuvian mineral, whereas it is well known in other localities, and at Laach its small crystals are so numerous and so well developed that German mineralogists have given the name "leucitohedron" to the form. To complete the usefulness of the work, Mr. Lobley gives a résumé of the flora of Vesuvius, and an appendix, containing the famous letters of Pliny the Younger, some interesting short geological notes, and an account of Prof. Palmieri's seismograph. The diagram of the seismograph is clear, but the explanatory account of it loses much of its value by reason of the indistinctness of the reference-lettering. The defects we notice in the volume are mainly such as careful revision should have eliminated; they are in spelling and composition. Although they interfere little, if at all, with the usefulness of the book, they greatly detract from the pleasure of reading it.

The Telephone. By W. H. Preece, F.R.S., and Julius Mayer, Ph.D. (Whittaker & Co.).—Mr. Preece from his position at the Post Office is entitled to speak with authority on the telephone, and the book which bears his name as joint author gives copious information respecting the systems of telephony now in use in various parts of the world. The descriptions of "switch-boards" and other details of the arrangements of telephonic exchanges are necessarily very complicated, and the ordinary reader is bewildered in endeavouring to trace them, but he will at least get some notion from this book of the extraordinary development and intricate organization which this newest of the arts can already boast. As regards the distance to which telephonic transmission of speech can be carried, experiments made by Van Rysselberghe with existing telegraphic circuits showed that with a copper wire 2.7 mm. in diameter conversation could be distinctly carried on between New York and Fostoria, a distance of 730 miles; and that with a compound wire 6 mm. in diameter, consisting of a steel core of 3 mm. diameter surrounded by copper, speech was possible between New York and Chicago, a distance of 1,010 miles. A solid copper wire of the same diameter would have given better results. With iron wire conversation could not be properly carried on beyond 250 miles. The actual commercial use of telephones, so far as we can learn from this book, does not at present extend beyond distances of fifty or sixty miles. No government has utilized telephony to so great an extent as that of Germany. The extension of telephony in that country has not injured, but aided telegraphy. The telegraph is paramount for long and the telephone for short distances, and the two combined can penetrate into localities which are either too limited in size or too poor to support telegraphs alone. In military operations the telephone, though of little use for its primary purpose of transmitting speech, has proved highly useful as a receiver of telegraphic signals, these latter consisting of vibratory currents sent by a special modification of the Morse key. Messages can be sent in this way through very faulty and sometimes even through broken wires. This system was extensively employed in our Egyptian expeditions, and is now permanently adopted for the Egyptian telegraphs. An interesting description is given of an adaptation of the telephone to rifle practice which has been extensively adopted in Germany.

ASTRONOMICAL NOTES.

By an inadvertence it was stated that Mr. Brooks, who discovered the first comet of the present year, was located at Phelps, N.Y. He did, in fact, discover several comets there, but removed nearly two years ago (see the Athenæum of July 7th, 1888) to Geneva, N.Y., about eight miles from Phelps, where a new observatory (called the Smith Observatory) was built and equipped for him by Mr. William Smith. The comet in question rises now about an hour after midnight, and its brightness next week (which, owing to the absence of moonlight in the morning, will be a favourable time for observing it) will be twice as great as at the time of discovery, and about equal to that of a star of the ninth magnitude. We give its approximate places (calculated for midnight) from the ephemeris of Dr. Bidschof, of Vienna:—

	R.A.	N.P.D.
	h. m. s.
April 21	21 7 18	67 21
22	21 6 48	68 40
23	21 6 10	69 57
24	21 5 33	70 14
25	21 4 50	70 30
26	21 4 5	70 45

Prof. Lewis Boss, director of the observatory at Albany, N.Y., has published in No. 213 of the Astronomical Journal a new determination of the amount and direction of the solar motion, based upon the list of stellar proper motions published by himself in No. 200 of the same journal. The stars in this list are 296 in number, the proper motions of 253 of which are used in the present determination of solar motion. They are all contained in the Albany zone, which is 4° 20' in breadth, and at a mean declination of 3° north of the celestial equator. The determination of solar motion from the stars in this zone is practically independent of the errors introduced by the employment of imperfect precession constants. The method followed in the investigation is substantially that proposed by Sir George Airy in 1859, and applied by himself and afterwards by other investigators. The difficulty of the problem is to eliminate as far as possible the proper motions which are really stellar from those that are apparent and due to solar motion. Prof. Boss, after several solutions, considers, as the most probable result of his own investigation, that the apex of the sun's way is situated approximately at R.A. 18° 40', N.P.D. 50°, or not far from Vega, the bright star in the constellation Lyra.

GEOGRAPHICAL NOTES.

THE Emin Pasha Relief Committee intends to hold a reception in honour of Mr. Stanley about May 2nd. The meeting under the auspices of the Geographical Society takes place a fortnight later at the Albert Hall.

A forthcoming book by Father A. Schynse, one of the missionaries whom Mr. Stanley conducted down to the coast, promises to contain a few interesting contributions to the Stanley-Emin controversy. Father A. Schynse is evidently one of those men who cannot believe that so Sir W ventur profit.

No 3260, APRIL 19, '90

was g Relief
the clear had b propo that i ferent
tion o to hav having succes a new terior.
Dr. from writte place Barin
Nyan
Mr. of the yester
Dr.
'Han with it sup care w as thi
M. P Pro
in 18 obser
the so furni and t teilur illustr taken

AST nant
E. R
—Th not i chang ingsentit
The
from proj sent is th gener thoug sun-s ing th wires of vi seen acco this i taken differ read Nau ago i comm auxi
and —Mr 1889, sun-we mini decl how 1886 days 1889 poin high as i Mea
Obse
'Dis
Broc
Tych

that so "astute [geriebener] a Scotch merchant as Sir William Mackinnon" can put money into a venture without looking forward to an ultimate profit. Emin Pasha, he says, told him that "he was grateful for what these gentlemen of the Relief Committee had done for him, but that the real object of the expedition had become clear to him after the very first interview he had had with Stanley—that, although no direct propositions were made him, he felt at once that it was desired to effect something very different from taking to their homes a few Egyptian officials." Mr. Jackson's caravan is reported to have reached the Victoria Nyanza without having been called upon to fight its way. The success of this expedition is likely to open up a new trade route from Mombaza into the interior.

Dr. Peters appears to be safe, after all. Letters from him have reached the coast, which were written from Kapte, in Kamasia, a camping place on Mr. Thomson's route between Lake Baringo and the north-western corner of Victoria Nyanza.

Mr. Joseph Thomson has entered the service of the South Africa Company, and left London yesterday (Friday) for Cape Town.

Dr. Lüdecke's map of Africa from Stieler's 'Hand-Atlas' has now been published separately with a full index, and, with its numerous insets, it supplies a vast amount of information. The care which has been bestowed upon compilation of this map is quite as creditable to its author as is its beautiful execution to the engravers of M. Perthes's famous geographical establishment.

Prof. O. Simony paid two visits to the Canaries, in 1888 and 1889, for the purpose of making observations on the atmospheric absorption of the solar spectrum. Incidentally his expedition furnished geographical results of some interest, and these are now being published in the Mitteilungen der Vienna Geographical Society, illustrated with sixteen capital landscape pictures taken from photographs.

SOCIETIES.

ASTRONOMICAL.—April 11.—Lieut.-General Tennant in the chair.—Sir G. Errington and Messrs. E. Robinson and A. Simons were elected Fellows.—The President announced that the Council would not take any responsibility in recommending a change of the time of the Society's evening meetings.—Mr. Knobel read a paper, by Mr. Schaeberle, entitled 'A Mechanical Theory of the Corona.' The paper was accompanied by photographs, taken from different positions, of a ball from which wires projected with curving forms intended to represent the rays of the corona. Mr. Schaeberle's theory is that the remarkable differences observed in the general form of the corona, which are generally thought to correspond with maximum and minimum sun-spot periods, may be accounted for by supposing the sun's axis to be tipped, so that the projecting wires are seen in projection from different points of view.—Mr. Wesley pointed out that all coronas seen at the same time of year ought to be similar according to Mr. Schaeberle's theory, but that this is certainly not the case, several eclipses having taken place in December at which coronas of very different forms have been visible.—General Tennant read an important paper criticizing the form of the Nautical Almanac, which was settled sixty years ago in accordance with the recommendations of a committee of the Astronomical Society. He is anxious that another committee should be appointed, and that several changes should be recommended.—Mr. Maunder read a paper on the sun-spots of 1889. He said that there was such a dearth of sun-spots in 1886 that astronomers thought that we had then reached the period of sun-spot minimum. But there had since been a still further decline in the solar activity. There were now, however, several signs of a revival of activity. In 1886 the average duration of spot groups was ten days, in 1887 seven days, in 1888 six days, but in 1889 it was twelve days. Another very important point was the appearance of a number of spots in high latitudes.—The following papers were taken as read: 'Fourth Catalogue of Micrometrical Measures of Double Stars, made at the Temple Observatory, Rugby,' by Mr. G. M. Seabroke, 'Discovery of Comet Brooks, 1890,' by Mr. W. R. Brooks, and 'Photograph of Stars in the Region of Tycho's Nova,' by Mr. I. Roberts.

LINNEAN.—April 3.—Mr. Carruthers, President, in the chair.—Mr. J. Lowe was admitted and Rev. J. T. Scott elected a Fellow.—Prof. P. M. Duncan exhibited a transverse section of a coral, Caryophyllia clavus, showing septa and irregular theca between them.—Mr. B. D. Jackson exhibited some seeds of Mystacidium filicornu, an epiphytic orchid forwarded from South Africa by Mr. H. Hutton, of Kimberley.—A paper, by Prof. W. H. Parker, 'On the Morphology of the Gallinaceæ,' in the unavoidable absence of the author, was read by Mr. W. P. Sladen, and a discussion followed, in which Dr. St. G. Mivart, Prof. Duncan, and Mr. J. E. Harting took part.

CHEMICAL.—April 3.—Dr. H. Müller, V.P., in the chair.—The following papers were read: 'Note on the Hydrosulphides,' by Messrs. S. E. Linder and H. Pieton, 'Researches on the Germination of some of the Gramineæ,' Part I., by Mr. H. T. Brown and Dr. G. H. Morris, 'The Formation of Indene-Derivatives from Dibromalphanaphthol,' by Messrs. R. Meldola and F. Hughes, and 'The Action of Chlorhydric Acid on Manganese Dioxide, Manganese Tetrachloride,' by Mr. H. M. Vernon.

INSTITUTION OF CIVIL ENGINEERS.—April 15.—Sir J. Coode, President, in the chair.—The paper read was 'On the Application of Electricity to Welding, Stamping, and other Cognate Purposes,' by Sir F. Bramwell, Bart.

SOCIETY OF ENGINEERS.—April 14.—Mr. H. Adams, President, in the chair.—A paper was read by Mr. W. H. Brothers 'On Weighing Machinery and Automatic Apparatus in Connexion Therewith.'

NEW SHAKESPEARE.—April 11.—Dr. F. J. Furnivall in the chair.—Miss G. Latham read a paper 'On Rosalind, Celia, and Helen.' In 'As You Like It,' with its bright unselfish friendship, were yet traces of its having been written at the period when Shakespeare's feelings on friendship were being severely tested by the faithlessness of his friend of the Sonnets and the dark lady. It had an underlying strain of world-bitterness, which was also a key-note to the character of Rosalind, and was the effect of her life of danger and constraint at her uncle's corrupt court, sharpening her power of observation, and inclining her to perceive the follies and weaknesses of human nature rather than its nobler qualities. Once free in Arden, her natural self asserts itself, but with traces of her early hard experience. Celia was one of the most beautiful of Shakespeare's women, her love for her friend finding expression in tender, devoted service, saved from weakness by its strength and selflessness. Of the two, she has the poetic nature; Rosalind sees the practical side of things, and, it is to be noted, usually speaks in prose. Helen, in 'All's Well that Ends Well,' was one of those determined, tactful women who will use any means and submit to almost any degradation or hardship to gain their ends. The great force of her will often blinded her to the real nature of the means she employed to carry out her purpose. While bright, witty Rosalind guided her life, and Helen shaped hers, the most beautiful, if least powerful character of the three was the gentle, loving, unselfish Celia.

HELLENIC.—April 14.—The Provost of Oriel, V.P., in the chair.—Mr. A. S. Murray read a paper on the Alkmene vase, formerly in Castle Howard, but recently acquired by the British Museum. Mr. Murray agreed in the main with Engelmann in interpreting the principal scene as representing Alkmene taking refuge on an altar to escape the wrath of Amphitryon on his return from the wars, Amphitryon and Antenor setting fire to a pyre erected in front of the altar, and Zeus, in answer to Alkmene's prayer, sending a violent storm to extinguish the fire, the rain coming down from hydræ in the hands of two figures, presumably Hyads. The presence of Eos denoted that the time of the incident was early dawn. After an allusion to the 'Amphitruo' of Plautus, Mr. Murray went on to say that he thought the scene likely to have been suggested to the vase painter by a passage in Euripides's lost drama of 'Alkmene,' in which possibly the birth of Herakles in the midst of storm and fire had been told just as his death under like circumstances had been told in the 'Trachiniae' of Sophocles. Mr. Murray, however, considered the date of the vase to be at least a century later than the time of Euripides, and on technical grounds he was inclined to refer its production to Southern Italy. Many of these South Italian vases represented grotesque scenes from the farces acted at Tarentum and elsewhere in the third century B.C. But the vase in question seemed rather earlier than any of these, and might more probably be referred to the actual revival of the old Athenian tragedies which took place in Southern Italy at about the same period. These revivals had themselves been marked by elements of exaggeration and by attempts to find new interpretations of old characters and incidents while at the same time striving to retain the lofty manner and large style of the old plays, with a result which at times approached to caricature. That the vase painters followed in the wake of this revival was evident from other vases besides the one under discussion. The use of the imperfect in the signature Πόθος ἔγραφε might, perhaps, also be regarded as an affection of the old Greek manner. The vase will be published with Mr. Murray's paper in the Journal of Hellenic Studies.—Miss Harrison, while accepting Mr. Murray's interpretation in the main, expressed some doubt as to the identification of the Hyads. She regarded the vase as a glorification of Alkmene and a protest against the prominence of the Amphitruon element in the myth, which element she held to be of Theban, but certainly of non-Argive origin.—Mr. Watkis Lloyd added some words as to the myth in question, and conjectured that there was an attempt on this vase, as in some early Italian pictures, to represent in the same scene successive moments of time.—Mr. P. Newberry exhibited some funeral wreaths found by Mr. F. Petrie in the course of his excavations at Hawara in the Fayum, and read a paper upon them, partly descriptive of their character and composition, partly as illustrative of funeral customs among the Greeks.

ARISTOTELIAN.—April 14.—Mr. S. H. Hodgson, President, in the chair.—The Rev. P. N. Waggett read a paper 'On Beauty.' The best writers about beauty have not, at their best, inquired of its nature. The artistic writers, as Winckelman, Lessing, and Goethe, take it for granted, and write about its place in art. The philosophical writers, from Hume to Alison, explain it away chiefly as the association of ideas either of utility or the higher emotions. Ruskin's work has been to teach the ethics of the higher pleasures, and especially of that of beauty, rather than of the nature of beauty; it is not æsthetic, but theoretic work, and the more valuable for this reason. Association of ideas replaces beauty when beauty is absent, or enhances it when present. We want, first, an exact psychological analysis of the beauty emotion in itself, apart from those ideas which are connected with it in imagination or those assistances which it gains from other modes of preference. And next, what Mr. Grant Allen has largely supplied, we want a physiological examination of the physical basis of the beauty emotion or sense. And, thirdly, an inquiry into the proximate causes and wider relations in nature of beautiful appearances, and especially further light on the origin and effects of this element in natural selection in organic forms. Such inquiries do not preclude speculation upon the teleology and significance of beauty, as of other phenomena. The results, so far as they go, of the positive inquiries encourage such a speculation.

MEETINGS FOR THE ENSUING WEEK.

- | | |
|--------|--|
| MOV. | Victoria Institute, 8 |
| TEA | Horticultural, 1; Lecture, 3. |
| | Royal Institution, 3.—'The Place of Oxford University in English History,' Hon. G. C. Brodrick. |
| | Statistical, 7.—'Statistics of the Abatement of Crime in England and Wales during the Twenty Years ended 1887-8,' Mr. G. G. Covenor. |
| | Society of Arts, 9.—'The Trades of the Drapery,' Sir A. Alison. |
| | Civil Engineers, 8.—Discussion on 'The Application of Electricity to Welding, Stamping, and other Cognate Purposes.' |
| | Anthropological Institute, 8.—'Anthropometric Identification of Criminals,' Mr. J. Bertillon. |
| WED. | Antiquaries, 2.—Anniversary Meeting. |
| | Gymnæstion, 8.—'The Legal Side of Welsh Social Life in the Fifteenth Century,' Mr. D. Lewis. |
| | Society of Arts, 8.—'Coal in the South-East of England,' Dr. A. Geikie. |
| THURS. | Royal Institution, 3.—'Heat of the Moon and Stars,' Prof. C. V. Boys (Tyndall Lecture). |
| | United Service Institution, 3.—'Notes on the Defence of a Modern Fortress,' Lieut.-Col. N. L. Walford. |
| | Royal, 4. |
| | Electrical Engineers, 8.—'Lighting Guard for Telegraph Purses and the Protection of Cables from Lightning,' Dr. O. Lodge. |
| FRI. | Civil Engineers, 7.—'Some Applications of Electricity in Engineering Workshops,' Mr. C. F. Jenkin (Students' Meeting). |
| | Royal Institution, 9.—'The Shapes of Leaves and Cotyledons,' Sir J. Lubbock. |
| SAT. | Royal Institution, 3.—'Colour and its Chemical Action,' Capt. Abney. |
| | Botanic, 9.—Election of Fellows. |

FINE ARTS

Notes on some Examples of Early Persian Lustre Ware. By H. Wallis. No. 3. Illustrated. (Griggs.)

MR. HENRY WALLIS illustrates with a studious pen and accomplished pencil the history and artistic merits of the beautiful ware on which he is throwing much light. He does not say that the part before us is to be the last, but, as it is accompanied by an announcement that his more comprehensive work on 'The Ceramic Art of Ancient Egypt' is shortly to appear, with abundance of illustrations from national and private collections in Europe and Egypt, we take it for granted that, for the present at least, we must be content with three excellent essays on what he conceives to be the oldest known fabrique of its kind, Persian ware with a metallic reflet. Beyond question he has proved that to Persia we must look for the origin of the lusted ceramics of the Moors of Valencia and the Balearic Isles, as well as of the potters of Italy and France. The claims made on behalf of China and Egypt to be the original seat of the craft are rejected by our author. In the present state of our knowledge they remain not proven. The East is, as has been truly said, full of surprises; but so far as China is concerned we are on safe ground if it can be proved that the Chinese—who seem never to have forgotten any craft they once adopted as their own—borrowed lustre ware from the Persians at a comparatively late date. With regard to Egypt the case is, perhaps, not quite so clear.

Mr. Wallis has already shown, as our readers are aware, from the pieces of lustre ware to which his former brochures referred, that, although its origin is still unknown and likely to remain so, the craft to which we owe them existed in Persia during the thirteenth century, if not somewhat earlier—a remoter date than had previously been given. We have already mentioned that a written record affirms the existence of lustre ware in the middle of the eleventh century, but there is a possibility of error in this record. Mr. Wallis's latest researches have collected more examples of early lustre ware of extreme resplendence, about the dates of which some uncertainty still exists, although they cannot well be less ancient than the middle of the twelfth century of our era. We shall return to these instances further on. Of their general design it is worth remarking that these relics might easily be ascribed to a period much later than the twelfth century, to which the circumstances of their discovery refer them—so long do Oriental types prevail in their native realms of design. A lamp, or candlestick stand, b, on plate i., as well as the similar candlestick on plate ii., undoubtedly belong to the lusted type affected by the Persians; yet some of their peculiarities, such as their somewhat copper lustre, and the apparent reference of their forms to models of metal (which is very striking), might be due to Valencian craftsmen of the sixteenth century. An intermediate instance is the bowl on plate iv., which is decorated with quasi-naturalistic roses, enclosing a bird very like the feathered monster dear to the learned author of 'The Dodo and its Kindred,' but probably meant for a pigeon. The former example belongs to the author, the latter is at Sévres.

That Persian ornamentation of the kind in question derives, however remotely, as Mr. Wallis asserts, from Byzantine models there can be no doubt; but we cannot trace that particular ornamentation further back than the thirteenth or fourteenth century. This enables us to put a date on dateless lusted specimens of the Persian type which display patterns of the same nature, while they obviously incline to Byzantium; but, so far as Mr. Wallis's instances, taken from a Koran in the British Museum, go (see the beautiful patterns on pp. 6 and 7 before us), they seem comparatively remote from that type and of a well-developed variety with characteristics of its own. The distinction is of great importance. Fig. 1, from a Koran at Cairo, is much nearer the source, and it is evidently more ancient. Mr. Wallis seems inclined to place the Cairene Koran in the third century of the Hegira (A.D. c. 900), although other authorities assign it to the first century of that era. The comparative stiffness and poverty of the forms, betraying original influences not fully assimilated to the style to which the patterns are due, as well as the type of the braided border of fig. 1, incline us to ascribe this very instructive instance to the earlier date, which our author rejects. On the other hand, the well-developed and graceful figs. 6, 7, and 20, all from the Museum Koran, belong beyond a doubt to the end of the thirteenth or beginning of the fourteenth century of the Christian era. These considerations do not affect Mr. Wallis's arguments.

He ingeniously suggests that illuminated Oriental MSS. were the chief means of disseminating ornamentation. A good instance is fig. 20 before us, a star-shaped panel from the British Museum MS. named above. It is enriched with Kufic letters on a pattern of beautiful arabesque foliage, which "might even stand for an illustration of a well-known class of Persian wall tiles." Most connoisseurs, if not informed to the contrary, would suppose that it really represents such a tile. Mr. Wallis thinks that the Oriental potters would be most likely to borrow their patterns from the superb Korans of the mosques, which were accessible to all. The portability of the volumes and the prodigious pains taken to ensure the accuracy of the text thus enriched led to the restriction of Koran-writing to certain well-known centres or schools. This, of course, favoured the use during long periods of time of certain decorative types, and their uniformity in many countries. Cairo was the greatest centre of this kind, and its works survive wherever Arabian art is found in use. This curious suggestion would account for the wide diffusion of similar patterns of Arabian types over many countries, and the application of these patterns to other materials than the clay of the potter—for instance, to the brass utensils, vases, bottles, trays, and the like. Even in the West the Arabian types are recognizable. Before us lies an English counter-seal dated late in the thirteenth century, the decorative scheme of which owes much to the arabesques of Cairo or Damascus. Many art critics have recognized in the tracery of windows, especially those which are circular, reminiscences of Eastern design.

It was with a view of learning something about early lustre ware that Mr. Wallis caused researches to be made at Fostat, a Persian city destroyed in A.H. 564 (A.D. 1184), for examples of its pottery. If lusted shards, or, what were still better, complete vessels, should be found on such a site, where no man had lived since the hordes of Gengis Khan swept over it, irrefragable evidence of the age of pottery of this peculiar kind would be secured. The number of pieces discovered was not great, but they were sufficient to indicate the age of the fabrique, and show what might be expected if systematic excavations, of course on a larger scale than private means allow of, were prosecuted. How much more might we expect if funds could be collected sufficient to ensure search in those stupendous heaps of buried treasures, the mounds of shards and household refuse which are conspicuous outside Cairo! These still unransacked piles have accumulated from age to age, and since the tenth century have received additions of all sorts. Comprehensive examination of them—a work of no great cost—would surely yield great results, chiefly, no doubt, in respect to the history of ceramic art, but not to that alone. Scandinavian middens have furnished half of what we know about Northern life.

It was at Fostat, and during our author's researches there, that the oldest instance figured before us was found. It is a hand-lamp, plate i. fig. 10, in shape not unlike late Roman terra-cotta lamps, and in certain knobs retaining what physiologists would call the rudiments of bosses often found in Roman lamps either of clay or metal, but, owing to the nature of the material, quite useless. They simply attest the retention of a traditionary form long after its use had departed. The pattern is manifest in a thin light blue enamel over the natural reddish buff of the clay of which the lamp is formed. Greek taste is apparent in what Mr. Wallis calls "a summary representation of a Greek fret" surrounding the upright side of the body of the lamp; on the top an arrangement of chevrons forms a star-like ornament such as we might find in the most ancient Egyptian work, in Greece, in Rome, or even in mediæval Europe. The technical characteristics, the glaze, enamel colours, paste and pattern, induce Mr. Wallis to ascribe his find to the remote period we have mentioned. He found at Fostat no pieces of semi-transparent porcelain, so called. What further excavations might produce would be hard to say, but the importance of the place, its character as a mart and factory, its ancient origin, and the unquestioned date of its destruction all point to it as a valuable field for research. Unable to follow our author into the minor parts of his essay, it remains for us to commend to students his example of making researches at the fountain head, his thorough artistic knowledge—a kind of knowledge only too seldom valued by those who find all they care for in books—and his careful habits of thought. His large views of design, comprehending a noble sort of art-philosophy, are strikingly manifest in a passage on p. 5, which eloquently describes the vitiated stage of Byzantine design, a phase which was almost as vile as the French rococo. Finally, it is our duty to praise in the highest terms the beauty, fidelity, and extraordinary brilliance of the coloured illustrations, which reproduce the splendour of the lustre and the magnificent coloration of the relics to which the text is devoted. These plates were executed by Mr. Griggs after Mr. Wallis's own drawings.

N° 3
Fr recei mar
9½ in Poet of W a r are a lady It is theti tion
the attit thor play is t head work show
and his make piece hand engr proof after bor a lar ear, s berth her t ner's prese which nolds grave refin featu expre too l what with flat.
has c
so th thes the h
Mr
O. W
(L. I artist a dog dicat
and whos lated sure due t cow t and t might Me trait çaise, terre Lons search liancy not a
The featu mans
and Broo
a ph a few able p Beyn gravu
'Fait melod
C. A.
admin

NEW PRINTS.

FROM MESSRS. P. & D. COLNAGHI & Co. we have received an artist's proof impression, with the remarque (a violin and bow), of a plate (11½ in. by 9½ in.) etched by M. E. Gaujean from Herr E. Poetzelberger's picture, belonging to the Princess of Wales, entitled 'The Prelude.' The scene is a room of the last century, in which two lovers are seated at a pianoforte, the keys of which the lady is delicately and sympathetically touching. It is a charming composition, elegantly and sympathetically designed. The chiaroscuro and coloration are harmonious and suitable to the subject; the man's earnest face and his expression and attitude are all that could be desired, and in thorough keeping with the grace and taste employed for those leading elements of the whole is the lady's dainty and elegantly poised head. The etcher, whose fine and finished work rivals mezzotinting in softness, while it shows much of the clearness of line engraving and the frank precision of his own art, has done his part to perfection—so well, indeed, as to make us wish a nobler picture than this pretty piece of genre had occupied his accomplished hands. The same publishers issue a mezzotint engraving (24 in. by 20 in.), of which an artist's proof lies before us, by Mr. T. G. Appleton, after Hoppner's portrait of the Countess of Mexborough, a half-length figure, seated. She wears a large black felt hat, looped up over the right ear, and decorated with ostrich feathers; a white bertha and dark gown complete the costume of her time. It is nearly one of the best of Hoppner's works, and the engraving fortunately preserves almost all the qualities of an original which, like all pictures of the school of Reynolds, lends itself to mezzotinting. The engraver has given the softness, delicacy, and refinement of the lady's gentle and English features, the girlish grace of her attitude and expression. Hoppner made her head a trifle too large for the figure, her complexion somewhat too even, so that, being in a soft light without marked shadows, the face looks a little flat. Mr. Appleton in dealing with the bertha has cut it up with shadows and contrasting lights, so that there breadth is sacrificed. Apart from these points, and some lack of sharp touches in the hands, the mezzotint is excellent.

Mrs. M. Morris's brilliant etching from Mr. O. Weber's landscape 'A Sunny Day, Cookham' (L. H. Lefèvre & Co.), of which we have an artist's proof with the remarque (a half-length of a dog), is pleasant, solid, and luminous. It indicates improvement on the part of the engraver, and it ought to be welcome to the painter, whose work has not often been so well translated, and to lovers of landscape. We are not sure some defects in drawing the cattle are due to Mrs. Morris, but the body of the white cow that stands sidelong is a little too long, and the foreshortening of the other white cow might be improved.

Messrs. Buck & Reid's new mezzotint, a portrait of Mlle. Desmarests of the Comédie Française, engraved by Mr. N. Hirst after M. Santerre's picture belonging to the Earl of Lonsdale, lies before us, and is very delicate, searching, soft, and fine. Some lack of brilliancy may be due to the process, which does not admit clear reflections or sharp shadows. The face is charming; the drawing of the features, bust, and hands equals the draughtsmanship at large, which is very accomplished and artistic.—A portrait of the Rev. Stopford Brooke, lithographed by Mr. N. Hanhart from a photograph, is very like what Mr. Brooke was a few years since, and altogether it is a creditable piece of work. It is published by Messrs. Beynon & Co., of Cheltenham.—A large photograph from Herr H. Schmaltz's picture 'Faithful unto Death,' ponderous nudes in melodramatic attitudes, is issued by Messrs. C. A. Millard & Co., and ought to be welcomed by admirers of the picture. Somebody seems to have revised the bad drawing of the naked women, without reducing their big heads to proportion with the heavy bodies.

NOTES FROM ATHENS.

British Archaeological School, March 26, 1890.

THE site of Megalopolis has at last been selected as the field of this season's excavations in Greece by the British School, and work has now been actually begun. Our party reached Sinanou, the modern village, half a mile from the ancient site, on Sunday, March 16th, and upon the 18th our excavations began.

The site of the ancient town lies, as is well known, upon the two banks of the broad stony bed of the Helisson; and the description of Pausanias, which is remarkably explicit, enables us to fix approximately the position of the various buildings. These are grouped by him around the Agora on the northern bank, and the theatre on the southern bank of the river. Many vestiges of ancient walls and columns are scattered over the site; but only a few are in their original position, and none, except the theatre, could be identified with certainty before excavation. The site of the Agora seemed to be indicated by a level space strewn and surrounded with fragments of stone and columns. The whole is now covered with rich cornfields, a fact which has proved a difficulty in our work.

We began upon a line of columns running north and south, near the north-western corner of what we supposed to be the Agora. We found that these were upon a base, but one of later period than the columns themselves, having an Ionic architrave built into it. This line of columns and another parallel to it ran out from a wall of much better construction preserved for about six courses. This great wall was one of the enclosing walls of an enormous triple portico running east and west across the north of the Agora; we followed the northern enclosing wall for about four hundred feet, and most of the column bases were in situ; we also found one or two entrances from the north. We conjectured that this building, which apparently had one row of Ionic, one of Doric columns, and to which belong most of the drums scattered over the site, was the same seen by Leake in part; but its position corresponds to that of the Stoa Philippios rather than to a portion of the gymnasium. We were, however, unable to finish our work either on this building or on another in a small enclosure near the river, at the south-eastern corner of the Agora (perhaps the temple of Zeus Soter), owing to difficulties raised by the occupiers as to compensation for their crops, and a misunderstanding with the Government upon this point. We shall be able to continue our work here when the crops are got in.

We next made trial of the other side of the river near the theatre, where the ground was lying fallow. Here a great trench cut the stage buildings of the theatre, and further down a plain column in situ. The stage buildings, which are in some places as much as nine feet below the soil, are of fourth century construction, and show no traces of later alterations, though they have been partially destroyed. Much work will be required to clear them, but the plan seems to be complete, and also to differ from that found at Epidaurus, Oropus, and elsewhere. For five days' work these results seem very encouraging; and though no statues or inscriptions have yet appeared, the chance of some seems to be a good one. But in any case there is little doubt that we shall have considerable results in plans of buildings and topographical discoveries.

The excavations are now being pursued by Mr. Loring and Mr. Richards, with Mr. Castromenos as Government Ephor; and I have returned to Athens for the present.

A short time ago a discussion was held on the Acropolis on the connexion of the basis bearing the name of Antenor as artist with the statue now mounted upon it. Dr. Wolters and other members of the German Institute were present.

It will be remembered that Dr. Studniczka had made this connexion, relying among other things upon the correspondence of the dowel holes in the basis and in the bottom of the statue. I had stated in the Hellenic Journal that the statue could not be mounted so that these holes should correspond, and that as it is now mounted they do not correspond. From an examination of the casts it was acknowledged by all that no such correspondence was possible, and that, therefore, if the holes were meant for a clamp connecting statue with base, as Dr. Studniczka supposed, the statue cannot belong to this base. Unless, therefore, the connexion be given up altogether, the holes must be explained in some other way; and in any case the only argument left for the connexion is a general correspondence in size and in the shape of the socket, which nowhere fits the feet of the statue exactly. On such evidence the connexion would certainly never have met with acceptance at first.

ERNEST GARDNER.

April 2, 1890.

P.S.—I notice in the Athenæum of March 29th a statement that "the American School in Athens have received a further concession from the Greek Government authorizing them to conduct excavations at Megalopolis, in Arcadia." The American School has certainly neither received nor applied for any concession for excavating there, being occupied this season with its own work at Platæa.

Just-Bri Gossipy.

IN ROOM VI. of the National Gallery, and numbered 1304, has just been hung a small picture of the Umbrian school of the sixteenth century, called 'Martius (?) Curtius,' and representing an equestrian figure, the right hand of which is raised in the attitude of striking with a dagger, while flames are bursting from the earth in front of the horse. The background comprises on our left a city, on our right the summit of a mountain.

THE private view of the Grosvenor Exhibition is appointed for Friday, May 2nd.

THE private view of Mr. E. Burne Jones's four large pictures of 'The Legend of the Briar Rose,' to which we have already referred, is appointed for the 25th inst. at Messrs. Agnew's gallery, Old Bond Street, where they will remain all the season.

WE regret to hear of the decease of Prebendary Scarth, well known as a writer on Roman remains in Britain. His chief work was 'Aquæ Solis; or, Notices of Roman Bath,' for a new edition of which he had made preparations; but he was best known by his little monograph on 'Roman Britain,' written for the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. He was an active member of the Somersetshire Archaeological Society, and contributed largely to its Transactions. He died at Tangiers, whither he had gone to winter because of failing health, at the age of seventy-six.

MESSRS. BOUSSOD, VALADON & Co. have appointed to-day (Saturday) for the private view of a collection of paintings and drawings by M. Anton Mauve, to see which the public will be admitted on Monday next. The same firm announces that from the present month Figaro Illustré will be issued in French every month, and contain six plates in colours, numerous illustrations in black and white, a piece of music, and articles bearing on the events of the day by writers on the daily Figaro.

A NEW selection from the published and unpublished engravings and etchings of Turner's 'Liber Studiorum,' comprising in all ninety-two illustrations, is about to be issued in folio form by Messrs. Blackie & Son. It includes four facsimile reproductions in mezzotint by photographure, the copperplates of which have been worked over by Mr. Frank Short, and fifty-one facsimile reproductions of the etchings, seven of these being rare unpublished plates. The introductory critical and historical essay is by Mr. Frederick Wedmore, and technical and descriptive notes by Mr. Short and other writers accompany each plate.

Those who are interested in monumental brasses may be glad to learn that a full supplement to Haines's 'Manual,' by Mr. Edleston, is about to appear in the columns of the Antiquary. The first part will begin with the May number.

MR. T. C. GOTCH contributes to the gallery of the Fine-Art Society a small number of portraits of children painted in water colours, with brilliant and pure carnations, firm draughtsmanship, and no lack of that finish to which solid morbidity and completeness are due. No doubt the likenesses are excellent, and the expressions are spirited; but Mr. Gotch should get rid of a mannerism, owing to which nearly all the eyes of his subjects have a set and forced stare, which cannot be true to nature.

MR. BRITON RIVIERE's fine picture 'Daniel's Answer to the King,' which we described last week, having become the property of Messrs. Agnew & Sons, will in the first instance be exhibited next week, not at Liverpool, but in the galleries of that firm at Manchester, after leaving which it may pass to their Liverpool galleries.

The death is announced of the sculptor Mr. J. A. P. M'Bride, who was born in 1819, became a pupil of J. Gibson and S. Joseph, contributed to the Westminster Hall exhibition of statues in 1843, obtained some practice in his native Liverpool, acted as honorary secretary to the Academy there, and executed some public, quasi-public, and private commissions of note in the region of the Mersey.

A PLYMOUTH manufacturer, Mr. R. Burnard, is going to issue, under the title of 'Dartmoor Pictorial Records,' fifteen full-page illustrations, by the Autotype Company from his own negatives, of Dartmoor scenery and buildings. They will be accompanied by descriptive letterpress.

At the gallery of the Royal Crown Derby Porcelain Company, Holborn Viaduct, may be seen capital examples of ceramic art manufactured by the company, which has taken up and continued, or rather revived, the old and famous Crown Derby Porcelain Works and Pottery at Derby. We have found in the London gallery several new methods of decoration, which are admirable for their taste, wealth of colours, and gilding properly employed, and, in fact, such as illustrate much higher standards of ceramic decoration and form than those which of yore characterized the once popular Crown Derby ware, a manufacture which seems to us simply detestable. Among the new examples are some sumptuous vases and other articles of what is not very aptly called "Repoussé Ware," which is really enriched with flowers and leaves moulded with much skill and taste and in high relief, then gilded in various tones and differing tints of red, rose, green, and grey. With these exceptional specimens are fine vases and vessels of various kinds, decorated in gold, Rose du Barri, cobalt, "azurite," marone, and Veronese green, peach, and olive. These colours are decidedly splendid. Noteworthy in the same place are specimens of fine modern eggshell porcelain, as delicate and pure as the eggshell of China, and decorated with relief patterns analogous to those of Meissen and Viennese wares of the last century, and, like them, "jewelled" and richly gilded.

In our concluding notice of the Tudor Exhibition two fairly obvious errors have crept into p. 474, col. 3, but may, perhaps, puzzle some readers. It was not No. 189 that Hollar and Thane engraved, but No. 174, Lord Yarborough's picture; while a few lines below, for "from the picture," with the picture should be read.

M. CHAPU, so says the Journal des Arts, has finished his statue in marble of the Princess of Wales for the National Gallery at Copenhagen. Her Royal Highness is seated, and wears a velvet robe. The statue is said to be a fine work of art and an excellent likeness. The same sculptor's sketch for the monument of J. F. Millet, which is to be set up at Cherbourg, has been accepted by the committee superintending the work; it is expected the figure will be erected in the beginning of 1891. M. Tony Noël's statue of Houdon for Versailles represents him leaning against a block of marble with his right hand, which holds a mallet; near him is his famous bust of Voltaire, to which he is pointing with his left hand.

AN exhibition of pictures by the Russian painter M. Ivan Aivazovski, whose vigorous spectacle 'The Living Torches of Nero' made the blood of cockneys run cold a few years ago, is now open in the gallery of M. Durand-Ruel, Rue Le Peletier, Paris. It includes 'The Argonauts upon the Colchian Coast,' 'Preparations for the Festival of Neptune,' 'The Destruction of Pompeii,' 'After the Deluge,' 'The Last Moments upon the Ocean,' a ship sinking, 'The Cathedral of St. Isaac,' and many landscapes. The collection will be closed on the 15th prox.

The able French landscape painter M. Hector Hanoteau died at Briet (Nièvre) on the 7th inst., aged sixty-seven years, after a long and painful illness. He was a pupil of Jean Gigoux. His pictures of subjects in the Nivernais we have often admired in the Salon. Two of his works are in the Luxembourg, being 'Les Nénuphars' and 'La Mare du Village.' He obtained medals at the Salons of 1864, 1868, and 1869. A Düsseldorf painter of altarpieces and other religious pictures, Prof. A. Müller, who was trained under Schnorr and Cornelius in Munich, and Schadow in Düsseldorf, died in the last-named city a few days ago.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

CARL ROSA OPERA COMPANY.—'Mignon,' 'Lurline,'
ST. JAMES'S HALL.—Young People's Orchestral Concerts.

ONLY two performances by the Carl Rosa Company call for notice this week. 'Mignon' was given on Thursday last week with Miss Fanny Moody in the principal part. The young vocalist has gained in breadth of style without losing the charm of youth since she last appeared in London, three years ago. Her conception of Goethe's creation, as transformed by the French librettists, is fresh and ingenuous, and she sings the music with that ease of manner which results from a correct vocal production. The rest of the performers were second rate, and scarcely deserve individual mention, though a word of encouragement may be given to Miss Lucille Saunders for the promise she displayed in the rather silly part of Frederick.

The resuscitation of Wallace's 'Lurline' on Saturday serves to recall memories of the Pyne and Harrison management at Covent Garden thirty years ago. It is impossible to reflect upon the activity which prevailed, as regards the composition and performance of English operas, during what may be termed the Balfe-Wallace period, without experiencing a feeling of regret that the unquestionable gifts of the composers named—not exceeded by those of any living English musicians—should have been wasted upon unworthy subjects, and a form of art already out of date. Even in 1860 the leading critics, including the late H. F. Chorley in the Athenæum, wrote in severe terms concerning the glaring absurdities of Fitzball's libretto of 'Lurline'; but the public at that period were utterly indifferent to the dramatic aspect of opera, and 'Lurline' was successful because it contained such tuneful ditties as "Troubadour enchanting," "Take this cup of sparkling wine," "A father's love," and above all, "Sweet spirit, hear my prayer." These, however, are not the best portions of the opera. Wallace was a better musician than Balfe, and his orchestration and part-writing will bear inspection. As a work of art the score of 'Lurline' is greatly superior to that of 'Maritana,' which preceded it fifteen years in production, though not in composition. The revival at Drury Lane, though in several respects admirable, is not in all superior to the original performance. Madame Burns, Mr. Durward Lely, and Mr. Crotty are neither individually nor collectively equal to Miss Pyne, the late W. Harrison, and Mr. Santley. Mr. Durward Lely's appearance in serious opera was, indeed, a failure, his voice sounding thin and hard in such a large theatre, while his intonation was at times painfully defective. Miss Grace Digby made a fairly successful début as the ridiculous Ghiva, and Mr. Max Eugene sang well as the equally preposterous Gnome. The orchestra and chorus were alike without flaw, and all that could be done to make the revival successful in the matter of decoration had been accomplished by Mr. Augustus Harris.

The new series of orchestral concerts commenced by Mr. Henschel on Wednesday may fulfil a useful purpose. The title, however, is somewhat ambiguous. We have several times taken occasion to point out that musical students should be well grounded in the works of the classic masters before paying much attention to modern developments. From the language of the analytical programme, however, it would seem that these performances are intended primarily for children. Certainly the pupils of the Royal Academy, Royal College, and other music schools do not need explanations written in the style of nursery books. Whatever may be the intention, the scheme was excellent in selection and variety. Three movements from Bach's Suite in D; Haydn's Symphony in G, No. 13 of Breitkopf & Härtel's edition; some ballet airs from Gluck's 'Iphigénie en Aulide'; the scherzo and Wedding March from Mendelssohn's 'Midsummer Night's Dream' music; the entr'acte from Reinecke's 'Manfred'; and the Overture to Rossini's 'William Tell,' make up a programme suitable for listeners of any age. Mr. Henschel's orchestra is of good quality, and the rendering of the various items, particularly of the symphony, was as bright and crisp as could have been desired. That Mrs. Henschel deserves unqualified praise for her interpretation of songs by Schubert, Schumann, and Brahms need hardly be said.

Musical Gossip.

MR. MURRAY promises a memoir of the artistic career of Jenny Lind (1820-50) by Canon Scott Holland and Mr. W. S. Rockstro. It will be founded on original documents and letters, and supply extracts from MS. diaries hitherto unpublished.

THE experiment of devoting the entire programme of a Crystal Palace concert to the music of Wagner was not so successful last Saturday as to warrant frequent repetition. We say advisedly "experiment," for the performance given at the earliest opportunity after the master's death on February 13th, 1883, may be regarded in the light of a special homage to the memory of a great composer. There was no particular interest in last Saturday's programme, the various items being so frequently introduced at orchestral concerts that most of them have become hackneyed. This remark certainly applies to the Prelude to 'Tristan und Isolde,' the introduction to the third act of 'Die Meistersinger,' the Preludes to 'Lohengrin' and 'Parsifal,' 'Siegfried's Tod,' the 'Siegfried Idyll,' and the 'Kaiser Marsch.' All these were magnificently interpreted, the fine quality of the Crystal Palace orchestra, alike in wind and strings, being never more fully tested. The vocal excerpts were Elizabeth's greeting from 'Tannhäuser,' 'Isolde's Liebestod,' 'Wotan's Abschied,' and Hans Sachs's monologue from the second act of 'Die Meistersinger.' Miss Fil-lunger and Mr. Henschel were both successful in these pieces, showing alike vocal ability of the highest class and the declamatory powers necessary for the proper interpretation of Wagner's music. There was a large, but not crowded audience.

AMONG the large number of foreign pianists who will visit London this season is Madame Teresa Carreño, who has lately been winning very great success in Germany. She will give recitals, in the Princes' Hall on May 10th, and on May 22nd in St. James's Hall.

KNELLER HALL, the Royal College of Music for the British army, is bound by the Queen's Regulations for the Army to use the "Philharmonic" orchestral pitch. Col. Shaw-Hellier, the colonel-commandant of that institution, has recently obtained the aid of Mr. A. J. Hipkins, of Messrs. Broadwood & Sons, to adjust the Kneller Hall standard tuning-fork to the pitch adopted by the London Philharmonic Society when Sir Michael Costa was the conductor of its orchestra (1846-54), and still maintained. The correction is to B flat, 479 3 double vibrations per second at 60° Fahrenheit, and is equivalent at that temperature to A 452 4 and C 538. Following the coefficient for rise of temperature as determined for the smaller wind instruments by Mr. D. J. Blaikley, viz., 25 per degree, the C will be 540 double vibrations for 68°, a pitch which may be accepted as the mean for concert orchestras. The larger wind instruments rise more rapidly. The desirability of a uniform pitch for military bands being observed when they are to be massed, as will be the case in the forthcoming Military Exhibition at Chelsea, is evident.

MISS MARGUERITE HALL and Mr. William Nicholl gave the second of their three vocal recitals at the Steinway Hall on Tuesday evening. Mr. Nicholl, however, was unable to appear in consequence of illness, and Messrs. Norman Salmond and Hayden Bailey sang in his place. M. Naché and Mr. Leo Stern also appeared. The programme was well selected, but presented no special features worthy of note.

It is said that M. Saint-Saëns, whose mysterious disappearance has caused so much curiosity and excitement, chiefly in Paris, has arrived in Las Palmas, in the Canary Islands.

THERE will be an important sale of musical autographs in Paris by M. Charavay, 8, Quai de Louvre, on the 5th, 6th, and 7th prox. Letters and other documents by nearly all the great masters are included in the catalogue.

THE principal works selected for the Lower Rhine Festival at Düsseldorf, on May 25th, 26th, and 27th, are 'Elijah,' Haydn's 'Spring,' one of Bach's Whitsuntide cantatas, symphonies by Mozart and Schumann, and Brahms's Rhapsodie for alto solo and chorus. Herr Stavenhagen has been engaged as pianist.

THE chamber concerts to be given in Bonn in connexion with the opening of Beethoven's house will take place between May 11th and 15th. Among the artists who will take part in them are Joachim, Reinecke, Barth, Heckmann, Hausmann, and Piatti, Madame Schumann, and Fräulein Spies.

THE Musical Exhibition which was to have been held in Vienna in August next has been postponed until 1891, as the scheme is assuming greater magnitude than was expected. It will probably be opened in March.

CONCERTS, &c., NEXT WEEK.

- MON. Mr. Lamond's Pianoforte Recital, 3, Princes' Hall.
 — Carl Rosa Opera Company, 'The Bohemian Girl,' 8, Drury Lane.
 — Performance of 'The Golden Legend,' 8, Bow and Bromley Institute.
 — Miss Hettie Temple's Concert, 8, Brixton Hall.
 — Mr. Arthur Taylor's Concert, 8, 30, Steinvay Hall.
 — Miss Anna Roekner's Concert, 8, 30, Portman Rooms.
 TUES. Miss Hilda Wilson's Vocal Recital, 3, Steinvay Hall.
 — Carl Rosa Opera Company, Production of Mr. F. H. Cowen's 'Thorgrim,' 8, Drury Lane.
 — Stock Exchange Orchestral Society's Concert, 8, St. James's Hall.
 — Miss Sauer's Piano Concert, 8, Brixton Hall.
 WED. Carl Rosa Opera Company, 'The Bohemian Girl,' 2; 'Carmen,' 8, Drury Lane.
 — Mr. John St. O. Dykes's Pianoforte Recital, 3, Princes' Hall.
 — Royal Choral Society, 'The Golden Legend,' 8, Albert Hall.
 — Miss Dora Bright's Concert, 8, Princes' Hall.
 THURS. Carl Rosa Opera Company, Drury Lane.
 — Philharmonic Concert, 8, St. James's Hall.
 — Mr. Henry Cross's Concert, 8, Steinvay Hall.
 — Misses Deives-Yat's Concert, 8, 30, Princes' Hall.
 FRI. Madame Bonner's Concert, 8, Steinvay Hall.
 — Carl Rosa Opera Company, Drury Lane.
 — Wind Instrument Chamber Music Society's Concert, 8, 30, Royal Academy of Music.
 SAT. Carl Rosa Opera Company, 2 and 8, Drury Lane.
 — Mr. Mann's Benefit Concert, 3, Crystal Palace.
 — Miss Jessie F. A. Reid's Pianoforte Recital, 3, Steinvay Hall.
 — Bristol Orpheus Glee Society's Concert, 3, St. James's Hall.
 — Popular Musical Union's Concert, 3, 30, Grosvenor House.
 — Sophocles's 'Antigone,' with Mendelssohn's Music, 8, 30, Westminster Town Hall.

DRAMA

GLOBE THEATRE.—Sole Lessee and Manager, Mr. F. B. BENSON.—Last Weeks of F. B. BENSON'S Shakespearean Company in 'A MID-SUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM,' with the Mendelssohn Music, EVERY EVENING at 8 (Thursday and Friday excepted). MATINEES (Children under Twelve half-price to Stalls and Dress Circle). EVERY WEDNESDAY and SATURDAY at 2.30. Doors Open at 2.—N.B. THURSDAY and FRIDAY, April 19 and 20, 'OTHELLO.' Doors Open at 7.30; Commence at 8. Box Offices Open 10 to 5.—GLOBE.

THE WEEK.

GAIRTY.—Afternoon Representation: 'The Prince and the Pauper,' a Play in Four (should be Five) Acts. By Mrs. Oscar Reinger. Adapted from Mark Twain's Story by arrangement with the Author.

THE interpretation of the story of the Man with the Iron Mask which found favour with Alexandre Dumas was that the victim was a twin brother of Louis XIV. Readers of his fiction will remember the dramatic use made of this idea in one of his best-known novels. It has pleased Mark Twain, in a book written, we are told, for his two children, to endow Prince Edward, afterwards King Edward VI., with a double, whose low birth and fortunes and striking resemblance to his princely patron form the basis of the plot of Mrs. Beringer's play. The two meet, and the prince, pining for a short relief from court formality, induces his dingy companion to change attire with him and fill temporarily his place. Unexpected results follow. The habit makes, it appears, the prince as well as the monk. Tom Canty in vain shrinks from the caresses of King Henry and declares himself an impostor. The resemblance is too strong to admit of doubt; his protestations are regarded as aberrations due to illness, and it is he who receives the dying words of the king and the subsequent homage of the nobility. Prince Edward, meanwhile, when once old Canty has seized him in his rags, may with all his might assert his royal birth. The more royal his bearing the sounder the thumping he receives from the old ruffian. The intervention of an adventurer, a sort of Don Cæsar de Bazan, named Miles Hendon, is necessary to save his life, and he is ultimately, after the death of his father has made him King of England, seized with his protector, thrown into prison, and sentenced to be scourged.

Can anything be wilder than this? It is told, moreover, in a sort of hybrid and inverted language that is as remote from Tudor speech as the blank verse in the historical plays of modern days is from that of the Elizabethan epoch. None the less the whole pleases and interests. The picture of the young prince maintaining his dignity amidst his squalid surroundings, and triumphing through the derisive honours accorded him by the gaol-birds his associates, dwells in the mind, and more than one of the scenes that arise is as human and as tender as anything in 'Little Lord Fauntleroy.' One comes away, indeed, with a sort of conviction of the truth of these inconceivable episodes, and is disposed to quote the phrase of the disputant, Credo quia impossibile.

For this the admirable performance of Miss Vera Beringer is principally responsible. The arrangement by which she is aided in two scenes by another juvenile actor, and during the remainder of the action takes the two characters, is not the best conceivable, but her acting is delightful. Mr. Vernon gives a capital representation of King Henry VIII.; and Mr. Macklin as the protector of the young prince whose experiences are so uncomfortable, Mr. F. G. Taylor, Mr. A. Wood, and Miss Annie Irish, play well. A view of London Bridge, in which some horses are superfluously introduced, is excellent, and the whole was received with favour.

Dramatic Gossip.

THE fourth of the original plays upon which Mr. Robert Bridges has for several years been engaged, and which are now appearing in a continuous series, is in the press. It is styled 'The Christian Captives.'

MICHAEL FIELD has in the press a play, entitled 'The Tragic Mary,' dealing with the events and passions of Mary Stuart's reign from the murder of Riccio to the battle of Carberry Hill. The queen, we understand, is portrayed as "a soul born active, wind-beaten, but ascending," to use Mr. Meredith's phrase. The volume will be published by Messrs. Bell & Sons.

THREE representations of an original pastoral play, entitled 'A Sicilian Idyll,' by Mr. Todhunter, author of 'Helena in Troas,' will be given in the theatre of the Club, Bedford Park, Chiswick, on the evenings of Monday, May 5th, and Wednesday, May 7th, and at three o'clock on Friday, May 9th. The incidental music, including a hymn to Bacchus and a hymn to Love, for a chorus of shepherds and shepherdesses, is composed by Mr. B. Luard Selby.

MR. WILLS's drama of 'Juanna,' first produced at the Court Theatre in May, 1881, with Madame Modjeska as the heroine, and Mr. Wilson Barrett and Mr. Forbes Robertson in other characters, has been revived at an afternoon entertainment at the Opéra Comique. It is now shortened by an act, and its action is quickened. Miss Adrienne Dairrolles, Miss Ivor, Mrs. Billington, Mr. Leonard Outram, and Mr. Ivan Watson took part in a moderately successful interpretation.

THE first of the series of afternoon revivals at the Lyceum consists of 'The Bells,' which was given on Saturday last, and is repeated to-night. In this Mr. Irving, of course, reappeared as Mathias. Miss Coleridge was Annette; Miss Pauncefort, Catherine; Miss Kate Phillips, Sozel; Mr. Howe, Walter; and Mr. Haviland, Christian. 'The King and the Miller' was also played.

A SERIES of afternoon performances of 'The Middleman' began at the Shaftesbury last Saturday. Mr. Willard is still Cyrus Blenkarn; Mr. Alfred Bishop now, however, replaces Mr. Mackintosh as the "Middleman." Miss Olga Brandon is Mary, and Miss Annie Rose, Nancy.

THE Court Theatre has been closed during the week for the rehearsal of Mr. Pinero's new play. To-night witnesses at the Princess's the last performance of 'Master and Man,' and the house will remain shut to the public until the production of 'Théodora.'

A TAME performance of 'She Stoops to Conquer' at the Vaudeville on Tuesday afternoon was lighted up by the fine acting of Miss Winifred Emery as Miss Hardcastle, and of Mr. Kemble as her father. In assigning some dignity to Mr. Hardcastle, Mr. Kemble elevates the whole play. A little added demureness is all that is requisite to render Miss Emery's heroine perfect. Mrs. Billington was Mrs. Hardcastle; Mr. T. Thorne, Tony Lumpkin; and Mr. F. Thorne, Diggory. Other characters were very indifferently rendered.

ALBURY's comedy 'Two Roses' was given on Wednesday afternoon at the Criterion, with Mr. Wyndham as Jack Wyatt and Mr. Wm. Farren as Digby Grant, and with a cast that comprised Mrs. E. Phelps, Miss Mary Moore, Miss F. Frances, Messrs. Giddens, Righton, and Blakeley.

NEXT WEEK'S NOVELTIES.

MON. Gaiety (Morning). Miscellaneous Entertainment for the Benefit of W. Meyer Lutz.
TUES. Avenue (Morning). 'London Assurance.'
WED. Criterion (Morning). 'A Fair Encounter' and 'Trying It On.'
— Court (Evening). New Play by A. W. Pinero.
THURS. Globe (Evening). Production of 'Othello.'
FRI. Toole's (Morning). 'Changes,' a Comedy in Three Acts, by John Ayler.

[These announcements are subject to changes of plan on the part of managers.]

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—F. D.—C. F.—E. L.—W. J. C. C.—S. P.—R. S.—T. E.—W. H. F.—E. T. K.—J. S.—received. No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

Erratum.—No. 3259, p. 471, col. 3, line 22, for "National" read Rational.

A DRAWING-ROOM INTERIOR; Some Wrought-Iron Lamp-brackets; Old Bromley College; Ashley House, Shaftesbury Avenue. For above and other illustrations, with some further Notes on Yorkshire Stone, &c., see the BUILDER of April 19 (ed. by post 4d.; Annual Subscription, 19s.)—Office, 46, Catherine-street, London, W.C.

Price Sixpence, Monthly.

THE PARENTS' REVIEW: a Monthly Magazine of Home Training and Culture.

Edited by CHARLOTTE M. MASON.

"Education is an atmosphere, a discipline, a life."—MATTHEW ARNOLD.

APRIL 15.

STAR MAP for the MONTH. By Mrs. L. C. D'A. Lipscomb.

EDITORIAL.

THE RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION OF THE YOUNG. By the Rev. William Dawks, M.A.

A FÆDAGOGIC HOLIDAY. By Oscar Browling.

SOME THOUGHTS about EARLY TRAINING. By Miss Clough, Head of Newnham College.

SMILES AND TEARS. By Dr. J. E. Taylor, F.R.S. F.R.S., Editor of Science-Gossip.

LES MANIÈRES POLIES (FRENCH POLISH). By Mrs. A. Caumont, Author of 'The Haulers,' &c.

"IVAN IVANOVITCH." In Memoriam. By M. Shaw.

OBSERVATIONS AND EXPERIMENTS IN EDUCATION. By Mrs. Southwold Hill.

THE HEAVENS. (Notes on Map.) By Mrs. L. C. D'A. Lipscomb.

FIRST LESSONS IN ARITHMETIC. By Mrs. R. H. Hart Davis.

OUR SONS. 2. Journalism as a Profession. By John Dawson, Author of 'Practical Journalism.'

BOOKS.—BY THE WAY.—NOTES AND QUERIES.—PRIZES.—PARENTS' NATIONAL EDUCATIONAL UNION NOTES.

W. H. Allen & Co. 35, Waterloo-place, S.W.; and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

CAREY'S GRADUS. GRADUS AD PARNASSUM.

With the English Meanings. Edited by the late Dr. CAREY. Recently Revised, Corrected, and Augmented by a Member of the University of Cambridge. Crown 8vo. cloth, price 7s.

The Stationers' Company, Stationers' Hall, London.

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

NEW NOVELS AT ALL THE LIBRARIES.

THE CONSPIRATOR:

A ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

By COUNT PAUL P—.

Edited by FRANK HARKUT.

2 vols. crown 8vo. cloth, 21s.

SECOND EDITION.

DUCHESSE FRANCES: a Novel. By

SARAH TYTLER, Author of 'Citoyenne Jacqueline,'

'Lady Bell,' &c. 2 vols. crown 8vo. cloth, 21s.

"The story is carefully told, and, like all Miss Tytler's work, is based on conscientious research; and those who appreciate historical novels are certain to appreciate this vigorous and gracefully written story."—Leeds Mercury.

New Additions to Low's Standard Novels.

SIX-SHILLING SERIES.

THE PENANCE OF JOHN LOGAN,

and OTHER STORIES. By WILLIAM BLACK,

Author of 'A Princess of Thule,' 'A Daughter of Heth,' &c. Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

"The Penance of John Logan' is so well contrived, so brightly told, and so lifelike, that its simple pathos is irresistible."—Athenæum.

AGNES SURRIAGE. By Edwin

LASSETTER BYNNER, Author of 'Damen's Ghost,' 'Penelope's Suitors,' &c. Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

THE CHOICE SERIES:

BEING

CHOICE EDITIONS OF ENGLISH CLASSICS IN PROSE AND VERSE.

ILLUSTRATED WITH 300 ENGRAVINGS ON WOOD.

Drawn by C. W. Cope, R.A., T. Creswick, R.A., E. Duncan, Birket Foster, J. C. Horsley, A.R.A., G. Hicks, R. Redgrave, R.A., C. Stonehouse, F. Taylor, G. Thomas, H. J. Townsend, Harrison Weir, Charles Keene, John Gilbert, &c.

Uniform 8vo. Volumes, cloth elegant, 1s. each, now ready.

Goldsmith's Vicar of Wakefield.

Gray's Elegy in a Churchyard.

Tennyson's May Queen.

Bloomfield's Farmer's Boy.

Campbell's Pleasures of Hope.

Coleridge's Ancient Mariner.

Goldsmith's Deserted Village.

Milton's L'Allegro.

Poetry of Nature. Harrison Weir.

Rogers's (Sam) Pleasures of Memory.

Shakespeare's Songs and Sonnets.

Keats's Eve of St. Agnes.

Elizabethan Poets.

Wordsworth's Pastoral Poems.

Additional Double Volume, price 2s.

BUNYAN'S PILGRIM'S PROGRESS.

"Such works are a glorious beatification for a poet."—Athenæum.

Ready on Monday, price One Shilling.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

MAY NUMBER.

Contents.

Some Modern French Painters. THEODORE CHILD.

17 Illustrations. From Paintings by Pierre Puvis de Chavannes, Henri Lerolle, J. C. Casin, &c.

Old New York Taverns. JOHN AUSTIN STEVENS.

26 Illustrations. Drawn by Howard Pyle.

The Shadow of a Dream: a Story. Part III. WILLIAM DEAN HOWELLS.

Now is the Cherry in Blossom: a Poem. MARY E. WILKINS.

Making United States Bonds under Pressure. L. E. CHITTENDEN.

An Ex-Brigadier: a Story. S. B. ELLIOTT.

The Evolution of Humour. Prof. S. H. BUTCHER, LL.D.

Susan's Escort: a Story. Illustrated. EDWARD EVERETT HALE.

Through Bush and Fern. WILLIAM SHARP, 9 Illustrations.

Robert Browning: a Sonnet. AUBREY DE VERE.

Steam from a Samovar: a Story. E. H. LOCKWOOD.

English Lyrics under the First Charles. LOUISE IMMOGEN GUINEY. 9 Illustrations. From Old Prints.

&c. &c. &c.

NEARLY 70 ILLUSTRATIONS IN ALL.

London:

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON, SEARLE & RIVINGTON

(LIMITED),

S. Dunstan's House, Fetter-lane, Fleet-street, E.C.

MESSRS. BELL'S NEW BOOKS.

CHEAP EDITION.

THE FRIEND of MAN; and his FRIENDS—the POETS. By FRANCES POWER COBBE. Crown 8vo. paper cover, 2s.

TENNYSON'S and BROWNING'S latest words about Dogs are included in this Edition.

"Miss Cobbe has made a beautiful selection of poetry which the fidelity and companionability of the dog has elicited from the poets of all nations."—Spectator.

"It may be divined that we welcome with enthusiasm Miss Cobbe's pretty little book, which is all about dogs..... dogs as seen by the poets, especially by the largest and most widely extended circle of poets, from Homer to Mr. G. R. Sims. It is an ingenious idea to collect the testimony of the Seers, those who among men are credited with the clearest gift of divination, in favour of that dumb companion whose instinctive sympathy and wonderful perception of human feeling throws a certain halo of poetry over the meanest cur."—Blackwood's Magazine.

Fifth Edition, Revised, fcap. 8vo. 6s.

A HANDBOOK to the WORKS of ROBERT BROWNING. By Mrs. SUTHERLAND ORR.

NEW VOLUME OF

PREFENDARY SADLER'S COMMENTARY.

Crown 8vo. 6s.

COLOSSIANS, THESSALONIANS, and TIMOTHY, The EPISTLES of ST. PAUL to the. With Notes, Critical and Practical, by M. F. SADLER, Rector of Honiton, Prefendary of Wells.

In a few days,

FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS, The WORKS of. Whiston's Translation, thoroughly Revised by the Rev. A. R. SHILLETO, M.A. With Topographical and Geographical Notes by Colonel Sir C. W. WILSON, K.C.B. Vols. IV. and V., containing the Jewish Wars and completing the work. Each 3s. 6d.

[Bohn's Standard Library.]

Just published, paper, 2s. 6d.; cloth, 3s.

INDEX of BRITISH PLANTS,

according to the London Catalogue (Eighth Edition), including the Synonyms used by the principal Authors, an Alphabetical List of English Names; also References to the Illustrations of Syme's 'English Botany' and Bentham's 'British Flora.' By ROBERT TURNBULL.

"The book will be found useful to many collecting botanists."—Nature.

"The book cannot fail to be useful."—Academy.

A BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY.

Containing Concise Notices (upwards of 15,000) of Eminent Persons of all Ages and Countries. With Supplement to 1889. By THOMPSON COOPER, F.R.S., Editor of 'Men of the Time,' &c. 2 vols. 5s. each.

[Bohn's Reference Library.]

2 vols. imperial 8vo. buckram, 3l. 3s.

A DICTIONARY of PAINTERS and ENGRAVERS. Biographical and Critical. With a List of Cyphers, Monograms, and Marks. By MICHAEL BRYAN. New Edition, thoroughly Revised and Enlarged, by WALTER ARMSTRONG, B.A., Author of 'Peter de Wint,' 'Scottish Painters,' &c.; and R. E. GRAVES, of the British Museum.

"A book which no collector and no public library can possibly do without."—Times.

USED AS THE STANDARD OF ORTHOGRAPHY IN THE POSTAL TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT.

WEBSTER'S DICTIONARY of the ENGLISH LANGUAGE. 1 vol. of 1,628 pp., with 3,000 Illustrations, 4to. cloth, 21s.; half-calf, 30s.; calf or half-russia, 31s. 6d.; russia, 40s.

The COMPLETE DICTIONARY.

With several valuable Literary Appendices, and 70 extra pages of Illustrations, Grouped and Classified, 1,919 pp. cloth, 31s. 6d.; half-calf, 40s.; calf or half-russia, 42s.; russia, 47s. 10s.

"Certainly the best practical English dictionary extant."—Quarterly Review, 1873.

. Prospectuses, with Specimen Pages, sent post free on application.

London: GEORGE BELL & SONS, York-street, Covent-garden.

SATURDAY, APRIL 26, 1890.

CONTENTS.

CARMEN SYLVA	525
SUMMER IN GREENLAND	528
RUDYARD KIPLING'S WRITINGS	527
WINCHESTER	528
A HISTORY OF NEW SOUTH WALES	529
FRENCH BOOKS	529
OUR LIBRARY TABLE—LIST OF NEW BOOKS	530-531
A REVIEW OF THACKERAY'S; BENEDICT OF OXFORD; MISS BOYLE; THE 'DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY'; BULGARIAN LITERATURE; THE TEACHERS' GUILD	531-532
LITERARY GOSSIP	533
SCIENCE—THE ROTIFERA; A FASTING MAN OF THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY; SOCIETIES; MEETINGS; GOSSIP	534-535
FINE ARTS—THE SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS; THE LEGEND OF THE BRIAR ROSE; THE EXCAVATIONS AT MEGALOPOLIS; SALES; GOSSIP	535-539
MUSIC—THE WEEK; GOSSIP; CONCERTS, &c., NEXT WEEK	539-541
DRAMA—THE WEEK; GOSSIP	541

LITERATURE

The Life of Carmen Sylva (Queen of Roumania).

Translated from the German by Baroness Deichmann. (Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner & Co.)

THREE THOUSAND feet above the sea level, buried in the wooded recesses of the Carpathians, stands Pelesch, the summer palace of King Charles of Roumania, where his Queen Elizabeth, or, as she prefers to be called, "Carmen Sylva," holds her court and offers a welcome to all who are distinguished in art, science, or literature. At present the baths of Sinaia, where the palace is situated, lie outside the regular tourist routes, but judging from the engraved traces they have left on the rocks about the little shrine of Santa Anna, at a considerable elevation above the palace, the Browns, Joneses, and Robinsons of the Continent, as well as some English members of those families, must already have visited the summer resort of the Roumanian gentry. But if Pelesch, with its woods and valleys and waterfalls, be out of the tourist's track, not so another place with which the name of "Carmen Sylva" is associated. As the traveller approaches Neuwied on the Rhine, the capital of the Princes of Wied, who were sovereign rulers in the last century, he may perceive the palace in which Carmen Sylva first saw the light; and if he should be tempted to land he may visit the Château of Monrepos (beautifully situated at a short distance from the town) where she spent her youth.

As far back as A.D. 1093 the name of Meffrid of Wied is found as a witness upon a document of foundation. Successive members of the house of Wied held such offices as those of Elector of Cologne and Elector of Treves, &c., and some of them took an active part in the Reformation. Frederick, Count of Wied, a Protestant, founded the town of Neuwied in 1649, and his son (1706 to 1737) built the palace in which Princess Elizabeth was born. From that period to the close of the eighteenth century Neuwied was an important industrial centre, the ruling prince, Frederick Alexander, having founded several useful institutions, encouraged mining, built foundries, and generally laboured to increase the prosperity of his state. He built, too, the Château of Monrepos.

The more immediate ancestors of the princess were men and women of considerable ability. Her great-grandfather, Prince Augustus, travelled much in the old and new world, and published interesting accounts of his wanderings. Her father, Prince Hermann, was of a speculative and philosophical turn of mind, and he, too, published some anonymous works on the subjects of which he made a study. Carmen Sylva herself, therefore, inherited the intellectual powers which were rapidly developed from her earliest childhood. She was born on November 9th, 1843, and was called Elizabeth after her godmother, the Queen of Prussia. According to her biographer she was at once a wayward and shy child, with democratic tastes not altogether consonant with her rank, for we are told that at a very early age she ran away, to the great consternation of her parents, from the palace to accompany the bailiff's children to school. Whilst she was quite a girl she met at Bonn two Roumanian boys, one of whom, Demeter Stourdza, has since made his mark as a statesman in Bucharest. At ten she began to compose verses surreptitiously, and at twelve she attempted to write a novel. From the age of fifteen to seventeen she studied English (a language which she speaks admirably), French, Latin, Italian, arithmetic, geometry, and physical science. "I have as many tasks as I can get through," she wrote to her brother at that time: "forty pages of Schlosser in a week, forty of Macaulay, arithmetic twice, geometry twice, more history and literature instead of later Italian, natural philosophy, and Church history, and last, not least, religion with mamma." It may here be mentioned that during a subsequent visit to St. Petersburg she acquired a fair knowledge of Russian; and as to the language of her adopted country, Roumania, in that her literary productions show her to be proficient.

Much of the romance of Carmen Sylva's nature had its origin in her early surroundings. Her home was situated on a high hill which overlooks the valley of Neuwied and the Rhine, and was encircled by woods and ranges of hills verdant to their summits. Here she delighted to wander in all seasons.

Thou forest-scent! Thou forest-song!
Sounds, perfumes, freshly borne along,
How sweet to me you are!
How glad grow heart and ear for you!
What joy you bring, and comfort too,
Unto our little Star!

Thus sang the young lady of sixteen before she had experienced any of the cares and troubles of life, or had felt the uneasiness of wearing a crown. She is described at that time as graceful, of a slight figure, with dark brown hair and large blue eyes, and she had, what she still possesses, a silvery, musical voice. From about her eighteenth year she travelled a good deal, generally with her great-aunt the Grand Duchess Hélène of Russia, visiting Berlin, St. Petersburg (where she had a long illness), Sweden, Rome, Naples, Switzerland, and Paris. At St. Petersburg Rubinstein taught her music, Kalliwoda at Karlsruhe; and she had the benefit of an excellent training in art as well as literature.

But her life was not all joy and unclouded happiness. The sufferings of an invalid brother and father, both of whom died before she left the home of her ancestors, taught her the patience and faithfulness of which she had so much need in after life, and which she exercised with advantage to her subjects during the troublous period of the Russo-Turkish War. For a long time she refused to entertain offers of marriage, her tastes and occupations being completely at variance with the gaieties and frivolities of court and fashionable life, although, when circumstances made it requisite, she could perform the duties of a hostess with grace and amiability. Her ambition appears to have been to pass a qualifying examination and to become a teacher—a fancy that, after her father's death, her mother seems to have humoured. But although she was "not at all afraid of that dreadful word 'old maid,'" she was not long in making up her mind to join her fate with that of Prince (now King) Charles of Roumania, when in 1869 he sued for her hand; and on the 15th of November of that year the marriage was celebrated which removed Carmen Sylva from her tranquil home, where she "thought of the evenings when the spinning wheels hummed," to the trying position of sovereign over a people who had lately secured their independence, but who had not yet fully attained the level of modern civilization.

The life of Carmen Sylva in Bucharest has been chequered and eventful. She there experienced the first grief of a mother in losing her only child (a daughter), who was born in 1870, died four years afterwards, and lies buried in the grounds of the orphan asylum "Hélène" in the vicinity of Bucharest. True, she was made a queen in 1881, but it was only after having participated in the horrors of one of the most terrible wars the world has witnessed. All Bucharest was turned into a vast hospital, where the queen not only helped to superintend the general arrangements, which were under the direction of the late General Dr. Davila, but she personally visited the beds of the injured soldiers, and in some cases helped to bind their wounds.

Her work as "mother of her country" has been above all praise. To understand what she has effected the reader ought to have known the condition of Roumania before its liberation from the Turkish yoke. The combined immorality of the Mussulman, the Tartar, and the Parisian was centred, as unfortunately it still to some extent is, in Bucharest. The people were downtrodden and uneducated. Charity and public sympathy for suffering were sentiments unknown. National industries had hardly any existence. A complete transformation has been effected. The queen encouraged and patronized the Asyle Hélène, where now 460 young girls are educated and happily placed in life. She founded a school of embroidery for poor peasant girls and a school of weaving, while she encouraged home work in the cottages of the peasantry. To further this object she herself wears, and causes the ladies of her court and the nobility to wear, the beautiful national costume; and at her own risk she some time since sent a number of articles of peasant manufacture to this country for sale. It is to be regretted that before doing so, however, she did not employ some expert to ascertain what kind of work would be acceptable here, for whilst the carpets of India, Afghanistan, and Persia are to be found in thousands of homes in England, the size and form of the work of the Roumanian peasantry were found unsuitable for the objects for which it was intended. The queen also founded the Société Élisabeth in aid of the poor, and a home for nursing sisters. In education her labours have been unremitting. She has caused children's books to be translated from German into Roumanian for the use of schools, for "there are absolutely no Roumanian books for the schools and the people," as she wrote to her mother. Lectures and musical societies have been started under her auspices, and her great aim has been to inspire the Roumanians with noble aspirations, and to wean them from the life of self-indulgence and frivolity which still, to a large extent, characterizes the nation. She has been in truth the mother of the people, and her own statement on the subject is by no means exaggerated. "People," she wrote to her brother, "often come to me to discuss their own affairs and seek for advice, comfort, and help; this makes me very happy."

As an author Carmen Sylva has earned a European reputation—we were about to add, "although she is a queen," but, indeed, her early poems were published anonymously. Her lyrical pieces are marked by deep feeling, and abound in touches of German home life. They often record in verse her joys, her sorrows, and personal experiences, and exhibit a keen appreciation of nature. Her stories 'From Carmen Sylva's Kingdom' are decidedly interesting. 'Through the Centuries' consists of the history, legends, and ballads of Roumania from the defeat of Decebalus the Dacian to the fall of Widdin. But as she herself has said, "I think that I am first a wife, then the mother of my country, and then a poetess." As a writer she may possibly be remembered hereafter, but history will preserve her name chiefly as the wife of the first King of Roumania, who introduced culture and refinement into the life of a people just emerging from servitude.

Baroness Stackelberg, the queen's biographer, as well as Baroness Deichmann her translator, have performed their task creditably, and the publishers have presented the book to British readers in a form to adapt it for the boudoir or the drawing-room.

Two Summers in Greenland. By A. Riis Carstensen. (Chapman & Hall.)

MR. CARSTENSEN'S slender volume is welcome for two reasons. In the first place, it is a well-written and fairly accurate account of that portion of West Greenland which he visited as the artist of two Danish surveying parties; and in the second place, books on the "Land of Desolation" are so scarce that, even were it an indifferent performance, as the latest account of the country the Danish painter's narrative must necessarily have a certain geographical value. Reminiscences of the kind supplied by Mr. Carstensen appear almost every year in Copenhagen, where retired "priester" and "Colonibestyrere" of the "Royal Trade" are numerous. But since Dr. Rink's classical monograph was published there have been no works in English on Greenland. Mr. Carstensen is, however, a mere retailer of pleasant gossip, and makes no pretension to rivalry with the exhaustive volumes of the single-minded specialist who for the best part of his lifetime was Governor of South Greenland and President of the Board which administers the commercial monopoly that the Danes conduct for the benefit of the Eskimo. Mr. Carstensen has, indeed, few qualifications for such a task. The only part of the country which he saw was that between Godthaab and Disco Island. He is entirely unacquainted with the east coast or with the extreme north and south. Nor has he made any effort to penetrate the great glacier sheet which covers the interior, or any part of the "outskirts" which is not more or less familiar to geographers; and as his boat voyages were made in the heyday of summer, his opportunities for presenting a complete picture of Greenland life were, of course, limited. However, he saw what may be regarded as typical of what he did not see. For the land which Red Erik named so inappropriately possesses throughout its length and breadth such a sameness that it is difficult for even the most accomplished of writers to say much about it that is entirely new. Dr. Nansen, for instance, crossed the country for the first time. But he seems not to have discovered one fact of scientific importance which had escaped the notice of those English and Scandinavian naturalists who had studied the "inland ice" only a few miles from the "fast land." Nor did the Government surveyors who—rather tardily, it must be admitted—undertook to examine the region where for 170 years the Danes have had settlements, succeed in doing much more than confirm and extend the conclusions already arrived at by their predecessors.

Mr. Carstensen could therefore scarcely be expected to prove an exception, as he is neither a geographer nor a naturalist. Accordingly, to those who have studied Rink's works, the 'Arctic Papers' of the Royal Geographical Society, and the 'Meddelelser om Grønland,' the author of this volume can have little fresh to tell. Yet the vast majority of readers have never heard of those learned treatises, and they will find Mr. Carstensen's pictures of the icebergs floating in an azure gulf, bright with the long summer sunlight, of the cliffs noisy with sea-fowl, of silent fjords in which gigantic glaciers end, and of cataracts tumbling over the black crags, possessed of all the charm of novelty. The solitary little settlements, consisting of a few Eskimo huts, a wooden church, and two or three Danish houses, are sketched with vigour; while the life of the natives in kayak and umiak, seal hunting and reindeer shooting, pursuing the narwhal and the white whale, luxuriating during the months of plenty and starving when there is nothing to kill, is a theme on which the duller of authors could scarcely be uninteresting.

Summer in Greenland is delightful, if the mosquitoes are not too numerous, and there is neither snow nor rain between the end of June and the beginning of September. Then "the land," as the Danes say, is like Iceland without the volcanoes, and plus the ice which that island lacks. But many of the old residents prefer the long dark night to the long bright day, except, indeed, in the southern section; for there the absence of a firmly frozen sea prevents that merry courting about in dog sledges from settlement to settlement which is one of the winter attractions of the north. Of this, however, Mr. Carstensen had no experience. He saw Greenland and the Greenlanders in their most lightsome aspects. And a friendlier land or a kindlier folk do not exist either within or without the Arctic circle. People shut off from all communication with the outer world, except when the store-ships from Copenhagen arrive between May and September, welcome with a warmth easily understood the few travellers who visit them. The rarity of strangers makes their arrival a great event, talked about for years afterwards, and arouses an amount of quickly circulating gossip about their appearance and characteristics which would be impossible in those less Arcadian regions where they are more numerous and less notable. Danish Greenland is, moreover, the most peaceful part of Christendom. There is not a policeman nor a soldier from Smith's Sound to Cape Farewell, and—unless the semi-judicial attributes of the two royal inspectors entitle them to that rank—not a magistrate. Yet anything like serious crime is unknown. The Eskimo never dream of resisting the order of the "Colonibestyrer" or of the "Partisok," a local council, of which one exists in each district. They no longer recognize the rule of chiefs, and as the industrious divide with the lazy—with the result that foresight is unknown, and improvidence the rule—they are practically Socialists. Public opinion is their despot. From this no man or woman can escape, and to such an extent is it carried that the colour of the ribbon with which a woman must tie her top-knot expresses the status of the wearer—whether married, single, widow, or mother without being wife. As in Fabricius's day, "reguntur consuetudine." But they are no longer "sine Deo," for all of them are good Lutherans, though scandal affirms that in sore travail they still sacrifice to Tornarsuak. Yet it is painful to hear that this elysian state of matters threatens to be disturbed. The American cod-fishers sell the natives spirits, from which they are strictly debarred by the Danes, and sometimes even threaten the officials with knives if their riotous proceedings ashore are objected to. The Moravians were compelled to leave Cumberland Sound by the hostility of the American whalers, and it is not unlikely that before long the fishermen from New England will be either forbidden to land in Greenland, or be put under stricter control than is at present possible. Insubordination has spread even among the submissive natives; though as yet the agitators, two half-castes, have not succeeded in raising the standard of revolt to any greater extent than persuading the girls of Godhavn, in opposition to the Inspector's wishes, not to dance at a sailors' ball, in revenge for being forbidden to go on board the Scottish whalers.

Such themes as these form the staple of Mr. Carstensen's closely packed, but undindexed narrative. It must be confessed that Greenland life is a little monotonous, though this was not the opinion of the Moravian missionary after his return to his native land. In Greenland, so the honest man explained, there was, as in Africa, "always something new." You had hardly tired of the darkness when the daylight came, and before the snow became quite wearisome it melted from the low lands. Then the birds of passage arrived, and the whales and the whalers, and when you were getting deafened with the clamour of the tatterak and the mollemoke they vanished. The succession of seals was also exciting. Now it was the saddleback, now the bladder nose; and when you got tired of seal and narwhal and white whale flesh, you had reindeer and ptarmigan and white hare; or perhaps a bear would arrive with the Spitzbergen ice stream, or a walrus drift past on a floe. "There was always something new in Greenland; but in Herrnhut one day was just like another day." Still, a less prejudiced person might be free to confess that Greenland is easily exhausted from a social point of view, and that Mr. Carstensen has not left a great deal for the next traveller, though he has little to relate which is not a twice-told tale, and even then is compelled to draw freely upon Dr. Rink's volumes.

The style of the book is simple, and for a foreigner unusually idiomatic, though it is evident, from the use of certain words, that the writer has learnt his English in America. His pages would, nevertheless, have been improved by revision by some one familiar with Greenland and the language in which they are printed. It will, for example, puzzle geologists to be told that the Greenland coal is intercalated between beds of "clay and chalk," since the latter is unknown in the country, though the cretaceous formation exists. "Birch forests" must also be understood in a very comparative sense, and it requires some local knowledge to apprehend that by "quanes" is meant the Angelica, that "Reef Col" is the place more usually spelt Rifkol, and that Yutland is our Jutland, while "a large mammalia" is not quite English, nor is "ceiling" the exact term by which to describe the rafters of an Eskimo earthen hut. The numerous illustrations—photographs from the author's paintings—are admirable delineations of the Greenlanders and the summer scenery of their country. The woodcuts are not so good, and more indifferently executed, and the map is about the rudest effort of the kind which has come before us. It resembles nothing so much as a schoolboy's attempt at cartography, though the boy who after visiting Greenland put "Godthaab" on Disco Island would run the risk of being reminded of his carelessness.

Departmental Ditties; and other Verses. By Rudyard Kipling. (Thacker & Co.)

Soldiers Three: Stories of Barrack-Room Life.

By Rudyard Kipling. (Sampson Low & Co.)

MR. RUDYARD KIPLING is a new writer, with something new both to say and sing. Throughout India, indeed, he has already made his mark; but it is only recently that his works have become known in England, and the two reprints before us will introduce him, if we mistake not, to a far wider circle of readers. Anglo-Indian society, with its tragedies and comedies, its social and official intrigues, its alternations of languor and excitement, serves as the farrago libelli for a satirist whose eye is keen, but whose touch is seldom other than kindly. The dedication of this new edition of 'Departmental Ditties' shows the Heinesque mood in which he writes:—

I have eaten your bread and salt,
I have drunk your water and wine,
The deaths ye died I have watched beside,
And the lives that ye led were mine.

Was there aught that I did not share

In vigil or toil or ease,—
One joy or woe that I did not know,
Dear hearts across the seas?

I have written the tale of our life
For a sheltered people's mirth,
In jesting guise—but ye are wise,
And ye know what the jest is worth.

Mr. Kipling does not love India, or, at all events, the Indian climate. The stifling atmosphere of the plains and the home-sickness it engenders in the English exile are depicted in more than one of his poems. 'Pagett, M.P.' is a charming sketch of the stout but energetic British legislator who comes out to study "native questions," and succumbs to the warmth of his reception in July:—

April began with the punkah, coolies, and prickly-heat,—

Pagett was dear to mosquitoes, sandflies found him a treat.

He grew speckled and lumpy—hammered, I grieve to say,

Aryan brothers who fanned him, in an illiberal way.

May set in with a dust-storm,—Pagett went down with the sun.

All the delights of the season tickled him one by one.

Imprimis—ten days' "liver"—due to his drinking beer;

Later, a dose of fever—slight, but he called it severe.

Dysent'ry touched him in June, after the Chota Burnat—

Lowered his portly person—made him yearn to depart.

He didn't call me a "Brahmin," or "bloat," or "overpaid,"

But seemed to think it a wonder that anyone stayed.

'The Man who could Write' deals with the woes of "Boanerges Blitzen," who hoped to rise to fame by his literary talents, but misguidedly devoted them to showing up his official superiors in a native journal:—

Posed as Young Ithuriel, resolute and grim,
Till he found promotion didn't come to him;

Till he found that reprimands weekly were his lot,
And his many Districts curiously hot.

But Mr. Kipling can be serious enough if he chooses, and does not hesitate to call a spade a spade when occasion demands it. The mysteries of bureaucratic administration are pithily exposed in 'Public Waste,' while 'The Story of Uriah' and a 'Study of an Elevation, in Indian Ink,' reveal with surprising frankness the proverbial woman for whom we are bidden to seek in situations that overtax our ingenuity. We quote the 'Story' as a sample of what Mr. Kipling can do when he is hitting out straight from the shoulder:—

Jack Barrett went to Quetta

Because they told him to.

He left his wife at Simla

On three-fourths his monthly screw:

Jack Barrett died at Quetta

Ere the next month's pay he drew.

Jack Barrett went to Quetta,

He didn't understand

The reason of his transfer

From the pleasant mountain-land:

The season was September,

And it killed him out of hand.

Jack Barrett went to Quetta

And there gave up the ghost,

Attempting two men's duty

In that very healthy post;

And Mrs. Barrett mourned for him

Five lively months at most.

Jack Barrett's bones at Quetta

Enjoy profound repose;

But I shouldn't be astonished

If now his spirit knows

The reason of his transfer

From the Himalayan snows.

And, when the Last Great Bugle Call

Adown the Hurnal throbs,

When the last grim joke is entered

In the big black Book of Jobs,

And Quetta graveyards give again

Their victims to the air,

I shouldn't like to be the man

Who sent Jack Barrett there.

Among the "other verses" that make up 'Departmental Ditties' appear certain poems which were not in the three earlier editions already consumed by the Anglo-Indian public. Two of these, 'The Ballad of Fisher's Boarding House' and 'The Grave of the Hundred Head,' are delightfully "grim and ghastly," though the horrors in either case are suggested rather than dwelt upon with admirable tact. 'The Song of the Women' is a graceful tribute to Lady Dufferin in the name of the sufferers who have profited by the establishment of her fund for medical aid. Of 'The Masque of Plenty' we do not think very highly, though the Swinburnian chorus at the end of it is an ingenious parody enough. And full of smart sayings and flashes of insight as is the poem called 'One Viceroy Resigns,' in which Lord Dufferin gives his views upon India to his successor in a blank-verse monologue, one cannot but feel that the smartness is a little overdone, and that the thinly veiled allusions to individuals are often in questionable taste.

From 'Arithmetic on the Frontier,' which contrasts the value of the lives spent in holding and assailing our empire, we quote a couple of stanzas whose Horatian aptness and truth are undeniable:—

A scrimmage in a Border Station—

A canter down some dark defile—

Two thousand pounds of education

Drops to a ten-rupee jezail—

The Crammer's boast, the Squadron's pride

Shot like a rabbit in a ride!

No proposition Euclid wrote,

No formulae the text-books know,

Will turn the bullet from your coat,

Or ward the tulwar's downward blow.

Strike hard who cares—shoot straight who can—

The odds are on the cheaper man.

Mr. Kipling's verse is clever, as has been abundantly proved by the foregoing extracts, but it is as a prose-writer, in our judgment, that he will make his permanent reputation. His 'Plain Tales from the Hills' has been everywhere received as displaying a by no means ordinary power of character drawing, besides that perception of the salient and essential which belongs only to the born story-teller. 'Soldiers Three' (already in its way a classic) possesses these qualities in full measure. Its wonderful trio—Mulvaney the Celt, Learoyd the Yorkshireman, and Ortheris the Cockney —are simply inimitable. They are types, it is true, but they are living types, not moribund abstractions. They positively palpitate with actuality, and we make bold to say there has never been anything like them in literature before. With the conventional treatment of Mr. Thomas Atkins, pipeclayed and prim, we are all well acquainted; but few writers have the requisite skill (or, we may add, the courage) to represent him as he is, with all his prejudices and adjectives complete. Mr. Kipling has eaten and drunk with him, has smoked countless pipes in his company, and has seen him over and over again en déshabille. As he says himself in the striking poem printed as an "Envoi" to the little book, he has wrought in common clay

Rude figures of a rough-hewn race; and the results, as they stand before us, are something really sublime.

Take the following from Mulvaney's story of 'The Big Dhrunk Draf.' The narrator, it should be observed, has left the army, and is engaged under a contractor on a Central Indian line, when one day the news comes that "there's a rig'mint an' a half av soldiers up at the junction, knockin' red cinders out av ivrything an' ivrybody!" This is too much for Terence, who at once sets off to the scene of action on a trolley (in his best coat) in order to bear a hand.

"Faith, that rest-camp was a sight! The tent-ropes was all skew-nosed, an' the pegs looked as dhrunk as the men—fifty av thim—the scourin's, an' rinsin's, an' Divil's lavin's av the Ould Rig'mint. I tell you, Sorr, they were dhrunk than any men you've ever seen in your mortal life. How does a draf get dhrunk? How does a frog get fat? They suk ut in through their shkins. There was Peg Barney sittin' on the groun' in his shirt—wan shoe off an' wan shoe on—whackin' a tent-peg over the head wid his boot, an' singin' fit to wake the dead. 'Twas no clane song that he sung, though. 'Twas the Divil's Mass.

"What's that?" I asked.

"Whin a bad egg is shut av the Army, he sings the Divil's Mass for a good riddance; an' that manes swearin' at ivrything from the Commandher-in-Chief down to the Room-Corp'ril, such as you niver in your days heard. Some men can swear so as to make green turf crack! Have you iver heard the Curse in an Orange Lodge? The Divil's Mass is ten times worse, an' Peg Barney was singin' ut, whackin' the tent-peg on the head wid his boot for each man that he cursed. A powerful big voice had Peg Barney, an' a hard swearer he was whin sober. I stood forinast him, an' 'twas not me oi alone that cud tell Peg was dhrunk as a coot.

"Good mornin', Peg," I sez, whin he dhrew breath afther cursin' the Adj'tint-Gen'ral; 'I've put on my best coat to see you, Peg Barney,' sez I.

"Thin take ut off again," sez Peg Barney, latherin' away wid the boot; 'take ut off an' dance, ye lousy civilian!'

"Wid that he begins cursin' ould Dhrum-shicks, being so full he clean misremembers the Brigade-Major an' the Judge Advokit Gen'ral.

"Do you not know me, Peg?" sez I, though me blood was hot in me wid being called a civilian.....

"I do not," sez Peg, 'but dhrunk or sober I'll tear the hide off your back wid a shovel whin I've stopped singin'.'

"Say you so, Peg Barney?" sez I. 'Tis clear as mud you've forgotten me. I'll assist your autobiography.' Wid that I stretched Peg Barney, boot an' all, an' wint into the camp. An awful sight ut was!

"Where's the orf'cer in charge av the detachmint?" sez I to Scrub Greene—the manest little worm that ever walked.

"There's no orf'cer, ye ould cook," sez Scrub; 'we're a bloomin' Republic.'

"Are you that?" sez I; 'thin I'm O'Connell the Dictator, an' by this you will larn to kape a civil tongue in your rag-box.'

"Wid that I stretched Scrub Greene an' wint to the orf'cer's tent."

But what he did there, and how "the Big Dhrunk Draf" was safely conveyed down to Bombay, we must leave the reader to find out for himself. Mulvaney's brogue, which is not altogether real, is too much in evidence all through the book, but Learoyd's drawling Yorkshire speech and Ortheris's cockneyisms are hit off with skill; and the tale told by the big private from Bradford of how the ingenious trio of friends palmed off an artificially coloured fox terrier upon an unsuspecting lady is nothing short of a masterpiece. Best of all, however, is the wonderful study of heat-hysteria entitled 'In the Matter of a Private,' describing how one Simmons ran amok among the regiment, and how, after considerable bloodshed, his capture was at last effected.

What position Mr. Kipling may ultimately attain to it is impossible, upon his present performances, to predict with any certainty; yet if he should prove capable of filling a larger canvas than he has as yet essayed, he might conceivably become a second Dickens. His sparkling and cynical trifles are comparable to those 'Sketches by Boz,' which first brought the great English novelist to the notice of the reading public; but it remains to be seen whether he can give the public what will answer to a 'David Copperfield' or 'A Tale of Two Cities.' He has shown himself extraordinarily prolific since his arrival in this country, and some of his later work seems to be of a higher imaginative quality than his earlier studies. What we look for now is that he shall begin "majora canere," and, avoiding the nemesis that waits upon over-productiveness, concentrate his undoubted gifts upon the treatment of more important themes than even the amusing vagaries of Tommy Atkins and the risky situations of Simla society.

Historic Towns. — Winchester. By G. W. Kitchin. (Longmans & Co.)

It would have been difficult to find a more suitable historian for the old West Saxon capital than the dean of its venerable cathedral, who combines the training of an historical student with the enthusiasm of a local antiquary. For these qualifications are both indispensable in a writer for this excellent series. The principle that each "Historic Town" is to be treated in relation to the national development has been faithfully followed in the present volume, which devotes four chapters to the period from 900 to the Norman Conquest, during which Winchester was the Anglo-Saxon capital, and four more to the reigns of the Norman kings, after which, under the Angevin race, the city was rapidly superseded as the official capital by Westminster. In contrast with this full treatment a single chapter only—the last—disposes of "Winchester from the Reformation Period." The fact that in the Great Rebellion, as the writer admits, Hampshire "was of the highest importance to both parties," and that "much of the interest of the war" centred at Winchester, might have justified fuller treatment of that period; but the dean has been well advised in concentrating attention on the growth and early greatness of the town.

In the true spirit of the modern historian the author traces to geographical considerations the rise of "Venta Belgarum," the existence of which, as a Roman "chester" of considerable importance as a centre, is only known to us from radiating roads, from Roman materials brought to light by pick and shovel, and from the ground plan of the city—a ground plan, by the way, exactly parallel in its peculiar lines to that of Colchester. The transference of the West Saxon "bishopstool" to Winchester in 676 was the first step in the city's advance to greatness under English rule, but an excellent point is made by the author when he traces the development of that greatness to the effect of the Norse invasions, driving back, as they did, the Anglo-Saxon kings upon the south of England, and concentrating their resistance and their power at their Hampshire capital:—

"The Northern pirates, in fact, made Winchester the chief city of England; for the other kingdoms went down, while Wessex still stood its ground. It was farther off from the main points of attack, and had the incalculable advantage of a succession of capable kings, Egbert, Æthelwulf, Alfred, and Edward the Elder. So well did they their work, that when at last the Scandinavian power reached its height, and all England fell into King Cnut's hands, Winchester became the seat and capital of the new Scandinavian empire."

The reign of Alfred was a period of special glory for Winchester, and its ecclesiastical importance was then increased by the foundation of the New Minster and of the "Nunnaminster" over against the Old Minster of St. Swithun. Under Cnut again the national capital further strengthened its position, and there the Confessor was elected and held his Easter Courts. Even the resistance he encountered from the hapless New Minster did not cause the Conqueror to change the seat of sovereignty. A new royal palace arose in the centre of the town, and great councils were held within the city in 1070 and 1076. When the Domesday Survey was made in 1086 it was to the Treasury at Winchester that the original returns were made, and it was there that Domesday Book—"The Book of Winchester" as it terms itself—was drawn up. The traditions of the Conqueror's reign were continued by his sons. Both of them began their reigns at Winchester, and so far as is known, the city remained to the end of the Norman period the administrative and financial centre of the realm.

We are brought by the days of Henry I. to the most unique of the city records, a document primarily local, but also of national interest. Dean Kitchin may be somewhat rash in asserting that Alfred "embodied in a first 'Liber de Winton' the earliest Domesday Book"; but "the Winton Domesday" of Henry I. stands in authenticity on a level with the Great Survey. The main object of this document was to record the head-rents—not, as the author asserts, "the land-tax"—payable from the king's burghs in the city. In its entries relating to the streets and houses, the burgesses, their callings, and their dues, this precious inquest stands alone in the period to which it relates. It has enabled the dean to reconstruct a map of Norman Winchester, which is perhaps the most original and valuable feature of his book. This map will be indispensable to every student of the record. On some points we have our doubts. That the entry "homines des tregilda" (sic) refers to "three guilds" appears to be most unlikely; and that assertion leads us to look with some suspicion on the statement that the "Domus Hafoe" and "Domus Safugel" were "the hawks' house" and "seafowl's house" respectively. In any case, the dean has fallen into a not uncommon error in believing the national treasury to have been within the Conqueror's palace in the High Street, for it was certainly situate in Winchester Castle.

Under Stephen Winchester was called upon to play an important part, mainly in consequence of the see being held by his ambitious and masterful brother, Henry of Blois. Thither hastened Stephen at the beginning of his reign, and the Empress, in turn, on her triumph; there were held eventful councils; and the great siege of the city forms a decisive turning-point of the reign. The story is here rather briefly told, and the writer is mistaken in placing the burning of the city after the storm of Wherwell, these events having taken place at the beginning and end of the siege respectively.

Henry of Blois, who, as is well known, hoped to convert Winchester into an archiepiscopal see, was followed by other mighty bishops, such as Peter des Roches, and Winchester became more eminent as an ecclesiastical centre and seat of learning than as a royal and official residence. The rapid rise of London in wealth and importance, together with the loss of their continental dominions, gradually led the kings of England to desert their ancient capital, and by the days of Edward I. its greatness was at an end.

The long line of "statesmen-bishops" and church-building prelates includes the names of Stratford, Wykeham, Beaufort, Waynelete, Courtenay, Fox, and Wolsey. But it came to a close with the Reformation and the conversion of the monastic chapter into a dean and canons.

The chapter on "The Civic Constitution and Commerce of Winchester" introduces the reader to the famous fair of St. Giles and to the Merchant Guild. The latter is here spoken of as "the first corporation permitted to exist within the kingdom," it being added that "all who belonged to it, and they only, were properly called citizens." The former statement is somewhat obscure; the latter truly describes the state of things at Winchester, but raises a difficult question. The whole problem, however, of municipal development in England awaits further research. In his closing words the dean thus gracefully takes leave of his theme:—

"To have been the capital of Wessex, to have welcomed in her early days the arrival of every prince and prelate of great name, for a while to have been the chief city of England, the home of the great Alfred, the refuge of letters, the mother of English public school life—these are the titles on which the city rests her high renown, and these the memories amidst which she lives."

History of New South Wales from the Records.
By G. B. Barton. Vol. I. (Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner & Co.)

MR. BARTON shows great enthusiasm for his adopted country, but while dwelling upon its other attractions he does not tell us that its inhabitants are centenarians. If they are not, how can he expect them to read their history in sixteen volumes (of which this is the first), each containing six hundred pages, devoted exclusively to New South Wales? We have never yet met with any one who has perused from cover to cover the evidence before the Special Commission, nor Mr. G. W. Rusden's three volumes on the history of the five colonies of Australia. When we are so fortunate we shall believe that the present work may find numerous readers.

The Australians are proud of their "destiny," and their progress during the first century of their existence warrants them in feeling sanguine regarding their future. The sentiment of confidence in what the years to come have in store for them has prompted the Government of New South Wales to compile this work from authentic sources, and in doing so it has done well. If these volumes are not generally read, they will be at any rate studied by future authors. What would not Livy have given for such a record of those who under Romulus founded Imperial Rome? Possibly the similarity of the situation may have occurred to Governor Phillip, as he more than once contemplated "a sort of Roman Sabine wedding," the brides being provided from the adjacent islands. He might have combined this with another original idea of his, that of disposing of criminals capitally convicted to the cannibals of New Zealand—a free trade in human merchandise might then have been established for the benefit of his subjects. It is not now considered "good form" at the antipodes to allude to the origins of society. This need not be the case, for other nations have had a foundation just as questionable; for instance, the United States were once used for a similar purpose, and, in fact, a very much larger number of convicts were sent there than ever were landed in Australia. The West Indies and other colonies were also at one time made receptacles of criminals. It may be safely said that the convict element is now nearly extinct in Australia.

In undertaking this publication the Government merit general thanks, and Mr. Barton's part of the work has been, so far, well executed. If patience and research merit praise it must be awarded to him. He feels more interest than most people can affect in the squabbles of Governor Phillip and Major Ross, whose amour propre seems to have been hurt, and admires Phillip's statesmanship more than we do, for to say the truth it was confined to finding food for his people. We can cordially join him in sympathy for the sufferings caused by the incredible neglect of the authorities in England, who sent out convicts without clothes, and guns without cartridges. Immense practical difficulties had to be encountered, and absolute famine had to be averted. Phillip was a man of considerable courage; and while the historian may be surprised at some of his proposals for deterring from crime and for encouraging morality, he must be awarded high praise for steady resolution and patient endurance.

FRENCH BOOKS.

M. MAURICE PALÉOLOGUE, in his contribution on Vauvenargues to "Les Grands Écrivains Français" (Hachette), was no doubt compelled to some extent, by the necessities of his subject, to adopt a rather "about it and about it" fashion of writing. Vauvenargues's life was very short, and its events were chiefly a succession of cruel illnesses, relieved only by participation in wars which, for the most part, were the reverse of glorious, and in which his own private experiences are but little known. His work, interesting as it is, lends itself but ill to the combination of analysis and comment which is most suitable to such books as these. So M. Paléologue, having to fill his hundred and fifty pages, has done it partly by panegyric and partly by a good deal of that not extraordinarily profitable kind of writing which busies itself in arguing what A would have been if he had been not-A; or, less metaphysically and epigrammatically, if he had known people that he did not know, had stood in circumstances which were not his, and had lived at periods when he was either not born or dead. The biographer, partly in order to establish his theory that Vauvenargues was not ignorant of true love, tries to slur over his odd proposal to engage himself to a young lady if her father would advance him a little money to pay his debts; but the attempt is hardly successful, and need not have been made. Vauvenargues was distinctly a modern stoic, and the stoics were never distinguished for excessively fine feelings in regard either to women or to money. There are good passages in the book; but if there be any one who wants to know about Vauvenargues without reading him (a desire which we never wholly approve), we should still refer such a person to Sainte-Beuve supplemented by Mr. Morley. The best part of M. Paléologue's book lies in his remarks on the dignity and humanity of Vauvenargues as contrasting with the prevailing frivolity and cruelty of his time, and in his comparison of his author's ethical position with the more strictly philosophical morality of Spinoza and the Germans. With the contemporary English school, who might furnish more points of illustrative contact, M. Paléologue would seem to be less acquainted.

We can heartily recommend the second series of M. Anatole France's La Vie Littéraire (Paris, Calmann Lévy). No one writes a better causerie than M. France, who has at once the lightest of hands, the most elegant of pens, and a head thoroughly well stored with that real literary knowledge, both of ancient and modern literature, which is perhaps not quite so common in French men of letters as in those of some other countries. The volume may contain some score and a half of papers ranging over the most interesting French literary subjects of the last two or three years: Flaubert's 'Letters,' M. de Maupassant's 'Pierre et Jean,' M. Sully Prudhomme's 'Bonheur,' M. d'Haussonville's book on Mérimée, M. Jules Lemaitre, "Gyp," M. Gaston Paris and his manual of old French literature, M. Zola's 'Rêve,' the 'Histoire du Peuple d'Israël,' and a great many others. Occasionally, it must be confessed, M. France is liable to be taken to task by a stern critic who thinks that other critics should model their deliverances on the form of a judge's charge by stating first the case, and then the law on it. But he will, it is to be feared, be only the more welcome to the general reader, who, at the same time, will be likely to go far before he finds a better writer himself, or a writer of more taste in judging others, than M. Anatole France.

YACOB ARTIN PASHA has written a work entitled L'Instruction Publique en Egypte, which has been published at Paris by M. Ernest Leroux, and is a very complete view of the subject of which it treats. One of the chapters is on the education of women, and it is interesting to note that the pasha tries to prove that not only is the Mohammedan religion no obstacle to family education, but that in the life of Mohammed there are many examples which should lead Mohammedans to see that their womenkind are properly taught. Yacoub Artin is, however, if we mistake not, an Armenian Christian, and he admits that little or nothing has been done in Egypt for women's education.

UNDER the title of L'Année Mondaine, by "Septfontaines," MM. Firmin Didot & Co. publish one of their most perfectly printed volumes, upon beautiful paper, containing a series of sketches of Parisian society written by one of its members. The book is attractive, and will doubtless have a considerable success in Paris; but it is too exclusively Parisian in the names of which it treats to interest a wide class in England. Contrary to the practice of most French writers, its author has accompanied his volume by an index, so that those who desire to see what he has said of any of the reigning beauties of France have only to turn to their names in order to at once find the passage. When the writer deals with other countries he very naturally makes some slight mistakes. "Retisham Hall" should, we think, be Redisham, both in the index and in the text; and when he tells us that at a garden party the Prince of Wales came in a white hat and the Duke of Cornwall in a black one, "Septfontaines" invites us to believe that the heir to the throne had imitated those merchants of old clothes who occasionally crown themselves with double force. The fact is that Prince Albert Victor was with the Prince of Wales, and that "Septfontaines" was under the excusable impression that the duchy reserved for the heir to the throne was the property of the Queen's eldest son's eldest son, instead of the possession of his father. "Septfontaines's" slips are perhaps not entirely confined to foreign names and usages. As we have sometimes found fault with English writers about France for having written "Galifet," "Galiffet," or "Gallifet" for Gallifet, we may point out to "Septfontaines" that he has made an error in writing of the "Marquise de Gallifet" in his text at pp. 324, 345, 359, 405, 407, and 434, although the name of the lady is correctly given in one passage of the text, and the name of her husband (the general) always correctly spelt, while the name of the marquise herself is given correctly in the index. The writer of these "Chroniques Mondaines" has done his part of the work in a readable and pleasant way, and his publisher has presented us with specimens of paper and of type such as will seldom be surpassed even by the house of Firmin Didot.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

The Life, Times, and Labours of Robert Owen, by Lloyd Jones, edited by William Cairns Jones (Sonnenschein & Co.), is described in the biographical sketch of the author as a republication, and we believe that it was first brought out by the Co-operative Newspaper Society, and afterwards by the Labour Association. It is quite worthy of a new edition. Not that the late Mr. Lloyd Jones was in all respects a model biographer. He was too much of an apologist, too apt to intrude his own personality, and had little command of style. But Robert Owen was so interesting a man that some shortcomings on the part of his vates sacer may well be forgiven. Lord Melbourne once told him to his face that he was one of the most foolish persons he ever conversed with, and undoubtedly most of Owen's ideas were crude and many purely visionary. Yet he was the real founder of infant schools and of the co-operative movement, while among the practical manufacturers of the time there were few who could beat him in the management and development of a business. Up to a certain point all his philanthropic schemes prospered. The New Lanark establishment was a remarkable success; he gained the ear of the public and of people in high places, notably of the Duke of Kent. But some of his later projects—for instance, the Labour Exchange—were essentially utopian, while his precipitation wrecked others, among them the community at Quenwood, Hants, which might possibly have succeeded under more deliberate guidance. Above all, his indirect declarations of hostility to the received forms of religion caused many of his adherents to forsake him, and afforded a most convenient topic to his enemies. At his worst, however, Owen was a man of spotless sincerity, and though different opinions will naturally be held as to the soundness of his views, the integrity of his character is undeniable.

LIKE the previous volumes of that excellent series, "The Badminton Library," the treatise on Golf (Longmans & Co.) is the work of several contributors. The result is the most elaborate of the many monographs that have recently appeared on the game. In fact, the book is a trifle too elaborate, and might without injury have been reduced to four hundred pages. Mr. Lang's chapter on the history of the game shows the writer's usual dexterity; at the same time, as is often the case with Mr. Lang's writings, it is impossible to help feeling that his essay would have been still better had the writer bestowed a little more pains on it. The "General Remarks" of Lord Wellwood are by no means bad in themselves, but, as they really contain nothing that is not said by somebody else somewhere else in the volume, they might have been omitted. Neither, although it contains some amusing stories, is Mr. Balfour's chapter of much account. On the other hand, the portions contributed by Mr. Hutchinson are excellent, full of common sense, and containing valuable hints and clear directions. Of course, we do not always agree with him—we should not, for instance, tell a player, unless we wished him ill, to make a rule of aiming to the left of the hole in making an approach shot—but these chapters, as a whole, contain a body of sound instruction such as the beginner should study and restudy. Mr. Everard's chapter on "Some Celebrated Golfers" is most interesting, and Mr. Hutchinson's on "Professionals and Caddies" is also worthy of perusal; so is Sir Walter Simpson's contribution. A word of warm praise is due to Mr. Hodge's illustrations. The term "slicing" might as well have been included in the glossary.

WE cordially welcome Mr. Samuelson's new quarterly, Subjects of the Day (Routledge & Sons), which differs essentially from its predecessors, for the articles in each number are confined to a single subject. The topic chosen for the first instalment is State education for the people. By a curious arrangement, the subject of Indian education, which is handled by Sir W. Hunter, is placed first, and England, Scotland, and Ireland only occupy the second place. Mr. MacCarthy compares British systems of education and those prevailing in the United States, in Canada, and Australia. But the continent of Europe is neglected, except incidentally. Something, for instance, is said about the education of women in France by Mrs. Crawford in her article on the 'Status of Women.' It is curious that in the bibliography so able an organ as the Journal of Education is ignored.

THE popularity of Mr. Lewis Morris has led to the issue by Messrs. Kegan Paul & Co. of an edition of his works in one convenient volume, designed to range with the one-volume edition of the Laureate's poetry. A good portrait is prefixed.—Mr. Frowde has sent us a new edition of The Letters of Lord Chesterfield to his Godson. Lord Carnarvon has made an acceptable addition to this charming volume by reprinting the correspondence of Lord Chesterfield with Arthur Stanhope, the father of Philip, and has improved the book in other ways.—The Literary and General Essays of Charles Kingsley and The Hermits are two new volumes of the delightful edition of Kingsley's works which Messrs. Macmillan are issuing. The same firm send us The Ogilvies, another instalment of their reissue of Mrs. Craik's novels, and also a new edition of Paul Patoff, by Mr. Marion Crawford.—Other reprints of novels on our table are The Pariah of Mr. Anstey (Smith & Elder); Pauline, by Mrs. Walford (Spencer Blackett); and Agnes Surriage, by Mr. Bynner, an American novelist (Sampson Low & Co.).—Hereward the Wake completes the sixpenny issue of Kingsley's novels by Messrs. Macmillan.—Messrs. Longman have done a clever stroke of business in dividing Mr. Lang's Blue Fairy-Book into seven pretty thin volumes with additional illustrations by Mr. Ford. They will, beyond all doubt, have a prodigious sale, and deservedly too.—Finally, Prof. Morley deserves to be thanked for reprinting (in the "Garisbrooke Library" of Messrs. Routledge) Stow's Survey of London.

WE have on our table A Primer of French Literature, by F. M. Warren (Boston, U.S., Heath & Co.),—The Modern Novelists of Russia, by C. E. Turner (Tribner),—The First French Reciter, edited by E. Malvin (Hachette),—German Course, by G. H. Williams (Moffatt & Paige),—The Philosophy of Civilization, by J. H. Ferguson (W. B. Whittingham & Co.),—The Home-Ruler's Manual, by R. Barry O'Brien (Kegan Paul),—Graphical Statics: Two Treatises on the Graphical Calculus and Reciprocal Figures in Graphical Statics, by L. Cremona, translated by T. H. Beare (Oxford, Clarendon Press),—Professional Papers of the Corps of Royal Engineers, edited by Capt. W. A. Gale, R.E., Vol. XIV. (Chatham, Mackay),—Skating, by D. Adams (Bell),—Æsop Redivivus, by Mary Boyle (Field & Tuer),—A Manchester Shirtmaker, by J. Law (Authors' Co-operative Publishing Co.),—Ashes for Bread, by B. Harrington (Thacker & Co.),—Selections from Original Contributions by James Thomson to 'Cope's Tobacco Plant' (Liverpool, 'Cope's Tobacco Plant' Office),—Twice 'Guilty'! by W. W. Fenn and E. Salmon (Drane),—Marianne, the Last of the Asmonean Princesses, by N. Ogle (Warne),—Mad Love, translated from the Russian of V. Garshin (Spencer Blackett),—Looking Forward; or, the Diothas, by I. Thijsen (Putnam),—A French Marriage, by F. C. Philips (White & Co.),—A Noble Woman, by H. Gréville, translated by A. D. Vandam (Chatto & Windus),—The Poetry of Tennyson, by H. Van Dyke (E. Mathews),—Towards Fields of Light, by the late Rev. E. Hatch, D.D. (Hodder & Stoughton),—Verses—Paintings of the Past, by Mrs. C. Walbey (Hertford, S. Austin & Sons),—The Ancient Classical Drama, by R. G. Moulton (Oxford, Clarendon Press),—The Lady of Lyons, and other Plays, by Lord Lytton, edited by R. F. Sharp (Scott),—The Homeric Birthday Book, selected by V. E. G. (Simpkin),—David in the Psalms, by the Rev. F. W. Mozley (Bell),—Moffatt's Edition of the Gospel according to St. Matthew (Moffatt & Paige),—A Manual for District Visitors in Town and Country Parishes, by H. Baillie (Griffith & Farran),—Leaves from the Tree of Life, by the Rev. J. Rate (Hodder & Stoughton),—Conscience and Sin, by the Rev. S. Baring-Gould (Skeffington),—The Mosaic Sacrifices in Leviticus i.-viii., by the Rev. W. M. Rodwell (Griffith & Farran),—Le Tour du Monde, Thirtieth Year (Hachette),—Q. Horatius Flaccus, recensuit J. G. Orellius, Ed. Quarta, Vol. II., curavit W. Mewes, Fasc. I. (Williams & Norgate),—and Sept Grands Auteurs du Dix-neuvième Siècle, edited by A. Fortier (Boston, U.S., Heath).

LIST OF NEW BOOKS.

ENGLISH.

Theology.

Conferences of Agostino de Montefeltro, delivered at Rome during Lent, 1889, trans. by H. D. Gall, 2nd Series, 3/6 Echlin's (J. R.) The Everlasting Gospel, in Four Discourses, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.

Harrison's (B.) Patient Waiting, Sermons, with a Memoir of the Author, 8vo. 5/6 cl.

Murphy's (Rev. J. B. C.) Through Fast and Festival, Part 3, cr. 8vo. 2/6 swd.

Sacred Books of the East, Vol. 35: Questions of King Milinda, translated by Rhys Davids, 8vo. 10/6 cl.
Selections from the Sermons of Padre Agostino de Montefeltro, edited by C. M. Phillimore, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.

Poetry and the Drama.

Allingham's (W.) Complete Works, in 6 vols. 12mo. 30/
Allingham's (W.) Thought and Word, and Ashby Manor, a Play in Two Acts, 12mo. 6/ half-pamphlet.

Domenichetti's (R. H.) The Quest of Sir Bertrand, and other Poems, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.

Hood's (T.) Poetical Works, with Memoir, Albion Edition, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.

Keats's (J.) Poetry and Prose, ed. by H. B. Forman, 8vo. 10/6

Second Poetry Book (A), Part 2, compiled by M. A. Woods, 12mo. 2/6 cl.

Trall's (H. D.) Saturday Songs, fcap. 4to. 3/6 cl.

Music.

Medburn Musical Drill, edited by F. W. Farrington, 8vo. 2/
Story's (E. M.) Cured Music, Book 1, for Beginners, 4to. 3/6 cl.

History and Biography.

Art of Authorship, Literary Reminiscences, &c., compiled and edited by G. Bainton, cr. 8vo. 5/6 cl.

Bagwell's (K.) Ireland under the Tudors, with a Succinct Account of the Earlier History, Vol. 3, 8vo. 18/ cl.

Russell (W. C.) and Jacques's (W.) Horatio Nelson and the Naval Supremacy of England, illus. cr. 8vo. 5/ cl.

Geography and Travel.

Bevan's (T. F.) Toll, Travel, and Discovery in British New Guinea, with 5 Maps, cr. 8vo. 7/6 cl.

Edwards's (E. M.) Severn to Tyne, the Story of Six English Rivers, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.

Hare's (A. J. C.) Cities of Central Italy, 2 vols. cr. 8vo. 21/ cl.

Lynch's (J.) Egyptian Sketches, with 16 full-page illustrations, 8vo. 1/6 cl.

Vincent's (F.) Around and about South America, Twenty Months of Quest and Query, Maps, &c., 8vo. 21/ cl.

Philology.

Arbuthnot's (F. F.) Arabic Authors, a Manual of Arabian History and Literature, 8vo. 10/ cl.

Century Dictionary of the English Language, edited by W. D. Whitney, Part 7, folio, 10/6 cl.

Cicero de Finibus, Book 1, Introduction, Text, Notes, and Translation by S. Moses and C. S. Fearnside, cr. 8vo. 5/

Euripides's Iphigenia in Tauris, a Literal Translation by G. F. H. Sykes and J. H. Haydon, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.

Fox (H. T.) and Bromley's (T. M.) Models and Exercises in Unseen Translation, 12mo. 5/6 cl.

Herodotus, Book 6, with Introduction, Notes, &c., by W. F. Masom and C. S. Fearnside, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.

Rutherford's (W. G.) First Greek Syntax, 12mo. 2/ cl.

Thomson's (W. S.) Practical Guide to English Composition and Essay Writing, cr. 8vo. 3/ cl.

Science.

Dixon's (C.) Stray Feathers from many Birds, being Leaves from a Naturalist's Note-Book, demy 8vo. 7/6 cl.

Draper's (C. H.) Elementary Text-Book of Light, Sound, and Heat, 12mo. 2/ cl.

Harrison (W. J.) and White's (C. A.) Magnetism and Electricity, 12mo. 2/ cl.

Irvine's (W. B.) A Class-Book of Geography, Physical, Political, and Commercial, &c., cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.

Kingsley's (C.) Glaucus, or the Wonders of the Shore, cheap edition, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.

Nicholson's (H. A.) Lives and Labours of Leading Naturalists, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.

Richardson's (A. T.) Tables for Chemical Analysis, 8vo. 2/ cl.

Richardson's (B. W.) National Health, abridged from the 'Health of Nations', cr. 8vo. 4/6 cl.

Snow's (H.) The Reappearance (Recurrence) of Cancer after Apparent Extirpation, &c., 8vo. 5/6 cl.

Terminologia Medica Polyglotta, a Concise Dictionary of Medical Terms, compiled by T. Maxwell, roy. 8vo. 16/ cl.

General Literature.

Atkinson's (B.) The Web of Life, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.

Burns's (D.) Temperance History, Part 3, 1882-1872, 2/ swd.

Cameron's (Mrs. H. L.) A Lost Wife, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.

Chambers's Encyclopædia, Vol. 5, roy. 8vo. 10/ cl.

Copner's (J.) The Faith of a Realist, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.

Craik's (Mrs.) Agatha's Husband, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.

Crawford's (M.) With Immortals, cheap edition, 3/6 cl.

Cupples's (G.) The Green Hand, cheap edition, cr. 8vo. 2/ cl.

Daphnis and Chloe, a Pastoral Romance, translated from the Greek of Longus, illustrated, demy 8vo. 10/6 cl.

Dickens's (C.) Personal History of David Copperfield, illustrated by F. Barnard, royal 8vo. 3/6 cl.

Donovan's (D.) Tracked and Taken, Detective Sketches, 2/

Export Merchants, Shippers, with their Trading Ports, &c., 8vo. 15/ cl.

Favourite Nursery Album, Forty Coloured Pictures mounted on Manila, 4to. 6/ cl.

Gems from the East, a Birthday Book of Precepts and Axioms, compiled by H. R. B., 32mo. 3/6 cl.

His Sweet Reward, and other Stories, 8vo. 2/ swd.

Locke's (Mrs. M.) In Far Dakota, 12mo. 2/6 cl.

Murray (D. C.) and Herman's (H.) The Bishops' Bible, 3 vols. cr. 8vo. 31/6 cl.

New Popular Educator, a Complete Encyclopædia, Vol. 3, royal 8vo. 5/ cl.

Smart's (H.) The Master of Rathkelly, cr. 8vo. 2/ bds.

Smollett's (T.) The Adventures of Peregrine Pickle, Vol. 1, 8vo. 5/ cl.

Tytler's (S.) French Janet, 12mo. 2/ bds.

Watson's (H. B. M.) Lady Faint Heart, 3 vols. cr. 8vo. 31/6 cl.

Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship and Travels, translated by T. Carlyle, cr. 8vo. 2/ cl.

FOREIGN.

Fine Art.

Petroz (F.): Esquisse d'une Histoire de la Peinture au Louvre, 5fr.

Drama.

Bennewitz (A.): Congreve u. Molière, 3m.

History and Biography.

Büdinger (M.): Catull und der Patriat, 6m. 70.

Ihne (W.): Römische Geschichte, Vol. 8, 5m.

Rougé (A. de): Le Marquis de Vercas, 7fr. 50.

Thouvenel (L.): La Grèce du Roi Othon, 7fr. 50.

Philology.

Dandin's Poetik, Sanskrit u. Deutsch hrsg. v. O. Böhtlingk, 10m.

Delitzsch (F.): Assyrisches Wörterbuch, Part 3, 30m.

Motti (F.): Elementary Russian Grammar, 2m.

Motti (F.): Russian Conversation Grammar, 5m.

Science.

Carez et Douvillé: Annuaire Géologique Universel, Vol. 5, 20fr.

Féré (Ch.): Les Épilepsies et les Épileptiques, 20fr.

Lasswitz (K.): Geschichte der Atomistik vom Mittelalter bis Newton, Vol. 2, 20m.

General Literature.

Chennevière (A.): Contes d'Amour, 3fr. 50.

Lager (L.): Russes et Slaves, 3fr. 50.

Lévy-Bruhl (L.): L'Allemagne depuis Leibniz, 3fr. 50.

Rougier (E.): Naufrage d'Amour, 3fr. 50.

Tissot (E.): Les Évolutions de la Critique Française, 3fr. 50.

A REVIEW OF THACKERAY'S.

62, Rutland Gate, April 18, 1890.

I HAVE observed that some of your correspondents have from time to time expressed in your pages a desire to ascertain and collect the less-known writings of William Makepeace Thackeray. One of these contributions has escaped their notice, because it was published anonymously, and I am probably the only person now living who knew the history, and can attest the authorship of the article in question. It is a review of the 'Speeches of Lord Brougham,' which will be found in the eighth volume of the British and Foreign Review (No. xvi.), published in April, 1839. It fills forty-nine pages of that journal. The criticism is one of extreme, perhaps excessive, severity; but it abounds in passages of great eloquence and power, and may, even at this great distance of time, be read with interest. It may be right to add that Mr. Thackeray had no cause for personal animosity to Lord Brougham, and that the article was simply the expression of the opinion he entertained of that remarkable man, who was still in 1839 in full possession of his transcendent abilities.

HENRY REEVE.

BENEDICT OF OXFORD.

MR. JACOBS is right that the day of Wednesday in the Berlin MS. agrees with 1233 and not with 1333, which is evident from Dr. Mahler's chronological tables (Vienna, 1889). It is, however, the only instance in a Hebrew colophon, as far as my knowledge goes, in which the hundreds, as Mr. Jacobs suggests, are left out, whilst errors in the thousands are frequent. But even with the date of 1233 the difficulty concerning "Benedictus le Puncteur" is far from being removed. Elijah calls himself "the son of Berechiah's old age." Supposing Elijah was already at the comparatively young age of twenty-three a skilful scribe, and "the old age of his father" was sixty (rather seventy), Benedictus, or Berechiah, would be born in the year 1150, and still alive when his son made the copy of the MS. Bible at Berlin. On the other hand, Elijah finished the copy of the Vatican MS., Assemani, No. 14, the 1st of Ab (10th in the Jewish Quarterly Review is wrong), 5059=July 1st, 1299, consequently at the age of eighty-nine. Would Elijah not have made allusion to his very advanced age? And what is more, Elijah does not mention here his father with the formula of the dead, which a son would never forget to give. Moreover, in the Vatican MS. Elijah does not yet give himself the title of Naqdan, and does not mention his father's works on "trees and stones," both which he does in the Berlin MS. Which colophon, according to common sense, is the earlier? And if everything be granted by specialists, which I doubt, to Mr. Jacobs, where are the proofs that Berechiah lived in England, and that he knew Arabic? I am, unfortunately, not gifted with the talent of explaining at a minute's notice contradictory documents, but I shall reconsider my objections to Mr. Jacobs's brilliant combinations after having obtained a new collation of the colophons at Berlin and the Vatican. The Athenæum, however, cannot afford space for such minute discussions, in which many Hebrew passages must be given; I shall, therefore, treat the matter carefully in a periodical specially devoted to Rabbinical subjects, and I hope that Mr. Jacobs will do the same. One word more about the locality בִּירְתָּ mentioned in the colophon of the MS. of Berlin, which I rendered by Dreux (בִּירְתָּ). Mr. Jacobs thinks that this word represents Rodom=Rodomagus=Rouen, already proposed by M. Renan in the 'Hist. Litt. de la France,' xxvii. 745. Rodom is, I believe, nowhere employed for Rothomagus, and besides the Jews, as usual, transliterate from the spoken language, viz., רֹוֶן=Rouen (see the Catalogue of Oriental MSS. in Trinity College, Cambridge, 1870, p. 228).

A. NEUBAUER.

MISS BOYLE.

Montone, April 18, 1890.

I HAVE only just read the notice in the Athenæum (April 12th) of Mary Louisa Boyle, whose death leaves in the heart of many a friend a blank that Time itself will scarcely fill. Accurate as are the statements in every line of that account of her life, so much which formed the essence of her inner character and of the abiding charm felt in her society is necessarily left out, that those who knew and loved her best will confess to a certain disappointment. May one to whom her name has been as a household word for the past forty-five years venture to fill in a few of the touches wanting in Mr. Theodore Watts's portrait?

It would be no easy task, were the question asked, to answer which was the chief characteristic of Mary Boyle's many-sided character. I think of her hosts of friends, of their devotion to her, of the warmth of her affection for many, and her delightfulness with all; of her deep love for those bound to her by the yet closer ties of family. I think of the unswerving truth and downright honesty that marked her intercourse with each and all, steel-true to the absent, faithful with every trust, small or great, that might be committed to her. I remember the tenderness of her unfailing sympathy alike in sorrow and in joy—for none like her knew how to rejoice with them that rejoice or to weep with them that weep—her cool, impartial judgment and fearlessness of opinion, unblinded by affection, unworried by prejudice. I think of all this, and feel that Mary Boyle's motto might have well been "Love and loyalty." And then there are the sunny hours that live in our memory—hours of which she was the life and soul with her quick wit and brilliant sallies, or when she charmed us with her inimitable acting—for amongst her varied talents she numbered this also, and had studied acting with the enthusiasm of an artist. And then those other memories return—"the slow sad hours" when she has been herself broken and cast down with trouble, or has sought to cheer and give comfort by sharing the burden that lay sore upon another's heart. And thus I know not which to choose as most characteristic of Mary Boyle, her buoyant spirits and keen appreciation of humour and the light flowing "war of mocking words," or her infinite sense of the pathos of life. One remarkable point must not be forgotten. With all her wisdom and her wit she was possessed with no desire to shine, as people say, in society. She knew when to sit still. Many have met her and gone away wholly unaware of the real quality of that richly stored mind. But when her turn came she would take her part with the best. Blue-eyed and fair-haired, in stature Mary Boyle was very small. Yet somehow she was not little, or to me she never seemed so. She had such a great heart and so fine an intellect! and then there was no littleness in anything she ever did or said. The world called her clever; but I have never forgotten hearing in my youth Mr. Landor's remark about her. He said, "Mary is more than clever, she is profound." Up to near the end of her long life she was able to enjoy in a way that very few when they are old find possible. She excelled in languages, and in that less common field of study, heraldry. In former times she loved to walk, to ride, to dance. To the last she enjoyed conversation, books, music; art also, until sight failed; and she worshipped beauty in whatever form. Nature she intensely loved and enjoyed. While entering into nature's every mood and change with the true feeling of a poet, God's blessed sunshine was always health and exquisite enjoyment to her. And so it was that Italy, where she spent a large part of her youthful days, remained for her her sweetest dream. Yet there is many an English garden, too, that she used to love. Last spring she would come in from strolling among the daffodils when the sun was low, and speak with such delight of how "the birds were jubilant." That was her favourite way of expressing the full chorus of garden music. After all, I think that this was Mary Boyle's most individual trait, this rare power to enjoy, ever rising from some perennial source within. Unchecked by years, undiminished by care or grief, or even sickness, the pure stream welled up almost until the last year. Latterly indeed, at times, we know that she must have felt "the daisy quilt" creeping up higher and higher. Quietly and without pain she closed her eyes and stole from us, early on that Easter Monday before the birds awoke or the dawn began. She had always been soft and quiet in her movements about the house, and in her way of entering or leaving a room. A strange unreality it still seems, that the long sleep should already seal that bright spirit! Emerson has somewhere said, referring to the loss of beloved friends, that "all at once we awake to find a whole wing of our palace has fallen." That is how some who held her dear are feeling now about Mary Boyle.

E. V. B.

THE 'DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY.'

The following is the second part of a list of the names which it is intended to insert under the letter L (Section I.) in the 'Dictionary of National Biography.' When one date is given, it is the date of death, unless otherwise stated. An asterisk is affixed to a date when it is only approximate. The editors of the 'Dictionary' will be obliged by any notice of omissions addressed to them at Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co.'s, 15, Waterloo Place, S.W. They particularly request that when new names are suggested, an indication may be given of the source from which they are derived.

Lant, Benjamin, Bishop of Peterborough, 1590-1674
Lant, Thomas, Portcullis Pursuivant, fl. 1587
Lantfred, monk of Winchester, fl. 950
Lanyon, Sir Charles, civil engineer, 1813-89
Lanyon, Sir William Owen, K.C.M.G., C.B., military commander, 1842-87
Lanza, Gesualdo, musical composer, 1780*, fl. 1834
Lapidge, Edward, architect, 1860
Laporte, G. H., painter, 1873
Laporte, John, water-colour painter, 1761-1839
Lapraik, John, Scotch poet, 1727-1807
Lapworth, Edward, M.D., Sedgwick Professor at Oxford, 1636
Larcom, Sir Thomas Aiskew, Bart., K.C.B., F.R.S., major-general, 1801-79
Lardner, Rev. Dionysius, LL.D., 'Museum of Science and Art', 1783-1869
Lardner, Nathaniel, D.D., Dissenting minister, 1684-1768
Largilliere, Nicholas, painter, 1656-1748
Larke, John, translator, fl. 1565
Larkham, Thomas, Puritan divine, 1602-69
Larking, Rev. Lambert Blackwell, M.A., antiquary, 1797-1868
Laroche, James, actor and vocalist, fl. 1713
Laroon, Marcellus, painter, 1653-1702
Laroon, Marcellus, painter, 1679-1772
Larport, Francis Seymour, Judge Advocate-General, 1776-1845
Larport, Sir George Gerard de Hochepeid, Bart., politician, 1789-1855
Lascelles, Mrs. Anne, née Catley, vocalist and actress, 1789
Lascelles, Rowley, 'Liber Hibernie', 1771-1841

Laski or Lasko, John, Polish reformer, 1499-1560
Lassell, William, F.R.S., LL.D., astronomer, 1799-1880
Lassells, John, Protestant martyr, 1546
Lassells, Richard, Catholic divine, 1603-68
Lates, Charles, Mus. Bac., composer, fl. 1827
Lates, John James, musical composer, 1777
Latawar, Rev. Richard, Latin poet, 1560-1601
Latham, James, 'the Irish Van Dyck', 1750*
Latham, John, M.D., F.R.S., ornithologist, 1740-1837
Latham, John, M.D., physician, 1761-1843
Latham, Peter Mere, M.D., physician, 1789-1875
Latham, Robert Gordon, M.D., F.R.S., philologist and ethnologist, 1812-88
Latham, Simon, writer on falconry, fl. 1618
Lathbury, John, D.D., Franciscan, fl. 1408
Lathbury, Rev. Thomas, 'History of the Nonjurors', 1798-1865
Latham, Francis, novelist and dramatist, fl. 1814
Lathy, Thomas Pike, novelist, b. 1771
Latimer, Hugh, D.D., Bishop of Worcester, 1490*, ex. 1555
Latimer, Nevil, 'Castell of Picaure', fl. 1508
Latimer, William, classical scholar, 1545
Latimer, William, D.D., Dean of Peterborough, 1583
La Touche, David Digges, banker in Ireland, 1671-1745
La Touche, William George Digges, British resident at Bussora, 1747-1803
Latrobe, Charles Joseph, C.B., 'Rambles in Mexico', 1801-75
Lauder, Robert Scott, R.S.A., painter, 1758-1836
Latter, Mr. Mary, dramatist, 1725-77
Latter, Capt. Thomas, Burmese scholar, 1616-53
Laud, William, D.D., Archbishop of Canterbury, 1573, ex. 1645
Lauder, George, Scotch poet, fl. 1667
Lauder, James Eckford, R.S.A., painter, 1812-69
Lauder, Sir John, Lord Fountainhall, Scotch judge, 1646-1722
Lauder, Robert Scott, R.S.A., painter, 1803-69
Lauder, Thomas, Bishop of Dunkeld, 1481
Lauder, Sir Thomas Dick, Bart., miscellaneous writer, 1784-1848
Lauder, William, 'Dewtie of Kyngis', fl. 1553
Lauder, William, literary forger, 1771*
Lauderdale, Earls and Duke of, see Maitland.
Laugharne, Rowland, major-general, fl. 1649
Laughton, George, D.D., Vicar of Wilton, fl. 1814
Laughton, Richard, D.D., Prebendary of Worcester, 1723
Laurence, St., Archbishop of Canterbury, 619
Laurence, Prior of Durham, 1154
Laurence, Abbot of Westminster, 1176
Laurence O'Toole, St., Archbishop of Dublin, 1180
Laurence or Lawrence, Edward, meteorologist, 1742
Laurence, French, D.C.L., see Lawrence.
Laurence, Rev. Giles, D.C.L., divine, fl. 1584
Laurence, Rev. John, M.A., writer on gardening and divinity, 1732
Laurence, Col. Richard, writer on Ireland, fl. 1682
Laurence, Richard, LL.D., Archbishop of Cashel, 1760-1838
Laurence, Thomas, D.D., Master of Balliol College, 1598-1657
Laurence, William, lawyer, 1614-82*
Laurens, Rev. Philip, M.A., schoolmaster, 1777
Laurie, Sir Peter, Lord Mayor of London, 1787-1861
Laurie, Robert, engraver, 1749-1804*
Lavenham, Richard, dramatist, 1381 or 1383
Lavingham or Lavenham, Thomas, D.D., divine, fl. 1447
Lavington, George, LL.D., Bishop of Exeter, 1683-1782
Law, Augustus Henry, Jesuit missionary, 1833-80
Law, Hon. Charles Ewan, LL.D., Q.C., M.P., Recorder of London, 1792-1850
Law, Edmund, D.D., Bishop of Carlisle, 1703-57
Law, Edward, Lord Ellenborough, 1749-1818
Law, Edward, Earl of Ellenborough, G.C.B., 1790-1871
Law, George Henry, Bishop of Bath and Wells, 1761-1845
Law, Right Hon. Hugh, LL.D., Lord Chancellor of Ireland, 1818-83
Law, James, Dean of Gloucester, 1798-1884
Law, John, of Lauriston, financial projector, 1671-1729
Law, John, Bishop of Elphin, 1810
Law, Robert, Covenanter preacher, 1688*
Law, Thomas, of Washington, 1834
Law, Rev. William, M.A., mystical divine, 'Serious Call', 1686-1761 Law, William John, Commissioner of Insolvent Court, 1787-1869
Lawren, John, D.D., Benedictine, fl. 1449
Lawes, Henry, musical composer, 1585-1662
Laws, William, musical composer, 1645
Lawless, John, Irish agitator, 1729-1837
Lawless, Matthew James, painter, 1837-64
Lawless, Valentine Browne, Lord Cloncurry, 1773-1853
Lawless, William, general, 1824
Lawlor, Denis Shine, Catholic writer, 1809-87
Lawrance, Miss Hannah, 'Queens of England', 1796-1875
Lawranson, Thomas, painter, 1778*
Lawranson, William, painter, fl. 1780
Lawrence, Andrew, engraver, 1708-47
Lawrence, Charles, writer on agriculture, 1881
Lawrence, Edward, M.A., Nonconformist divine, 1627*-95
Lawrence, Frederick, 'Life of Fielding', fl. 1855
Lawrence, French, D.C.L., civilian, 1768-1809
Lawrence, George, Puritan divine, fl. 1663
Lawrence, George Alfred, 'Guy Livingstone', 1827-76
Lawrence, Sir George St. Patrick, general, 1805-84
Lawrence, Henry, President of the Council of State, 1664
Lawrence, Sir Henry Montgomery, K.C.B., general, 1806-57
Lawrence, James Henry, the Chevalier de Lawrence, 1773-1840
Lawrence, Rev. John, writer on agriculture, 1732
Lawrence, John, literary farmer, 1753-1839
Lawrence, John Laird Mair, Lord Lawrence, 1811-79
Lawrence, Mary, afterwards Mrs. Kearse, flower painter, fl. 1797. See Kearse.
Lawrence, Richard, theological writer, fl. 1657
Lawrence, Roger, Nonjuror, 1736
Lawrence, Rev. Samuel, of Nantwich, 1662-1712
Lawrence, Samuel, poet, 1854
Lawrence, Sir Souden, judge, 1751-1814
Lawrence, Stringer, general, 1697-1775
Lawrence, Thomas, M.D., physician, 1711-83
Lawrence, Sir Thomas, P.R.A., portrait painter, 1769-1830
Lawrence, William, 'Marriage Vindicated', fl. 1680
Lawrence, Sir William, Bart., F.R.S., surgeon and anatomist, 1753-1867
Lawson, Cecil Gordon, painter, 1851-82
Lawson, Mrs. Dorothy, Catholic lady, 1632

Lawson, George, D.D., Scotch associate clergyman, 1749-1820
Lawson, Henry, F.R.S., astronomer, 1774-1856
Lawson, James, poet and dramatist, 1799-1880
Lawson, Right Hon. James Anthony, LL.D., 1817-87
Lawson, Sir John, admiral, 1665
Lawson, John, 'Lectures on Oratory', 1712-59
Lawson, Thomas, polemic, 1688*
Lawson, Rev. Thomas, Quaker, 1830-91
Lax, William, M.A., F.R.S., Lowndean Professor, 1761-1836
Layamon, Saxon poet and historian, fl. 1214
Layard, Daniel Peter, M.D., physician, 1721-1802
Laycock, Thomas, M.D., physician, 1812-76
Layser, Christopher, Jacobite, ex. 1722
Layser, Richard, Jacobite conspirator, ex. 1723
Layfield, John, D.D., Biblical scholar, 1617
Layman, William, commander R.N., 1826*
Layton, Henry, theological writer, fl. 1692
Layton, Richard, LL.D., Dean of York, 1544

BULGARIAN LITERATURE.

MR. ZIRKOW, the Minister of Public Instruction in Bulgaria, has, according to a long article in the Levant Herald, taken an important step for promoting vernacular literature in that state. His department has issued the first number of a quarterly series of miscellanea in a thick volume. This includes a great number of contributions dealing with a variety of subjects. Among these those which will create most interest abroad are such as deal with ethnology and folk-lore. One essay is on Slav legends concerning the sacrifice of one's own child. Another is a collection of Macedonian (Bulgarian) popular songs. One subject is the primitive forms of industrial production. The difficult problem of the dialect of the Rhodope is treated upon. Prof. Slien gives a paper on old Bulgarian coins and their historical relations. Local matters are dealt with in observations on the meteorology of the country and in an essay on the flora by Prof. Cuborguiew. Literary efforts in poetry and prose take up much space, and include the first chapters of an historical novel, 'Under the Yoke.' There are several criticisms and reviews. We learn that Victor Hugo's 'Misérables' has been translated into Bulgarian, and also a book of selections in prose and verse. Some professors and schoolmasters have contributed popular tales and ballads of philological interest.

THE TEACHERS' GUILD.

At the third annual conference of the Teachers' Guild, held at Cheltenham College in Easter week, there were several interesting discussions on points which confront teachers in their daily work. Among these may be mentioned the question of 'How to Supply a Satisfactory Passage from the Elementary to the Higher-grade School,' which was opened by Dr. Wormell and Principal Barnett; 'The General Question of Written and Oral Work in School, with Special Reference to Girls' Schools,' opened by Miss Beale, Miss Cooper, of Edgbaston, and Miss S. Burstall, upon which Mr. Welldon, Miss Ward, of the Maria Grey Training College, Mr. James, of Cheltenham, and others spoke. 'The Teaching of English,' a thorny question, was entrusted to Mr. H. Courthope Bowen and Mr. W. H. Widgery, and 'The Teaching of Music' to Mrs. Curwen and Mrs. Webster, of Aberdeen. Perhaps the most interesting was the discussion on 'The Teaching of Modern Languages,' as the questions before the meeting had been previously brought under five definite resolutions, which were all carried, and several distinguished foreigners—among whom may be mentioned M. Paul Passy, of Paris, and Prof. Victor, of Marburg—took part in the debates. The following were the resolutions:—

1. That uniformity in the treatment of the grammar of the five school languages is desirable.
2. That phonetics should form the basis of the teaching of modern languages.
3. That the reader should be the centre of instruction in teaching a foreign language.
4. That the position of grammar in the order of teaching modern languages requires revision.
5. That a proper supply of teachers can best be obtained by establishing at our universities an honour degree in modern languages, which shall adequately test a knowledge of the living languages.

On the proposal of Mr. Storrs, the Conference unanimously passed a further resolution to the effect "that no examination in modern languages is a satisfactory test of knowledge of the language unless it be in part composed of a vivâ voce conversational element."

It is probable that in future conferences the Council of the Guild will submit no questions to the meeting without previously embodying them in the form of resolutions, but, even without resolutions, it has been found to be of great advantage to teachers to learn the views of those who are best qualified to hold views on the subjects mentioned.

We have no space to do more than touch on the proposed Registration of Teachers Bill, the main outline of which received the hearty support of the Conference. Its leading features are that it aims at putting all duly qualified teachers on one common register, and that it seeks to establish a test of training for future teachers. The great advantages which would accrue to teachers from a properly furnished Educational Museum were shown by Mr. Field, of Canterbury, and Mr. Storr. It was, however, also shown that it would need a large sum of money properly to establish such a museum. Questions of organization and development of the association were dealt with at a special meeting of the Council and branch and other local officers, on the day before the opening of the Conference.

The excellent exhibition of school-books, pictures, and apparatus, in which most of the leading publishing houses took part, received much attention.

Literary Gossip.

LORD SALISBURY will, it is said, propose the toast of literature at the dinner of the Royal Literary Fund, and Mr. John Morley will respond.

MR. RUDYARD KIPLING's novel is, after all, not quite finished, and its publication will probably be preceded by a volume of stories much on the lines of 'Plain Tales from the Hills,' entitled 'The Book of the Forty-five Mornings.'

THE June volume of the "Camelot Series" will be a new popular edition of Mr. Edmund Gosse's 'Northern Studies,' originally published in 1879, and now reprinted, in a slightly modified form, with the author's permission.

THE sale of a portion of the important library of Mr. Thomas Gaisford, of Offington (the son of Dean Gaisford), commenced at the rooms of Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson & Hodge on Wednesday last. In this first day's sale the Blakes brought extraordinarily high prices, e.g., 'Poetical Sketches,' 48*l.*; 'Book of Thel,' 29*l.*; 'Songs of Innocence,' 41*l.*; 'Songs of Innocence and Experience,' 87*l.*; 'Visions of the Daughters of Albion,' 26*l.* 10*s.*; 'America,' 61*l.*; 'Europe,' 59*l.*; 'Urizen,' 66*l.*; 'Illustrations of Young's Night Thoughts,' 40*l.* 10*s.*; and 'Illustrations of the Book of Job,' 19*l.* 10*s.* Amongst other articles eagerly contested for were:—Alamanni, La Coltivazione, a beautiful specimen of Roffet's binding, 37*l.* 16*s.* Allot's 'England's Parnassus,' 17*l.* 5*s.* 'Arie Montani Dictatum,' a magnificent specimen of the library of Diane de Poitiers, 94*l.* 10*s.* Arnold's 'Strayed Reveller,' 'Empedocles on Etna,' and other Poems, first editions, 15*l.* 15*s.* 'Boiardo, Philogyne,' 22*l.* Collection of forty ballads, 32*l.* Another collection of sixty-three later ballads, 18*l.* Baron's 'Pocula Castalia' and 'Cyprian Academy,' 16*l.* 10*s.* Bateson's 'First Set of Madrigals,' 16*l.* 'Bembo, Prose,' printed in 1549 by Torrentino, 35*l.* Boccaccio's 'Decameron,' the uncastrated Giunta edition of 1527, 64*l.*; four other editions, 44*l.* 19*s.*; the French version of Le Maçon, 29*l.* Bodenham's 'Bel-Vedere,' 25*l.* 10*s.* A series of works by Brathwayt, including his 'Drunken Barnaby,' edited by Haslewood, 82*l.* The day's sale (273 lots) produced 1,503*l.* 11*s.*

MR. DAVID STOTT will commence the issue next month of a new half-crown library entitled "The Foreign Favourite Series," which will include translations of the works of Rousseau, Sainte-Beuve, Goethe, Richter, and many others. The first volume will be a translation of 'Les Caractères' of La Bruyère by Helen Stott. The size will be foolscap octavo, and each volume will have an etched portrait as frontispiece.

THE Rev. M. C. F. Morris, Vicar of Newton-ouse, York, is gathering together, with a view to publication, the old words, phrases, sayings, modes of expression, and grammatical usages of the North and East Ridings of Yorkshire, as well as stories illustrative of the independence and originality of the Yorkshire character.

THE anniversary dinner of the Newspaper Press Fund will take place on Saturday, June 7th, at the Hôtel Métropole. Mr. Edward Lawson will occupy the chair. The dinner of the Printers' Pension, Almshouse, and Orphan Asylum Corporation will be held at the Freemasons' Tavern on Monday, June 16th, under the presidency of Dr. John Evans, F.R.S., President of the Society of Antiquaries.

MESSRS. CHAPMAN & HALL have in the press a work by Mr. Oswald Crawford, Her Majesty's Consul at Oporto, entitled 'Round the Calendar in Portugal,' dealing chiefly with rural life, folk-lore, and the manners and habits of the Portuguese people. The book will be fully illustrated. The same house will shortly issue a translation of M. Renan's new work, 'The Future of Science.'

A WELSH DIALECT SOCIETY, with Prince Lucien Bonaparte as president, has recently been established in connexion with the University College of North Wales at Bangor. The first report shows that local branches have been organized in all the counties of North Wales for the purpose of collecting material for the study of Welsh dialect, and prizes are offered by the society at the next national Eisteddfod for the best collection of the kind. The secretary is Mr. J. Morris Jones, Welsh Lecturer at the University College.

MESSRS. REMINGTON & Co. are going to publish an English translation of Count Tolstoi's 'Kreutzer Sonata.'

MESSRS. KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRÜBNER & Co. will shortly leave Paternoster Square and Ludgate Hill, and concentrate their business in large premises in the neighbourhood of Shaftesbury Avenue.

MR. ROBINSON ELLIS will print in the next number of the Classical Review some emendations of the text of Manilius, as specimens of his forthcoming 'Noctes Manilianæ,' and Dr. Gow will contribute an article on the Mavortian recension of Horace; while Mr. Maunde Thompson will review Mr. Allen's monograph upon the abbreviations in Creek MSS., and Dr. Verrall will criticize at length Mr. Haigh's work on 'The Attic Theatre.'

THE Rev. W. Probyn-Nevins is engaged on a work on the first three chapters of the Book of Genesis, with the purpose of meeting many of the objections of the Wellhausen school of Biblical criticism. It will probably appear in the course of next autumn.

THE old-established printing and publishing house of Bradbury, Agnew & Co. has been turned into a limited company, which is confined to the firm, no shares being offered to the general public.

THE office of the Booksellers' Provident Institution has been removed to 48, Paternoster Row.

MESSRS. JARVIS & SON promise new editions of 'Queens of Society' and 'Wits and Beaux of Society,' by Philip and Grace Wharton. Each book will be in two volumes, with a preface by Mr. Justin Huntley McCarthy, M.P.

Blackwood's Magazine for May publishes a scheme of Imperial Federation which has been broached in view of the meeting at the People's Palace; and another article contains a statement of German aims and activity in East Africa, which is said to come from an authoritative quarter.

MESSRS. GRIFFITH & FARRAN will publish shortly a selection of fables entitled 'Le Fablier de Jeunesse; or, the Youth's Own French Fable Book,' by M. Esclançon, intended for elementary instruction.

THE well-known economist and former Austrian Minister of Commerce, Dr. Schäffle, will shortly issue a work entitled 'Die Bekämpfung der Sozialdemokratie ohne Ausnahmsgesetze.' Dr. Schäffle used to be considered a Socialist himself.

AN important contribution to the history of Frederick the Great, based on researches in the archives of Prussia, is expected from the Geh. Archivrat, Prof. C. Grünhagen of Breslau, under the title of 'Schlesien unter Friedrich dem Grossen.' The first volume, referring to the period of 1740-1756, will shortly be published.

A COLLECTION of the obituary notices of the late Empress Augusta, amounting to upwards of 2,000, has been issued at Berlin. Most of the notices naturally appeared in German newspapers, but the French press is represented by as many as 575 notices, and the English press by 400.

THE chief Parliamentary Papers this week are a Report on the Statistics of the Colony of Victoria for 1888 (4*d.*); Statement of the Trade of British India with British Possessions and Foreign Countries for the Five Years 1884-5 to 1888-9 (11*d.*); United States, Extradition Convention, supplementary to the Tenth Article of the Treaty of 1842 (1*d.*); Education, England and Wales, Return showing Expenditure from the Grant for Public Education in 1889, the Number of Elementary Schools on the Annual Grant List, &c. (3*d.*); Annual Report of the Director of the National Gallery for 1889 (3*d.*); and the Thirty-seventh Report of the Charity Commissioners, England and Wales.

SCIENCE

The Rotifera or Wheel-Animalcules. By C. T. Hudson, LL.D., assisted by P. H. Gosse, F.R.S. 2 vols., with Supplement. (Longmans & Co.)

WITH the appearance of the Supplement this fine monograph, of which the main part was published three years ago, is to be for the present considered as finished, although we may be allowed to hope that Mr. Hudson will not refuse to add yet another supplementary number, should the present activity in this branch of knowledge continue. In these days of short papers in the transactions of learned societies, and of "preliminary notes" the conclusions in which are frequently withdrawn by the time that the writer has finished the complete memoir, it is refreshing to find that such a piece of work as this of Messrs. Hudson and Gosse can still be achieved. Many of the best workers in zoology have during the last few years been busied with the material brought back by the Challenger, but, apart from these, the number of monographs of importance which have appeared in the last decade has been wholly disproportionate to the number of recruits to the science. Yet there is not one of the older works dealing with the British fauna which does not stand sorely in need of revision, and whole groups of British animals have in some cases hardly been touched.

The monograph before us opens with short introductory chapters on the general structure of a rotifer, the history of the literature, the classification of the group, and the haunts and habits of its members. To these might have been advantageously added information on the best methods of preserving, staining, and mounting Rotifera. The remainder of the work is systematic, the Supplement (which is, of course, due to Mr. Hudson alone) being chiefly concerned with foreign species. Every known species is defined, described, and figured; and a bibliography is appended both to the Supplement and to the main work; the whole amounts to some three hundred pages and thirty-four plates. The latter might have been much better; it is, perhaps, not too much to say that they would have been better in a German work of this calibre. With the views of the authors on the so-called "branchial" system we feel bound to disagree; in favour of its "branchial" nature there does not seem to be a particle of evidence; its structure is simply that of the nephridial or excretory system of the lower worms, terminating in the typical "flame-cells." Again, the arthropodous nature of Pedalion has been by no means universally allowed, and much additional evidence is required before so close an affinity between Rotifera and Crustacea as this would imply can be held to have been proved. Somewhere in the work reference should have been made to the fact that, in consequence of Cohn's observations of many years ago, parthenogenesis was long supposed to occur in the group; and the paper of Weismann, which proved that it is at least true for certain genera, should have been added in the Supplement to the literature. It appears probable that, as in the phyllopodous Crustacea, the thin-shelled "summer eggs"

(Subitan-eier) develop parthenogenetically, but the thick-shelled "ephippial" or resting eggs (Dauer-eier) are fertilized before development. We may remark in passing that the daphnid ephippial egg receives its name, not from its shape, as Mr. Hudson suggests (vol. i. p. 10, note), but from a saddle-shaped patch of the mother's shells specially modified for its protection. These are, however, only minor points; of the monograph as a whole it requires no special gift to prophesy that it will deservedly be accounted a classic for many years.

A FASTING MAN OF THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY.

AT a time when the Westminster Aquarium is attracting thousands of persons to see the edifying spectacle of a starving match against time, and when the case of a girl is recorded from abroad to whom it appears to be a matter of indifference whether she eats anything or not, it may be of some interest to quote an early performance of this nature, as to which what appears to be satisfactory evidence is forthcoming. In a Cotton charter in the British Museum is a statement by Vianesius Albergatus of Bologna, in which, after setting forth that the truth suffers injury in the matter of things which seem incredible, unless those who are in a position to do so lend their assistance to make them known to the rest of the world and to posterity, he proceeds to relate that his friend the reverend Father Silvester Darius of Lucca, Papal Nuncio at the Court of Scotland, had mentioned in a letter to him that a certain John, a Scotchman (unless Scotus is to be taken as a mere surname, which does not seem probable), had fasted for several (the number is unfortunately lost through the charter having been partially burnt) months on end "propter ipsius eximium in deum pietatem." The letter was apparently accompanied by the man in person, and Vianesius, while protesting that he would on no account doubt the word of so trustworthy a friend, yet in the interests of science asked the said Johannes whether "pietatis ac nostra causa, ut rem tam inaudita videremus, cibo potuque abstinere vellet." The man consented, and our friend with praiseworthy precaution stripped him of all his clothes, "ne quid in eis quod spiritus recreare et vires refocillare meque fallere posset, quod alias factum audiveram, esset absconditum," and, having supplied him with fresh garments, "undecim continuos dies noctesque domi meo in cubiculo diligentissime clauso et obsignato continui." He further affirms that during that time he kept the keys of the room always about him, and would not entrust them even to his nearest and dearest friend. After these eleven days the fasting man was as fit and well as when he began, "semper eundem colorem vigorem et pulsam, quod doctissimis physicis qui ad eum visendum sepius conveniebant maxime mirum videbatur, servasset"; and the worthy Vianesius, thinking that he had sufficiently established his power to fast beyond the term of natural human endurance, released him from his imprisonment, "nihil tale postulante aut expectante." The record had not then been put so high as it has now been raised by the efforts of Dr. Tanner and Signor Succi, otherwise Johannes would doubtless have been encouraged to persevere in his undertaking; but in one respect his performance may be said to "hold the field," since, so far from having any mysterious "elixir," or even plain water, on which to sustain himself, he is affirmed to have abstained from drink as well as from meat. Will Succi try to cut this record?

The document concludes with solemn asseverations of the truth of its contents, and exhortations to the reader to believe them. It is dated from Rome, on the 1st of September of either 1532 or 1582. The figures are partly burnt, but it appears to be the later year. F. G. K.

SOCIETIES.

ROYAL.—April 17.—The President in the chair.—The following papers were read: 'Preliminary Note on Supplementary Magnetic Surveys of Special Districts in the British Isles,' by Profs. Rücker and Thorpe, 'The Variations occurring in certain Decapod Crustacea: I. Cragon vulgaris,' by Mr. W. F. R. Weldon, 'Observations on the Anatomy and Development of Apteryx,' by Prof. T. J. Parker, and 'Notes on some Peculiar Relations which appear in the Great Pyramid from the Precise Measures of Mr. Flinders Petrie,' by Capt. Downing.

GEOLOGICAL.—April 16.—Mr. J. W. Hulke, V.P., in the chair.—Messrs. W. H. Colman and R. S. Wyld were elected Fellows; Dr. D. Stur, Vienna, a Foreign Member; and Magister F. Schmidt, St. Petersburg, a Foreign Correspondent of the Society.—The following communications were read: 'On the Disturbed Rocks of North-Western Germany,' by Prof. A. von Könen, communicated by Sir W. W. Smyth, 'On the Origin of the Basins of the Great Lakes of America,' by Prof. J. W. Spencer, 'On Ornithosaurian Remains from the Oxford Clay of Northampton,' by Mr. R. Lydekker, and 'Notes on a "Wash-out" found in the Pleasley and Teversall Collieries, Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire,' by Mr. J. C. B. Hendy, communicated by Dr. W. T. Blanford.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.—April 17.—Dr. J. Evans, President, in the chair.—Mr. Waller exhibited a silver ring of fifteenth century date, with figures of saints, found at Cobham, Kent.—Mr. Power exhibited a curious little gilt brass mace of the end of the sixteenth century, formerly the mace of the constable of Bidford, co. Warwick.—Mr. St. John Hope read some notes on three further examples of the curious alabaster tablets of mediæval date called St. John's Heads.—The Rev. W. A. Scott Robertson, by permission of the Dean and Chapter, exhibited a mitre, ring, chalice, and paten, and other articles recently found in the tomb of an archbishop in Canterbury Cathedral, on which he also read a descriptive paper. The tomb in question is traditionally called Archbishop Theobald's, but Mr. Scott Robertson thought there could be no doubt that it was really that of Archbishop Hubert Walter, who is recorded to have been buried on the south side of the choir.—The Rev. J. Morris said he could not accept the theory of the tomb being Hubert Walter's, since the tomb stood to the east of the high altar, on the south of the Trinity Chapel, which by no twisting of the words could mean on the south side of the choir, where there actually remained a tomb and effigy traditionally assigned to Hubert Walter. As to whose relics these were, and to whom the tomb was really set up, there was now time for discussion, and, with the Society's permission, he would lay his views before them in a separate paper at their meeting on May 1st. The discussion was therefore adjourned.

April 23.—Anniversary Meeting.—Dr. J. Evans, President, in the chair.—Messrs. Winkley and Waller were appointed scrutators of the ballot.—The following were duly elected members of the Council and officers of the Society for the ensuing year: President, J. Evans; Treasurer, E. Freshfield; Director, H. S. Milman; Secretary, Hon. H. A. Dillon; Other Members of the Council, Rev. W. Benham, C. J. Elton, A. J. Evans, Chancellor Ferguson, G. E. Fox, A. W. Franks, G. W. G. Leveson Gower, G. L. Gomme, H. A. Grueber, Prof. T. McK. Hughes, H. Jenner, J. T. Micklethwaite, G. Payne, Earl Percy, Lieut.-General Pitt Rivers, J. Watney, and J. W. Willis-Bund.—The President delivered his annual address, in which he drew attention to the losses the Society had sustained by death since the last anniversary. He also drew attention to the conference of archaeological societies, and to the enrolment of nearly thirty societies in union with the Society of Antiquaries; also to the Research Fund, which had already reached over 1,800l.; to the excavations on the site of the Roman city at Silchester about to be undertaken by the Society; and to the gross treatment of the presbytery of St. Albans abbey church by Lord Grimthorpe under the pretence of restoration, and of some of the finest Egyptian monuments at the hand of Arabs or tourists, or both.

ARCHAEOLOGICAL INSTITUTE.—April 17.—Earl Percy in the chair.—Miss R. H. Busk communicated a paper 'On the Forthcoming Sixth Centenary of Dante's Beatrice at Florence.' The paper contained a detailed account of what the proposed exhibition would include.—Mr. J. J. Doherty read an exhaustive paper 'On Bells, their History, Uses, and Inscriptions,' and treated at length on each subject contained in his paper.

NUMISMATIC.—April 17.—Dr. J. Evans, President, in the chair.—Capt. J. R. P. Clarke was elected a Member.—Mr. A. Durlacher exhibited a half-crown of Charles I. struck at the Tower mint, with the plumes over the shield on the reverse, and with mint-mark "Heart."—Mrs. Bagnall-Oakeley communicated a paper on coins found at Caerwent and Caerleon (Venta Silurum and Isea of the Romans), ranging in date from the reign of Claudius to that of Arcadius. The writer remarked that perhaps the most noteworthy fact in connexion with the coins found in many thousands in that part of the country was the total absence from among them of any of Diocletian, their place being supplied by large numbers of those of the usurper Carausius.—Dr. Evans read a paper on a small hoard of Roman coins found at Amiens, ranging in date from Gordian III. to Allectus. The principal features of interest in this find consisted first in the presence in it of one of the extremely rare coins of Pacatianus, and, secondly, in the preponderance of coins of the British usurpers Carausius and Allectus in a hoard found in French soil.

STATISTICAL.—April 22.—Mr. F. Hendriks, V.P. in the chair.—Statistics of the Abatement in Crime in England and Wales during the Twenty Years ended 1887-88, was the title of a paper read by Mr. G. Grosvenor.—The under-mentioned took part in the discussion that followed: Messrs. J. Monro, T. L. M. Browne, R. Hamilton, T. H. Elliott, W. Hazell, and the Chairman.

LINNEAN.—April 17.—Mr. Carruthers, President, in the chair.—Messrs. E. C. Galpin, T. Johnson, W. F. Kirby, J. B. Carruthers, and J. S. Turner were elected Fellows.—Lord A. Russell, on behalf of the subscribers to a portrait of Sir J. D. Hooker which had been painted at their request by Mr. H. Herkomer, formally presented the portrait to the Society. It was announced that a photograph of the portrait would be presented when ready to every subscriber to the portrait fund.—Prof. P. M. Duncan exhibited a vertical section through a large coral, Fungia echinata, cutting through and across the septa and synaptoculae and the so-called base. The union of the sides of contiguous septa at the base is either incomplete or by means of synaptoculae.—Dr. E. Fischer, of Zurich, exhibited and made remarks on certain species of Polyporus bearing a sclerotium possessing the structure of Pachyma cocus, but it was doubtful whether the Polyporus represented the fructification of the Pachyma, or was merely parasitic on it.—Mr. G. Murray expressed himself in favour of the latter view.—Mr. J. E. Harting exhibited alive a so-called "singing mouse," which had been captured at Maidenhead a week previously, and which uttered sounds like the subdued warbling of a linnet. He desired to be informed whether the cause usually assigned for the phenomenon was correct, namely, some obstruction or malformation of the trachea.—Prof. Stewart stated that he had observed alive, and dissected when dead, a similar specimen, and had found no trace of any organic disease or malformation.—Sir C. Sawle exhibited a specimen of the little green heron, Butorides virescens, of North America, which had been shot by his keeper at Penrice, St. Austell, Cornwall, in October last, and which he had sent for preservation to a taxidermist at Bath.—Mr. J. E. Harting offered some remarks on the occurrence, and suggested various ways in which the bird might have reached England. He observed that the larger American bittern, Botaurus lentiginosus, had been met with some five-and-twenty or thirty times in the British Islands, and, strange to say, had been described and named by an English naturalist, and a Fellow of this Society, Col. George Montagu (who obtained a specimen of the bird in Dorsetshire), a year before it was described by Wilson as a native of the United States.—A paper was read by Mr. S. Moore on some micro-chemical reactions of tannin. In this an account was given of the behaviour of Nessler's test for ammonia upon tannin, which it usually colours almost immediately some shade of brown or reddish brown. The great value of the reagent is held to reside in the rapidity of its action; moreover, in none of the many experiments did it fail. Reference was also made to some other new tannin tests, especially to some in which, as in Nessler's fluid, caustic potash furnishes the basis, and which, like that fluid, are very rapid in their action.—A paper by Mr. E. Saunders, 'On the Tongue of the British Hymenoptera Anthophila,' in the absence of the author was read by Mr. W. P. Sladen, and was illustrated by drawings.

ZOOLOGICAL.—April 15.—Mr. G. A. Boulenger in the chair.—Mr. A. Smith-Woodward read a paper on some new fishes from the English Wealden and Purbeck Beds, referable to the genera Oligopleurus, Strobilodus, and Mesodon. Detailed descriptions of several fossils of these genera were given. Oligopleurus was stated to be represented by a single species in the Wealden of the Isle of Wight, occurring also in the Purbeck of Dorsetshire; and the latter formation had yielded at least one species both of Strobilodus and Mesodon. Previous researches had already indicated a close connexion between the fish-fauna of the English Purbeck Beds and that of the Upper Jurassic Lithographic Stones of France, Bavaria, and Württemberg; and the new forms now described tended to demonstrate that alliance even more clearly.—Mr. G. A. Boulenger read the second of a series of reports on the additions to the Batrachian Collection in the Natural History Museum. Since 1886, when the first report was made on this subject, examples of seventy-four additional species of batrachians had been acquired. Amongst these was a remarkable new form allied to the family Engystomatidae, proposed to be called Gonyophryne thomsoni, based on a single specimen obtained by Mr. Basil Thomson on Sudest Island, near South-East New Guinea. The form was stated to be unique in having teeth in the lower, but none in the upper jaw.—Mr. F. E. Beddard read a paper on the structure of Psophia, and on its relations to other birds. The author was inclined to consider Psophia most nearly allied to Cariama and Chunga, and more distantly to Rhinoceros, but entitled to stand as a distinct family in the group of cranes and their allies.—Mr. H. Seeborn gave an account of a collection of birds from the northern part of the province of Fokien, South-Eastern China. Several interesting species were represented in the series, amongst which was a new Hemixos, proposed to be called H. canipennis.

METEOROLOGICAL.—April 16.—Mr. B. Latham, President, in the chair.—The Marquis of Gallidoro and Mr. J. M. Veevers were elected Fellows.—The following papers were read: 'The Cold Period at the beginning of March, 1890,' by Mr. C. Harding. At the commencement of the month a rather heavy fall of snow was experienced in many parts of England, and cold weather set in over the midland, eastern, and southern districts, the temperature on the 3rd and 4th falling to a lower point than at any time in the winter. The lowest authentic thermometer readings, in approved screens, were 5° at Beddington, 6° at Kenley in Surrey and Hillingdon in Norfolk, 7° at Chelmsford and Beckenham, 8° at Addiscombe, 9° at Reigate and Brockham, and 10° in many parts of Kent and Surrey. At Greenwich Observatory the thermometer registered 13°, which has only once been equalled in March during the last one hundred years, the same reading having occurred on March 14th, 1845. During the last half century the temperature in March has only previously fallen below 20° in three years, whilst during the whole winter so low a temperature has only occurred in eight years.—Note on the Whirlwind which occurred at Fulford, near York, March 8th, 1890, by Mr. J. E. Clark.—On the Possibility of Forecasting the Weather by means of Monthly Averages, by Mr. A. E. Watson.—Rainfall of the Globe, by Mr. W. B. Tripp. The author has collected and tabulated a large number of records of rainfall from all parts of the world. Some of these records extend over more than a hundred years. He finds that in recent years 1854 and 1861 were the driest, and 1872, 1878, 1879, and 1883 were the wettest years.

PHILOLOGICAL.—April 18.—Mr. H. Bradley in the chair.—Mr. S. T. Butler and Mr. F. H. M. Corbet were elected Members.—Prof. Skeat read a paper on 'English Etymologies.' Asaunces, as if, E. as, O.Fr. quanes, as if. Bedene, forthwith, E. bi, by, dene—A.S. dēn, dōn, done, so that bidene is "by done," when the thing is done, or else it is the pp. of bidan, to shut a door, hence to conclude. Cheat, chete, a slang term for change, is seen in E.E. ceatta, L. rerum. Chaucer's compane is com ba me, come kiss me, in four MSS. Cowl, a tub, is A.S. cūf, L. cupella. Crucible is "Crassipulum, crucibulum, a cresset," O.Fr. craisset, a lamp supplied with grease. Dicker (daykyr), a lot of ten hides, is O.Fr. dacre, Low Lat. dacra, decura, Lat. decuria, from decem, ten. Grift, a slate-pencil (Essex), is O.Fr. greffe, a pencil, Low Lat. graphium. Reckless is short for "effless." Luscious, Mid.E. lucius, lucius, is (as Wedgwood says) short for "delicious." Mididone, forthwith, is mid idone, "with (its being) done"; idone—A.S. gedōn. Pie, a pasty, Low Lat. pica ('Babe's Book,' ii. 36, l. 51). Pony, O.Fr. poulenet, a little colt. Tennis, perhaps from Low Lat. tenar, the palm of the hand, Gk. thērap.

HISTORICAL.—April 17.—Mr. O. Browning in the chair.—Mr. H. Hall read a paper 'On the King's House: a Retrospect from Burke's Act.'—A discussion followed, in which Messrs. G. Bertin, Bowen, H. Haines, R. Lloyd, and E. Smith, and the Chairman took part.

PHYSICAL.—April 18.—Prof. W. E. Ayrton, President, in the chair.—Mr. W. B. Croft was elected a Member.—Prof. Rücker described the results of 'Some Recent Magnetic Work,' undertaken by himself and Prof. Thorpe in connexion with their Magnetic Survey of the United Kingdom.—Mr. T. H. Blakesley, honorary secretary, read a paper 'On a Theory of Permanent Magnetism,' by Mr. Osmond.

MEETINGS FOR THE ENSUING WEEK.

- Mon. Aristotelian, 8.—Newman's Grammar of Assent, Mr. P. Daphne.
— Surveyors' Institution, 8.—The Principles of the Exemption of Public Undertakings from Rateability, Mr. F. Marshall.
— Society of Arts, 8.—Sugar, Tea, Coffee and Cocoa, their Origin, Preparation, and Uses, Lecture 1, Mr. H. Bannister (Cantor Lecture).
— Geographical, 8.
Tues. Royal Institution, 3.—The Place of Oxford University in English History, Hon. G. C. Brodrick.
— Photographic, 8.
Wed. Society of Arts, 8.—Photographic Lenses, Mr. T. R. Dallmeyer.
— Microscopical, 8.
— Geological, 8.—Physical Phenomena exhibited by the so-called "Raised Beaches" of Hope's Nose and the Thatcher Rock, Devon, Mr. D. Pidgeon. The so-called Upper-Lias Clay of Down Cliffs, Mr. S. S. Buckman. Devonian Rocks of South Devon, Mr. W. A. E. Usher. New Mammals from the Red and Norwich Crag, Mr. B. T. Newton. Burrows and Tracks of Invertebrate Animals in Palaeozoic Rocks, and other Markings, Sir J. W. Dawson.
Thurs. Royal Institution, 14.—Annual Meeting, 3.—Heat of the Moon and Stars, Prof. C. V. Boys (Tyndall Lecture).
— Archaeological Institute, 4.—Dumny Grenadiers from the County Hotel, Carlisle, Chancellor Ferguson. Anglo-Norman Ornament compared with Designs in Anglo-Saxon MSS., Part II, Mr. J. P. Harrison.
— Royal, 4.
— Society of Arts, 8.—Design applied to Wood Carving, Mr. L. F. Day.
— Linnean, 8.—Quantitative Examination of Water-Meadow Herbage, Prof. W. Fream. Some Old-World Species of Scorpion, Mr. R. T. Focke.
Fri. Antiquaries, 8.—Tomb of an Archbishop recently opened in Canterbury Cathedral Church, Rev. J. Morris. Objects found in the Tomb of an Archbishop at Canterbury. Dean and Chapter of Canterbury. A Mire of St. Thomas of Canterbury, Cardinal Manning.
Sat. United Service Institution, 3.—Enlistment of the Militia for Foreign Service, Capt. R. Holden.
— Physical, 8.—Distribution of Glow in a Strained Elastic Solid, Mr. C. A. Carus-Wilson. Photographs of Rapidly Moving Objects, and the Oscillating Electric Spark, Mr. C. V. Boys.
— Geologists' Association, 8.—Manufacture of Serpentine in Nature's Laboratory, Major-General C. A. McMahon. A New Species of Capulus, Prof. G. S. Boulenger. Occurrence of Amberite (Resinite), or Fossil Gum, in a Series of Coal at Keweenaw Colliery, Bay of Islands, New Zealand, Mr. T. P. Moody.
— Royal Institution, 9.—The phlebotomy, Mr. W. H. Pollock.
Sat. Royal Institution, 3.—Colour and its Chemical Action, Capt. Abney.

Science Gossip.

It will be remembered that five years ago the Fishmongers' Company made a grant of 200l. a year for five years to the Marine Biological Association. The Company has now decided not only to renew the grant for another five years, but to double the amount. We believe that the Fishmongers' Company take quite the right view of the work which the Association can do if it is properly supported.

The next ordinary general meeting of the Institution of Mechanical Engineers will be held on the evenings of Thursday and Friday next. The President will deliver his inaugural address on the former evening, after which the following paper will be read and discussed, and the discussion will be continued on Friday evening: 'Research Committee on Marine-Engine Trials: Report upon Trial of Three Steamers, Fusi-Yama, Colchester, Tartar,' by Prof. Alexander B. W. Kennedy, F.R.S. The anniversary dinner takes place on Wednesday.

FINE ARTS

ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS.—THE ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTIETH EXHIBITION IS NOW OPEN.—5, Pall Mall East, from 10 till 6.—Admission 1s; Catalogue 1s. ALFRED D. FRIFF, R.W.S., Secretary.

THE SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS.

The hundred and thirtieth exhibition of the "Old Society" is by no means equal to most of its forerunners; yet it has at least the advantage of being smaller than usual. We must go back many years to find anything like so low a total as 220 drawings. In 1831, in the "good old days," when the Society comprised forty-seven members all told, there were 427 drawings, and for a long series of years the number seldom fell below 350. There was a time when popular artists like David Cox thought nothing of sending twenty-five or thirty examples at once, and on one occasion a well-known draughtsman contributed as many as thirty-seven. Of late the number of associates has considerably increased, yet the pictures have become fewer. This year one member is represented by fifteen drawings, but only a few of his colleagues send more than three each. On the other hand, the average size of the pictures has increased. Perhaps this increase was never so marked as on the present occasion, and it quite forces itself on the visitor's attention. It is pleasant to be able to say that though the exhibition may be inferior to many of its predecessors, it proves that the resources of the Society are considerable, and that it can put together a respectable show without the aid of those of its members who are best known to the general public. Indeed, for many years past the number of absentees of note has never been so great. The absentees number no fewer than twenty, and of these several are usually represented on its walls, and are among the most distinguished members of whom the Society can boast; for instance, Mr. Alma Tadema, Mr. R. Barnes, Mr. B. Bradley, Mr. J. Burr, Mr. W. C. T. Dobson, Mr. H. Hardy, Mr. Holman Hunt, Mr. Burne Jones, Mr. Alfred Moore, Mr. F. Powell, Mr. Poynter, and Mr. Henry Wallis. At present the Society has to rely on Mrs. Allingham and Mr. Boyce, Mr. Crane, Mr. Birket Foster, the brothers Fripp, Mr. Henry Moore, and Mr. David Murray; for Mr. Andrews, Mr. Alfred Hunt, Mr. Marks, and Sir J. Gilbert supply but one drawing each, and none of them is of extraordinary merit—in deed, the first two are not by any means seen to advantage.

We shall criticize the best drawings first, grouping the works of each contributor without regard to subject, size, or style. The Water-gate Bay (No. 1) of Mr. S. P. Jackson deserves to be conspicuous, because it very completely illustrates at once the painter's merits and his defects, his poetical but limited imagination, and his feeling for the dignity and romance of the Cornish coast on misty autumnal evenings. He is excellently fitted to deal with their softened light and melancholy calm, their impressive loneliness, and the breadth, simplicity, and majesty of their elements. The lofty cliffs receding before us look almost ghastly in the fading twilight, the wan horizon is indistinctly seen, and the pallid greenness of the sea is marked by slow surges, which, breaking on the shore, produce that mournful sound which the Laureate aptly calls "hollow." But, as has been said, the defects of Mr. Jackson's pictures are not less obvious than their beauty: his technique is mannered, his drawing lacks firmness, and his textures and surfaces are sometimes woolly. An Evening Breeze off the Sea (26) is as pathetic as No. 1, but its sentiment is different. It is a wild and mournful view. Day is declining. In the foreground are sandy hillocks, and the distant cliffs are fading out of sight; the wind is rising. Mr. Jackson's is a fine kind of art, and appeals to the sympathies of every visitor to the gallery, but his technical methods are of the simplest, and the whole picture is in very low keys of colour and tone. The Worm's Head, Twilight (157), also by Mr. Jackson, is dignified and pathetic, but mannered; yet even its mannerisms are noble.

Mr. P. Naftel, on the other hand, is always a cheerful painter. In his Cliff at Alport, Derbyshire (7), the sentiment is as fine as in any of the drawings named above, and the work is characterized by grace, sweetness, and softness. Its materials are a cliff of limestone, a bright and verdant meadow, and a charming stream creeping along the meadow. The woodland distance is tender, and the whole is so true a pastoral that Spenser would be pleased by it, although he might possibly ask why it was not painted with more firmness and research. The same may be said of the Lathkill River (18), a lovely subject not quite adequately treated. The Village of Alport (73) is a capital instance of taste and love for nature of an idyllic kind.—Mr. C. Rigby's calm pool in a rocky river (8) is decidedly pretty, and bright, and, except in the mid-distance, it is solid. The Stepping-Stones (143) depicts a Derbyshire stream, the low banks of which are fringed with trees. The young mother, who is helping her child to cross, is a graceful figure deftly represented and spiritedly designed, but the child is flimsily treated and unworthy of so pleasing a drawing. Still this is the best picture by Mr. Rigby that we remember to have seen. To say that, except in solidity, it is worthy to be ranked with Mrs. Allingham's Blabre's House, Hampstead Heath (11), is no small praise. The lady's contribution possesses all her usual brilliancy and strength of tone. A broad and harmonious example, it is one of the best of her contributions this year. These are, all said and done, not quite up to her mark, though few could surpass them in their own line. The Cottage under the Copse (113) is own brother to No. 11 (although no mere pendant to it), but the green a little too green and if Mrs. Allingham continues to paint verdure so splendid and foliage in such high keys of colour, she may lose that fine sensitiveness and delicate appreciation of nature's limits in "greenery" which have charmed her admirers in her pictures. This cottage—a subject after her own heart—is delightfully picturesque, rural, and paintable. Buss's Corner (209) and the Old Church Porch, Albury (218), are in considerable examples, more suitable to one of the Winter Exhibitions of the Society.

Mr. Marks's contribution, A Rare Edition (13), is in several respects a failure, in others a considerable success. The figure of the old bibliophile is capably drawn, and modelled with such skill and accomplishment as very few members of the Old Society could rival. Nothing could be truer or happier than his expression and his attitude. On the other hand, his face, "shrivelled like an Applejohn," is hard and monotonous in touch, and its flesh-colour is not unlike a cork. The blues of the background and costume are unpleasantly uniform in tint, and lack brightness and variety of colour. In fact, the painter's attempt to deal with much blue is not fortunate. The background is flat, and, though by no means opaque, it is heavy.—Mr. R. Thorne Waite's Lancing Mill (15) is a picture of the blue sea and grey chalk cliffs in sunlight; solid, bright, and pure, it is a happy composition, and the draughtsmanship is capital. It reminds us of Mr. Hine, but is no plagiarist. Another excellent specimen, in some respects superior to the last, is Shoreham Valley (23), which again reminds us of Mr. Hine; it is soft, broad, and artistic, but, unluckily, the sky is weak and empty of light and colour. Mr. Thorne Waite paints too much, however, to do many things well. Of his fifteen pictures not half are worthy to be classed with No. 15, although every one has some good points about it, for his tact in composing the masses and arranging the lights, shadows, and colours of his subjects—his objective materials, in fact—is remarkable, and seldom fails to give interest to his works, however small they may be.

No pictures here are more delightful, original, or poetical than Mr. A. D. Fripp's three Dorsetshire coast scenes in misty sunlight, full of colour, exceedingly delicate in tone, and remarkable for reposeful harmonies of every kind. The Praun Fishers (84) is a piece as delicious as it is modest and refined. The air is full of rosy and grey light, and the shadows are nowhere defined. The dreamy charm of the design is irresistible. Durdle Door (90) depicts, with exquisite poetry and all the luxuries of colour and tone subdued and harmonized by the nacreous vapours of a calm atmosphere saturated with sunlight, the well-known Dorsetshire bay, its quaint arch of rock (which is badly drawn, however), a pearly enamel-like sea, the white cliffs, and the uplands sleeping in the hot and languorous afternoon. To cope satisfactorily with so much that is fine is very high art indeed. Mid-day, Ringstead (108), is a picture of a halcyon sea, a coast-road ascending to a group of cottages upon our right, and a stately line of cliffs. It is most delicate and tender.—Very spirited, pleasantly painted, and deftly drawn is Mr. J. Parker's sentimental pastoral, "The Village seems asleep, or dead, now Lubin is away" (86). The obvious occasion of this drawing was the picturesqueness of an ancient village well by a roadside, seen in golden sunlight, and a broad and soft, almost shadowless effect. Mr. Parker has treated these matters charmingly, and, being a neat draughtsman with a taste for pretty girls in love, he has made a pleasant picture prettier by designing a buxom damsel standing in an absent mood near the springhead, her dainty figure conspicuous in the glowing light. In No. 14, On the Cliffs, Middleton Gower, by the same artist, the figures are less important. It is a most acceptable and artistic picture (taken from a lofty headland) of the pure blue sea, white cliffs and undulating downs in bright sunlight. Harmonious as this brilliant work is, the painter's firm touch has made it almost stereoscopic. A Plea for an Absent One (127), a group of well-drawn figures, proves that Mr. Parker has been rightfully ambitious of painting figures on a scale larger than he is accustomed to—larger, indeed, than is usual in water colour. In some respects the result reminds us of an enlarged photograph; its surface, although not, of course, at all "out of focus," is flat and deficient in wealth of details, while the modelling is somewhat empty. The older woman is commonplace, but the girl's face and attitude are genuine, spontaneous, and sincerely thought out. Her hands have been drawn with care and skill. The painting is good, and the whole needs only to be carried out with uniform attention to make it a capital picture of a kind demanding studies much more searching and sincere than half the specimens on these walls have enjoyed. A pretty Thames idyl is the same painter's Thatcham Lock, Berks, Perch Fishing (142).

Mr. A. Goodwin, who often tries to illustrate Arabian legends with North Devon accessories, combining rocky shores and tumbling lymns with Oriental costumes, customs, and coloration, has this year been successful, and produced a true and beautiful romance which is in keeping with itself in his leading contribution, the awkwardly named Sindbad the Sailor's Sixth Voyage (94), of which the Catalogue has been employed to tell that it represents Sindbad lying upon the raft which carried him along the subterranean river, and floating swiftly out of that dark cavern to which, in despair, he had committed himself. He fell asleep in darkness, and the river hurried him

Through caverns measureless to man, but not
Down to a sunless sea.

On the contrary, the stream emerges into the brilliance of fairyland, and, being filled with magic sunlight, resembles a torrent of blue enamel, is peopled with wonderful fish, and fringed with "incense-bearing trees" in —forests ancient as the hills,

Enfolding sunny spots of greenery.

The rocks and the steep, dark red and russet cliff are unreal and theatrical; but the resplendent river, the softened charm of daylight in the magic land, the fruit and flowers floating with the raft, and the figure of Sindbad, are all vividly imagined and happily painted. Lucerne and Pilatus (111) is a fine landscape, most artistically treated and beautifully drawn. For Durham (114), although it is good and sincere, we care less than for many of Mr. Goodwin's works of the same class, but it deserves a better place. The Monastery, Locarno (179), a noble Italian view, instinct with that pathos which makes landscape precious, could hardly be better. In his motto to Monte Carlo from Monaco (200) Mr. Goodwin indicates the serpent's trail in the Paradise he represents; but a fancy less poetic than his might, without a minatory motto, have conveyed the "moral" of his theme by the picture itself.

Although that fine architectural study, The

Inter
(98), cent tifies
The
and is us when Bay (70), with soft
and clear
Mr.
and braci
and Lock spicu the r
and Fran barre in th vast with
The of c are c thing looki bute work pret a lev shad (123) altho of e acco
whil med
T renc
and sunn
and deal sinc mos
Coas
the sky,
and they fusi sion is a pain ing clou proj bey tant that can ten wav spac of i
and con he l is l
and bou sph hill dra a s ban at t suc
tru of f neg

Interior of the Mosque of Sultan Hassan, Cairo (98), by Mr. E. A. Goodall, is by no means innocent of the lamp nor devoid of pictorial artifices, it still is most striking and impressive. The style of the picture is large, the effect broad and noble, and the whole is more majestic than is usually the case in water colours, especially when they are employed on so large a scale. The Bay of Gibraltar, from the Road to Algeiras (70), is good, but not important.—Contrasting with the last, and still more so with his brother's soft landscapes and their sweetness of colour and their atmosphere of luxurious repose, are the clear, pure, firmly drawn pictures of rocks by Mr. G. A. Fripp, which are as fresco-like as ever, and are noteworthy for what may be called their bracing atmosphere, their precision of touch, and pearl-like harmonies of grey. Among them Loch Aon, Northern Grampians (101), is conspicuous. The crenellated hills are drawn with the most sensitive of touches. Nearly as good, and almost as impressive, is In the Vale of Nant Francon, North Wales (95), another vista of the barren sides of crenellated hills that are distinct in their purplish hues and beautiful lines. The vast meadow of deep green makes fine colour with the purple and grey of the neighbourhood. The draughtsmanship is admirable; the effects of colour and tone, simple almost to severity, are of very fine quality. In the absence of anything to give us the scale of the place, the whole looks small. It is Mr. Fripp's custom to contribute drawings of widely different subjects—works as different as the last and No. 17, his pretty and well-drawn On the Thames, at Cleve, a level expanse of water and meadow in pure, shadowless daylight. Near Horsham, Evening (123), is a true English idyl. Loch Etive (190), although its subject differs materially from that of either of the Highland landscapes, may, on account of its treatment, be ranked with them, while Keld, in Upper Swaledale (219), is intermediate between the two classes.

That water-colour painting is quite capable of rendering Titianesque effects of tint and tone, and need not restrict itself to the pearls and sunny greys of the brothers Fripp, or the sparkle and glowing light of Mr. Goodwin, but may be dealt with in a masculine manner, has long since been proved by Mr. H. Moore, whose most important contribution is Off the Cornish Coast (120). It depicts with superb breadth the bluest of blue water beneath a darkened sky. Here the waves are intensely brilliant and full of light and colours changing as they rise, and turn and fall in apparent confusion, but really in perfect order. The expression of the motion of this wilderness of colour is as much a work of art as the drawing and painting of the weltering surface and its changing tints can be. Very grand indeed are the clouds of dazzling gold and snowy white which project their shadows over the foreground, while, beyond them, strong sunlight falls on the distant entrance to Fowey Harbour and the cliffs that stretch from left to right as far as the eye can reach. Their splendour is made more intense by the contrast with the darkness of the waves. Especially worthy of admiration are the spacious atmosphere of this picture, the solidity of its painting, the lucid quality of the colours, and the painter's touch, frank yet firm and well considered. In the last-named respect, indeed, he has nothing to learn. His Stacking Peat (76) is less ambitious, and its sentiment, coloration, and lighting offer a perfect contrast to its neighbour. Rainy mist, a grey and colourless atmosphere out of which the daylight fades, barren hills whose sides are dull and treeless, low ridges drawn across the sky as if to shut out half of it, a sodden moorland in the foreground, and long banks of peat stacked across the view, the pools at their feet being even blacker than they are—such are the chief features of the minor work, a true piece of colour, which is notable for the grading of its atmosphere, and has all the sadness of a neglected land and a thriftless people for whom the heathery waste and the melancholy pools suffice.

Mr. D. Murray is at his best in his fine and large work Showery Weather (136). It is a pity the foreground is not so good and complete as the middle and remoter parts. Admirably toned and coloured and most subtly graded, this most pathetic picture possesses the charms of homogeneity, simplicity, and veracity of the higher kind. Although far from being the most ambitious of Mr. Murray's contributions, it is, we think, the best, because it is the completest. We greatly prefer it to the less expressive and powerful At Set of Sun (131), and the somewhat commonplace, but otherwise acceptable End of the Floods (67).—Mr. C. N. Hemy, the newly chosen Associate, hardly justifies his reputation as a sea-painter by the somewhat woolly handling and rather hackneyed motives of Boatling Along! (62.) Although the motion of the boat is happily given and the waves have considerable swing, the whole picture lacks clearness, firmness, and purity of colour. Much better is the comparatively refined study of colour and a rich twilight effect the artist calls Night Watches at Sea: No. 1, The Anchor Watch (158). The white hull and dark rigging tell truly against the rich indigo of the waves and the lighter blue of the sky, while the whole is in keeping. Here again the wooliness of the water is scarcely creditable to the artist, who was formerly one of the most precise of painters. His touch, in fact, used to be only too sharp and crisp and inclined to hardness.—In the effective No. 161 Mr. J. H. Henshall shows considerable skill in painting the lady in modern costume who is the subject of the verse—

Sweeter than the violet's hue,
Fairer than the heaven's blue,
Eyes that look the shadows thro'!

The lady is not supremely beautiful, nor of the purest breeding, and, beyond the superficial charm of youth, a high colour, and smart attire, she fails to justify the raptures of the verse. Mr. Henshall proves himself a clever draughtsman—as the hands and powerful, if rather forced, illumination show—but he is somewhat less familiar than he might be with noble, not to say pure models. It would not be hard for so accomplished a draughtsman to raise the standard of his ideal of beauty, to improve his taste for form and expression, and to refine his ideas of light, shadow, and colour. Still, it must be admitted that Mr. Henshall's Osiria (19) does not encourage us to hope much from him in the future. If he does not mind what he is about, he will most assuredly paint like Mr. E. Long, and may actually design worse. Osiria's name is bad enough, but her arms are worse. Mr. Henshall is not bound to know about Osiris, but he is bound to draw at least indifferently well. There is so much technical power in this otherwise mistaken picture—which the hangers have inconsiderately made conspicuous—that it seems a pity an artist capable of doing well should be content to do no better.

Conceived in quite another mood is the demure and almost puritanical landscape which Mr. Boyce calls Richard's Castle Church, Herefordshire, in the Autumn of 1888 (197). This artist's drawings are as veracious as they are fresh and pure. The old grey, Romanesque church, built of unhewn stones and charming in its simple dignity, is very finely drawn. It is not ungrateful of us to say that the verdure seems a little too intense, while the flatness (not the brilliancy) of the sky is not to our minds. At the worst, what are such defects as these, even if they really exist, compared with the exquisite sincerity and tenderness of the solid and learned landscape? If Mr. Boyce can still delight us thus, why has he so long neglected this gallery, where undoubtedly, if they were not won, his most modestly-worn laurels were secured?—Mr. W. Crane is inadequately represented by three drawings of minor subjects, A Morning Tub (44), Birds of a Feather (147), and In an Orchard (220), the technique of which needs no praise. No. 220 is the best of them.—The Society has certainly strengthened itself in a most desirable manner by electing Mr. G. L. Bulleid, a highly accomplished and studious painter, who, when he has rid his surfaces of a certain dryness and "paperiness," and learnt to believe in the value of those relationships of light, colour, and tone which we recognize under the term "qualities," will assuredly charm the public with his firm and exhaustive drawing, his intense refinement, and his rare knowledge of form. Mr. Bulleid's works look thin and rather flat amid the gilded frames and strong colours which are too conspicuous in the gallery; but in quieter circumstances their studious beauty and honourable care would be fully manifest. They possess, on one hand, something of Mr. Crane's merits, and, on the other hand, trench on Mr. Alma Tadema's province. Mr. Bulleid plagiarizes from neither of those artists, and he draws most skilfully and finely—see the faces of the damsels in Cynthia's Garden (162) and After the Bath (181). In the latter the hands, feet, and dresses are searchingly and soundly modelled; the bronze table and its appurtenances will charm all lovers of a thorough and choice mode of art, but we do not see why the patina should look so old. The grace of the figures in this and its companion picture is of a sort the most uncommon, and is obviously due to the artist's devotion to the antique. The damsels are charming versions of the Diana of Gabii, but, as becomes earthly women, a little plumper and more luxurious.

The remaining pictures require only brief notice, and may be taken in the order of the Catalogue. Mr. E. A. Waterlow's The Foot-Bridge (3), of old weather-stained stone in strong sunlight amid foliage, is spotty, but bright, clear, and rich in colour.—Mr. Marsh's Gathering Fuel (4) is unworthy of him, being woolly, without solidity, flat, and thin.—The Harvest in Cambria (6) of Mr. H. C. Whitte, though a good subject, is too big for treatment in the manner adopted by the artist. There is overmuch fiery colour about it. Mr. Whitte harps on this effect, and will, we think, do well to confine himself to more delicate themes, and, above all, to greyneess and lower keys.—Mr. C. Davidson's Cornfield at Perran Porth (28) is somewhat mannered and too much like Mr. B. Foster's work, but otherwise it is a good instance of soft sunlight, and is bright and pure.—The Rush Cutters (29) of Mr. T. Lloyd is good in composition, but rather garish in its illumination. The subject is trite both here and abroad.—The old-fashioned pastoral mood which Mr. E. K. Johnson cultivates with very unequal success, but with uniform devotion, appears at its worst in the awkwardly composed group of lovers in an unnatural light in No. 38. The otherwise neat handling is thin, and the effect is poor.—The Grace Cup (46) of Mr. W. J. Wainwright, a half-length, nearly life-size figure of an ugly girl, with masses of coarse and tawny hair hanging about her ears, is not delightful, and its assertiveness is somewhat offensive. The cup is badly drawn, and there is no drawing in the draperies, which lack finish and sound draughtsmanship altogether. Most of all, the picture lacks beauty.—Miss E. Martineau relapses into prose of the prosiest, and has lost much of that taste for bright colour which was acceptable. The figures in At the Well (55) are carefully drawn, but stiff and spiritless. What induced her to revenge herself upon mankind by painting such ugly people as those in Taking up the Mangolds (68) it would be hard to say. Her shadows are heavy, hot, and unnaturally brown.—The Worshipful Master (61) is a portrait of Mr. Papworth by Mr. C. Haag: the features are disagreeable and wooden, the carnations crude, the modelling harsh, and the smile artificial.—Mr. B. Foster is sure to maintain his reputation with Arrival of Hop-pickers (63), numerous small figures in a garden, nicely drawn, and skilfully painted with variety of incidents. The shadows are too black, but the rainy, cloudy effect is true. His A Surrey Lane (195) is like a bright mosaic.—Mr. Shields has abandoned his vocation in the "morality" which he calls "Facilis est descensus Averni" (69).—We commend to the visitor's notice Mr. Hodson's Romanesque arcade in The Sealiger Mint, Verona (77), and his May Afternoon in the Piazza Erbe, Verona (85); Mr. G. H. Andrews's bright harbour scene, in which the colours are luminous and delicate, called An Italian Seaport in the Middle Ages (82), a capital subject sympathetically conceived; and the highly characteristic and romantic Autumn (107) of Sir J. Gilbert, than which he never did better of his kind.

THE LEGEND OF THE BRIAR-ROSE.

AFTER about seven years' intermitting labour, Mr. Burne Jones has finished the four important paintings in oil (to which we have more than once referred) which are designed to illustrate the 'Legend of the Briar Rose,' which is a version of the ancient and better-known history of the Sleeping Beauty, or "Sleeping Palace," as the Laureate has it. These pictures are highly and brilliantly finished, full of figures and details of many kinds, and of uniform size, about 11 ft. by 5 ft., landscape way. They were begun on commission from the late Mr. Graham, but are the property of Messrs. Agnew & Sons, who intend to exhibit them all during the season at their gallery in Old Bond Street. The private view occurred yesterday (Friday).

Mr. William Morris has supplied mottoes for his friend's pictures, as he did for a previous series which the Athenæum described. It is hardly needful to say that in illustrating a dateless legend the painter has selected what costume he thought fit, without the least regard to archaeology. As he has to deal with a romance, not with a history, antiquaries must take, or leave, the paintings as they find them. The first in order is inscribed: The fateful Slumber floats and flows about the Tangles of the Rose, but, Lo, the fated Hand and Heart to rend the slumbrous Curse apart!

Here, at the outset of the series, we observe that each work is pervaded by a pure, soft, and mystical light, differing in degree of intensity, and adapted to the progress of the legend from the semi-darkness of the woodland which is the scene of the first painting to the uniform, but subdued brightness of the "chamber far apart," where the enchanted lady and her maidens lie at rest. We are to understand that since the "slumbrous curse" began to operate centuries have passed. The lives of the king, his councillors and knights, the royal damsel and her attendants, have been suspended; but all the rest of the world has gone on its way. The trees have grown larger and more numerous, the shrubs have flourished unchecked, so that the building was almost covered by the briars, which, developing in the magic air, form a dense thicket, till now impenetrable, and have blocked the doors and crept in at the windows, and thrust themselves along the corridors until they have reached the chamber of the princess.

During the lapse of ages many knights had striven to penetrate the thicket and deliver the princess. Adventurer after adventurer has entered, but none has passed through or returned. Failing to overcome the spell, each succumbed to it, and sinking to the earth slept as the inmates of the palace slept. Suffering no change, his weapons have not rusted, nor his attire decayed. Accordingly the painter has represented each man in the garb of his time: the Celt in tegulated armour, the Gothic knight beside the Saracen or Moor; here a champion clad in mail, there another in steel plates. From every head but one the helmets have rolled away, leaving bare the martial faces, in which the look of life is stilled, but not lost. The shields that have fallen from their grasp have been lifted up by the ever-growing briars that have twined about the baldrics, so that each escutcheon hangs above its owner. So profound is the repose of the unsuccessful champions that when the fated knight appears, breaking his way through the underwood, their slumbers are unbroken. He is clad in steel from head to foot, and upon the polished surface of his armour the gloom of the thicket is reflected, and so are rays of light from above and flecks of colour from the roses round about. He pushes aside the branches with his shield, and in the other hand holds his sword. A large part of the charm of this picture is due to the look of the knight. His dark eyes are distinct in the shadow of his vizor, but, heedless of the lost champions at his feet, he seems to gaze far beyond the tangles of the wood and discern victory where others have failed. The features are as beautiful as their expression is poetical. The picture's coloration, light, and shade, the very gloom of the briary wilderness, the strange armour of the knights, the immobility of their faces, and the rapture of the prince, who moves as in a world apart, are appropriate to the magic whose charm is soon to be broken.

The motto of the second picture is The Threat of War, the Hope of Peace, the Kingdom's Peril and Increase: sleep on and bide the later Day when Fate shall take her Chain away. It depicts the council chamber of the white-bearded king. He sits on his throne of bronze, wrapped in embroidered cloth of silver, and wearing a quaint crown. Although sleeping, he still holds in one hand an open scroll, which seems to have been the subject of discussion with the lords who lie on couches or on the floor near their master. Nearest, reclines the chief councillor in blue, a crafty smile fixed upon his face; close by is the treasurer, with his hand on his special charge, the purse; next to him slumbers the general in his armour. On our left the sentry, fixed in sleep, leans upon his spear. Through a grille of gilt bronze behind these figures are visible the faces of the guards and attendants in an outer chamber. The hour-glass, long at rest, is on a stool near the king. The briars penetrate the grille and extend themselves over the couches and the throne. The softened light is much brighter than in the first picture.

The motto of the third picture is The Maiden Pleasance of the Land knoweth no Stir of Voice or Hand. No Cup the sleeping Waters fill; the restless Shuttles lieth still. Here the scene is a courtyard open to the air, where the giant arms of the magical briars form great loops, and from the fountain on one side to the loom on the other stretch along in the sunlight. The maiden at the loom (she is clad in deep rose-red) leans over her warp, and, with her face resting on her crossed arms, sleeps as she has slept for centuries. Another lies on the floor, and a third sits on the loom frame. At the fountain slumber three other maidens clad in beautiful colours, which are beautifully harmonized with the chromatic and tone schemes of the entire picture.

The motto of the fourth painting is Here lies the hoarded Love, the Key to all the Treasures that shall be. Come, fated Hand, the Gift to take, and smite this sleeping World awake. This depicts the princess's chamber, which is surcharged with a rosy and golden light, so that there are hardly any shadows, and the delicate splendour of the scene, the beautiful forms of the sleeping ladies, their sumptuous garments, embroideries, and jewellery, lose none of their charms. The royal damsel, who is clad in warm white, lies under a coverlet adorned with needlework in silver; her face, which is turned towards us, is a little flushed by the life within, her lips are touched with a smile, and every limb and feature bespeaks "a perfect form in perfect rest." The charm of her face is enhanced by the slight disorder of her hair and the stillness of her eyelids. The pillow on which her head rests is of dark rose colour and silver; her couch is pale purple, with a broad hem of gold, upon which a quaint line of silver bells hangs from a cord of the same metal. Near the princess's shoulder the fairest of her maids of honour reposes upon the floor, her lute lying at her hand, while near her feet two other maidens form a fine group. In front lies a casket of jewellery, to which a briar has reached; near it is an inlaid mirror; over the princess's head hangs a silver bell; the carpet at the side of her couch is of a dark red ground with a pattern of deep blue peacocks. Upon the central group the artist has concentrated all the resources of his palette, and he has displayed exquisite taste in producing a combination of hues more lovely than anything he has hitherto achieved. The figures and faces of the princess and her principal attendant are worthy of their place as the crowning elements of the superb series which closes with them.

THE EXCAVATIONS AT MEGALOPOLIS.

April 9, 1890.

THE excavations at the theatre during the past week have been very much hindered by heavy and continuous rain. The plan of the buildings is becoming clearer, but does not yet admit of a very definite report. Some tiles, apparently drain-pipes, with the inscription Σκαυθήκας in late characters, followed by a symbol which is a cross between an A and a Δ, have been found at the end of our front trench.

We have tried two new sites in the neighbourhood of the theatre with unsatisfactory results. One of them proves to be no more than a house of very late construction, and the other is still more unpromising.

Yesterday, being unable to work at the theatre owing to the condition of the ground, we took down a few workmen and dug a trench into a tumulus which forms a conspicuous object on the further side of the river, and which local tradition has regarded as sepulchral. Our excavation brought to light, only a few inches beneath the surface, a small cylindrical vessel of white marble with a lid, containing bones (bearing the marks of fire) and two pieces of thin gold ornament, viz., a headband with floral decoration, and a sort of button—of the usual Mycenaean type. In the underside of the vessel are several holes, one of them filled with lead. This seems to prove that the bones and ornaments, which are undoubtedly prehistoric, have been removed at some later period to their present resting-place. There is no doubt, however, that the mound is sepulchral. We found a large quantity of bones near the surface, and one complete skeleton; also some thick red tiles covered with yellow slip, and an unpainted vase of somewhat unusual shape. Excavation will now be suspended till after the Greek Easter, when we hope to penetrate into the interior of this interesting tumulus.

W. LORING, G. C. RICHARDS,
Students of the British School at Athens.

SALES.

MESSES. CHRISTIE, MANSON & WOODS sold during last week the following drawings, from the first portion of the Percy Collection:—J. Constable, Hampstead Heath, a sketch on the reverse, 61l. J. S. Cotman, In Yarmouth Roads, and the engravings, 178l. J. Cozens, Lake of Avernus, 61l. P. De Wint, A Landscape, with farm buildings and cattle in a pool, 80l.; A Stormy Day, 132l. Copley Fielding, Near Sidmouth, 58l. F. O. Finch, A River Scene, with ruined castle and cascade, 95l. T. Girtin, On the Thames, near Blackfriars, 71l. J. Glover, A Landscape, with waterfall, castle in the distance, and figures, 58l. W. Havell, A Landscape, with castle, 99l. W. Hunt, A Rustic Interior, 94l. J. C. Ibbetson, Scene in the Mall, 60l. Sir T. Lawrence, Portrait of Mrs. Siddons, 68l. F. MacKenzie, Jews' House, Lincoln, 210l.

The same auctioneers sold on the 19th inst. the following pictures, from various collections:—W. Shayer, sen., Gipsies, 173l. E. Verboeck-hoven, A Coast Scene, with sheep, 178*l*.; A Grand View in Holland, with a herd of cattle, a village in the background, 304*l*. E. Long, The Secret, 147*l*. T. S. Cooper, Summer-time, 140*l*.; Cow and Sheep, 357*l*.; Mountain Sheep, 185*l*.; Canterbury Meadows, 420*l*. J. T. Linnell, In the Mountains, 220*l*. R. Ansdell, Herd Lassie, 158*l*.; Entrance to a Shrine in the Alhambra, 168*l*. T. Creswick, A Beck where Trout lie, 304*l*.; The Old Mill, 252*l*. E. Nicol, Interviewing their Member, 750*l*.; His Legal Adviser, 525*l*. G. Morland, The Inn Door, 309*l*. P. F. Poole, Mother and Child, 283*l*. P. Graham, Highland Rovers, 388*l*. J. Linnell, A Summer Evening, 651*l*. E. W. Cooke, Shipwreck off Deal, 682*l*. G. B. O'Neill, New Year's Eve, 131*l*. J. W. Oakes, A View in Wales, 173*l*.; Oranmore, Galway Bay, 162*l*. W. Collins, A Coast Scene, with shrimpers, 325*l*.

Five-Act Gossy.

In the Athenæum of May 3rd we propose printing an account of most, if not all, of the principal pictures at the exhibitions of the Academy and the New Gallery. In order to do this we shall with our next number give a supplement free of charge.

MR. GLADSTONE has entrusted the late Sir Stephen Glynne's notes on the churches of Lancashire and Cheshire to Canon Atkinson, Vicar of Bolton, who is editing them for the Chetham Society with supplementary notes.

AMONG the pictures and drawings to be sold to-day (Saturday) by Messrs. Christie, Manson & Woods there are a few of note, such as the sketch of Mr. F. Goodall's 'Felice Ballarini reciting Tasso,' and W. Hunt's 'Negro Boy, with a Candle and a Hot-Chestnut Stove.' These are drawings. The well-known pictures in oil are D. Cox's 'Stepping-Stones on the Conway' (Manchester, 1857); Mr. T. Faed's 'Pot-Luck'; Landseer's 'Uncle Tom and his Wife for Sale,' 1857; Sir J. Millais's 'Asleep'; Mulready's 'Landscape, with peasants, horses, and poultry,' 1819; Mr. Alma Tadema's 'The Studio,' 1867; Linnell's 'The Harvest Field' and 'The Road through the Wood,' 1854; and examples by Messrs. B. Foster, A. Glennie, J. Breton, Lantant de Metz, E. Frère, P. F. Poole, W. Collins, W. Muller, P. Nasmyth, and J. Constable.

MR. HARRY FURNISS's 'Royal Academy Antics,' with sixty illustrations by the author, will be published by Messrs. Cassell & Co. next week.

We are glad to see that Messrs. Tooth have been unsuccessful in the action they brought against Mr. Muir, well known by his reproductions of Blake. Mr. Muir rightly declined to consider one of five hundred impressions from a plate an artist's proof, and the judge upheld his contention. The result may teach print-sellers that the fact of their having paid an artist a high price is no justification for flooding the market with what they choose to call artist's proofs.

MR. G. W. TOMLINSON, the secretary of the Yorkshire Archaeological and Topographical Association, writes from Wood Field, Huddersfield:—

"If Mr. Edleston would like any help in his continuation of Haines's 'Brasses' as far as this county is concerned, the above society will be glad to do anything to make the list complete."

THE Worshipful Company of Cordwainers, under the auspices of Mr. J. Anderson Rose, their Master, have gathered in their hall, No. 7, Cannon Street, E.C., a large number of things of much interest, beauty, and value, which are to remain there for the benefit of the public till the 17th prox.

THE Arts Club, Manchester, has formed a numerous collection of artist's proofs of engravings by S. Cousins. Mr. J. H. Nodal has written an introduction to the catalogue.

THE Salon on the Champ de Mars, Paris, is being prepared with great activity. It is intended to place the works of each of the more distinguished painters in a separate panel, according to a plan which was partially adopted at the Grosvenor Exhibition a few years ago. Among the more valuable examples the French papers mention the following:—A. Appian, 'Un Soir à Charolet (Ain)'; V. Brozik, 'Causeries de Paysannes,' and 'Normandie'; E. Detaille, 'En Batterie, Artillerie de la Garde'; E. Lansyer, 'La Loire à Saumur' and 'Le Château de Loches'; J. P. Laurens, 'Portrait de Madame H.' and 'Les Sept Troubadours des Jeux Floraux'; A. F. Lejeune, 'Le Matin à Vetheuil'; Lematte, 'Saint Vladimir et Sainte Olga aux Pieds de la Vierge' and 'Portrait de Madame X'; M. Moisset, 'Pommiers en Picardie (Printemps)'; and 'L'Orage sur les Marais.' Sculpture: Allar, 'L'Université,' for the Sorbonne, and 'Les Fêtes de la Fédération au Champ de Mars.' Barrias, 'Femme d'Algérie,' for the monument of Guillaumet. Bartholdi, 'Un Monument Funèbre.' A. Cain, 'Aigles et Vautours se disputant un Ours Mort,' colossal group. Carls, 'Portrait de Madame Roger-Miclos,' bust. Chapu, 'Monument de Gustave Flaubert,' and 'Danseuse,' statue. Cordier, 'Eve,' statue. Coutan, 'Monument de Madame Louis Herbet,' 'Escuela,' 'La Mort de Procris,' Fremiet, 'Portrait Équestre de Velasquez' and 'Un Anier du Caire.' Falguière, 'La Femme au Paon,' statue, and 'Portrait de M. X.,' statue. Gaudes, 'Watteau,' bronze group. Gérôme, 'Tanagra.' E. Guillaume, 'Buste de l'Empereur Don Pedro' and bust of M. Émile Perrin. Guillou, 'Thésée terrassant le Minotaure.' Injalbert, 'Gavarni,' bust. H. Lemaire, 'Duguesclin,' statue; 'Vénus,' group. Lormier, 'Une Fille d'Eve,' statue. Marieton, 'Les Frères d'Armes,' group. Marqueste, 'Persée et la Gorgone,' group. Moreau-Vauthier, 'Un Supplicié,' statue. A. Mercier, 'La Peinture,' statuette; 'Victor Hugo,' bust. G. Michel, 'David devant Goliath' and 'La Paix,' statues. Gautherin, 'Une Glaneuse surprise par le Vent,' A. Lefevre, 'Pour la Patrie,' group. R. de Saint Marceaux, 'Portrait de Vakien.'

THE Committee of Société des Artistes Français has decided that the fee for admission to the Salon on the 30th inst., which is the day of the vernissage, shall be 10 francs. The Salon will be opened as usual on the 1st of May.

WE have received from M. Hoffmann, of Paris, the catalogue of the Greek coins of Photiades Pasha by M. Froehner, and also that of the Pasha's Byzantine coins, by the same authority. They are to be sold at the Hôtel Drouot on Monday, the 19th of May.

CONSIDERABLE repairs are about to be undertaken for the cupola of St. Peter's, Rome.

'LA NYMPHE À LA COQUILLE,' the famous statue by Coysevox in the park at Versailles, having, like nearly all works in marble similarly exposed, suffered much from the weather, has been entrusted to M. Suchetet for restoration, which being done, it will be deposited in a museum, and a copy by M. Suchetet take its place in the park.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

CARL ROSA OPERA COMPANY.—'The Star of the North.'—'Thorgrim,' an Opera in Four Acts. Libretto by Joseph Bennett. Music by F. H. Cowen.—'Maritana.'

THERE is no need to dwell upon the performance in English of Meyerbeer's 'L'Étoile du Nord' on Thursday last week. The chorus was excellent and the spectacle brilliant, but the soloists never rose above mediocrity, and the opera is too artificial to be interesting save when in the hands of vocalists of the first rank.

The production of Mr. Cowen's new opera,

'Thorgrim,' on Tuesday night, is an important event for more than one reason. More than three years have elapsed since the Carl Rosa Company produced a new work by an English composer, and neither Mr. Bennett nor Mr. Cowen could be said to have had much previous experience in this branch of art. Under the circumstances the measure of success they have both attained is extremely gratifying, and gives promise of greater things in the future. We can easily understand that the composer of the 'Scandinavian' Symphony approached the task furnished him by Mr. Bennett with much pleasure. The elements of romanticism and picturesqueness in Scandinavian legends and stories are eminently favourable to a composer possessing the requisite vein of fancifulness. This Mr. Cowen does in large measure, and he, more than any other English musician we could name, might be expected to render justice to such a subject as 'Thorgrim.' It is scarcely necessary to remind our readers that the name given to the opera is that of one of the characters in 'Viglund the Fair,' one of the 'Three Northern Love Stories' by Messrs. Magnusson and Morris. In choosing this foundation for his book Mr. Bennett's object must have been rather to present some stirring pictures of Norse life in the tenth century than to frame a drama calculated to interest either by incident or characterization. What little there is of plot may be summarized in a few lines. Jarl Eric has two sons, Helgi, by his wife Arnora, and Thorgrim, who is "love born," or, as the partisans of Arnora and Helgi term it, "shame born." During a progress through his country King Harald Fairhair visits Eric, and taking a fancy to Thorgrim, in spite of his proud, turbulent nature, makes him "kingsman." Three years later, while Harald is holding a council, Thorgrim meets Olof, daughter of Jarl Thorir, and asks her in marriage. But she is promised to Helgi, and, as the king declines to interfere in family matters, Thorgrim declares he will serve him no longer, and departs to seek adventures as a Viking. On the night of the marriage, however, he returns, and his men extinguish the lights, enabling him to carry off Olof, who prefers him to the gloomy and pusillanimous Helgi. It cannot be said that this is a sympathetic story, but any attempt to endow the characters with the finer attributes of humanity would have been a fatal error. Mr. Bennett has wisely preserved and emphasized the pagan spirit in every detail, just as Wagner did in his treatment of the Norse deities. But he has done much more than this. He has written a book which in literary merit far surpasses any opera libretto with which we are acquainted, save, of course, Wagner's dramatic poems. The lines are always terse and full of matter, and there are not a few really poetical conceits in the more lyrical portions. Mr. Bennett has before now displayed his mastery of the English language in his cantata libretti, but never so successfully as in the present instance.

Turning to the music, it is not surprising to find, with a knowledge of Mr. Cowen's previous work, that he has been more successful in the set pieces than in the purely dramatic episodes of the opera. Happily he has been provided with plenty of opportunity for the exercise of his special gifts, and of these he has made full use. Local colour is introduced—that is to say, the characteristics of Scandinavian music as we find them in the works of Grieg, Svendsen, and other composers—but with a sparing hand, and chiefly in the first act, where the purely picturesque element prevails. There is here a succession of telling numbers. The opening chorus of welcome to King Harald is characterized by a measure of rude vigour admirably in keeping with the situation. Almost as good is a song for the king, "The viking's ship sails o'er the main." A drinking chorus for male voices is written with much brightness, and is certain to be a favourite with choral societies, to whom it may be strongly recommended. Passing over a spirited and appropriate double chorus by the respective partisans of Helgi and Thorgrim, we come to the principal tenor air, "Pride of the North," in which the "shame-born" hero professes his devotion to his monarch. It is, perhaps, a little ballad-like and commonplace, but it becomes very effective when worked into the choral ensemble which forms the climax of the act. The reception scene in King Harald's house, at the commencement of the second act, is not particularly strong. It recalls irresistibly a similar episode in 'Tannhäuser,' and the march is rather conventional, the most attractive portion, a melody in e flat, recurring too frequently. A brief duet for Thorgrim and Olof is tender and expressive, but far superior to these is Arnora's appeal to the goddess Freya on behalf of her son. It is a beautiful lyric, and the divided strings in the accompaniment greatly enhance the effect. The next important piece, a pathetic ballad sung by Thorgrim at the king's request, is also in Mr. Cowen's best manner. The sad and mellow tones of the saxophone blend well with the voice. Thorgrim's appeal to the king for the hand of Olof gives occasion for the most important concerted piece in the opera. It is cleverly put together, the part-writing showing excellent musicianship, yet it is not worked up to an effective climax. There is nothing worthy of note in the finale of the act, when the hot-headed hero forswears his allegiance. In the third act there is much to remind the hearer of the second in 'Tristan und Isolde.' The scene is a forest near Olof's dwelling. The women sing a bright and pretty chorus suitable for ladies' choirs, after which Olof has an aria written in Mr. Cowen's most refined manner and tenderly accompanied. The entrance of Thorgrim leads to the inevitable love duet, the commencement of which is very reminiscent of 'Tristan,' with the reiterated figure in the orchestra expressing the agitation of the lovers. The rest is elegant and melodious, but does not present any features on which it is necessary to dwell. The inverted seventh, on which it ends, is less ear-startling than the discord in Wagner's work, but the situation is similar, the lovers being disturbed by the entrance of Helgi and Arnora. The "son of inheritance," however, is too much of a poltroon to fight, and Thorgrim escapes unharméd. The brief fourth act is occupied with the wedding ceremonies of Olof and Helgi, and Thorgrim's forcible abduction of the bride. The sombre opening contrasts well with the graceful and pretty wedding chorus. The remainder of the music is for the most part mélodrame until the close, when a portion of the love duet recurs as the lovers are seen on Thorgrim's war-ship passing out to sea. This is the most dramatic point in the opera, and brings it to a highly effective conclusion. Mr. Cowen makes scarcely any use of leading themes, and his recitatives are rather conventional; but the wealth of melody, excellent part-writing, and picturesque orchestration ought in a large measure to compensate for the absence of other qualities desirable, though not essential, in an operatic score.

The presentation of 'Thorgrim' by the Carl Rosa Company is, on the whole, better than that of any other opera this season. The cast is not only adequate in itself, but the artists seemed to be interested in their work and appeared at their best. Mr. Barton McGuckin looked well, and sang with mingled force and expression as the truculent hero of the opera. The music of Olof is well suited to Mlle. Zélie de Lussan, who rendered it full justice. The part of the cowardly Helgi is unthankful, but Mr. Crotty made it effective in a vocal sense, and so did Mlle. Tremelli that of Arnora, though she was a little too self-conscious in her stage business. The smaller parts were efficiently interpreted by Mr. F. H. Celli, Mr. Max Eugene, Mr. Somers, and Miss Kate Drew. The staging of the opera is adequate and at times picturesque. Of course some licence is necessary in dealing with such a remote epoch, but the anachronisms were seldom so glaring as to be offensive. The important work for the chorus was all excellently interpreted, and there were few slips in the general performance, considering the haste in which the work had been prepared.

'Maritana' was performed for the first time this season on Wednesday evening, with Madame Burns, Miss Lucille Saunders, Mr. John Child, Mr. F. H. Celli, and Mr. Max Eugene in the leading parts.

Musical Gossip.

THERE is little to be said concerning the last of the regular series of Crystal Palace concerts, which took place last Saturday afternoon, the programme consisting of familiar masterpieces. These were Beethoven's 'Pastoral' Symphony and 'Leonora' Overture, No. 3, Weber's 'Oberon' Overture, and Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto. The executant in the last-named work was Madame Sophie Menter, who had not appeared at these concerts for eight years. Her rendering was more noteworthy for energy than the more subtle qualities which the work demands, and she was, therefore, most successful in the finale, where brilliancy of execution is certainly needful. The vocalist was Mr. Charles Manners, who sang Mozart's "Qui s'adegna," and Schumann's 'The Two Grenadiers,' on the whole acceptably, his bass voice being of good quality; but in both airs he altered the text in order to evince his possession of an unusual compass. At a Crystal Palace concert this vulgar method of producing an effect should not be permitted. Mr. Mann's extra benefit concert takes place this afternoon with an interesting programme.

THE pianoforte recitals which have taken place within the last few days must be briefly dealt with. That of Madame Frickenhaus, at the Princes' Hall last Saturday, had a diversified programme, Schumann's Sonata in f sharp minor, Op. 11, and Mendelssohn's 'Variations Sérielles' being the most important items.

Among the minor pieces was a pleasing Nocturne in e flat, somewhat in the style of Field, by E. Cutler.

MR. LAMOND created an excellent impression at his recital on Monday by his broad and intellectual rendering of such works as Beethoven's Sonata in A flat, Op. 110; Brahms's Variations on a Theme of Paganini, Op. 35 (both sets); and Schumann's 'Études Symphoniques,' the only defect being the somewhat hard quality of tone.

MR. J. ST. O. DYKES played on the whole with more vigour than refinement at his recital on Wednesday afternoon, also at the Princes' Hall. He was ably assisted by Herr Willy Hess in Beethoven's 'Kreutzer' Sonata. Perhaps the most successful of Mr. Dykes's solo efforts was Schumann's very difficult Toccata in c, Op. 7. Miss Helen Trust contributed some songs.

MISS HILDA WILSON gave the first of three vocal recitals at the Steinway Hall on Tuesday afternoon, with the assistance of some members of her family. Miss Agnes Wilson, soprano; Mr. W. S. Wilson, violinist and vocalist; and Mr. H. L. Wilson, vocalist and pianist, all showed ability of no mean description.

THE Royal Choral Society concluded its season on Wednesday with a performance of 'The Golden Legend.' The principal parts were sustained by Miss Macintyre, Madame Patey, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Henschel. There was an enormous audience.

THE death of John Barnett at the advanced age of eighty-eight does not leave a void in musical circles, as the venerable composer had taken leave of the public many years ago. His once famous opera 'The Mountain Sylph,' with which his name is principally associated, would not, as a matter of course, bear revival at the present day, but, like his later operas, 'Fair Rosamond' and 'Farinelli,' it shows him to have been possessed of a rich vein of melody and also dramatic feeling. After his managerial failure at the St. James's Theatre in 1838, Barnett settled as a teacher in Cheltenham, where he died on Thursday last week. As a tribute to his memory a selection from one of his operas might be given at one of the many concerts now taking place.

THE Plain-Song and Mediæval Music Society, of which the Bishop of Salisbury is president, has just issued a volume illustrating the musical notation of the Middle Ages. The work consists of twenty specimens taken from manuscripts at the British Museum, the Bodleian, and some foreign libraries, reproduced by photography, and selected to illustrate the gradual development of the ancient pneumes into the characters now used on a staff of lines and spaces. These facsimiles range from missals dating from the tenth century down to the Fairfax MS. in the time of Henry VIII.

MR. EDWARD HERON-ALLEN has in the press a work entitled 'De Fideiulis Bibliographia,' being the basis of a bibliography of the violin and all other instruments played on with a bow in ancient and modern times. The work will be published by Messrs. Griffith & Farran.

MR. FREDERICK J. CROWESE, author of 'The Great Tone Poets,' is completing a 'Life of Cherubini,' which will appear in Messrs. Sampson Low & Co.'s "Great Musicians" series.

HERR RICHTER writes from Vienna under date April 16th, stating that he will arrive here on May 7th to conduct his concerts in St. James's Hall. This disposes of the report, which gained widespread currency, to the effect that he would be unable to visit London this season.

MÉRUL's opera 'Joseph' has been revived at Munich, under the direction of Herr Levi, with striking success. Herr Max Alvary is said to have made a very strong impression in the principal part.

THE reports relative to the cerebral affection with which Signor Franco Faccio was said to be afflicted are unhappily confirmed, and the recovery of the gifted musician is said to be almost hopeless. This is a serious loss to the art in Italy, for Faccio was one of the few Italian musicians who kept abreast of the times when the tendency in the peninsula was to remain content with the achievements of former generations both in creation and interpretation.

The centenary of the birth of the once esteemed composer Vaccai has just been celebrated at Tolentino.

CONCERTS, &c., NEXT WEEK.

- MON. Miss Edith Greenop's Concert, 3, Steinway Hall.
 — Miss Winifred Robinson's Concert, 3, Princes' Hall.
 — Miss Ethel and Mr. Harold Bauer's Concert, 3, Princes' Hall.
 — Miss Henrietta Lascaille's Concert, 3, Steinway Hall.
 — Carl Rosa Opera Company, 'Thorgrim', 8, Drury Lane.
 TUES. Miss Gutierrez and Mr. Mewburn-Lovien's Concert, 3, Princes' Hall.
 — Myre Park Academy Concert, 3, Steinway Hall.
 — Girls' Friendly Society's Concert, 3, Grosvenor House.
 — Miss H. Rasse's Matinée Musicale, 3.30, St. James's Hall.
 — Carl Rosa Opera Company, 'Lohengrin', 8, Drury Lane.
 WED. Carl Rosa Opera Company, 'Maritana', 2, 'Faust', 8, Drury Lane.
 — Young People's Orchestral Concert, 3, St. James's Hall.
 — Mr. Harden Coffin's Concert, 3, Princes' Hall.
 — Signor Gallero's Concert, 8, Princes' Hall.
 — Royal Amateur Orchestral Society's Concert, 8, St. James's Hall.
 — Miss Kate Flinn and Miss Agnes Janson's Concert, 8.15, Steinway Hall.
 THURS. Carl Rosa Opera Company, Drury Lane.
 — Miss Helen Armstrong and Mr. Henri Logé's Matinée Musicale, 3, Marlborough Rooms.
 — Miss Synge's Concert, 3, Princes' Hall.
 — Miss Josephine Simon's Concert, 8, St. James's Hall.
 — Mr. Hans Wesely's Concert, 8.30, Princes' Hall.
 FRI. Miss Falconer's Concert, 8, Steinway Hall.
 — Carl Rosa Opera Company, Drury Lane.
 SAT. Performance of 'The Golden Legend', 3, Crystal Palace.
 — Carl Rosa Opera Company, Drury Lane.
 — 'Rolling Players' Concert, 8.30, St. James's Hall.

DRAMA

THE WEEK.

COURT.—'The Cabinet Minister,' in Four Acts. By A. W. Pinero.

ADELPHI.—Revival of 'The Green Bushes,' a Drama in Three Acts. By J. B. Buckstone.

SHAFTESBURY.—'The Violin Makers,' an Adaptation of 'Le Luthier de Crémone' of François Coppée. By Alfred Berlyn.

MR. PINERO'S new comedy is exceptionally brilliant in dialogue and in characterization. It has a story of a somewhat thin kind, and it is unburdened with a moral. In all respects, accordingly, it is an advance upon its author's recent works, and it pleases and perplexes an audience in a sufficiently stimulating manner. The use of the word "perplexing" may seem strange, seeing that the story is simplicity itself. Mr. Pinero, however, admirable craftsman and accomplished wit as he is, puzzles us with his atmosphere. He carries us into two worlds. During certain scenes his characters are exactly of the world around us. In others we seem to be in wonderland, and not unnaturally lose our bearings. In the present case, at least, the leading motive is fresh, the satire of modern proceedings is excellent, and the whole play is thoroughly entertaining. The only fault to be found is the introduction of some rather incongruous matter in which the satirist has overshot the mark. In presenting a juvenile Earl and Countess of Drumdurris as taking, in connexion with the future profession of their child of three months old, views so widely divergent that some commencement of estrangement is threatened, Mr. Pinero, with the underlying seriousness of the true humourist, ridicules the triviality of the causes of misconception. His instance, however, fails to carry conviction, his purpose is not easily seen, and the whole of this portion of the play seems to the majority of the audience mere lumber. In one other case, at least, the action of a character, though prettily conceived, is not wholly effective in representation.

The plot turns upon the tribulations of the wife of a Secretary of State, who, having contracted debts unknown to her husband, finds herself compelled to introduce into society a Jew money-lender of inconceivable vulgarity, and his pretty and designing sister. In some not very important respects, accordingly, the play recalls 'L'Aventurière.' In the end she betrays state secrets to her persecutor for the purpose of Stock Exchange speculation. Fortunately the husband, though ordinarily imbecile enough, sees what is going on, and, by substituting false documents for real, sends his wife's creditor to ruin himself instead of making a fortune. Connected with this main story is some love-making of no great interest. The action, meanwhile, is carried on by some of the most diverting creatures ever seen upon the stage. The wife who betrays her husband is a serious rather than a comic character, in which Mrs. John Wood reveals a new facet of her admirable talents. Mr. Arthur Cecil is, however, wonderfully comic as the harassed minister, sighing vainly for rest, and solacing his moments of leisure with the flute. Mr. Weedon Grossmith as the usurer presents a capital picture of self-sufficient vulgarity. Mr. Brandon Thomas is marvellously funny as a Highland chief afraid of his mother. Many more characters of extreme drollery are supplied, and the acting of the company gave all possible vivacity to the interpretation.

The revival at the Adelphi of 'The Green Bushes' furnishes opportunity for reflections not wholly satisfactory. For the first time, probably, the melodrama has been given by actors who, not having seen its original cast, retain only such traditions concerning the manner in which it is to be rendered as ordinarily linger in the case of a successful play. In the new representation, accordingly, there is a general falling off in breadth and colour. One or two parts were played to perfection. Miss Kate James gave all possible pathos to the warm-hearted Irish girl who seeks her infant charge in Blondel fashion through the streets, and Miss Clara Jacks assigned the extravagant character of Tigertail a vivacity it has not previously possessed. In the main interest, however, the incapacity of the performance was striking. Madame Celeste, whose principal character Miami was, was an admirable pantomimist, who by simple gesture could fill the stage. Her figure as she stood on the bridge in front of the house and contemplated her guilty husband in the arms of another woman will not be banished from the memory. This part is now assigned Miss Mary Rorke, a pretty and attractive actress, a conceivable Geraldine, but a wholly ineffective and inconceivable Miami. Miss Olga Nethersole has been suggested as a fitting representative of the savage heroine, and one or two other actresses possessing the requisite passion might be mentioned. A choice less felicitous than that of the management could scarcely, however, have been made. Mr. J. L. Shine as Muster Grinnidge seemed overweighted with thoughts concerning his forerunners in the part, and failed to do himself justice. Paul Bedford's ripeness and unctious are not possessed by Mr. Lionel Rignold, who, however, is a more genuine humourist than his predecessor, and will end by being an excellent Jack Gong. Miss Ada Ferrar played nervously as Geraldine, and Mr. Frank Cooper was a too sentimental Connor O'Kennedy. This will probably not be the last revival of this old-fashioned play. Fantastic in characterization and conventional in treatment, it is vivified by a breath of true passion. It does not, like subsequent pieces, keep the hero skating on thin ice and escaping immersion. It plunges him into absolute guilt, and presents him as paying the penalty. Its situations are real and its action is vivid. The drama of yesterday seems, indeed, like the acting of yesterday, to have more breadth and colour than that of to-day.

A new version of 'Le Luthier de Crémone,' produced at the Shaftesbury, is in one act and in blank verse. Much of the spirit of the play is lost, and portions of it become depressing. Miss Olga Brandon is, however, an ideal heroine; Mr. Willard plays with strength as the self-sacrificing hero; and Mr. Alfred Bishop and Mr. Elwood are included in an acceptable cast. The whole accordingly constitutes an agreeable and fairly poetical lever de rideau.

GRAMMATIC GOSSIP.

A MEETING of the Marlowe Memorial Committee was held on the afternoon of the 18th inst. Lord Coleridge was in the chair, and among those present were Mr. A. H. Bullen, Mr. Arthur Boucher, Mr. Edmund Gosse, Mr. Henry A. Jones, Mr. Sidney Lee, Mr. J. H. McCarthy, M.P., and Mr. J. E. Baker (acting hon. secretary). It was announced that Mr. Onslow Ford had consented to design the monument. Mr. Bram Stoker, who appeared as the representative of Mr. Irving, stated that Mr. Irving and Miss Ellen Terry proposed to contribute 100*l.* from the proceeds of their readings in St. James's Hall next July. A sub-committee was appointed to organize a dramatic performance at one of the leading theatres. Many expressions of willingness to take part in the performance have been received. Subscriptions may be paid to the account of the Marlowe Memorial Fund at the branch office of the London Joint-Stock Bank in Pall Mall.

'THE LINENDRAPER,' a three-act farcical comedy by Messrs. J. R. Brown and F. Thornthwaite, produced at an afternoon representation at the Comedy Theatre, is conventional in story and characterization, but amusing if rather vulgar in dialogue. It was well played by Mr. Righton as a parvenu carrying with him educational manuals, and practising dancing and social experiments generally in the houses of his friends; and by Miss Cicely Richards, Miss Vane Featherstone, Mr. Frank Wood, and others.

'CERISE & CO.,' a farcical comedy by Mrs. Musgrave, given at the Prince of Wales's Theatre on the same afternoon that witnessed 'The Linendraper' at the Comedy, has some elements of possible vitality. It deals with aristocratic shopkeeping, and some of the satire upon fashionable foibles is not ineffective. Miss Lottie Venne, Miss Sylvia Grey, Mr. F. Kerr, Mr. Eric Lewis, and Mr. H. H. Morell played the principal parts.

A CORRESPONDENT writes:—

"The town of Stratford-on-Avon has been making high holiday this week. If possible there is even more recognition of Shakespeare than usual. Since the founding of the Memorial Theatre in 1877 and the institution of the Memorial plays, the annual pilgrimage has been greatly increased. Some make the pilgrimage once in a lifetime, others come often, and some few every year. Mr. Charles Flower spares no pains to make the commemoration plays a success; and perhaps not the least is the publication of the Memorial Theatre edition of each play in full, with the omitted passages printed in small type, so that we may have the advantage of a study copy and an acting copy in one. This year again it is the company of Mr. and Mrs. Tearle who represent the plays. Those chosen this season are 'Othello,' 'The Two Gentlemen of Verona,' 'King John,' and 'King Lear.' Mr. Tearle acted as Othello impressively on Monday evening, in spite of a visible falling off in the murder scene; and Mrs. Tearle rendered Emilia, especially in the last scene, in a powerful and sympathetic manner. But they were badly supported. 'The Two Gentlemen of Verona' was splendidly set on the stage. The transposition of some of the scenes under Mr. Flower's directions much elucidated the narrative; the new stage scenery was beautiful, especially the view of the piazza in Milan. Mr. Tearle played Valentine, and Mrs. Tearle, Sylvia, for which part she is rather large, but her fine voice and good dressing made it a pleasant piece. Speed and Launce, by Mr. Gallier and Mr. Gordon, were fairly rendered; and Launce's dog was an accomplished actor that 'brought down the house.' Mr. Rouse as Duke of Milan filled a small part well; but Miss Edwin wants grace, unconsciousness, and study to enable her to fill her ambitious parts, though she has gleams of inspiration occasionally in her Julia. On the birthday itself the play selected was 'King John.' The difficult character of King John was fairly supported by Mr. Tearle. Mrs. Tearle as Constance rather overstrained her voice. Prince Arthur is played by Miss Bessie Hatton.

On Wednesday afternoon at the Criterion Mr. Charles Wyndham appeared as Citizen Sangfroid in Dance's comic drama 'Delicate Ground' and Walsingham Potts in Mr. Brough's farce 'Trying It On.' These characters belong to the repertory of the younger Mathews. So successful was Mr. Wyndham in these parts, it is to be hoped he will work the series further. No living English actor approaches him in this class of comedy.

The season is not, it appears, to pass without an entertainment of French plays. On June 2nd the Gymnase company will appear at Her Majesty's Theatre in 'La Lutte pour la Vie,' to be followed after a few days by 'Paris Fin de Siècle.' On the 16th Mlle. Sarah Bernhardt is announced to appear as Jeanne d'Arc.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—W. A.—received.
M. B.—You should ask some bookseller who deals in foreign books.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

PRICE ONE SHILLING. MURRAY'S MAGAZINE.

Contents for MAY

MAD TIPPERARY.

The POET'S APOLOGY. By Andrew Lang.

MARCIA. Chaps. 17-20. By W. E. Norris, Author of 'Thirby Hall,' &c. (To be continued.)

PASSION PLAYS AT HOME; or, Ober-Ammergau in Winter. By Florence Norris.

THE NEW DEPARTURE.

1. France under M. Constans.

2. Germany without Bismarck.

A QUIET CORNER OF NORMANDY. By E. D. Cuming.

AGITATORS and DEMAGOGUES. By Morley Roberts.

ROUND FOR GREEN FIELDS. By May Kendall.

THAT FIDDLER FELLOW. Chaps. 1-3. By Horace Hutchins.

NOTES OF THE MONTH from LONDON and PARIS.

CORRESPONDENCE.

OUR LIBRARY LIST.

London: John Murray, Albemarle-street.

THE UNITED SERVICE MAGAZINE. MAY. ONE SHILLING.

ENGLAND: an Ode. By Algernon Charles Swinburne.

ENGLAND and BELGIUM. By General Brialmont, Ex-Minister of War, Belgium.

GEORGE LEO VON CAPRIVI. (With Portrait.)

RESPONSIBILITY IN WAR. By Spencer Wilkinson (Author of 'The Brain of an Army').

OBSTACLES TO IMPERIAL FEDERATION.

1. By the Editor.

2. An Australian's View. By G. H. D. Gossp.

WATERLOO. The Origin of Legends. II. By Colonel J. F. Maurice, R.A.

The EASTER MANCEUVRES.

The SUDAN CAMPAIGN. By George Hooper (Author of 'Waterloo,' Sedan, &c.).

ROUND about DISLEY. (With Plan.) By Colonel Cooper King.

NATIONAL INSURANCE. A Practical Proposal. By Vice-Admiral Sir George Tryon, K.C.B.

London: W. H. Allen & Co. 15, Waterloo-place; and all Booksellers and Railway Bookstalls.

COVENTRY PATMORE'S WORKS.

The UNKNOWN EROS. Third Edition. 1s.

PRINCIPLE IN ART, &c. Second Edition. 5s.

The ANGEL IN THE HOUSE. Sixth Library Edition. 5s.

POEMS ('Angel,' 'Victories of Love,' 'Unknown Eros,' 'Tavernon Church Tower,' 'Amelia,' &c.). Third Collective Edition. 2 vols. 8s.

George Bell & Sons, York-street, Covent-garden.

PHALLICISM: a Description of the Worship of the Ligeia-Yoni in various Parts of the World and in different Ages, with an Account of Ancient and Modern Grosse, particularly the Cruz Ananta, and other Symbols connected with the Mysteries. Crown 8vo. parchment, 10s. 6d.

A. Reader, Orange-street, Bloomsbury, W.C.

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

NOW READY.

GLANCES at GREAT and LITTLE MEN. By "PALADIN." 1 vol. crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

Contents: Oxford—Bishop Wilberforce—Some Preachers—The late Emperor of Brazil—Sir Bartle Frere—Anthony Trollope—Richard Wagner—Napoleon III.—George Mac Donald—Emperor William I. and Prince Bismarck, &c.

ART in the MOUNTAINS. The Story of the Passion Play at Oberammergau. By HENRY BLACKBURN, Editor of 'Academy Notes,' &c. New and Cheaper Edition, with numerous illustrations, and Information for Travellers in 1890. Demy 8vo. cloth, 5s.

A CENTURY of PAINTERS of the ENGLISH SCHOOL. Abridged and continued to the Present Time. By R. REDGRAVE, C.B. R.A., and S. REDGRAVE. New Edition. Large crown 8vo. cloth, 10s. 6d.

NEW NOVELS AT ALL THE LIBRARIES.

THE CONSPIRATOR: a Romance of

Real Life. By Count PAUL P.—. Edited by FRANK HARKUT. 2 vols. crown 8vo. cloth, 21s.

DUCHESS FRANCES: a Novel. By

SARAH TYTLER, Author of 'Citoyenne Jacqueline,' 'Lady Bell,' &c. SECOND EDITION. 2 vols. crown 8vo. cloth, 21s.

"The story is carefully told, and, like all Miss Tytler's work, is based on conscientious research; and those who appreciate historical novels are certain to appreciate this vigorous and gracefully written story."—Leeds Mercury.

LOW'S STANDARD NOVELS.

RECENT VOLUMES.

NEW AND CHEAPER ISSUE.

Crown 8vo. fancy boards, 2s.; cloth, uniform, 2s. 6d.

The MAYOR of CASTERBRIDGE. By THOMAS HARDY.

The CASTING AWAY of Mrs. LECKS and Mrs. ALESHINE; and the DUSANTES. By FRANK R. STOCKTON, Author of 'Rudder Grange.'

ADELA CATHCART. By GEORGE MAC DONALD.

CRIPPS the CARRIER. By R. D. BLACKMORE.

TRUMPET-MAJOR. By THOMAS HARDY.

DRED. By Mrs. BEECHER STOWE.

The VASTY DEEP. By STUART CUMBERLAND.

DAISIES and BUTTERCUPS. By Mrs. RIDDELL.

GUILD COURT. By GEORGE MAC DONALD.

*. * To be followed by others.

Now ready, price One Shilling,

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, FOR MAY.

Contents.

Some Modern French Painters. THEODORE CHILD.

17 Illustrations.

Old New York Taverns. JOHN AUSTIN STEVENS.

16 Illustrations. Drawn by Howard Pyle.

The Shadow of a Dream: a Story. Part III.

WILLIAM DEAN HOWELLS.

Making United States Bonds under Pressure.

L. E. CHITTENDEN.

An Ex-Brigadier: a Story. S. B. ELLIOTT.

The Evolution of Humour. Prof. S. H. BUTCHER, LL.D.

Susan's Escort: a Story. Illustrated. EDWARD EVERETT HALE

Through Bush and Fern. WILLIAM SHARP.

9 Illustrations.

Robert Browning: a Sonnet. AUBREY DE VERE.

Steam from a Samovar: a Story. E. H. LOCKWOOD.

English Lyrics from the First Charles. LOUISE

IMOGEN GUINEY. 9 Illustrations. From Old Prints.

NEARLY 70 ILLUSTRATIONS IN ALL.

London:

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON, SEARLE & RIVINGTON

(LIMITED),

St. Dunstan's House, Fetter-lane, Fleet-street, E.C.

ELLIOT STOCK'S NEW BOOKS.

In handsome crown 8vo. cloth, 2s. 6d. post free,

Boyhood, Adolescence, and Youth.

By LEON TOLSTOI,

Author of 'Anna Karenina,' 'What I Believe,' 'War and Peace,' &c.

Translated by CONSTANTINE POPOFF.

"An excellent translation."—Saturday Review.

"Extremely interesting. Tolstoi's power of description is admirably shown in the pictures of Russian scenery. Some of the incidental characters bear the impress of real portraiture."—Times Weekly.

"Mr. Popoff's version is easy, natural, and 'free and despoiled of Gallicisms.' The translator has a command of English idiom, and his piece of work is a decided improvement on the translation of Miss Hoppgood's."—Speaker.

"Supplying an unquestionably graphic picture of the Russia of the time."—Globe.

"Delightful and characteristic specimens of Tolstoi's writing."—Manchester Guardian.

"Singularly eloquent and deeply interesting. The translation is exceedingly well done, the English being clear, vigorous, and forcible."—Newcastle Chronicle.

"Mr. Stock's publication derives its chief merit from its translation by a native of Russia. Mr. Popoff's English is remarkably good; so good, indeed, that it is only here and there, by dint of hard searching, that we can find anything betraying the handling of a foreigner."—Bookseller.

"The ordinary versions raise a suspicion by their style that they have not been rendered direct from the author's Russian, but from the French versions that are so widely circulated. In the double transmission from speech to speech, Tolstoi's expression, as may be supposed, gets curiously distorted. Mr. Popoff seems to have worked from the genuine Slavonic. An English reader could not read the story in a better rendering."—Scotsman.

NEW VOLUME OF VERSE.

Now ready, complete Edition, in handsome crown 8vo. cloth, gilt edges, 3s. 6d. post free,

The Poems of William Leighton.

Illustrated by JOHN LEIGHTON.

"Good taste, sensitive feeling, and easy versification are their chief characteristics.....The outcome of a generous mind."—Athenæum.

"All of them good, and many exquisitely beautiful."—Literary World.

"The same qualities of tenderness and grace and melodious versification are to be observed throughout."—Spectator.

"Charming and tender pages."—Standard.

"Gems, all pure and sparkling."—Family Treasury.

"The versification is never at fault, and a certain natural refinement displays itself in every page."—Bell's Life.

"A sweet singer."—City Press.

"Very beautiful verse, both pictorial and didactic."—Court Circular.

"Tender and graceful poems."—Guardian.

"The natural expressions of a pure and tender heart."—Queen.

"Whoever loves sweetness and vigour, thought and feeling, will admire and love these charming poems."—Morning Post.

"The only words to express our opinion of these charming poems are those of unqualified commendation. They disarm criticism; for when we would examine rigorously, their sweet tones enter into the heart, exciting its deepest sympathies, and winning us to admiration."—Weekly Budget.

"Scotland may well be proud to claim amongst her tuneful sons the pure-minded, sweet singer whom she cannot but regret.....Had he lived he must have won a high place in our literature; as it is, he has enriched English poetry with many admirable pieces, which will live and set readers thinking for many a long day to come."—Graphic.

London: ELLIOT STOCK, 62, PATERNOSTER-ROW, E.C.

SATURDAY, MAY 3, 1890.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
THE DIARIES OF SIR M. MONTEFIORE ...	559
THE GLACIERS OF THE ROCKY MOUNTAINS ...	560
LORD DALHOUSIE'S RULE IN INDIA ...	560
THE POETRY OF THE ANTI-JACOBIN ...	561
NOVELS OF THE WEEK ...	563
OUR LIBRARY TABLE—LIST OF NEW BOOKS ...	564-566
IN MEMORY OF AURELIO SAFFI; 'FRANCE AND THE REPUBLIC'; THE SCOTCH FASTING MAN; SALE; THE ORIENTAL CONGRESS; MR. BLADES ...	566-567
LITERARY GOSSIP ...	567
SCIENCE—LIBRARY TABLE; CHEMICAL NOTES; SO- CETIES; MEETINGS; GOSSIP ...	569-570
FINE ARTS—THE ROYAL ACADEMY; THE NEW GAL- LERY; SALES; GOSSIP ...	570-577
MUSIC—THE WEEK; GOSSIP; CONCERTS, &c., NEXT WEEK ...	578-580
DRAMA—THE WEEK; GOSSIP; NEXT WEEK'S NOVEL- TIES ...	580

LITERATURE

Diaries of Sir Moses and Lady Montefiore, comprising their Life and Work as recorded in their Diaries from 1812 to 1883. Edited by Dr. Loewe. 2 vols. (Griffith, Farran & Co.)

THE life of Sir Moses Montefiore is the history of a man who devoted himself with unremitting energy to the task of combating race-prejudices, sectarian persecution, and religious fanaticism in every quarter of the globe. His services in the establishment of toleration were enormous, and, though other features in his useful career are noteworthy, it is to this side of his work that we shall mainly confine our attention. His devotion to the cause of humanity in general, and of his co-religionists in particular, deserved to be permanently recorded. No fitter person could be found than Dr. Loewe, who for over fifty years was intimately associated with Sir Moses Montefiore in all his philanthropic efforts, and who was chosen by Sir Moses himself to write a memoir of the "useful and blessed life" of Lady Montefiore; but unfortunately he has not used his opportunities with much skill.

Moses Montefiore was born at Leghorn in 1784. He died at Ramsgate in 1885. His early years were spent in a struggle against the many obstacles which at the beginning of the century impeded Jews in commercial transactions. Business was the only career open to him. "There was no sphere of work open to him in any of the professions; and even to enter the medical profession would have been difficult." His industry was indefatigable. He worked hard and spent little, serving his apprenticeship in a counting-house in the City, where "the hours were late and he sometimes had to take letters to the post on the stroke of midnight." From an entry in his diary for August 20th, 1831, it appears that the dishonesty of some person with whom he was engaged in business made this early struggle doubly severe:—

"This day five and twenty years ago, in 1806, J. E. D. robbed me of all I possessed in the world, and left me deeply in debt; but it pleased the Almighty in His great mercy to enable me in the course of a few years to pay every one who had been a sufferer through me to the full extent of their loss."

The business ability, energy, and spotless integrity of Montefiore soon made his fortune. He became one of the twelve Jewish brokers who alone were privileged to transact business on the Stock Exchange, and the firm of Montefiore Brothers quickly became known in England as one entitled to the respect of all honourable men.

But Moses Montefiore never permitted business to encroach upon the duties which he owed either to the religion of his ancestors or the country of his adoption. He remained throughout his life punctual in the observance of the fasts and festivals of his faith:—

"However profitable or urgent the business may have been, the moment the time drew near when it was necessary to prepare for the Sabbath or solemn festivals, Moses Montefiore quitted his office, and nothing could ever induce him to return."

In very early life he showed that patriotic feeling which characterized his whole career, and which gave emphatic denial to the opinion that Jews can never be Englishmen:—

"In the year 1809, in the reign of George III., an Act of Parliament was passed enabling His Majesty to establish a local Militia Force for the defence of the country. Young Montefiore, who was then twenty-five years old, having attained his majority in 1805, deemed it his duty to be one of the first volunteers. Loyalty to the country in which he lived and prospered, and sincere devotion to his king, afterwards proved to be special traits in his character. In all foreign countries whether his philanthropic missions subsequently led him, his addresses to the people and his counsels, even to those who suffered under heavy oppression, contained exhortations to them to remain firm in their loyalty to their Government."

In 1812 Montefiore married Judith, the daughter of Levi Barent Cohen. For fifty years she was the faithful partner in all his philanthropic schemes, and accompanied him in difficult and often dangerous missions. Many touching illustrations of their complete sympathy and domestic happiness are recorded in Dr. Loewe's volumes. As the business position of Moses Montefiore became more secure, he devoted himself with rare self-denial and persistency to the furtherance of every good cause of humanity. Dr. Loewe has published a bare record of the events of Montefiore's life. The two volumes contain an ample chronicle of the facts of his philanthropic career, drawn from his diaries, notes, manuscripts, and memoranda. But they do not, and perhaps designedly, make any attempt to supply a picture of the philanthropist himself. Consequently they have no arrangement beyond the order of time, and, from the multiplication of petty miscellaneous details, are difficult reading. The personal interest is throughout unduly neglected.

Montefiore's labours were at first directed towards the wants of his own community. As President (1818) of the Spanish and Portuguese Congregation, he is punctual in attendance at the meetings of the elders, zealous in the collection of contributions towards the hospital funds of the congregation, munificent in his charities, answering petitions from the poor, and visiting the Villa Real School and other communal institutions. In 1827 he and his wife paid their first visit to Jerusalem. The motive of this expedition was nothing more than the natural desire to see a country with which their race was connected by countless associations. But from this visit sprang consequences which were of vast importance to the community at Jerusalem. Subsequently he paid seven other visits to Jerusalem, in 1838, 1848, 1855, 1857, 1867, 1871, 1875. Each of these journeys resulted in the relief of immediate distress or the promotion of some new scheme for the improvement of the condition of the Jews in Palestine. During the earlier periods Jerusalem was only reached after difficult and dangerous voyages. In 1838 the Mediterranean was infested with Greek pirates. The vessel which Montefiore had chartered was the only one which, in the space of three months, escaped without being plundered. In 1848 the risks of his journey were greatly increased by the fact that he carried with him large sums of money for distribution among the Jews of Safed, Jerusalem, Hebron, and Tiberias, who had been plundered by their rulers, ruined by the earthquake, or attacked by the Druses. It was mainly through his intervention, and by his personal interviews with the Sultan, that the Jews of Palestine were enabled to rent land for long terms of years, assisted in the cultivation of the land and the breeding of sheep, and protected from robbery and insult by a better administration of justice, a more equitable system of taxation, and gradually by the establishment of religious toleration. He was also the founder of a dispensary, a hospital, a Jewish girls' school, an almshouse, and numerous other charitable institutions in Jerusalem.

Montefiore's position as President of the London Committee of the British Jews, a position which he held from 1841 to 1874, and the great influence which he possessed, made him the recipient of the complaints of persecuted Jews in every part of the world. He was ever ready to face the most laborious journeys on behalf of his co-religionists. Now the cry comes from Syria, now from Russia, now from Morocco, now from Roumania, and Montefiore always responded to the appeal by himself investigating the case on the spot. His tact, energy, and tenacity of purpose in every case enabled him to ameliorate the conditions of the oppressed Jews. Sometimes persecutions arose from revivals of the time-honoured calumny that the Jews murdered Christians in order to make their Passover cakes with the blood of the murdered men. In 1840 this superstition was the cause of terrible sufferings among the Jews of Damascus and Rhodes. Numbers of men, women, and children were thrown into prison and tortured to procure confessions. Montefiore obtained the release of the prisoners, as well as a firman from the Sultan, which testified to their innocence of the charge, and assured the Jewish populations of protection. Sometimes the oppression of the Jews arose, as was the case in Russia in 1846, from commercial or political causes. As Montefiore visited the Sultan in 1840, so in 1846 he interviewed the Czar. At this time the Jews were forbidden to live in Old Russia, because it was supposed that they were inclined to an idle life, and preferred petty commerce to agriculture; they were prohibited from living in villages, because it was alleged that they imposed upon and robbed the peasantry; they were removed from all towns or villages upon the frontiers, on the ground that they carried on a contraband trade. Montefiore drew up exhaustive reports upon the life of the Jews in Russia, laid them before the Czar, and obtained valuable modifications of the existing laws. Occasionally, as in Morocco in 1863, a popular rising was caused by suspicion of crime committed by the Jews; several Jews were thrown into prison at Saffi, one was executed, and a popular panic, which threatened some terrible outbreak of violence, spread to Tangier and Gibraltar. Montefiore made his way to Morocco, and obtained from the Sherifian Sultan the release of the prisoners and an imperial edict ordering that Christians and Jews should enjoy perfect equality before the law with other people. Sometimes, as in the Danubian Principalities in 1867, the persecution originated in commercial jealousies. Montefiore, then eighty-three years of age, travelled to Bucharest, obtained an interview with Prince Charles of Roumania, and received from him a promise of protection for all the Jews in his dominions.

To the very end of his life his labours were unremitting in the cause of humanity. They did not pass without recognition. He had been knighted in 1837; he was made a baronet in 1847. He was decorated by foreign potentates. The City paid him the highest compliment in its power. In 1864 he was voted the freedom of the City of London, in approval, as the Lord Mayor stated,

"of the sacrifices you have made, of the time you have spent, of the wearisome journeys you have endured, in order not only to alleviate the sufferings of your co-religionists, but at the same time to alleviate the sufferings and miseries of people of all creeds and all denominations."

When this notable philanthropist died, in 1885, it was felt throughout the civilized world that few men had ever employed a long life, great wealth and opportunities, more unselfishly or for nobler ends than Sir Moses Montefiore.

The two volumes in which Montefiore's career is told cannot be characterized as attractive reading. There are scarcely any passages which it is possible to extract for quotation. The rapidity with which the scene shifts is bewildering. Little help is afforded to the realization of the personality of the hero. The facts are baldly and dryly stated. Reduced to half its size the picture would be infinitely more effective. Though Dr. Loewe's bulky volumes embrace a variety of topics, and extend over a space of seventy years, they are without an index. The 'Diaries of Sir Moses and Lady Montefiore' are a chronicle, and not a biography.

Among the Selkirk Glaciers: being the Account of a Rough Survey in the Rocky Mountain Regions of British Columbia. By W. Spotswood Green, M.A., F.R.G.S. (Macmillan & Co.)

MR. SPOTSWOOD GREEN is already favourably known to the public by his book on the Alps of New Zealand. In the present volume this enterprising member of the Alpine Club gives an account of the way in which he executed a commission from the Royal Geographical Society to make a preliminary exploration of the glaciers of the Selkirk Range, part of the Rockies situated close to the new Canadian Pacific Railway.

Until a few years ago this region lay remote from the common paths of men, and almost inaccessible to the ordinary traveller. Now a "Glacier Hotel," within a few miles of Kicking-Horse Pass, supplies daily meals to the passengers to and from the Pacific coast. But a mountain chain, even in the Far West, cannot be subdued suddenly to human uses by a single line of rails. Beyond the track all is primeval and pathless forest, too often smouldering from the fires created by the passing engines. Hence several of the many thrilling dangers and escapes recounted in Mr. Green's narrative were the result of being caught unawares by a train when making use of the rails as a path for his horse.

Mr. Green tells the story of his explorations and ascents in a consecutive narrative, in which adventures and observations, climbing and cartography, are mixed up. The adventures, many readers may be glad to know, occupy the greater part of his pages, though Mr. Green's general scientific attainments and wide experience of mountains give value and authority to what he has to tell us of a more solid nature. The heaviest part of his real work is, naturally, embodied in the map, originally issued by the Royal Geographical Society, which accompanies the present volume.

When the respective heights of the peaks and valleys (11,000-10,000 feet and 4,000-3,000 feet), and the therefore relatively inconsiderable elevation to be climbed, are taken into account, it will be admitted that for their size the Selkirks afford far more sport to the mountaineer than any of their European equals. The upper ridges of the peaks themselves are precipitous; but, as in most wild and wooded regions, the chief difficulties lie below the timber line, among the decaying timber and dense scrub of the lower slopes, and in crossing the wild torrents which flow from the extensive snow-fields. It is a new sensation to the Alpine traveller when he has to learn to look with relief to reaching the snow and with apprehension to the plunge into the valley, and to feel as grateful to the boulders of a bare torrent-bed as to a well-made path in more civilized countries. Perhaps almost too many of Mr. Green's pages are devoted to the misadventures of the unfortunate animal which conveyed his camping material from glen to glen. Another of his difficulties was in finding a backwoodsman who would do some of the work a Swiss guide undertakes in ordinary mountain excursions. One promising candidate for employment backed out of an engagement at the last moment on learning Mr. Green's profession, giving the odd reason that "he could not live three weeks without swearing, and that he could not swear at his ease before two parsons!"

The result of Mr. Green's excursion has been to show that in the Selkirks the Dominion possesses a pleasure or health resort, with mountains, glaciers, peaks, lakes, valleys, forests, and flowers equaling at least in attraction, as they do in scale, those of Central Tyrol. Sport, of course, must be thrown in. Mr. Green did not meet with any bears, but he often fell amongst the mountain goats in their fastnesses, and he made friends with a delightful little animal, the sewellell, which picks neat nosegays of flowers—apparently for its winter food or bed.

Mr. Green reached one of the higher summits, Mount Bonney, 10,622 ft., but his plane-tableing rather interfered with peak-hunting. He discredits (as have other recent authorities) the great height often attributed to two summits of the Rockies, Mounts Brown and Hooker, and considers 12,000 ft. about the loftiest elevation of this portion of the North American backbone. The little volume in which he has recorded his trip is at once lively and instructive, and it is impossible not to wish that a traveller who knows so well how to use his opportunities had had the time at command to extend his explorations over a wider area, and to bring home with him materials for a more extensive survey of the strange forests and new heights in which he has been—above the snow level—one of the first pioneers.

The illustrations are not worthy of the subject, and do no justice to the peculiar and characteristic beauties of the Selkirks, their sharp crests, steep ladder-like glaciers, varied forests, and beautiful mountain tarns. There is no index!

The Marquess of Dalhousie. By Sir William Wilson Hunter, K.C.S.I., C.I.E. (Oxford, Clarendon Press.)

THE "Rulers of India" series, of which Sir William Hunter is the editor and Oxford the patron, has made a worthy beginning with Sir William's own volume on Lord Dalhousie and the great part he bore in the final development of the Company's rule. The book should command a wide circle of readers, not only for its author's sake and that of his subject, but partly at least on account of the very attractive way in which it has been published at the moderate price of half-a-crown. The print, paper, and binding demand unqualified praise, and a good map and portrait add to the appearance of the book.

But it is, of course, by its intrinsic merits alone that a work of this nature should be judged. And those merits are everywhere conspicuous. The ground had already been broken, it is true, by Capt. Trotter, to whose study of the same subject Sir William offers a generous tribute. But there was room for another monograph, composed on a different method, by a writer whose thorough mastery of all Indian subjects has been acquired by years of practical experience and patient research. The present volume is avowedly more of an historical retrospect than a personal biography; but the one chapter which deals especially with "The Man" brings together within one focus nearly all that it is yet possible to tell about the "great Proconsul's" character and home life.

The author starts by comparing the India of Wellesley's day with the India which Dalhousie, as the "second builder of the temple of British rule," left behind him, and of which the India of to-day is but the logical outcome. "The present foreign policy of India, the present internal problems of India, the new industrial era in India are alike legacies of his rule." Dalhousie's threefold work—the expansion of territory, the unification of territory, and the drawing forth of material resources—is neatly summed up in “the three words, conquest, consolidation, and development.” The process of expansion has since brought our Indian empire into contact with Russia in one direction, with Tibet in another, and with China in a third. The work of unification is “slowly disclosing itself also as a unification of the Indian races.” The development of the empire by means of roads, railways, canals, harbours, and other public works, and by a grand scheme of state education, has not only bound the different provinces together, given to trade a mighty impulse, and created manufactures on a large scale, but it is also, it seems, slowly but surely tending to transform many different peoples into one nation. Such, at least, is Sir William’s reading of the times—a reading too speculative for present use. Without asking questions of the still distant future, it is enough to accept the fact that the India of to-day, in all its aspects, aims, and activities, is the legitimate offspring of Lord Dalhousie’s far-seeing and beneficent rule.

Having set forth the argument and described the man, Sir William in chapter iii. begins his historical retrospect of the work which Dalhousie accomplished in those eight years, at the sacrifice of his health, and, one might fairly say, of his life. The oft-told story of the conquest of the Punjab is told again, concisely of course, but clearly, vividly, with a happy skill of phrase and illustrative touches which impart to it a certain air of freshness. In the chapter that describes the process of consolidating the Punjab—an achievement which by itself would have made the fame of any Governor-General—the author brings out with especial clearness the shaping and governing influence of Dalhousie’s master-mind in all parts of the work accomplished by his able lieutenants. Dalhousie, says Sir William, “was not content with throwing a paper constitution at the heads of his subordinates.” Even after John Lawrence became Chief Commissioner “the mainspring of the Government of India’s policy in the Punjab was the Governor-General himself.” It was his “powerful, perhaps at times imperious, personality” which really made the Punjab what it became in 1857 under the strong and trusty subalterns who aided so zealously in working out his plans.

The same master-spirit revealed itself from the outset of the second Burmese War to the results which speedily followed the annexation of Lower Burma, converting “a vast ruined country into one of the most progressive and most prosperous provinces of Asia.” Chapters vi.—viii. set forth the principles on which Lord Dalhousie annexed so many native states within or close to the British-Indian frontiers. With regard to the doctrine of lapse, as applied to Sātara, Nagpur, Jhansi, and some other dependent states, Sir William shows convincingly how Dalhousie “merely carried out the declared law of the case, and the deliberately formulated policy of the Government of India, years before he arrived in the country.” This sentence, by the way, might have been more carefully worded, but the meaning is clear. The policy of absorption through lapse was anything but new in Dalhousie’s time. It had been formulated by the India House nearly twenty years before, and applied in several cases by two or three of Dalhousie’s predecessors. Lord Hardinge, indeed, very nearly applied it even to the powerful state of Indore. What Dalhousie did was to apply it uniformly to all strictly “dependent” states, as the occasion arose. And he enforced it with scrupulous respect for existing rights and claims, with a single eye to the principle which, as Sir William puts it,

“during his early manhood he had seen triumph in England—the principle which Englishmen of every political party now adopt.....the principle that Government is not designed for the profit of princes, but for the welfare of the people.”

In the India of those days native rule was far more of a curse than a blessing to nearly all classes of the people; and to bring the latter, whenever he could, within the British pale seemed to Dalhousie a sacred duty. It is sad to think of all “the foolish flying falsehoods” which afterwards represented the honest discharge of a statesman’s highest duty as a course of wanton spoliation.

In the case of Oudh, the last of his annexations, Dalhousie set aside his own views in deference to a positive command from the powers at home. He might, and ought, indeed, for his health’s sake, to have retired a year earlier, and he knew the odium which his obedience to the Court of Directors would bring upon him. But, in Sir William’s own words, “he had promised that, however the Court of Directors decided, he would incur the odium himself, instead of leaving it to be borne by the new Governor-General.”

The next three chapters give a succinct but picturesque review of Dalhousie’s administrative successes in the work of reorganizing and improving his enlarged empire. His scheme of government for the newly annexed provinces, his system of guaranteed railways and electric telegraphs, his cheap uniform postage, his zeal in carrying out Sir C. Wood’s educational programme, his commercial reforms, his new Department of Public Works, his financial achievements, are all carefully sketched within the compass of thirty-four pages. In his last chapter, dealing with Dalhousie’s military policy, Sir William quotes at due length from the Duke of Wellington’s memorandum on the famous dispute which led to Sir Charles Napier’s resignation in 1850. The great duke’s verdict was wholly against the Commander-in-chief; and the words in which he justifies Dalhousie at the expense of his own old comrade entirely refute “the foolish charges wafted about after the Mutiny in 1857, with reference to Lord Dalhousie’s alleged neglect of the symptoms of mutiny seven years previously.” The whole chapter, indeed, completely vindicates the great governor and prescient, high-minded statesman from all the rash charges to which Sir William refers.

Is it hypercritical, we wonder, to grumble at the author’s fondness for a collocation of words which we had thought peculiar to the new journalism? Is it elegant English to write “it is needful to distinctly realize the man”? or is a critic old-fashioned who prefers the older form “distinctly to realize the man” or “to realize the man distinctly”?

Poetry of the Anti-Jacobin. Edited, with Explanatory Notes, &c., by Charles Edmonds. Third Edition, considerably Enlarged. (Sampson Low & Co.)

ALTHOUGH it is long since the ‘Poetry of the Anti-Jacobin’ took its place as an English classic, a reprint properly edited was wanting. It is wanting still, notwithstanding that Mr. Edmonds has taken full six-and-thirty years to prepare his third edition. It is larger than the second, published in 1854, but that is a doubtful advantage. It is not growing, like a tree, in bulk, that doth make either man or book better be; and it would be hardly too much to go on and say that Mr. Edmonds’s work falls “a log at last, dry, bald and sere.” All, or, to make sure of keeping well within the mark, almost all that was bad in his earlier issues seems to be repeated, and the “additions to the present volume,” detailed in a separate list (for there is no new preface), are of the scantiest value, while in most cases such worth as they have is lessened by their being tacked on instead of being incorporated. In short, nothing could well be more slovenly than the manner in which the book has been sent out. The editing has almost every fault which editing can have. The text follows no particular edition, certainly none that is authoritative, and is full of misprints; no notice is taken of various readings, or of notes in the original dropped or modified in the reprint—indeed, there is no evidence that Mr. Edmonds has ever seen an original number of the Anti-Jacobin. The bibliography is defective. The editor’s notes are loaded with irrelevant, and deficient in relevant matter; a great many are unsupported by authorities or references, and the information they supply is scattered about the book in a manner which is distracting rather than helpful, while, to crown all other defects, there is no index. In this latter iniquity Mr. Edmonds sins in far too good and too numerous company, and authors and publishers will probably not mend their ways in this respect until an Act is passed denying copyright to books unfurnished with an index. The deficiency in this case is the more aggravating that Mr. Edmonds has rendered his table of contents all but unintelligible by burdening it with a mass of obsolete nonsense respecting the authorship of the pieces, a fault committed quite deliberately, seeing there is prefixed an avowal that much of the information obtruded is wrong. Most, if not all, of it seems to have rested on the authority of (1) a certain “E. Hawkins”; (2) on three copies of the ‘Poetry’ which are supposed to have belonged respectively to Canning, Lord Burghersh, and Wright, the publisher, but which nobody now living has seen; and (3) on “Information of W. Upcott, amanuensis”—this last probably oral, as no document is mentioned. All this stuff was exploded by the late Mr. Hayward in an article contributed to the Edinburgh Review for July, 1858 (reprinted in his ‘Essays,’ 2 vols., 1873), and it says much for Mr. Edmonds’s candour, and very little for his appreciation of his duties as an editor, that he reprints much of this article en bloc in his preliminary matter, instead of distributing the relevant parts of it in the shape of notes.

From a quotation made by Hayward from Mr. Edmonds's edition of 1854 (there is nothing about it in the present issue) we learn that "E. Hawkins" was "E. Hawkins, Esq., of the British Museum," and that Mr. Edmonds had no faith in the attributions made by that gentleman. Hayward goes on, in allusion presumably to some other passage of 1854 suppressed in this new edition:—

"We learn from Mr. Edmonds that almost all his authorities practically resolve themselves into one, the late Mr. Upcott, and that he never saw either of the alleged copies on which his informant relied. As regards the principal one, Canning's own, after the fullest inquiries among his surviving relatives and friends, we cannot discover a trace of its existence at any period. Lord Burghersh (the late Earl of Westmoreland) was under fourteen years of age during the publication of the Anti-Jacobin, and we very much doubt whether either the publisher or the amanuensis (be he who he may) was admitted to the complete confidence of the contributors."

Even Mr. Edmonds's ultimate authority, Mr. Upcott, is apparently wiped out by a discovery made by Hayward of a copy of the original Anti-Jacobin which came from the library of Marquess Wellesley (one of the contributors), and bearing on it the book-plate of a former possessor, "Charles William Flint," against whose name is pencilled "Confidential Amanuensis." Between the publication and republication of Hayward's essay there appeared the 'Works of J. Hookham Frere; with a Prefatory Memoir' (1872), in which statements were made regarding the authorship of several pieces of the poetry; but Hayward merely mentions in a foot-note the book and a review of it which appeared in the Edinburgh for April, 1872. This review of Frere's memoir adopted a most sceptical tone in dealing with the statements aforesaid, and whether Hayward was the reviewer or not, it is possible that he considered the tone of the article to be justified.

This question of authorship has been a vexed one from the beginning. There were obvious reasons for concealment, and the curiosity which was roused has never been satisfied. As regards a good many of the pieces curiosity died out, because of their inferior merit, but it survives in the case of a few which were the glory of the short-lived newspaper, and which have become classic—'The Inscription on Mrs. Brownrigg's Cell,' 'The Needy Knife-grinder,' 'The Soldier's Friend,' 'The Progress of Man,' 'The Loves of the Triangles,' and the 'New Morality.' All these, from the first, have been credited to Canning, or to Canning and Frere in collaboration, and it is quite probable that with regard to most of them, if we assume more or less help from George Ellis, the attributions are in the main correct.

No other of the pieces mentioned has been from the first so popular as 'The Friend of Humanity and the Knife-grinder,' and rumour has been persistent in attributing it to Canning or to Canning and Frere. Yet there is a strong possibility that it was written by neither, but by an undergraduate of Cambridge, one Peter Fraser, of whom no printed record remains save in the 'Diary and Reminiscences' of his friend Crabb Robinson (2 vols., 1872, i. 153, &c., ii. 232). There we learn that Fraser became Fellow of Corpus Christi College, principal leader-writer in the Times, and "prime adviser" of the second John Walter, during the first quarter of the century, and finally rector of Kegworth in Leicestershire. With Fraser, Robinson, as an important member of the staff of the Times, had intimate relations, which appear to have continued long after the two men had ceased to be colleagues. At their friendly dinners in the first decade of the century William Combe, now remembered only as the author of the trash entitled 'Dr. Syntax's Tours,' was a frequent guest. Robinson describes him as an excellent raconteur, but as having a weakness which habitually led him to stray far from the paths of strict veracity, and as one of several illustrations of this foible records the following story, in a passage which has not hitherto appeared in print. In the MS. the passage immediately precedes the last paragraph printed on p. 154 of the first volume:—

"One day (said Fraser) he [Combe] told me that he was the author of that quiz on Southey in the Anti-Jacobin—'Needy Knife-grinder, little think the proud ones.' Now I [Fraser] wrote that when I was an undergraduate at Cambridge. Indeed! why, I said, that was given to Canning. Yes, F. replied, but I wrote it. And what did you say to Combe? I looked him in the face and said, 'Indeed! I never expected to hear any man say he wrote that thing.'"

When, in 1852, Robinson revised the MS. of his 'Reminiscences,' he wrote in the margin against the above:—

"I am sorry to add that the authorship of this famous parody is claimed for Canning by Mr. Hamilton, the friend of him and Frere. He lives still in very old age. He married the eldest sister of my friends the Miss Allans. 13. 5. 52." There is some ambiguity in the language of this marginal note, for it might be read to mean either that Robinson was sorry at the discovery that his friend Fraser had told him a lie, or that Mr. Hamilton persisted in claiming the 'Knife-grinder' for Canning, to the injury of Fraser. But there can be little doubt that the latter idea was in Robinson's mind, and that he believed Fraser's story. Any theory which supposes that Fraser in telling the story was merely making fun of Robinson is open to the objection that it assumes Fraser to have been a liar, inasmuch as he did not deceive Robinson after a reasonable delay; and Robinson, one of the shrewdest and most sceptical of men, and an excellent judge of character, to have failed to suspect the truthfulness of an intimate companion. For Robinson invariably wrote of Fraser with respect, and never modified any of the entries regarding him, which he certainly would have done had he in 1852 readopted the opinion that Canning, and not Fraser, was the creator of the famous 'Knife-grinder.'

The point is not particularly important; but it is sufficiently interesting as such matters go, and the theory that Fraser wrote the verses does not affect the veracity of either Canning or Frere. There is no evidence that Canning ever claimed them (or anything else in the Anti-Jacobin), and Frere's representatives only state in a general way that they were included in memoranda of things in which he claimed some share. The conductors of the Anti-Jacobin constantly acknowledged and printed contributions from correspondents, anonymous and otherwise, and it need not be considered improbable that Fraser sent in the 'Knife-grinder' anonymously, and that Canning (or Canning and Frere) licked the undergraduate's verses into the exquisite shape in which they were presented to an admiring world—further, that Fraser, as an ambitious young man on his promotion, deemed it advisable to refrain from too noisily claiming a thing attributed by universal rumour to so magnificent a personage as the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs.

Any one possessing a competent knowledge of the literary and political world in which the Anti-Jacobin appeared, combined with habits of order and accuracy—acquirements and qualities in which Mr. Edmonds shows himself deficient—might find a task delightful to himself, and productive of results delightful and profitable to others, in thoroughly editing the whole of the original quarto Anti-Jacobin. Its prose and poetry illustrate one another, and there are a hundred notes omitted or modified in the collected edition of 1799 which are full of interest. A thorough study of the best of the parodies would probably do more to ascertain their authorship than all the dubious pencillings and memoranda which have been supplied to a curious and credulous world. Mr. Edmonds has done something towards heightening the interest in some of the parodies by putting alongside of them the originals parodied; but it has been done in an imperfect, and occasionally in a most blundering way, and has only been attempted in cases which involved no research. Much more remains to be accomplished by an editor who would take a little trouble. For instance, how much more enjoyable is Frere's famous description of the loves of Trochais and Smoke-Jack when over against

The spiral grooves in smooth meanders flow,
Drags the long chain, the polished axles glow,
While slowly circumploes the piece of beef below, we read Darwin's lines, describing Arkwright's spinning machinery, in the 'Loves of the Plants' (canto ii. lines 99-104):—

Slow, with soft lips, the whirling can acquires
The tender skeins, and wraps in rising spires;
With quickened pace successive rollers move,
And these retain, and those extend the rove;
Then fly the spoles, the rapid axles glow,
And slowly circumploes the labouring wheel below.

In connexion with this passage Hayward tells what he calls "a well-authenticated anecdote," that when Frere had completed it to the point just quoted, he took it to Canning and defied him to improve on it. Canning took the pen and added:—

The conscious fire with bickering radiance burns,
Eyes the rich joint, and roasts it as it turns.

Hayward then states: "These two lines are now blended with the original text, and constitute, we are informed on the best authority, the only flaw in Frere's title to the sole authorship of the first part. The Second and Third parts were by Canning."

Two remarks are suggested by this story. As regards the authorship, it is not in accordance with tradition or with the claims put forward by Frere's representatives—but that is of little importance, seeing everything is in confusion. What is of more significance is that it shows that Hayward never referred to the original Anti-Jacobin, where he would have found "these two lines blended" in the first version printed. Unfortunately it is not the only evidence of laxity in Hayward's practice. When dealing with 'The Rovers' he accepts without inquiry a ridiculous statement made (on no quoted authority) by Mr. Edmonds regarding the composition of the famous 'Matilda Pottingen' song. It is to the effect that when the song had only the first five stanzas, written by Canning, and "before its publication," it was accidentally seen by Pitt, who "took up a pen and composed the last stanza on the spot." A glance at the number of the Anti-Jacobin for June 4th, 1798, in which the song was first printed, would have shown that it contained but five stanzas. The sixth first made its appearance in the collected edition of the following year, and there is no evidence as to its authorship. Hayward also mistakes the allusion in a letter of Southey to Wynn, August 15th, 1798:—

"I know not what poor Lamb has done to be croaking there. What I think the worst part of the Anti-Jacobin abuse is the lumping together men of such opposite principles; this was stupid."

The allusion is very palpably to Gillray's caricature in the Anti-Jacobin Review and Magazine for August, 1798, in which Lamb and Lloyd were represented as a toad and a frog respectively, "croaking" vigorously from a paper bearing the legend, "Blank Verse, by Toad and Frog." The caricature, however, was founded on the passage in the Anti-Jacobin poem (afterwards named 'New Morality') which included the silly lines "lumping together" Lamb and Le Paux. The boyish recklessness of the Anti-Jacobins is the more conspicuous in this particular stanza as the preceding one accused their opponents of the sin they were themselves committing—"throwing dirt on private worth and virtue."

Mr. Edmonds shows that he is acquainted with the Anti-Jacobin Review, but he has overlooked something in its quotation from the Anti-Jacobin which should have appeared in his notes to the 'New Morality.' The Review boldly supplies names to blanks left in the original, thus:—

"With E-sk-e, G-y, and C-r-t-y in thy train,
And W-tb-d" wallowing in the yeasty main—
Still as ye snort, and puff, and spout and blow,
In puffing and in spouting, praise LEPAUX!"

"* The initials of the four names contained in these two lines do not appear in the original. If any of our readers object to the letters which we have introduced by way of supplying what to us appeared as a defect, they are requested to substitute in their place, such others as, to them, may appear more appropriate."

The names, however (though probably genuine enough), were not adopted in the reprints of the 'Poetry of the Anti-Jacobin.'

The absurdity of thrusting Lamb into such a bear garden was hardly greater, however, than that of introducing Coleridge. In Coleridge's case there was meanness as well as absurdity; for only three months before he had published and signed with his name in the Morning Post (April 16th, 1798) the magnificent poem now known to us as the 'Ode to France,' but which was then printed with the politically significant title of 'The Recantation.' The attack of the French Republic on the liberties of Switzerland had opened his eyes to its apostasy to the cause of freedom, and he lost no time in withdrawing his sympathies, and taking sides with the Anti-Jacobin on the main point of its policy. That its astute, but ungenerous conductors did not fail to notice the poem in the Morning Post is made clear by the remarks regarding that journal which appeared in the Anti-Jacobin for April 23rd:—

"We have lately had occasion to make a distinction [as regards the other Opposition papers] in favour of that paper.....The Morning Post alone has shrunk from our severity, reformed its Principles in some material points, and in more than one of its last columns held a language which the Whig Club, and Corresponding Society will not soon forgive."

Of course, there is nothing of all this in Mr. Edmonds's notes, but he shows he has heard of the 'Ode to France' by making a blunder about it in the preface (alike in 1852, 1854, and 1890), Coleridge being represented as having written his recantation ode nearly a year before the incidents which provoked it and were condemned in it in plain language had taken place. Nor does Mr. Edmonds appear to be aware that the Anti-Jacobins were not the first to see the fun of Southey's dactylic 'Soldier's Wife,' for he makes no mention of Lamb's excellent and well-known parody sent to Coleridge in acknowledgment of a MS. copy of the verses submitted to him in June, 1796 (Ainger's 'Lamb's Letters,' i. 26). But he is good enough to give us copies both of Southey's sapphics and dactyls, characteristically, however, frustrating his good intentions by supplying (with misprints) texts which had no existence when any of the parodies were made. But to note all the sins of omission and commission in this deplorable book would be to rewrite it.

NOVELS OF THE WEEK.

The Burnt Million. By James Payn. 3 vols. (Chatto & Windus.)

Lady Faint-Heart. By H. B. Marriott-Watson. 3 vols. (Chapman & Hall.)

When We were Boys. By William O'Brien, M.P. (Longmans & Co.)

The Conspirator: a Romance of Real Life. By Count Paul P.—. Edited by Frank Harkut. 2 vols. (Sampson Low & Co.)

Mr. Spivey's Clerk. By J. S. Fletcher. (Ward & Downey.)

Wildwater Terrace. By Reginald E. Salwey. 2 vols. (Digby & Long.)

Joshua. By G. Ebers. Translated by C. and M. Bell. 2 vols. (Sampson Low & Co.)

The Mynns' Mystery. By George Manville Fenn. (Warne & Co.)

Honneur d'Artiste. Par Octave Feuillet. (Paris, Calmann Lévy.)

MR. PAYN has written brighter and more interesting stories than 'The Burnt Million.' It is eminently a book for skipping; that is to say, a book in which many passages might be skipped without losing the substance and savour of the story. The story itself proceeds on very familiar lines. Of course Mr. Payn writes well, but 'The Burnt Million' is terribly uneven. The first volume arouses expectation, the second allows one's interest to flag, and the third leaves behind it an impression of wishy-washy heroes and heroines and highly coloured pictures of crime.

'Lady Faint-Heart' is the title of an intense young woman, Millicent Hetherdene, who lives with her father in the country, and nurses deep thoughts about the poor in the East-End of London, and lets all her numerous admirers know the currents of her soul. Her story, as recounted by Mr. Marriott-Watson, is full of love scenes, proposals, and refusals; but perhaps the conscious and unconscious fun of the book is more frequently conspicuous than its sentiment or serious purpose. At any rate, it is entertaining to read, and abounds in such picturesque touches of external nature as "the pish of a snowflake fizzling in the mud" and "cows on the glassy slopes." Poor Millicent cannot help making herself a little ridiculous now and then; and she has a severe if useful lesson when she is persuaded to publish a little book telling people in general 'How to Think' on the graver questions of the day. A mischievous friend gets hold of her proofs, and introduces a series of notes which convert her literary and philosophic essay into palpable nonsense. The basis of human interest in 'Lady Faint-Heart' is not particularly pleasant; but the tale is brought to a legitimate and satisfactory conclusion.

Mr. O'Brien's novel is undoubtedly a considerable performance, commanding attention by reason of other qualities besides its inordinate length. It is theatrical, thrilling, and eloquent with that unbridled eloquence which deals in extravagant metaphor and effusive sentiment. On his native soil Mr. O'Brien is on comparatively safe ground; but although a large proportion of the dramatis personæ are Irish, hardly any type of English society is unrepresented in his kaleidoscopic panorama. Mr. O'Brien plunges boldly into Mayfair, and introduces us to the denizens of Clubland and the frequenters of Newmarket. He reproduces the slang of the subaltern, the argot of the boulevardier, the dialect of the London cabman, the exaltation of the mystic, and the arch babble of the skittish spinster of uncertain age. The novel might be described as a drama in four acts—education, flirtation, agitation, and transportation. Strange to say, the scene of the story is within a few miles of that chosen by Mr. Froude in his recent romance, 'The Two Chiefs of Dunboy.' But it is needless to remark that, although they are both full of enthusiasm for the scenery of a romantic neighbourhood, the methods of the two writers have not much in common. There was no love-making in Mr. Froude's tale; there is a great deal in Mr. O'Brien's, though its course is of a thorny nature. His women are almost uniformly adorable. They have "warbling" voices, "sumptuous" eyes, "luminous" figures, and "peachy" cheeks. But the men are of varying degrees of goodness, ranging from the saintly Father Phil to the mephistophelean agent who plays Chopin and hurls crockery at his woman-kind. Lord Drumshaughlin, the heroine's "droll papa," with his trembling white hand and gouty great toe, is an eminently conventional type of the absentee peer; but with true Hibernian generosity Mr. O'Brien has depicted in the daughter of this selfish and dissipated old rake a miracle of transcendent loveliness and seraphic purity. It is in truth a noble revenge on his opponents to represent the possibility of such an angel as Mabel Westropp being nursed in the lap of landlordism. But there is no moderation in our author's method. Of artistic reserve or reticence or restraint he knows not the rudiments. His own likes and dislikes emerge with transparent clearness at every turn of the story. This is chiefly due to Mr. O'Brien's extraordinary exuberance of epithets. Everything is labelled, often twice or three times over, so that the reader is in no danger of forgetting for a single instant what he is expected to think of it. Mr. O'Brien never stands aside. Rather does he stand over his reader, exhorting, rebuking, or threatening. There is no escape from the author, and this it is which renders the book so fatiguing apart from its wordiness. In the dialogue he strains after point and epigram, but the talkers do not converse; they make speeches. In his descriptions of scenery Mr. O'Brien is often really eloquent, but the colours are laid on with so lavish a brush as to remind one of his own strange comparison of an Alpine valley to a "live chromolithograph," though a live oleograph would be nearer the mark in this case. To sum up, Mr. O'Brien has written a feverish, but vivid sketch of Ireland in the sixties. We doubt if it will live, however, for it lacks four notable essentials in a classic—repose, restraint, humour, and virility. Indeed, feminine effusiveness is so strongly marked a characteristic of the work that it might be fairly nicknamed 'When We were Girls.'

'The Conspirator' is apparently a veracious story; and indeed Mr. Harkut plainly vouches for its veracity. The prologue gives an account of certain incidents in the Polish rising of 1864—a chapter of "Russian horrors" on which the remainder of the narrative is made to turn. The book is vividly written, and abounds in excitements of various kinds. There are plots, treacheries, murders, revenges, treasures, and sacrifices more than sufficient to fill up two volumes of genuine romance. Similar stories have been told before, both as fiction and as unvarnished fact; but it must be admitted that Count Paul P—— had good warrant for painting these pictures of "real life," and presenting them in an English setting to the novel-reading public.

The story of Tom Christmas, as told by his friend Leonard Tempest, and reported by Mr. Fletcher, is on very old lines, and full of reminiscences; but at the same time it is pathetic and picturesque. The hero is at Oxford when his father dies, and the best thing he can do for himself and his mother is to become a clerk to Mr. Spivey, the publisher, at one pound a week. He has a handsome friend of the Steerforth type, and a sweetheart who might be described as a middle-class Little Em'ly. The tale is soon told. It is a mere sketch, and ends inconclusively enough so far as Mr. Spivey's clerk is concerned.

In 'Wildwater Terrace' there is more of attempted villainy than of actually perpetrated crime, and more of suggested mystery than of mystification. The bad people act for the most part without adequate motive, and this might suffice to account for their want of success in the deadlier sorts of criminality. The fact is that Mr. Salwey weaves a terrible piece of mystery, and the reader who follows it in the making will certainly get a great deal of entertainment out of it; but it may be questioned whether any reader will let himself be drawn as far as the point where listless attention ends, and the shudder of genuine interest comes in.

It seems to have become inevitable that every year should bring a novel from Prof. Ebers's pen, and every year, truth obliges us to state, these novels grow feebler. The learned author's latest effort is entitled 'Joshua,' and retells in his peculiar fashion the story of the Exodus. According to his own words,

"he has endeavoured by means of the actors in his tale.....to make the mighty destinies of the people he has described more humanly real to the sympathetic reader. If he has succeeded in this, without seeming to dwarf the splendid narrative of the Bible [the italics are ours], he has attained his end; if he has failed, he must rest content with the pleasure and personal exaltation he has enjoyed while composing the work."

The want of logic, the unlimited self-complacency of the last sentence, are ill calculated to dispose a reader of critical faculty and good taste in Prof. Ebers's favour, nor will the perusal of the novel dispel the unfavourable impression made by the preface. 'Joshua' is a modern German soldiering romance, disguised under the Egyptian and Hebrew rags and masquerading dresses of some costumier's shop. We have here the fascinating young lieutenant (Joshua), the major, the colonel of the regiment, the garrison town, the young ladies who share the views and tastes of the Grande Duchesse de Gerolstein. For our own part we prefer the Bible version, and we much suspect that English readers will agree with us.

Mr. Fenn has unfortunately not thought it worth while to take much trouble over a plot for 'The Mynns' Mystery.' He has appropriated not so much another man's plot as a plot which has served the purpose of a dozen novelists before him, and, engrafting an extra murder upon it, has contrived to introduce a certain element of novelty into his narrative. Mr. Fenn has some very coarse and unpleasant characters to deal with; but as they are his own creations, he has less reason to complain of the fact than his readers might have. Unrelieved villainy is rampant through a large portion of 'The Mynns' Mystery,' and there is little to soften its acerbity.

In his 'Honneur d'Artiste' M. Octave Feuillet departs widely from the style of his later books, and returns to that which made him famous in 'Monsieur de Camors.' The volume is less well written than his other novels, but is a powerful sensational story, not, perhaps, in some points very like real life, but not anywhere departing so widely from it as to shock the hardened novel-reader.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

Those who are induced by the author's name, the rough-cut edges, and the "buckram" suit to expect a further instalment of Scotch sketches after 'Mansie Wauch' will at first feel disappointment in Mr. Barrie's latest volume, My Lady Nicotine (Hodder & Stoughton). But it will be but momentary. The ant has turned the spider, telam ex se conficit, or rather out of the fumes of his inimitable briar. Yet not Kingsley or Calverley would disdain the precious uses he has evolved from smoke, and the late Lord Iddesleigh could not have lectured better upon "nothing." These graceful trifles are most of them familiar to those who duly read their St. James's

Gazette, yet the form is a little changed, and we fancy one or two of the chapters are new. Let us give an example or two. Some reflections on barbel fishing strike our fancy:—

"You know how you fish from a house-boat. The line is flung into the water and the rod laid down on deck. You keep an eye on it. Barbel fishing, in fact, reminds one of the independent sort of man who is quite willing to play host to you, but wishes you clearly to understand at the same time that he can do without you. 'Glad to see you with us if you have nothing better to do; but please yourself,' is what he says to his friends. This is also the form of invitation to barbel."

But one of the devotees of the "Arcadia Mixture" commemorated in this book was so eager to play the host that he played his barbel for ten minutes in the middle of a proposal of marriage, and so gained the fish, but lost the lady. Another good story of the brotherhood is that of Jimmy, noted at Oxford for his satiric pen, to whom his friends attribute the most sardonic of Saturday articles until they find he is the authority on canaries and white mice known as "Uncle Jim" by the infant readers of the Mother's Pets magazine. The letters from Primus to his uncle—the specious Primus, who spends his holidays in making the footman "walk the plank," chasing the sheep in Hyde Park, and fighting the shoeblack, and renders such an excellent epistolary account of how he "made home happy" during the vacation—are none the worse on second reading. It is probably quite true that the "ambition to blow rings is the most ignoble known to man," yet the mental effect of smoking has the most serious results. The reticence induced by the Arcadia Mixture is on the whole beneficent in its effects, yet it is apt to lead to complications. The tangled web of deception into which the writer was betrayed by declining on principle to correct the friend who took him for a mythical brother Henry (himself under a wrong name) is the subject of a humbling narrative. Altogether there is much admirable fooling in this book, not without a touch of sadness; as when the writer, married, but divorced from his earliest love, places the now empty briar between his teeth, and nightly listens to the man next door, whom he has never seen, but recognizes by his knocking out the ashes against the neighbouring fireplace.

THE reissue by Mr. Unwin of Trelawny's Adventures of a Younger Son, with an introduction by Mr. Edward Garnett, forms a good commencement of the "Adventure Series." The book had become rather scarce. It makes a slightly volume, illustrated with a few portraits and other subjects, but not with any designs immediately pertinent to the text. We need hardly be at the pains of explaining that Trelawny's 'Adventures of a Younger Son' takes the form of a romantic personal narrative, based no doubt upon the facts of his early nautical career, but not professing to exclude some considerable intermixture of fiction; and in reality the fictions were rather liberally introduced. According to Mr. Garnett, whose prefatory notice is judiciously drawn up and ably written, it is not even true that Trelawny was ever an officer in the British navy; "there is a document," he says, "now in the possession of his family, which shows that he never held warrant or commission in the navy." Though this statement upsets one's antecedent notions on the subject, it is on the whole satisfactory, as it relieves Trelawny from the grave imputation of having deserted his post as a British naval officer in order that he might serve in a privateer furnished with letters of marque from Napoleon. The 'Adventures of a Younger Son' is an eminently stimulating book, full of life, energy, and the passion of enterprise, and written, not indeed with regularity either of plan or of diction, but with a splendid vividness which could only come from a man of great capacity, and born to make his mark with pen in hand no less than with sword or firearm. Mr. Garnett gives a good sketch of Trelawny's life from first to last, coming to closer quarters with the facts than any previous account. Much, however, would remain to be done in this way before his career could be adequately grasped and analyzed. The general view of Mr. Garnett is that Trelawny was theatrical in character and demeanour, yet genuine to boot. We are not so sure that he ought to be accounted theatrical. A man who has thrown off the trammels of society, and who constantly and defiantly acts from impulse and passionate will, with a thorough love of liberty and no disposition to compromise or conciliate—and such a man was Trelawny—may strike other people as theatrical without being so in his own person. Contemplated as a figure in our literary history, he seems to have been born to intensify the romance in the most romantic group of our poets, Byron and Shelley, with Mrs. Shelley in their company. Without Trelawny, Byron would, perhaps, never have gone to Greece and died there before middle age; and Shelley, though drowned, would not have had a Greek cremation. It is remarkable that, as the biographer of these extraordinary men, Trelawny was at least as realistic as he was picturesque: he had the seeing eye for them, and the demonstrative hand.

It is Mr. Lodge's opinion that, despite all the books which have been written about Washington, he "is still not understood—as a man he is unfamiliar to the posterity that reverences his memory." The attempt made by Mr. Lodge to set forth the man George Washington is highly commendable, and a large part of the performance deserves praise. When noticing Mr. Lodge's 'Short History of the English Colonies in America' (Athenæum, No. 2808), we wrote in strong terms about the industry and care which he had displayed, and his George Washington (Sampson Low) is a still more favourable example of conscientious labour. In addition to belonging to the class of educated young Bostonians, Mr. Lodge is a member of the House of Representatives, and it has been supposed that men of his type would help to lighten Congress. But though well educated and well read, Mr. Lodge is a fierce Anglophobe. It is quite permissible for him to dislike this country at the present day; but it appears childish spite for him to disparage it in bygone years because he disapproves of the treatment which some Americans received. If the ancestors of Mr. Lodge in the direct line had been the victims of British ill treatment he might continue to resent it, though there is something petty in importing personal grievances into historical biographies. But we cannot see any excuse for Mr. Lodge writing at p. 6 of the first volume, "Englishmen, the most unsparring censors of everything American, have paid homage to Washington"; or, p. 79, that "there is something very instructive in this early revolt against the stupid arrogance which England has always thought it wise to display towards this country." This is said in reference to Washington's objection to be ranked below the officers of the regulars. A good many countries are guilty of equal arrogance, as in them militia officers are out-ranked by those of the line. Even an officer whose commission has been gained at West Point may deserve some superiority over a militia officer in the United States. At p. 196 our author says: "The English were thoroughly satisfied that the colonists were cowards and were sure to be defeated, no matter what the actual facts might be." This is as foolish a sentence as the utterance of the Earl of Sandwich upon which it is based. Mr. Lodge goes on in a tone which cannot be styled polite: "Rude contempt for other people is a warming and satisfying feeling, no doubt, and the English have had unquestionably great satisfaction from its free indulgence." At p. 25 of the second volume he refers to one of Washington's letters to Jay and others, wherein he "analyzed the designs of England, rightly detecting a settled policy on her part to injure and divide when she had failed to conquer." At p. 90 we read that "the English, with their usual thoughtfulness, incited the Indians to claim the Ohio as their boundary, which meant war and murderous assaults on all our people travelling on the river." At p. 99, England "had redoubled her efforts to injure the United States by every sort of petty outrage both on sea and land." At p. 133, Washington "saw that England, taking advantage of our failure to completely fulfil our obligations under the treaty, had openly violated hers." And in this case the violation was quite as gross and as open on the one side as on the other. The United States had undertaken that Englishmen who were guilty of nothing more heinous than of being creditors of citizens of the United States should be reimbursed, while the forts had not been ceded because this reimbursement was denied. The only credit Mr. Lodge gives to England is that she could not be charged with the "evasion and delay" of Spain; yet, while not blameworthy in this way, England displayed "more arrogance and bad temper" than Spain. This bitterness of Mr. Lodge's causes him to produce bad literature and bad history, and we have dwelt upon this blot in his book in the hope that, when his attention is called to it, he will not allow it to sully other editions. If he be in grim earnest, so much the worse for him.

MR. ANDREW LANG has reprinted his studies in epistolary parody from the St. James's Gazette, and issued them under the title of Old Friends (Longmans & Co.), with an introductory paper on 'Friends in Fiction.' Unfortunately for the parodies this essay is the best thing in the book; but it makes the reader expect too much. As in historical novels the characters meet real people, why, says Mr. Lang, should not contemporaries in fiction be made to meet each other? And then in a very charming and easy manner he talks over the possibilities of his suggestion, and the nature of the qualities which make fictitious characters real and endear them to us. Coming to the parodies, one soon discovers that many writers could have written a few of them not less well than Mr. Lang, though perhaps no one else could have written them all. By his own showing he has forced upon himself the necessity of being humorous; in most cases he has barely succeeded in being funny. To be sure, the literary part of the task is admirably executed. The style of each writer is imitated as cleverly as a clever boy will imitate the style of a Greek or Latin author. It is, moreover, hardly necessary to say that Mr. Lang is always sprightly, jocular, and ready in allusion. But to sit down with the determination to be humorous is a terrible undertaking, and it is impossible to admit that Mr. Lang has succeeded more than once or twice.

As a novelist Sidney Luska (Mr. Henry Harland) has done some good work; but by publishing some shorter pieces, the longest of which gives the title to his new volume, A Latin-Quarter Courtship (Cassell & Co.), he has not done himself justice. These stories are not at all above the level of magazine tales.

WE are able unreservedly to praise the issue of the Statesman's Year Book for 1890, which reaches us from Messrs. Macmillan. The editor is again Mr. Scott Keltie, and he has in the present year rearranged the work, placing first the United Kingdom, followed by its dependencies. Next come the foreign countries in alphabetical order, the former clumsy arrangement under continents having been abandoned. We have looked hard for downright errors, and have not succeeded in finding any. One of the heads under which information is supposed to be given as far as possible for each country is "Pauperism"; but very little information is afforded upon the subject. In Switzerland, for example, the head "Pauperism" is entirely omitted, although the Poor Laws of the various cantons are most curious and interesting. The editor of such a work must, of course, be constantly on the watch to prevent its growing too large for usefulness. The catalogue of the books of reference is perhaps, on the whole, the least satisfactory portion of an excellent publication: in the lists concerning France and New Zealand, for instance, there are some remarkable omissions.

The Year-Book of Scientific Societies (Griffin & Co.) is still open to criticism. No notice is taken of the publications of the Ballad Society, the Chaucer Society, or the Early English Text Society, although we complained of the omission last year; and the editor still talks of the Manchester Spenser Society. Why cannot he give societies their right names?

East and West has reappeared at a shilling, improved in appearance and fortified by two new stories, one by Mr. Norris, the other by Mrs. E. Stuart Phelps and the Rev. H. D. Ward. 'Cosette' is concluded in this number. Mr. Heinemann is now the publisher of the magazine.

THE catalogues on our table are those of Mrs. Bennett, Mr. Baker (theology), Mr. Galwey (good), Mr. Gray, Mr. Hayes (Methodist books), Mr. Irvine, Messrs. Jarvis & Son (good), Messrs. Sotheman & Co. (good), and Mr. Stibbs (fairly good). Messrs. Sotheman have also sent us a catalogue of works in political economy. Mr. Downing, Mr. Hitchman, the Midland Educational Company, and Mr. Thistlewood of Birmingham, Messrs. Fawn & Co. of Bristol (fair), Mr. Murray of Derby, Mr. Baxendale, Mr. Brown (good), and Mr. Cameron (good) of Edinburgh, Mr. Miles of Leeds, Mr. Underwood of Leicester, Messrs. Young & Sons and Mr. Potter of Liverpool, and Messrs. Jarrold & Son of Norwich have forwarded their catalogues. Three excellent catalogues of autographs have reached us from M. Charavay; two catalogues from M. Stargardt, and one from M. Lissa, of Berlin.

WE have on our table Striking Events in Irish History, by C. F. Dowsett (Kegan Paul & Co.),—Nyassaland: Travel-Sketches in our New Protectorate, selected from 'Tropical Africa,' by H. Drummond (Hodder & Stoughton),—Livy, Book XXI., adapted from Mr. Capes's Edition, with Notes and Vocabulary by J. E. Melhuish (Macmillan),—Longman's School Composition, by D. Salmon (Longmans),—Modern French Readings, with Helps for Composition, edited by A. J. Smith (Ginn & Co.),—Public School Music Course, by C. E. Whiting, Books I. to VI. (Boston, U.S., Heath & Co.),—Catalogue of the Fossil Mammalia in the British Museum, Natural History, by R. Lydekker, Parts II. to V. (Trustees of the British Museum),—Boyhood, Adolescence, and Youth, by L. Tolstol, translated by C. Popoff (Stock),—By the World Forgot, by E. J. Clayden (Warne),—Random Shots at Living Targets, by H. W. Holley (Funk & Wagnalls),—and Strange Clients, and other Tales, by S. de Havilland (Liffes & Son). Among New Editions we have Forestalled, by M. Betham-Edwards (Spencer Blackett),—With the Harrises Seventy Years Ago, by the Author of 'The Subaltern' (Allen & Co.),—Life and Letters of William Fleming Stevenson, M.D., by his Wife (Nelson),—and Scaramouch in Nazos, Plays by J. Davidson (Fisher Unwin). Also the following Pamphlets: The Future of British Law, by E. Jenks (Melbourne, Robertson),—Nyassaland, by the Rev. H. Waller (Stanford),—Modes of Painting, by J. S. Taylor (Winsor & Newton),—Cornwall as a Winter Resort (Plymouth, Brendon),—On London Fogs, by A. Carpenter, M.D. (Croydon, Ward),—The Effect of Town Life on the General Health, by J. P. Williams-Freeman, M.D. (Allen & Co.),—Israelite and Indian: a Parallel in Planes of Culture, by G. Mallory (New York, Appleton),—and The Irish University Question, Addresses delivered by the Rev. Dr. Walsh (Dublin, Gill).

LIST OF NEW BOOKS.

ENGLISH.

Theology.

- Farrar's (Rev. F. W.) Lives and Times of the Minor Prophets, cr. 8vo, 2/6 cl.
 Kirkham's (H.) The Open-Air Preacher's Handbook, containing Preparation for Preaching, &c., cr. 8vo, 2/ cl.
 Mehuvi El Havi's From Strength to Strength, Lessons for the Use of Jewish Children, cr. 8vo, 3/6 cl.
 Moule's (H. C. G.) Veni Creator, Thoughts on the Person and Work of the Holy Spirit of Promise, cr. 8vo, 5/ cl.
 Bowter's (G. A.) From Heart to Heart, Sermons, cr. 8vo, 3/ cl.
 Tweddell's (P.) The Soul in Conflict, cr. 8vo, 6/ cl.
 Walsh's (W. P.) The Voices of the Psalms, cr. 8vo, 5/ cl.
 Wider Hope (The), Essays and Strictures on the Doctrine and Literature of Future Punishment, cr. 8vo, 7/6 cl.

Law.

- Phillips's (G. J.) The Tramways Act, 1870, with Introductory Notes, &c., cr. 8vo, 5/ cl.

Fine Art.

- Artistic Japan, Illustrations and Essays collected by S. Bing, Vol. 3, roy. 4to 15/.
 Furniss's (Harry) Royal Academy Antics, illustrated, 2/6 bds.

Poetry and the Drama.

- Bonar's (H.) Until the Day Breaks, and other Hymns and Poems left Behind, cr. 8vo, 5/ cl.
 Shakespeare's Tragedy of Coriolanus, edited by H. C. Beeching, 12mo, 2/ cl.

Philosophy.

- Jevons's (W. S.) Pure Logic, and other Minor Works, edited by R. Adamson and H. Jevons, 8vo, 10/6 cl.
 Rickaby's (J.) General Metaphysics, cr. 8vo, 5/ cl.
 Warner's (F.) Lectures on the Growth and Means of Training the Mental Faculty, 12mo, 4/6 cl.

History and Biography.

- Diary of John Evelyn, Esq., F.R.S., from 1641 to 1705, edited by W. Bray, Esq., 8vo, 7/6 cl.
 Forbes's (A.) Havelock, cr. 8vo, 2/ cl.
 Green's (J. R.) Short History of the English People, Pt. 4, 3/ Living Leaders of the World, illustrated, 4to, 21/ cl.
 Rutledge's (H. A.) Beethoven, cr. 8vo, 3/ cl.
 Shuttle's (Rev. J. R.) The Works of Flavius Josephus (Whiston's Translation), Vols. 4 and 5, cr. 8vo, 3/ each, cl.
 Wordsworth (Christopher), Bishop of Lincoln, Life of, by J. H. Overton and E. Wordsworth, cheap ed., 7/6 cl.

Geography and Travel.

- Gale & Polden's Military Atlas, 26 Maps printed in Colours, imp. 16mo, 2/ cl.
 Kent's (H. B.) Graphic Sketches of the West, cr. 8vo, 5/ cl.
 Leland's (L.) Travelling Alone, a Woman's Journey around the World, cr. 8vo, 6/ cl.
 Levey's (G. C.) Handy Guide to the River Plate, including the Argentine Republic, with Map, cr. 8vo, 2/ swd.
 Russell's (A.) Glimpses of Eastern Cities, Past and Present, cr. 8vo, 2/6 cl.
 Smith's (F. H.) Through Abyssinia, an Envoy's Ride to the King of Zion, cr. 8vo, 7/6 cl.

Philology.

- Plutarch's Lives of Galba and Otho, with Introduction and Explanatory Notes by E. G. Hardy, 12mo, 6/ cl.
 Travel Talk in Italy, a Manual of English and Italian Conversation, compiled by Prof. M. Field, 2/ cl.

Science.

- Bishop's (E. S.) Lectures on Nurses on Antiseptics in Surgery, cr. 8vo, 2/ bds.
 Church's (A. H.) Chemistry of Paints and Painting, 5/ cl.
 Dalziel's (H.) The Diseases of Horses, their Pathology, 2/ cl.
 Fleming's (G.) Practical Horse-Keeping, cr. 8vo, 3/6 cl.
 Stirling's (W.) Outlines of Practical Histology, a Manual for Students, cr. 8vo, 12/6 cl.

General Literature.

- Allen's (C. B.) London Medical Specialists, a Classified List of Names, &c., cr. 8vo, 2/6 cl.
 Bailey's (G.) Fabian Fossil, a Romance of Love and Crime, cr. 8vo, 2/6 cl.
 Blackall's (C. H.) Builders' Hardware, imp. 16mo, 25/ cl.
 Böhm-Bawerk's (E. V.) Capital and Interest, trans. by W. Smart, 8vo, 14/ cl.
 Clarke's (C.) Love's Loyalty, 2 vols. cr. 8vo, 21/ cl.
 Croker's (Mrs. J.) Diana Barrington, cr. 8vo, 2/ bds.
 Dickens's (C.) Dombey and Son, with 40 Illustrations, Crown Edition, 8vo, 5/ cl.
 Dyan's (Mrs.) The Stories of the Trees, cr. 8vo, 3/6 cl.
 Ellis's (A. B.) West African Stories, cr. 8vo, 6/ cl.
 Ellis's (H.) The Criminal, illustrated, cr. 8vo, 3/6 cl.
 English Epigrams, selected and arranged by W. D. Adams, cr. 8vo, 2/6 cl.
 Fun from Life, imp. 16mo, 5/ bds.
 Haggard's (R.) Beatrice, cr. 8vo, 6/ cl.
 Hutton's (J.) By Order of the Czar, 3 vols. cr. 8vo, 31/6 cl.
 Hungerford's (F. H.) British Difficulties under Solution, 2/.
 Jefferson's (J. C.) Cutting for Partners, 3 vols. cr. 8vo, 31/6 cl.
 Lytton's (Earl of) The Ring of Amasis, a Romance, 3/6 cl.
 May's (A.) Laura Montrose, or Prejudice and Pride, 3/6 cl.
 Moore's (T.) How to be Married in All Ways and Everywhere, cr. 8vo, 2/6 cl.
 O'Halloran's (A.) Chance? or Fate? 12mo, 2/ bds.
 Paladine's Glances at Great and Little Men, cr. 8vo, 6/ cl.
 Pargant's (J. E.) Homes of Taste, post 8vo, 2/6 cl.
 Sargent's (C. H.) Urban Rating, being an Inquiry into the Incidence of Local Taxation in Towns, 8vo, 6/ cl.
 Taylor's (C. J.) In the "400" and Out, ob. 4to, 5/ cl.
 Vogel's (Sir J.) Anno Domini 2000, or Woman's Destiny, cheaper edition, cr. 8vo, 2/ bds.
 Warde's (F.) St. Catherine's Tower, cr. 8vo, 5/ cl.
 Wells's (E. H.) Saved by a Looking-Glass, cr. 8vo, 3/6 cl.
 Wells's (R.) Ornamental Confectionery, a Guide-Book for Bakers, Confectioners, &c., cr. 8vo, 5/ cl, gilt.
 Wilkins's (M.) A Far-away Melody, 32mo, 2/ cl.

FOREIGN.

Theology.

- Darmesteter (J.) La Légende Divine, 3fr. 50.
 Fessler (J.) Institutiones Patrologiæ, ed. B. Jungmann, Vol. 1, 6m.

Fine Art and Archaeology.

- Jahrbuch d. K. Deutschen Archäologischen Instituts, Vol. 5, 16m.
 Quellenschriften f. Kunstgeschichte d. Mittelalters u. der Neuzeit, hrsg. v. A. Ig. Vol. 3, 14m.
 Robert (C.) Die Antiken Sarkophag-Reliefs, Vol. 2, 225m.

Poetry and the Drama.

- Montégut (É.) Dramaturges et Romanciers, 3fr. 50.
 Œuvres de Léon Valade, 6fr.
 Théâtre de Musset, Dessins de Delort, Préface de Jules Lemaitre, Vol. 2, 25fr.

Philosophy.

- Krause (K. C. F.) Das Eigentümliche der Wesenlehre, 6m.
 Spiegel (J. S.) Geschichte der Philosophie d. Judenthums, 8m.

History and Biography.

- Hérissou (Cte. d') Un Drame Royal, 3fr. 50.
 Lair (J.) Nicolas Fouquet, 2 vols, 16fr.
 Maugras (J.) Journal d'un Étudiant pendant la Révolution, 3fr. 50.

Geography and Travel.

- Bühler u. v. Sarwey: Von den Vogesen zum Balkan, 2 vols, 6m.

Science.

- Lindner (G.) Theorie der Gasbewegung, 10m.
 Wolf (R.) Handbuch der Astronomie, Vol. 1, Part 1, 8m.

General Literature.

- Boisgobey (F. du) Le Fils du Plongeur, 3fr. 50.
 Fleuriot (Z.) La Clef d'Or, 2fr.
 Girou (A.) Bracquette, 2fr.
 Lebon (A.) Études sur l'Allemagne Politique, 3fr. 50.
 Mirbeau (O.) Sébastien Roch, 3fr. 50.
 Taxil (L.) Monsieur Drumont, 3fr. 50.
 Witt (Madame de) Vieux Contes de la Veillée, 2fr.

IN MEMORY OF AURELIO SAFFI.

The wider world of men that is not ours
 Receives a soul whose life on earth was light.
 Though darkness close the date of human hours,
 Love holds the spirit and sense of life in sight,
 That may not, even though death bid fly, take flight.

Faith, love, and hope fulfilled with memory, see
 As clear and dear as life could bid it be.
 The present soul that is and is not he.

He, who held up the shield and sword of Rome
 Against the ravaging brood of recreant France,
 Beside the man of men whom heaven took home
 When earth beheld the spring's first eyebeams glance
 And life and winter seemed alike a trance
 Eighteen years since, in sight of heaven and spring
 That saw the soul above all souls take wing,
 He too now hears the heaven we hear not sing.

He too now dwells where death is dead, and stands
 Where souls like stars exult in life to be:
 Whence all who linked heroic hearts and hands
 Shine on our sight, and give it strength to see What hope makes fair for all whom faith makes free:

Free with such freedom as we find in sleep,
 The light sweet shadow of death, when dreams are deep
 And high as heaven whence light and lightning leap.

And scarce a month yet gone, his living hand
 Writ loving words that sealed me friend of his.
 Are heaven and earth as near as sea to strand?
 May life and death as bride and bridegroom kiss?
 His last month's written word abides, and is;
 Clear as the sun that lit through storm and strife
 And darkling days when hope took fear to wife
 The faith whose fire was light of all his life.

A life so fair, so pure of earthlier leaven,
 That none hath won through higher and harder ways
 The deathless life of death which earth calls heaven;

Heaven, and the light of love on earth, and praise

Of silent memory through subsiding days
 Wherein the light subsides not whence the past Feeds full with life the future. Time holds fast
 Their names whom faith forgets not, first and last.

Forget? The dark forgets not dawn, nor we
 The suns that sink to rise again, and shine
 Lords of live years and ages. Earth and sea
 Forget not heaven that makes them seem divine, Though night put out their fires and bid their shrine

Be dark and pale as storm and twilight. Day,
 Not night, is everlasting: life's full way
 Bids death bow down as dead, and pass away.

What part has death in souls that past all fear
 Win heavenward their supernal way, and smite
 With scorn sublime as heaven such dreams as here Plague and perplex with cloud and fire the light
 That leads men's waking souls from glimmering night
 To the awless heights of day, whereon man's awe,
 Transfigured, dies in rapture, seeing the law
 Sealed of the sun that earth arising saw?

Faith, justice, mercy, love, and heaven-born hate
 That sets them all on fire and bids them be More than soft words and dreams that wake too late,

Shone living through the lordly life that we Beheld, revered, and loved on earth, while he Dwelt here, and bade our eyes take light thereof;
 Light as from heaven that flamed or smiled above
 In light or fire whose very hate was love.

No hate of man, but hate of hate, whose foam Sheds poison forth from tongues of snakes and priests,

And stains the sickening air with steams whence Rome

Now feeds not full the God that slays and feasts;
 For now the fangs of all the ravenous beasts
 That ramped about him, fain of prayer and prey, Fulfil their lust no more: the tide of day
 Swells, and compels him down the deathward way.

Night sucks the Church its creature down, and hell Yawns, heaves, and yearns to clasp its loathliest child

Close to the breasts that bore it. All the spell
 Whence darkness saw the dawn in heaven defiled
 Is dumb as death: the lips that lied and smiled
 Wax white for fear as ashes. She that bore
 The banner up of darkness now no more Sheds night and fear and shame from shore to shore.

When they that cast her kingdom down were born, North cried on south and east made moan to west
 For hopes that love had hardly heart to mourn,
 For Italy that was not. Kings on quest,
 By priests whose blessings burn as curses blest,
 Made spoil of souls and bodies bowed and bound,
 Hunted and harried, leashed as horse or hound,
 And hopeless of the hope that died unfound.

And now that faith has brought forth fruit to time,
 How should not memory praise their names, and hold

Their record even as Dante's life sublime,
 Who bade his dream, found fair and false of old, Live? Not till earth and heaven be dead and cold

May man forget whose work and will made one
 Italy, fair as heaven or freedom won,
 And left their fame to shine beside her sun.

ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE.
 April, 1890.

FRANCE AND THE REPUBLIC.

Paris, April 21, 1890.

My attention has been called to the number of the Athenæum for April 12th, which contains an article upon a book of mine entitled 'France and the Republic.' Your readers are informed by the anonymous author of this article that "when Mr. Hurlbert has in his mind something which is a little too startling even for himself, he puts it into the mouth of some one else—as, for example, when he tells his readers that he has been assured by one of the most distinguished public men of France that M. Thiers was with difficulty restrained from bringing against Marshal MacMahon an accusation similar to that which led to the condemnation of Marshal Bazaine."

The plain English of this is to charge me with deceiving my readers by putting my own inventions into the mouths of other people. I must request you, therefore, to withdraw this absolutely unfounded and inexcusable charge, into which you have been betrayed by the polemic zeal or the political ignorance of your anonymous contributor, and to withdraw it as conspicuously as it has been made.

As a matter of courtesy purely to you, I beg to say that the account of the conduct of M.
 Thiers towards the Marshal Duke of Magenta, to which I allude in the introduction to my book

(pp. xxix-xxx), was given to me by M. Cornelis de Witt. I did not cite his name because his untimely death had taken him from the affection of his friends and the respect of his country before the publication of my book. But my recollection and my memoranda of the account as he gave it to me, with details and particulars full of interest, are fully confirmed, while I write, by his son, M. Pierre de Witt.

The story, indeed, is an open secret with all really well-informed persons in the political world of the Third Republic. In this case, as in all cases, I have stated nothing of importance without adequate authority. Omniscience and infallibility belong to the first person plural. But I have a reasonable assurance that it will be found much easier to question than to disprove the accuracy of any data given by me, or of any conclusions legitimately drawn from them by

WM. HENRY HURLBERT.

 It certainly was not our intention to charge Mr. Hurlbert with wilful deceit. But he is prejudiced, and the witnesses he quotes are even more prejudiced, and it is they who have supplied the most startling statements to be found in his book. Internal evidence and the names he gives throughout his volume point to the conclusion that Mr. Hurlbert talked freely with none of those in France who are really friendly to the existing form of government. The story with regard to M. Thiers is absolutely incredible, and, as a matter of fact, is received with ridicule by "all really well-informed persons in the political world of the Third Republic." Marshal MacMahon has often been charged with dulness of intellect, but never with treachery, which was the offence of which Marshal Bazaine was found guilty; and M. Thiers (who was, whatever his faults, certainly no fool) would have been the last man in France to have dreamt of bringing such a charge as that of military treachery against his wooden but patriotic rival. That Mr. Hurlbert should believe such an infamously foolish piece of gossip is but one more indication of his unfitness for the task which he has undertaken in writing upon the politics of modern France.

THE SCOTCH FASTING MAN.

Aberdeen, April 28, 1890.

I IMAGINE the John Scotus whom F. G. K. mentions in Saturday's issue as fasting at Bologna in 1532 is the same person as Archbishop Spottiswoode mentions in 1531. The facts of his life are summarized in the leader columns of the Aberdeen Free Press of to-day as follows:—

"Archbishop Spottiswoode also relates the case of a Scotchman, John Scott, of Teviotdale, in 1531. 'Having succumbed in a plea of law,' quoth the archbishop, 'and knowing himself unable to pay that wherein he was adjudged, he took sanctuary in the Abbey of Holyrood House, where he abstained from all meat and drink the space of thirty or forty days together.' This was a feat too notable to be let pass, and the king confined him in Edinburgh Castle, where a thirty-two days' fast was accomplished. 'This proof given of his abstinence'—to return to the quaint words of Spottiswoode—he was dismissed, and, coming into the street half naked, made a speech to the people that flocked about him, wherein he professed to do all this by the help of the Blessed Virgin, and that he could fast as long as he pleased.' But even in those days there were doubting ones, for 'many did take it as a miracle, esteeming him a person of singular holiness; others thought him to be frantic and mad.' The novelty wore off, and the man of Teviotdale, recognizing that a prophet hath no honour in his own country, betook himself to Rome, where he went through a fasting performance for the behoof of the Pope, Clement VII. After a visit to Venice and to the Holy Sepulchre, he returned to London, this time in the rôle of a moralist, and for 'denouncing King Henry's divorce from Katherine' he was sent to an involuntary fast of fifty days in the Tower."

This Scott also went to Rome just the year before the alternative date given by F. G. K. to the Bologna performance, so that probably the same man is meant. This man is said to have been an ancestor of Sir Walter Scott.

J. MALCOLM BULLOCH.

SALE.

In continuing our notice of Mr. Gaisford's sale (at which the prices have ruled excessively high) at the rooms of Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson & Hodge, we must be content to quote a copy of the Breviarium Romanum, 1546, in a splendid binding by Le Fauchaux, sold for 25*l.* 10*s.* First edition of Burns's Poems, 120*l.*, the highest price ever given. Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy, first edition, 30*l.* Byron's Works, first edition, 24*l.* Camoens's Lusiadas, 1584 edition, 23*l.*, and 1591 edition, 11*l.*; first edition of his Rhythmas, 21*l.* Campion's Maske at the Mariage of the Earl of Somerset and Lady F. Howard, 13*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* Chants et Chansons Populaires, 26*l.* 10*s.* Charles II., Account of his Preservation, 20*l.* Chaucer's Works, printed by Kele, 36*l.* Chronicon Nurembergense, 16*l.* Ciceronis Academica, a beautiful specimen of binding by Le Fauchaux, 26*l.* 5*s.* Dallaway's Sussex, 40*l.* Daniello de la Poetica, Canavari's copy, 40*l.* Dante, 1529 edition, 19*l.*; the 1544 edition, 13*l.*; and 1502, Aldine, 10*l.* Davies's Mirum in Modo, 10*l.*, and Microcosmos, 13*l.* 5*s.*; his Scourge of Folly, in which he abuses the poets, including Shakspeare for his 'Venus and Adonis,' 21*l.* 10*s.* Davison's Poems, 16*l.* De Lolme on the Constitution, with paintings on covers and edges, 25*l.* 10*s.* Donne's Poems, with autograph of Isaac Walton, 26*l.* Drayton's Poems and Poly-Olbion, 26*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* Fior de Virtù, 1519 edition, 40*l.* Fraunce's Yvychurch, 38*l.* The Germ, 8*l.* 5*s.* Hardyng's Chronicle, 17*l.* 17*s.* Henrico II. Entrata nella Citta di Lyone, 18*l.* 5*s.* Herick's Hesperides, first edition, 30*l.* Heywood's Spider and Flie, 17*l.* 5*s.*; and his Woorkes, 10*l.* 15*s.* Histrio-Mastix, 29*l.* Homer, translated by Chapman, 41*l.* Hookes's Amanda, 11*l.* 10*s.* Horæ, Manuscript, with illuminations executed for Anne de Beaujeu, 49*l.* Horæ, printed in 1556 by Kerver, 26*l.* Various Jest-Books, 26*l.* 16*s.* Johnson's Highwaymen, 20*l.* 5*s.* Keats, 3 vols., first edition, 27*l.* Killigrew's Comedies and Tragedies, 21*l.* 5*s.* Lace Patterns by Lucretia Romana, 18*l.* Lord Langdale and Sir A. Panizzi's Farthing Publication, 19*l.* Loggan's Oxonia et Cantabrigia, 30*l.* 10*s.* Lok's Ecclesiastes, 18*l.* Longus, with designs by the Duke of Orleans, 45*l.* 10*s.* Lucretius, first edition with a date, 13*l.* Maldonado, Cancionero, 23*l.* 10*s.* Marguerite de Valois, Contes, first edition with Romeyn de Hooghe's plates, 40*l.* 10*s.* Marot, Œuvres, Dolet's edition, 19*l.* 15*s.* Milton's Paradise Lost and Regained, first editions, 25*l.* 5*s.* Mirror for Magistrates, 1587 edition, 16*l.* Molière, Œuvres, par Bret, 116*l.* 10*s.* (the highest price ever given) Morley's Madrigales, 40*l.* 10*s.* Newcastle Fisher's Garlands, 12*l.* Offices des Rogations, 40*l.* Olney Hymns, with Cowper's autograph, 16*l.* 5*s.* (bought in Daniel's sale for 12*l.* 10*s.*, then considered a ridiculous price). Panzeri Annales Typographici, 20*l.* 15*s.* Patmore's Poems, first edition, 14*l.* Peacock's Novels, first editions, 9*l.* Peele's Battle of Alcazar, 19*l.* Percy Society's Publications, 22*l.* 10*s.* Philips's Poems by the Matchless Orinda, 10*l.* 5*s.* Philobiblon Society's Publications, 22*l.* 10*s.* Pierce Plowman's Vision and Crede, 21*l.* 10*s.* (bought in Roscoe's sale for 5*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.*). Plays by May, Haughton, and others, 50*l.* Pontificale Romanum, 1582 edition, 22*l.* Porter's Two Angry Women of Abingdon, 20*l.* Preston's Cambrises, a Tragedie, supposed to be ridiculed by Shakspeare in his 'Henry IV.,' 20*l.* 10*s.* Puttenham's Arte of English Poesie, 19*l.* Rabelais, Œuvres, avec des Remarques par Le Duchat, 28*l.* 10*s.* Racine, Œuvres, par Luneau de Boisjermain, 22*l.* Rappresentazione Italiana, 81*l.* 19*s.* Roman de la Rose, first edition, 70*l.*; and the 1529 edition, 8*l.* Rowlands's Diogenes Laethorne, 12*l.* 5*s.* Roxburghe Society's Publications, 87*l.* 4*s.* The 1,670 lots sold for 6,227*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*

THE ORIENTAL CONGRESS.

THE second meeting of the English organizers of the Oriental Congress to be held in London took place on Tuesday last, when the Central Committee was formed as follows: Sir Henry Rawlinson, Honorary President, Sir M. E. Grant Duff,* President, and Sir G. Birdwood,* Vice-President; Sir Roper Lethbridge,* M.P., Sir A. C. Lyall, Sir Lepel Griffin,* Sir R. Meade,* Prof. Sayce, Dr. Leitner,* Prof. Douglas, Dr. Ginsburg,* Dr. Bellow, Dr. Bullinger, Dr. Thornton, Dr. Hyde Clarke, Prof. Margoliouth, Mr. Braubrook, Mr. Ransom, Dr. Badenoch,* Mr. L. Bowring, Mr. Stanley Lane-Poole, Prof. C. H. Wright, Mr. Hewitt, Dr. R. Morris, Prof. R. S. Poole, Mr. Dickens, Canon Taylor, Dr. De Lacouperie, Dr. Beddoe, and Mr. Macdonald.* Those whose names are marked with an asterisk form the Reception Committee. Sectional committees are to be formed on the plan of the Comités Techniques of the French National Committee, one for Ethnographical Philology and another for Oriental Archaeology and Art being added.

MR. BLADES.

WE have few bibliographers among us, and still fewer printers in this commercial age know or care anything about the history of their craft, so that we can ill afford to lose Mr. W. Blades, whose sudden death has been a blow to a large circle of friends. Mr. Blades bore his years well, and no one would have anticipated, who saw him lately, that his career was to be cut short thus suddenly. It is true he was sixty-six years of age, but he seemed to have still several years to live, and he had certainly the capacity for good work, as the interesting little monograph on 'Signatures' that he recently issued abundantly proved.

His name will always be identified with Caxton's. His earliest publication was devoted to Caxton, and his magnum opus was his 'Life and Typography of Caxton,' as careful and conscientious a piece of work as British bibliography has to boast of, which first appeared in 1861 and 1863 in two quarto volumes, and again in one volume in 1877, on the occasion of the Caxton celebration. Next to this must rank his 'Numismata Typographica,' which was originally published in 1869, but was reissued in an enlarged and improved shape in 1883. But the most popular of his works was undoubtedly 'The Enemies of Books,' a pleasant little volume which ran through three editions. Of his reprints, beginning with Caxton's 'Governayle of Heltho,' issued more than thirty years ago, we need say no more than that they were executed with the thoroughness and taste that distinguished his work. He was thorough in all he did, and his genuine modesty led him generally to confine himself strictly to matters in which he was thoroughly at home, and thus he avoided almost entirely the besetting sin of a self-educated man. It was very seldom that he ventured out of his range, and consequently bibliographers may use his books with confidence and security.

From time to time contributions from Mr. Blades appeared in these columns, and they were welcomed by all who cared about his favourite subjects. He was very simple and unaffected, kindly and honest—a man who laboured at the history of printing not for honour or reward, but from pure love of the study. It will be long before we meet with another bibliographer as devoted and unpretentious. It is to be remembered, too, that he was not a rich man with ample leisure and command of a long purse, but a man of business who could only devote occasional spare hours to his favourite pursuit. Yet how completely he outstripped the amateurs!

Literary Gossip.

MR. STANLEY'S article in the June Scribner (the first material that he will put before the public) reviews the chief points of his expedition and its difficulties, and for the first time supplies the public with Mr. Stanley's own view of Emin Pasha's position and the questions involved in his departure from his province; while the body of the article is occupied with a story of adventure and suffering almost unparalleled, at a culminating point of the expedition, which the explorer has chosen for his first detailed description. The illustrations have been made from probably the most remarkable series of photographs ever published, a large number of these having been taken in the forest through which no white man had ever before passed. This paper will be followed in July by an article, by Mr. Edward Marston, entitled 'How Stanley wrote his Book,' fully illustrated by drawings and photographs of Stanley and his house at Cairo.

SIR EDWIN ARNOLD, the author of 'The Light of Asia,' is busy in his leisure at Tokyo with the composition of a new epic poem to be called 'The Light of the World,' the subject being the life and teaching of the founder of Christianity. He believes that the scheme of the work and its treatment are altogether novel.

MESSRS. PHILIP & SON are going to bring out the 'Travels in South-West China' of Mr. A. Hosie, H.B.M. Consul at Wenchow. Mr. Archibald Little will supply an introductory chapter dealing with the opening of the Upper Yang-Tze.

PROF. CAMPBELL FRASER's new monograph on Locke, in Blackwood's "Philosophical Classics," will be an introduction not merely to Locke, but through him to the intellectual philosophy of Europe during the two hundred years that have elapsed since the publication of the 'Essays.' Prof. Fraser has been able to add fresh materials for the study of Locke from the papers in possession of Lord Lovelace, and also from the large collection of letters belonging to Mr. Sandford, of Nynhead (see Athen., No. 3209).

MESSRS. REMINGTON will publish immediately a volume of sonnets called 'The New Day,' by Dr. T. Gordon Hake, whose previous volumes, 'Parables and Tales' and 'New Symbols,' met with a great success in England and America about seventeen years ago, when Dante Rossetti, among other critics, claimed for Dr. Hake a high and unique place among Victorian poets. A reproduction of Rossetti's well-known portrait of Dr. Hake will form a frontispiece to the volume, and Mr. Earl Hodgson, in an introductory essay, will glance at the career of the octogenarian parable-writer, poet, and savant. Though the central idea of the sequence is the new day that natural science has opened up for the poets of our time, a considerable number of the sonnets consist of Dr. Hake's reminiscences of notable men with whom he has been brought into intimate relations during his long life. Vivid pictures of Rossetti during his reclusive life at Kelmscott Manor and at Bognor, and of George Borrow in his rambles through Surrey, will form the most interesting portions of the book, which will be No. 2 of "The Rosslyn Series of Poets."

It has become a custom to attribute all leaders on literary subjects that appear in the Daily News to Mr. Andrew Lang. This is a mistake. Mr. Justin McCarthy, M.P., Mr. Richard Whiteing, Mr. Moy Thomas, and Mr. Herbert Paul are also contributors of literary leaders to our contemporary's columns.

WE hear that the Rev. Ll. J. M. Bebb, Fellow of Brasenose College, Oxford, is preparing a list of all MSS. containing the Old Testament or any part of it in Greek which are to be found in published catalogues of libraries. It will also include the contents of lectionaries, and precise details will be given so far as they can be ascertained. No general list of this kind appears to have been attempted since the publication of Holmes and Parson's edition of the LXX. (Oxf. 1798-1827). Instalments of it will probably appear in forthcoming numbers of the Classical Review.

A CORRESPONDENT writes:—

"The new edition of 'The Letters of Lord Chesterfield to his Godson' is doubtless, as you say, an improvement on the first. The whole of the first was sold on the day of publication; each of the 525 copies was numbered, and though the price was high, being 2l. 12s. 6d., yet subscribers had the satisfaction of procuring what would probably become a rare book. In the 'Epilogue' Lord Carnarvon writes, 'I have published everything.' It appears that he has reserved something for a second edition, costing one guinea only, and that in it he has reprinted some things which he did not think fit to include in the first. As the work is produced by the Clarendon Press, no one can suppose that anything in the shape of sharp practice can have been intended, and it is probably an oversight that subscribers to the first edition have not been informed that they can have the additional matter, printed in a form to add to their copies, if they choose to apply for it."

WE have received a circular (which has already been printed in the Allgemeine Zeitung of Munich, and is now being distributed in this country) from some German and Dutch Orientalists who object to the proposal for a Congress in London in 1891. The protestants are not very numerous, although some of them are well-known scholars, and, probably with a view of swelling the number of signatures, two highly respectable Dutch publishers have also signed. The protest admits that the statutes of the Congress were in several instances broken at Stockholm; but it pleads that this was done with no ill intention. That is very possible; but the admission of the illegality of the proceedings of the last Congress is fatal to the position assumed by its defenders.

THE selections from the records of the Indian Foreign Office dealing with the Hastings period have just been published in India. Prof. Forrest has embodied them in three volumes, and they are likely to prove very interesting.

MR. ROBERT WHITE, of Worksop, is printing the parish registers of Edwinstow, an extensive parish covering the district known as the ancient Forest of Sherwood, Notts, and the parish church at which Robin Hood is traditionally said to have been married. They will be printed from a transcript made by Dr. Marshall, Rouge Croix Pursuivant at Arms of the Herald's College, who has already edited the registers of Perlethorpe and Carburton, chapelry in Edwinstow parish—two out of three oldest registers in England.

MR. NUTT is about to issue another series of reprints, intended to contain the best products of pre-Tudor English literature. The archaic English texts will be accompanied by translations, and, where possible, with facsimile illustrations from MSS. Mr. I. Gollancz, of Christ's College, Cambridge, will edit the series, the first volume of which, 'The Pearl,' will appear about Christmas. Future volumes will include 'Old English Lyrics,' 'Cynewulf's Christ,' 'Miracle Plays,' 'The Wanderer's Lament,' &c.

EARL SPENCER has accepted the invitation of the "George Bullen Testimonial Fund Committee" to become the honorary chairman. Lord Charles W. B. Bruce has already been elected vice-chairman.

THE College for Working Women is sorely in need of funds. It had only a balance of sixteen pounds and a few shillings at the close of last year. Mr. Alex. Macmillan, the well-known publisher, is treasurer of the College.

It is reported that Mr. F. L. James, the author of 'Wild Tribes of the Soudan' and 'The Unknown Horn of Africa,' has been killed by an elephant.

THE third volume of Messrs. Philip's series, "The World's Great Explorers and Explorations," will be 'Mungo Park and the Niger,' by Mr. Joseph Thomson.

THE meeting of the Goethe Gesellschaft is to be held at Weimar on May 31st. Among the speakers will be Dr. v. Loeper and Prof. Suphan, the Keeper of the Goethe-Schiller Archiv.

WE regret to hear of the death of the noted Professor of Norse Literature, Dr. Möbius of Kiel.

MR. WALTER SCOTT will shortly publish a translation of Count Tolstoi's 'Kreutzer Sonata.'

A GREAT "Buchdrucker-Jubilaum," in honour of the four hundred and fiftieth anniversary of book-printing (presumably with reference to Laurens Janszoon Coster, 1440), is to be celebrated at Cologne on June 28th and 29th. There will be a costumed historical procession and a series of meetings.

THE Swedish writer Albert Theodor Lysander, Professor of Roman Eloquence and Poetry at the University of Lund, died in that city on the 25th of April. He was born at Gothenburg on the 29th of May, 1822. Besides his contributions to the study of Roman literature, he collected the fragments of Archilochus, translated Goethe's 'Faust' into Swedish, and collected the writings of Almqvist. His literary career extends over more than forty years, and comprises a large number of volumes.

THE Berlin Municipal Council has just ordered memorial tablets to be placed upon the houses in which three eminent Berliners died—Heinrich von Kleist, Ernst Theodor Wilhelm Hoffmann, and Franz von Gaudy.

THE chief Parliamentary Papers of the week are East India, Loans raised in England, Return (1d.); Order in Council relating to the Second Division of the Civil Service (1d.); Historical Manuscripts Commission, Twelfth Report of the Royal Commission (3d.), and Calendar of MSS. of Marquis of Salisbury, K.G., Part III. (2s. 1d.); Report of Registrar-General on Births, Deaths, and Marriages in Scotland during the Year 1889 (5d.); and Trade Reports for Antwerp (1d.), and for the Consular District of Boston (1d.).

SCIENCE

The Rev. J. G. Wood: his Life and Work. By the Rev. Theodore Wood. (Cassell & Co.)—The Rev. T. Wood has written a memoir of his father which is decidedly more interesting than we expected. It will never be in any way a classic, but it will probably have a large circle of readers. As we are not now about to review Mr. Wood's numerous works, we shall not say much in way of demurrer to his son's rather astounding claim for him, that he was the first to popularize natural history; but this, at any rate, must be said, that whatever some, such as White of Selborne, may have unconsciously done, it is perfectly certain that, in this country at least, Thomas Bell, William Yarrell, and Edward Forbes—to name some of those who wrote for the series which Mr. Van Voort first published many years since—did of set purpose write as plainly and as easily as any lover of natural history could need. We do not want here or now to press the point further. It would be difficult to understand how a man of the capacity for work of the late Mr. Wood—that he was “able to labour steadily on for weeks together with scarcely an hour's intermission” is, of course, an exaggeration—should have always found it so difficult to supply himself with a reasonable competence, did not his son let us into the secret of his absolute inability to keep accounts, and of his total lack of business capabilities. To our regret we learn that his friends suffered from this defect when they were so unwary as to allow him to borrow their books. But the interest which Wood took in living things, his real affection for them and theirs for him, his ingenuity in difficulties, and his easy style, will carry the reader along and please him as he goes. It may not be a book to read twice, but few will regret having read it once. It is always a difficult thing for a son to be the historian of his father's life, and the reverend author has every right to congratulate himself on the volume he has produced.

CHEMICAL NOTES.

An important modification in Brins's process for obtaining oxygen from the air on a manufacturing scale was recently described by Dr. Thorne before the Society of Chemical Industry. In the old process purified air at a pressure of about 10 lb. was passed over barium oxide heated to dull redness, when oxygen was absorbed and barium dioxide formed; the retorts containing the dioxide were then connected with an exhausting pump and heated to a bright red heat, when the barium dioxide was decomposed into oxygen and barium oxide, the latter being ready to then undergo the same cycle of changes for an indefinite number of times. The repeated changes of temperature, however, produced great wear and tear in the retorts, furnaces, and fittings, and involved much waste of time and fuel in heating and cooling the retorts. In the modified process the temperature is kept steadily at about 700° (that is, about half-way between the high and low temperatures previously employed); air is pumped in at about 14 lb. pressure, when barium dioxide is formed to some extent; the air current is then stopped and the pressure reduced to 13 lb. or 14 lb. below that of the atmosphere, when the absorbed oxygen is liberated. Although the amount of oxygen obtained at each operation is far smaller than was the case with the old process, yet the yield of oxygen per day is much increased, as the series of changes can now be completed in fifteen minutes, whilst previously it occupied about four hours. The main difference in the two processes is summed up by saying that in the old process the combination and decomposition were effected by changes of temperature, whereas in the new process they are effected by changes in pressure.

In a paper communicated at the last meeting of the Chemical Society, Prof. Pedler, of Calcutta, shows that the term amorphous phosphorus is a distinct misnomer, commercial amorphous phosphorus being in reality the same substance as the crystalline form called rhombohedral or metallic phosphorus, obtained by dissolving phosphorus in lead at high temperatures.

At the same meeting Prof. Thorpe and Mr. Tutton gave an account of their very complete investigation of phosphorus oxide. When pure this substance melts at 22.5°, solidifies at 21°, and boils without decomposition at 173°. It oxidizes spontaneously in air or oxygen, or if warmed gently inflames. Determinations of the molecular weight by various methods show that it has the molecular formula P_4O_6 , and not P_2O_3 , as previously held. When heated to 300° and above it is decomposed into phosphorus and phosphorus tetroxide. It is also readily decomposed by light. Contrary to the statements in the text-books, cold water has scarcely any action on it. Hot water acts on it with explosive violence.

Prof. Emil Fischer has lately communicated to the Berlin Chemical Society a series of papers in which he describes the brilliant synthetical experiments by which he has effected the artificial formation of several of the sugars. Unfortunately, the details of the work are of such a technical nature that they could not with advantage be described in this place. It must suffice to say that some time back he obtained a sugar-like substance, acrose, from several substances, the most important of which, from the synthetical point of view, was formaldehyde, as this compound can be built up from its elements, and has for some time been suspected by vegetable physiologists to be the first product of the reaction of carbonic acid and water in the leaves of plants, and the source from which starch and other carbohydrates are built up in the plant. In the present researches acrose forms the starting-point, and by lengthy series of reactions has been converted into mannite, the sugar occurring in manna; into levulose, the sugar occurring in honey and many fruits; and into dextrose (ordinary glucose or grape sugar), which occurs in sweet grapes, and, together with levulose, in honey and fruits. For the details of the syntheses and of many other interesting results obtained reference must be made to the original papers (Berichte 23, pp. 370 and 799), or to an abstract of the results in the May number of the Journal of the Chemical Society.

SOCIETIES.

ROYAL.—April 24.—The President in the chair.—The following papers were read: ‘On a Pneumatic Analogue of the Wheatstone Bridge,’ by Mr. W. N. Shaw; ‘On the Effect of Tension upon Magnetic Changes of Length in Wires of Iron, Nickel, and Cobalt,’ by Mr. S. Bidwell; ‘On the Heat of the Moon and Stars,’ by Mr. C. V. Boys; and ‘Observations on the Secretion of Bile in a Case of Biliary Fistula,’ by Mr. A. W. M. Robson.

MICROSCOPICAL.—April 16.—Dr. C. T. Hudson, President, in the chair.—Mr. J. Mayall, jun., called attention to a spiral ruling on glass sent by Mr. P. Braham, which had been produced in an ordinary lathe, the diamond point being adjusted on the slide rest; also to a series of photomicrographs of diatoms sent by Mr. T. Comber. These were of special interest from the fact that they were produced with sunlight, by which the maximum resolving power of the objective was obtained.—Mr. Mayall referred to an improved form of fine-adjustment constructed and exhibited by Messrs. Powell & Lealand, in which the chief aim had been to construct a fine-adjustment which should combine extreme sensitiveness of action with accuracy and probable durability beyond what had previously been attained. The essential feature was the application of what watch-makers would term a “jewelled movement.” The whole of the contact surfaces by which the fine-adjustment was actuated consisted of polished steel and agate, the intention being to reduce the friction as much as was consistent with steadiness of motion. The result attained was undoubtedly an improvement on the old system, though the cost would probably limit the application to the few instruments required for very special and difficult investigations in microscopy. For high-class photomicrographic work, or where preparations had to be retained under observation for long periods of time, the new mechanism should be particularly useful, for the greater solidity of the general construction clearly pointed to greater precision and increased stability.—Mr. Goodwin exhibited a form of eyepiece for the microscope which gave a large field with considerable magnifying power.—Mr. A. W. Bennett gave a résumé of a paper by Mr. W. West, ‘On the Fresh-water Algae of North Wales.’ The paper described a collection of freshwater algae, chiefly diatoms and desmids, made in various localities in North Wales and Anglesey, and it furnished what was beyond comparison the richest list of desmids which had ever been prepared in this country.—Prof. M. M. Hartog's paper ‘On the State in which Water exists in Live Protoplasm’ was read.—A paper descriptive of the method adopted by Mr. Halford in mounting the spermatozoa of the Salmonidae was read, and specimens in illustration were exhibited by the lantern.—Mr. E. M. Nelson exhibited on the screen several slides showing under high powers ($\times 1350$) the bordered pits of Pinus and Tilia. He also exhibited a small series of slides to show the qualities of a new apochromatic quarter-inch objective with fluoride lenses and of 95 N.A., which had recently been made by Messrs. Powell & Lealand.—Mr. Mayall mentioned that the gathering which was to have taken place at Antwerp in celebration of the three hundredth anniversary of the invention of the microscope was unavoidably postponed until next year.

CHEMICAL.—April 17.—Dr. W. J. Russell, President, in the chair.—The following were elected Fellows: J. Barker, C. R. Beck, D. Corrie, W. Dixon, T. F. Ellis, F. J. Hambly, A. C. Holburn, W. F. Laycock, A. S. Lea, H. Lescher, J. S. MacArthur, H. de Mosenenthal, G. Müller, E. H. Neville, H. Picton, E. G. Scott, J. Sibun, A. Smith, W. B. Shuttlewood, F. R. M. Stone, and J. S. H. Walker.—The following papers were read: ‘Phosphorus Oxide,’ Part I., by Messrs. T. E. Thorpe and A. E. Tutton; ‘The Action of Chlorine on Water in the Light, and on the Action of Light on certain Chlorine Acids,’ ‘Note on the Explosion of Hydrogen Sulphide and of Carbon Bisulphide with Air and Oxygen,’ and ‘The Action of Light on Phosphorus, and on some of the Properties of “Amorphous” Phosphorus,’ by Prof. A. Pedler; and ‘The Action of Phosphoric Anhydride on Fatty Acids,’ by Dr. F. S. Kipping.

ARISTOTELIAN.—April 28.—Mr. S. H. Hodgson, President, in the chair.—Mr. P. Daphne read a paper ‘On Newman's Grammar of Assent.’ In his criticism of the work he endeavoured to show that the author's description of “certitude” exceeded the real condition of that state of consciousness by postulating not only conviction, or assent satisfied by investigation and experience, but also actual objective truth or reality in the object of certitude,—also that the assent thus given, though sufficient for all purposes of practice, as we have nothing else to go upon, while choice is imperative on us, permits and, to some extent, requires the speculative judgment to be held in suspense, to the extent, at least, of the recognition of the partial and conditional character of our knowledge.—The paper was followed by a discussion, in which Prof. Iomanes, Rev. P. N. Waggett, and the President took part.

MEETINGS FOR THE ENSUING WEEK.

- MON. Royal Institution, 5.—General Monthly. Engineers, 7½.—Breakwater Construction, Mr. F. H. Cheesewright.
- Institute of British Architects, 8.—Annual General Meeting.
- Victoria Institute, 8.—Paper by Prof. E. Hull.
- Society of Arts, 8.—Sugar, Tea, Coffee, and Cocoa, their Origin, Preparation, and Uses, Lecture II., Mr. R. Bannister (Cantor Lecture).
- TUES. Royal Institution, 3.—Line Engraving, Mr. L. Fagan.
- Horticultural, 3.—Lecture.
- Biblical Archaeology, 8.—Priestly Character of the Earliest Egyptian Civilization, Mr. P. Le F. Renouf; ‘Torus for “god” and “sacredness” in Accadian and Chinese,’ Rev. C. J. Ball.
- Civil Engineers, 8.—Ballot for Members; ‘The Screw-Propeller,’ Mr. S. W. Barnaby.
- Zoological, 8½.—Observations on a Particularly Fine Example of the ‘Black Coral’ of the Mediterranean, lately acquired by the Trustees of the British Museum, by Prof. F. Jaffé Bell; ‘Notes on the Wild Sheep and Mountain Antelope of Algeria,’ Mr. E. N. Suxton; ‘A Remarkable Antler from Asia Minor,’ Mr. B. Linderker; ‘Minute Structure of the Eye in some Shallow-water and Deep-sea Species of the Isopod Genus Arcturus,’ Mr. F. E. Beudant.
- WED. Entomological, 7.
- Society of Arts, 8.—The Aim and Scope of Higher Technical Teaching, Dr. P. F. Frankland.
- Shortland, 8.—Normal Phonography, Mr. W. H. Barlow.
- THURS. Royal Institution, 5.—Fame and Explosives, Prof. Dewar.
- Royal 4½.
- Society of Arts, 5.—The Western Frontier of China, Mr. D. Boulenger; 8.—Design applied to Wood-Carving, Mr. L. F. Day.
- Electrical Engineers, 8.—Lighting Guard for Telegraph Purposes and the Protection of Cables from Lightning, Dr. O.

- Lodge; 'Treatment, Regulation, and Control of Electric Light by the Legislature and the Board of Trade,' Major P. Carew.
- THURS. Mathematics, 8.—'On the Function which denotes the Excess of the Divisions of a Number which 1, mod 3, over those which 2, mod 3,' Dr. Glaisher; 'Notes on Circulating Decimals,' R. W. D. Christie; 'On the Genesis of Binodal Quartic Curves from C-cubic,' H. M. Jeffery; 'On the Arithmetical Theory of the Form $x^2 + y^2 + z^2 - 3xyz$,' Prof. G. B. Mathews.
- Chemical, 8.—Exhibition of Apparatus, &c.
- FRID. United Service Institution, 3.—'The Enlistment of the Militia for Foreign Service,' Capt. R. Holden.
- New Hampshire, 5.—A Paper by Rev. W. A. Harrison.
- Astronomical, 8.
- Royal Institution, 9.—'Colour-Vision and Colour-Blindness,' Mr. R. B. Carrer.
- SAT. Royal Institution, 3.—'Excavating in Greece,' Dr. C. Waldstein.
- Botanic, 5.—Election of Fellows.

Science Gossip.

THE Chancellor of the Exchequer has consented to receive a deputation on May 15th to urge the claims of the Marine Biological Association to further State aid. The Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, M.P., will introduce the deputation, among the members of which will be a number of eminent naturalists.

THE Council of the Royal Society have selected the following fifteen candidates to be recommended for election into the Society. The ballot will take place on June 5th at 4 P.M.: Sir B. Baker, R. H. M. Bosanquet, S. H. Burbury, W. Gardiner, J. Kerr, A. S. Lea, Major P. A. MacMahon, Rev. A. M. Norman, Prof. W. H. Perkin, Prof. S. U. Pickering, I. Roberts, D. Sharp, J. J. H. Teall, R. T. Thorne, and W. F. R. Weldon.

'SANITY AND INSANITY,' by Dr. Charles Mercier, will be the next volume of the "Contemporary Science Series." Dr. Mercier treats of the nervous system and the mind in health and in disease, and of the various causes which under the conditions of modern life tend to produce the various forms of mental disorder.

THE planets Mercury and Venus, which were in conjunction on the morning of the 26th ult., are still visible after sunset very near each other. Mercury, which is now a short distance to the east of the Pleiades, will be at greatest elongation from the sun on the 6th inst., and about 8° due north of Aldebaran on the 8th, soon after which he will set too early to be visible to the naked eye. Venus will be only 6° due north of Aldebaran on the 9th inst., and about 4½° due south of β Tauri on the 18th; she will be a conspicuous object in the evening sky throughout the summer and autumn. Mars, which rises now between 9 and 10 o'clock in the evening, will remain throughout May in the constellation Scorpio, and pass on the 23rd about 3° to the north of Antares. Jupiter is still in Capricornus, and next week will rise about midnight. Saturn remains in Leo, and continues to attract attention by its close proximity to Regulus; the planet will be a little more than a degree due north of that star, the brightest in the constellation, in the last week of this month.

THE most distinguished Swedish physician and medical writer of our day, Dr. Magnus Huss, died at Stockholm on the 22nd of April, in his eighty-third year.

FINE ARTS

ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS.—THE ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTIETH EXHIBITION is NOW OPEN. —5, Pall Mall East, from 10 till 6.—Admission 1s; Catalogue 1s.

ALFRED D. FRIPP, R.W.S., Secretary.

THE LEGEND of the BRIAR ROSE, painted by E. BURNE JONES A.R.A.

THE LEGEND of the BRIAR ROSE.—The EXHIBITION of Mr. BURNE JONES'S Four Pictures is NOW OPEN at Messrs. Thos. Agnew & Sons' Old Bond Street Galleries, 39, Old Bond Street, W. Admission, 1s. 10 to 5 o'clock.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

(First Notice.)

THE catalogue of the exhibition which will be opened to the public on Monday next is the largest on record, except those of 1885, which contained 2,134, and 1889, when the total was 2,196, the highest figure yet attained, and 66 above that of the present exhibition. Since 1881 there has been an increase of nearly 600 works. On the whole, the collection is the best within our memory, if we take all kinds of art into consideration, and do not, as many journals are apt to do, think only of the oil paintings and leave out of account the sculptures and the water-colour drawings. Indeed, the only class of contributions which shows no improvement is that which is loosely called architectural. There are more good portraits than usual, although there are many bad ones.

The first thing which strikes the visitor on entering is Mr. Onslow Ford's very fine statue of General Gordon seated on his camel, to which we refer below. It stands in the middle of the Central Hall. The vestibule is empty, although it might very well be filled with works in bronze; but the Lecture Room is more than usually attractive, and it is so not only because there are a number of good examples, but because they have been arranged with taste and skill, and the general effect of the whole on a visitor seeing them for the first time has been kept in view. Of the details of this arrangement we cannot, of course, at present speak. An unusually small number of members of the Academy have failed to exhibit this year; the most important of the absentees are Mr. Armitage, Mr. E. Burne Jones, Mr. Gilbert, and Mr. W. F. Yeames.

MR. ALMA TADEMA.

This artist is a liberal contributor both to the Royal Academy and the New Gallery. His most important work, however, is No. 324 at Burlington House. Some months ago we gave a description of it which was accurate at the time, but, as is his wont, the artist has made several changes not only in the execution, but also in the design. In fact The Frigidarium retains its title, but little else of its original self. The scene is still the dressing-room of a bath for ladies in the days of Hadrian. The room is comparatively low; it is lined, ceiled, and paved with marble, the various colours of which harmonize with the prevailing white, and, notwithstanding the subdued illumination of an interior, they are wonderfully pure, delicate, and brilliant. Beyond it is a sort of ante-chamber in half shadow and partly screened by a richly coloured portière, while further off the vista is closed by the bath itself. It is lined with intensely white marble, and filled with water (the greenness of which is delicious), and is open to the sun and resplendent with his light. Above the parapet of the roofless bath we catch a glimpse of the glowing air, the cloudless blue sky, a bay of yet darker blue, and the green hill tops in the distance. In the tiring-room stands a stately lady who has just left the tepidarium. She is dressed in a loose robe of pale grey-green fronted with rich embroideries of flowers on a very intense blue ground. The noble air and grace of the lady, her beautiful face, the exquisite finish of her dress and hands, are examples for artists to study; not less so is the firm morbidezza of her flesh, rosy from the bath and glowing with health and youth. An attendant, dressed in a fringed chlamys of semi-transparent white, stoops to fasten her mistress's purple girdle. Upon the marble floor lie the towels and sponge, which are not less carefully studied, drawn, and painted than any other part of the brilliant example. The legs and arms of the maid are among the finest bits of flesh painting Mr. Tadema has produced. On a shelf in a recess of the wall the lady's jewellery—a ponderous gold bracelet and an amber necklace—lies ready to be replaced; on an upper shelf are the ornaments of another bather. We suppose it is her owner who, holding some drapery about her, steps towards us across the shadowed ante-room, while a servant pulls back the heavy curtain to let her pass.

Round the bath itself, their nude figures showing distinct in the sunlight, are several girls full of animation. Mr. Waterlow, A.R.A., was a fortunate man when Mr. Tadema painted him (see No. 160) in so searching and faithful a manner. Mr. Waterlow is looking forward, as if studying a picture on the easel before him. He holds a palette on his thumb, and his brushes are at his side. Those who study character will be delighted with this portrait; those who enjoy feats of the brush and palette will not fail to notice the working of the solid lights over the more or less transparent, and the less brilliant pigments which give us the varied qualities of the skin and the flesh beneath it. It is a life-size portrait cut off at the shoulders. Another picture by Mr. Tadema is the portrait of Mrs. Ralph Sneyd (900), seated against a darkened wall and wearing a black dress striped with white. Although not so striking in any respect as the likeness of the new Associate, it deserves to be studied for qualities similar to those of its more important neighbours.

SIR JOHN MILLAIS.

From 'Childe Harold's Pilgrimage' Sir John Millais has borrowed the motto for the fine landscape we described some time ago (25),

The moon is up, and yet it is not night.

We have already laid stress on its originality, because, of all qualities, that is the rarest in English landscape. In Paris art of this category seems much less hide-bound than with us, and, although we remember no subject exactly like those of Sir John's two landscapes of the present year, Frenchmen select subjects at which our countrymen rarely, if ever, look, or, if they look at them, they flinch from the difficulties encompassing them. Apart from this, No. 25 is a most poetical and sympathetic rendering of the time just after the setting of the sun, while daylight, almost colourless yet warm, lingers in the cloudless and even-tinted sky of an evening in late autumn, and the air is suffused with mist much less dense than that of the sunlit picture. The pale golden disc of the moon at full is enclosed by a barely distinguishable halo. We have in front a woody plain, pierced by an open glade, covered with faded fern and furze, and enclosed by dark trees. Beyond dark pines rear their tall forms, and look like phantoms in the vapour. Athwart the mid-distance a wan reflection of the moon's disc betrays the water which lies concealed there. Further off uplands are dimly seen. They are so much veiled that they and the sky are only differently grey. The effect of the whole is full of sentiment, and relies for its charm on the soft, tender, and broad coloration, a subtly-graded tonality in grey and brown, which might be called monochromatic, although examination reveals the care and skill of the painter, his reticence and self-control. We shall have something to say by-and-by of Sir John's portrait of Mr. Gladstone and his grandson (No. 361).

SIR FREDERIC LEIGHTON.

Occupied with a large commission to illustrate the history of Proserpine for the town of Leeds, as well as with his picture of the rescue of Andromeda, and, besides, temporarily interrupted by the task of enlarging and improving his studio, the President has not this year taken that conspicuous position which he usually occupies. He is content to maintain without enhancing his reputation. The most important of his three contributions is The Bath of Psyche (243), in which, warned, as we suppose, by the experience of Mr. Poynter in painting his 'Diadumene,' he has represented a whole-length, life-size figure partly draped. Nearly in profile to our left, she is standing at the side of a bath of white marble and is in the act of dropping her last garment before she enters the water, where her form is reflected in reverse. Her very fair flesh is with choice art (the value of wh ciate) n its purpl to col least, keep assi solidi mode if the harm prove blue Soliti yet s is a

N° 3
'Psy
of th symp from her medi sion elega the c to us still a pict a life high surfa brea lurid of su dun-sea's
and of h in th in ab we s in k whic
and of h whit devi who natu to a as c tifu bou
H four desc our to h like mer
In i qui has the not is a
the vie wat bre
gro wh
In res wit wo wit sky cor ser by in sh
Ge

of which few but painters will adequately appreciate) relieved upon the white linen, and this in its turn is set off by the contrast with the deep purple of the curtain which extends from column to column behind the goddess. At present, at least, this curtain seems to be a little out of keeping with the carnations it was employed to assist. If the flesh were rosier, if greater solidity were imparted to it by the additional modelling the artist intends to bestow on it, and if the purple of the curtain were reddened, the harmony of the whole would, we fancy, be improved. Above the curtain appear an intensely blue sky and the brilliant white of summer clouds. Solitude (166) illustrates that luxurious and yet serious sentiment of which Sir Frederic is a master. In this picture as well as in 'Psyche' the colour and lighting are elements of the design. They are at once finely and sympathetically employed. Spring is draped from head to foot in cool white, and rests her cheek upon her hand. She is lost in meditation, and looks down with an expression that is rightly conceived. The design is elegant, the pose is apt, and there is poetry in the coolness of the light which reveals the figure to us. The poetry we recognize in 'Solitude' finds still more emphatic expression in the companion picture Sir Frederic names Tragic Poetess (310), a life-size, full-length figure, seated on a terrace high above the sea, the dark and glowing surface of which is broken by long ridges of breaking waves and their lines of foam. The lurid sky darkens overhead, and the brassy glare of sunset divides the horizon sharply from the dun-coloured clouds; a paler gleam marks the sea's edge. The poetess sits in a marble chair, and her hands are arranged to express the passion of her mood, which appears even more intensely in the fixed outlook of her dreamy eyes, that, abstracted from the world, gaze beyond us while we study her form and features. Her dress is in keeping with the theme: a pale blue pallium, which she draws close about her head and bust, and a purple stola which covers nearly the whole of her person, and leaves little to be seen of the white tunic underneath. This drapery has been devised with characteristic care by the painter, who always makes a point of studying beauty in nature and at the same time of paying attention to archeology. Consequently his draperies are as correct and true to history as they are beautiful. No. 243 is the picture which has been bought with the Chantrey Fund.

MR. HOOK.

Having already introduced to our readers the four landscapes of Mr. Hook, we need not now describe them at length, but we may confine ourselves principally to such comments as seem to be needed. A Dutch Pedlar (309), the Cuypp-like view of the Rhine in the golden light of summer afternoon in Holland, is the one we prefer. In it light softened by vapours is treated with exquisite feeling and the subtlest art, and the river has that brightness of colour and tone in which the Dutch landscape painters delighted, although not all of them attained it. The horizon is, as is always the case in Holland, low; the lines of the prospect are level and nearly parallel; the view of the stream is marked by boats slowly wafted towards us from the distance by a gentle breeze; the banks are protected by projecting groynes, which give spaciousness to the water, while they serve to grade it and beguile the eye. In the foreground are the pedlar, his team of resting dogs, their burden (a little cart loaded with children and other "small wares"), and a woman waiting for the ferry boat, which drifts with the current towards the landing-place. The sky for fineness and delicate brilliance may be compared with the water. It is partly veiled by semi-diaphanous clouds whose edges are touched by the sun, while their long reflections quiver in the stream where the tardy breeze can hardly shake them. Not Cuypp at his best; nor Van Goyen, one of the finest masters in this line;

nor Vlieger, a first-rate man where air and level water are concerned, has charmed us more effectually than Mr. Hook, who has added colour in a higher key than these able Dutchmen ventured on. Next to 'A Dutch Pedlar' we rank the Cornish coast scene of Last Night's Disaster (75). The heaps and hollows of the sand, and all the sea in the foreground, glitter in the sun, and form a contrast to the blackness of the wreck and the tumultuous ocean in the mid-distance and background, which takes faint shadows from the sable and ashy white of the storm clouds that fly through the upper air before the remnant of the gale. The still-vexed ocean was never more sympathetically painted even by Mr. Hook. He has dealt with the hollows of the furious surges dashing upon the sand, and depicted the foaming wilderness without in an irreproachable manner. The third example is another coast scene, very different from the last in its motives and subject. Named A Jib for the New Smack (249), it depicts a perfect calm, the warm, pearly atmosphere of a Cornish summer passing into autumn—a serene period which the fishermen of the West often devote to building and mending their small vessels. Three "sailor-men" such as these sit near the cliff's edge overlooking the sea, and they are gravely discussing the right cut for a new jib which, a mass of white (it used to be brown), lies on the knees of two of them. Duly to appreciate his work we must know the men whom Mr. Hook has taken for models. They look like what they are, strong, civil, sober, and independent; owners of their own boats and builders of their own harbours; as honest as they are incapable of sponging, lying, or bullying. They are so vigorously painted that we think that in this work Mr. Hook's figures are (contrary to his wont) almost as admirable as the delicious landscape in which they are set. Notice the colours of their faces, hair, and hands, and the deliberate gravity of the expressions and attitudes, the intelligent earnestness of the sail-maker and his attention to the man who speaks eagerly. On the shore below lies the new smack in the builders' hands. Its black is invaluable in the chromatic scheme of the whole. One of the most charming parts is the receding line of cliffs against whose base the tide is pressing; the beauty of the drawing is conspicuous here. The ripe corn on the summit looks pale, and the verdure on the cliff is subtly harmonized with the sombre grey of the underlying slate. If anything be finer in painting than this portion it is the sheeny surface of the sea, exquisitely graded to the horizon through a hundred tints and lights of infinite variety. The fourth picture is called Breakfasts for the Porth (317), and perfectly represents a numerous class of Mr. Hook's works. It is distinguished by sumptuous colour, the aerial perspective and exquisite painting of the sea creeping along the cliffs, which recede to the distant Land's End and its outlying islets; by the air, which is fresh as nature and without a cloud; while the group of fish lying on the beach in front is a collection of lovely colours. The scene is a little rocky Cornish cove, and the light is that of early morning. Taking these pictures together or singly, we may say that the artist never did better and has not always done so well.

MR. LOGSDAIL.

A picture that will very much surprise the exhibition-loving public, and, with certain unimportant reservations, thoroughly delight "the profession," is Mr. Logsdail's Ninth of November (1028), representing the progress of the Lord Mayor's Show westwards, with the Bank and the Exchange behind the crowded pavements. The canvas is large and the foreshortening capital. Every face and figure has true and fresh character and expression, without the least artifice or attempt at sentiment or poetry of any kind. Abundance of study and a good deal of character, depicted with considerable humour by the artist, is to be discovered in the compact crowd on the pavement before the Bank, including banjo men, orange-sellers, soldiers, idlers innumerable, and police on foot. The effect of sunlight after rain, reflected from the wet pavement and obscured by vapours driven athwart the scene, has been carefully studied, and, barring a slight superfluous hardness, it is brilliantly and truly rendered. This work, in fact, is a strong and vivid representation of the subject; a little softness, a lighter touch here and there, and more breadth and simplicity of the masses (obtainable by consolidating the local colours, lights and shadows) would add immensely to the artistic charm of one of the remarkable pictures of the year.

MR. POYNTER.

Closely occupied with his large work 'The Queen of Sheba's Visit to Solomon,' Mr. Poynter has been able to send to the Academy only a comparatively minor work, On the Temple Steps (866), in which, while he has preserved the fine classic motives and pure taste we expect from him, he has developed a sweeter and purer sort of colour and richer tones than formerly. A steep flight of steps of white marble leads from an antique town on the seashore to the acropolis and the fane upon its platform which overlooks the land. From between the tall cypresses and gorgeous oleanders guarding the staircase we see the dark blue waves, the distant cliffs in the gloom of a cloud shadow, and a ship with white sails hastening to the port. This landscape is striking in its dignified sentiment and lurid beauty, as well as thoroughly original. Close to where we are supposed to stand a slender girl, scarcely adolescent, has stationed herself with fruit and other refreshments for those who have climbed so far. The bread, melons, and pomegranates are heaped in splendid masses of colour upon a table. The damsel is dressed in a loose white tissue, through which her limbs are partly seen; she leans with crossed arms against the parapet, and shades her face from the sunlight with a red palm fan. Her figure is elegance itself, and her air could not be more graceful, natural, or Greek. The colour of the cut melons is not satisfactory. Pea Blossom (212) also marks the artist's improvement in flesh painting, and proves that he has nearly mastered the secret of that red and white

Which Nature's own sweet and cunning hand laid on, and that he has made clear and fair the roses and greys of his carnations. It is a life-size, half-length figure of a lady in a modern dress of pure white, wearing a white fillet of the Empire round her brown hair; she moves to our left and looks at us with her dark blue eyes. She holds a basket of silvery white pea blossom, which makes beautiful colour with the soundly modelled and admirably drawn flesh and the white costume.

MR. G. D. LESLIE.

This artist contributes to the Academy two pictures, which are quite as charming as those he formerly delighted us with. The more important of them is called The Terrace (258). From a terrace in front of an ancient house we overlook a stately pleasure rich in verdure, distinguished by tall trees, and warm with light reflected from the rosy clouds above. The white stone parapet is dashed with lichens, and its weather-worn balustrades combine with the darker dress of a young lady, who has seated herself on the top. Apart from the beauty and refinement of these elements, her figure is delightfully English, graceful, and pure. Few faces in the exhibition are more tender and expressive; she looks forward as if waiting for some one who she knows is sure to come. So we read her placid air and the reposeful ease of her attitude as she leans lightly on one hand, while the other rests in her lap. The coloration of the picture excels in the way its painter affects, but it is not mannered in being centred, so to say, upon the lady's light indigo-blue dress, with white frills at the elbows and bust. Her light brown hair, being heaped in classic masses about her comely face, sets off its sweet and pure look and adds to the refinement of the whole. The Monks of Abingdon (295) is a charming example of Mr. Leslie's fondness for silvery and pale olive hues in concert with sober and low-toned verdure, a sky filled with rosy gold, but not too bright for harmony, and a broad and soft, almost uniform and shadowless effect of daylight sinking into twilight. The warm grey buildings of the famous abbey rise behind some trees and face us. Two monks are afloat in a punt upon the Thames. The scene is one of perfect peace. The leisurely movements of the monks, the citron-like dark olive of the water, whose smooth surface is hardly broken by a ripple telling of the current, the motionless boughs, the tawny leaves that drop and float away, the pure calm of the sky, and the rocks on their homeward flight have been combined by the artist to convey that sense of repose in which the pathos of his picture is to be found.

MR. WILLIAM WYLLIE.

Beyond question the new ground—if such the bottom of the sea may be called—which Mr. William Wyllie has pitched upon will command the admiration of the exhibition-going public. The painter struck on a good idea when he decided to depict the contents of what he not very happily calls Dory Jones's Locker (81). He has depicted the bottom of the sea under about fifty fathoms of warmish-grey water, where the light, scarcely dimmed in its passage downwards, reveals as through a sort of haze the huge wreck of an ancient ship, the quaint rig of which attests how long ago she sank to where she rests undisturbed by storms and billows which torment the sea overhead. The fishes swim between the masts and the still-standing yards and other tackle, and amid tangled ropes that droop and sway with the flowing and ebbing of the tides. She sank at her anchor, and it is easy to see that a chain extends from her hawse-holes to the huge rusty bulk conspicuous in the foreground, where the flukes rise on high, and long and slender dog-fish and herrings, whose silvery sides gleam in the light as they turn towards us, swim round about them. The sea-floor is a wilderness of sea anemones, weeds of various growths and hues. A great conger eel threads his way, like a snake, between the tangle and stone. Here and there lies a bone; a human skull, to which clings a star-fish, lies near the centre, close to a little heap of stones. Apart from the strangeness of the subject the treatment is original and sympathetic. The colour is extremely good, and the general effect deserves the warmest praise. To learn what the bottom of the sea is like Mr. Wyllie examined it repeatedly from a diving-bell, which thus became the first sub-aqueous studio upon record. This artist contributes to the Water-Colour Room a large and able drawing named The Teutonic leaving Liverpool (1307), which is practically a study in black and grey relieved with warmer tones. The huge ship is going slowly down the Mersey in gusty weather, and she ploughs her way through olive-green and dun-coloured water, which the wind dashes against her sides in a way the artist always treats with truth and spirit. Her red flag straining in the wind proves the strength of the gale, which, nevertheless, has not the power to make the big hull roll, although close to her a fussy tug, rolling furiously, drags along a lighter and a train of small boats in a most peremptory manner, and the masts of a distant ship reel slightly in the wash of the great steamer which has passed her. As a harmony of black and grey in many degrees of tone this beautiful piece is almost as fortunate as in the draughtsmanship of the vanishing line (with its exquisitely fine curve) of the big ship's bulwark and the portholes beneath it, which diminish in the most cunningly delineated perspective. Another drawing of nearly equal merit and similar qualities is H.M.S. Exmouth (1615), the whole-length portrait of a large iron-clad ram just launched in the Medway, near Sheerness, with the Admiralty flag at the fore, the royal standard at the main, the British ensign at the mizzen jury-masts. Here again the beautiful drawing of the hull will be delightful to those who can appreciate it fully, and all can enjoy the fine coloration at large of both these works, as well as their wealth of local colours.

MR. HENRY MOORE.

Mr. Moore ought to be appointed Sergeant Painter to Neptune, with Mr. Brett for Principal Painter in Ordinary of the Shores and Islands. Mr. Hook reigns elsewhere. Mr. Moore, although in several ways a great sufferer during the past year, will not damage his reputation at the Academy by his masculine Summer Time (257), his principal work, a superbly coloured view of the waters near the Channel Islands. The waves are marvellously drawn and painted; they are of the deepest, clearest, and most varied blue, and they rise in large and seemingly confused, but really well-ordered masses, while their crests are torn off and scattered by a brisk breeze. The remoter atmosphere, being softened by the spray, betrays the presence of vapours, which give breadth, without loss of brilliancy, to the whole picture, and slightly subdue the harshness of the detached and rugged masses of white clouds tinged with gold which race along the brilliant azure of the sky. To this the same artist's picture Storm Brewing (544) forms a contrast. He has again taken us out into the open sea. The time is nearly midday. Rain comes from the distance to close the view, and, owing to undercurrents, unexpected waves come to the surface to throw themselves into the air. Among the mass of white clouds, which, touched with rose and pallid gold, seem as if they are more than the atmosphere can carry, it is easy to see that rain is falling in torrents from one level to the next. Stealing along the horizon, a tall ship keeps on her way athwart the lonely deep. This is so impressive a picture that one might well fancy one heard the gusty murmur of the wind, the wash and hissing of the billows, and, now and then, a mutter from the cloudland overhead. In The Marshes, Yarmouth, Isle of Wight (501), is a radically different work. It is a smaller picture, and, with that poetic sympathy which almost all the world delights to find in landscape art, represents a late October morning. The mist is closing between us and the distant hills, and is drawing soft veils over shallow pools, which spread themselves between low ridges. This is a lovely piece of colour and very fine in tone.

MR. JOHN BRETT.

Cognate with the last-named group of splendid studies of vivid harmonies of light and colour are the fine coast pieces of Mr. John Brett, whose chief contribution is his Echoes of a Far-off Storm (472), which depicts a sandy bay. The fine sand spreads from cliff to cliff in full sunlight, and the rugged points of underlying rock, rich with the strong dark hues of a hundred weeds, are crowned with the blackest mussels. Waves coming in from the level ocean floor (where there is not wind enough for a ripple) throw themselves in long white lines against the beach and the debris of the cliffs, thus bearing testimony to the influence of tempests beyond our ken. The very pale blue sky is graded lighter to the horizon, and, as often in Mr. Brett's pictures, a filmy veil of vapour floats landward across the mid-distance. The painter is at his best in the last-named part of his picture, nor is he much less fortunate in painting the deep sea pool at the foot of the foremost rock, filled as it is with water more brilliant than the finest aquamarina. Harlyn Bay (513) illustrates vividly late summer weather—a reaped cornfield that, from a hill, overlooks a calm blue sea which creeps with gentle ripples to the shore. The flatness of the sand is admirable, and so is the aerial perspective of the distant cliffs, where headland follows headland to the horizon. We shall say something about Mr. Brett's other two pictures in a future article.

MR. T. FAED.

This artist, who seldom fails to contribute to the popularity of the Academy, is more than usually fortunate this year in three pictures of subjects such as he has made his own. The Shepherd's Wife (445) is a pathetic incident sincerely and justly represented, with a sort of feeling which reminds us of M. Israëls, but with a freshness M. Israëls has lost. A well-favoured woman is standing at her cottage window and gazing anxiously on a snow-covered landscape. The flakes fall thicker and thicker, and drift into dense masses as far as she can see along the hillsides where her husband is. She is pressing one hand to her chin, and her expression could hardly be more sincere. With her light blue dress and its brown and red skirt the painter has, according to his wont, made excellent colour in combination with the humble furniture and ornaments of the room. Apart from these good points it suffices to say that the technique of the work is worthy of one who is a master of the brush and of a firm, light, and deft handling. Highland Tramps crossing a Headland (285) marks a departure unusual for Mr. Faed. The scene is a wild shore, close to the edge of a furious sea. A stalwart fellow, thin, worn, and grizzled before his time, trudges half recklessly yet resolutely onwards against a strong rain-laden gale, and leads his wife, who clutches his arm. She, while drawing back the shawl from her face, looks anxiously forward on the path which the hurrying billows soon must cover. With her other hand she leads a little boy, whose shivering lips alone are seen below the edge of the hat he presses to his head against the wind. All these figures are designed with thorough vivacity and sympathy. The picture is spontaneous, and in just keeping with itself. In short, it is long since we saw a better of the kind from any one. The third of Mr. Faed's pictures is called The Anxious Look-out, is numbered 225, and has for its motto:—

Ah! many a morn in sunshine bright
Is born of a tempestuous night.

The motive of the design is similar to that of 'The Shepherd's Wife,' but the methods of illustrating them and the artistic materials of the works are quite different. A fisherman's young wife stands on the beach, where wild surges break at her feet; her two children clasp her dress, and they all gaze seaward in alarm. Their expressions are faithful, spontaneous, and sincere. We are charmed by the graceful simplicity of the comely matron's figure, and do not know which to prefer of the children.

MR. P. GRAHAM.

Like Mr. Faed, Mr. P. Graham is faithful to the Academy at a time when some of his brethren contribute freely to other galleries. Low Tide (215) belongs to a category of Mr. Graham's works with which our readers are already familiar, but it is more solid and sincere than most of them. It is a telling coast piece, where a strong and brisk breeze has caused the blue water to lap against a rough natural jetty of rocks covered with mussels and weed, such as Mr. Graham has known how to paint since his boyhood. A black boat of Berwick-upon-Tweed, with a lowered russet sail, has reached this spot, and is about to land her cargo of fish. Some women wait with their creels. Departing Day (190) has for its motto

The mist-robed mountain-tops,
Crowned with the glory of the setting sun.

It depicts with much effect, and the vigour we expect from Mr. Graham, a narrow valley darkened by the shadows of the hills and clouds as well as flushed with fiery gold light. White drift, of the most solid kind, flies before the wind. A woman with a creel full of peat upon her back trudges along the rough path. It is undoubtedly a vivid example of the skill of a highly popular artist.

MR. W. D. SADLER.

Among the genre pictures of the year few will give so much pleasure as the thoroughly characteristic The Hunting Morn (1034) of this capital artist. The new work is bright; the painter's touch is crisp and his finish is sufficient, but not very searching. The scene is the breakfast-room of an old mansion early on a sunny morning. Three red-coated men seated at the table are discussing the prospects of the day with an old squire of the florid type celebrated by Fielding, which has become, so to say, fossilized on the stage and in "illustrated" literature, the most recent instance being the humorous sketches of Mr. Randolph Caldecott. The scene is the more like an episode in an eighteenth century novel because the inevitable domestic chaplain in his black coat appears at the corner of the table and takes tea from the hands of the buxom young lady whose duty it is to occupy the head of the table. This capital picture is remarkable for its brilliant yet soft lighting, the cleverness with which the local colours have been massed—a manifest improvement in the artist's method—the simplicity of the treatment at large, and the skilful painting of its accessories. Home-brewed (1012), by the same artist, shows that, at least in the choice of its subject, he has looked back upon his former successes, and, perhaps unconsciously, continued a vein already well-worked. We have the door of the King's Head, an old-fashioned country inn where an aged host obsequiously presents his own choice beer in tall glasses to some ancient gentlemen. One visitor, standing a little apart, holds his glass to the light and criticizes it with the air of an expert. Of course motives developed in the manner we have described are rather stagey and conventional. Apart from this the story of the picture is well told in a spirited design, and with a technique much better than Mr. Sadler's used to be.

MR. CALDERON.

On the pictures by the Keeper of the Royal Academy in this exhibition we have already printed some notes. The most important of them is Hagar in the wilderness (327), sitting on a rude natural bench of rock, and half supported by a loftier slab which, rising behind it, shelters her from the declining sun, and thus casts a cool shadow, most valuable in the chiaroscuro as well as in the coloration and light and shade of the design, which—embodied with few colours and a broad and massive grouping of the elements of all kinds, and a very bright and clear illumination—is the more telling because it is extremely simple. The hapless mother is a highly expressive figure. Her face is at once pathetic and poetical. The shadow rising as the sun sinks behind the distant hill is a good point in a meritorious design. Lady Betty (444) is a work of a class the artist has previously done well in: a three-quarters, life-size figure of a handsome lady seated in a chair and turned a little sideways. The features are lifelike and their expression of vivacity is spiritedly rendered. The face is turned towards the front abstractedly, and with a serene and musing air, as if her attention had been called away from her surroundings. This is happily expressed; it does not often appear in art. Her dress of red is trimmed with brown fur. The handling of the picture is clear and firm, and the whole work is agreeable; it would be still more so if it were richer in half tints. A half-length portrait of Miss Evelyn Maud

(403) is good in itself and commendable for the painting of the costume, which is enriched with gold brocade.

MR. VAL PRINSEP.

Diva Theodora Imperatrix (346), a large picture with life-size, full-length figures, is an unusually ambitious effort to deal seriously with a tragical subject. Such themes are often selected by French painters, who are a much better-read body than their brethren on this side of the Channel, and possess wider sympathies, incomparably greater courage, and larger technical resources. The more credit to Mr. Prinsep, who, preferring Paris to Piccadilly, has often chosen noble and romantic themes, such as 'Odin,' 'The Unwise Virgins,' and 'Berenice,' although buyers did not always appear—such has been the case with more than one of the Academy's greatest men. In the group before us he has sought to represent that wonderful woman who rose from the obscurity of the bear-keeper's home to be the wife of Justinian I., and, through him, mistress of the Eastern world. Mr. Prinsep has adopted for his model throughout his picture the bright, clear, somewhat hard and sharp definitions of the famous mosaic in the apse of San Vitale's at Ravenna, and has to a considerable extent accepted the light hues, the sparkle of the ornaments, and the luminous coloration of the mosaic. He was bound to find a likeness of the Empress in the same picture, which was finished under her own auspices three years before her death. Her erect figure is at once austere and stern, although as if nerved with suppressed passion, and altogether she looks as if she faced a body of spectators, not altogether satisfied nor impotent, whom she might not fear, although she could not afford to defy them, and with whom there must needs be a dreadful reckoning when the time came. The pallid face, the somewhat sunken and cruel eyes, the narrow red lips, the cheeks a little flattened by time, and the dark hair compactly banded on the forehead, are true to the mosaic, which is a wonderful piece of work, and due to an artist of rare capacity. In the picture before us the Empress stands as if on the step of her throne, and rests one hand on the head of the golden lion which serves as an arm of her gorgeous chair; behind the throne is a splendid mosaic of Christ in Majesty and surrounded by the angelic choir. Theodora wears a sumptuously jewelled crown of the Byzantine type, a golden breastplate thickly inlaid with precious stones, and a heavy purple mantle, the weight of which is partly borne by an attendant on her left, while on the other side another dame holds a fan for her mistress. It is pleasant to be able to praise the style and other cultured elements of this creditable work. A minor production of the same hands brings the artist before us as a designer of genre of a more playful kind than usual. It is called Among the Brambles (96), and depicts part of a garden or private grounds, with a thicket including a blackberry bush laden with fruit, which two pretty young girls and a boy in blue are picking. Of course a picture with such a subject depends for its charm upon the spontaneity, grace, and beauty of the manner in which the design is carried out. On this account we wish the colouring had been warmer, gayer, and brighter; the faces, the expressions of which are first rate, touched with a lighter hand; and the surface throughout more delicate and even.

MR. FILDES.

This Academician contributes a subject picture and three portraits to the exhibition. The first is comparatively unimportant, but it aptly represents a number of pictures of Venetian subjects for which we are already indebted to the artist, but it is no better, and is probably the last of the category. A Daughter of the Ghetto (20) is a life-size figure of a slender young girl carrying a copper vessel of the well-known sort, and passing a stall laden with fruit, the colours and diverse textures of which have been employed to set off the pretty damsel, whose dress of pink and red shawl drawn over her head give distinction to the animated expression and naïve air of the maiden of Mr. Fildes's fancy. Of course, Mr. Fildes makes the most of the copper pot and the rich complexion of the girl. Very full of spirit indeed, most effective, brilliant, and deftly painted, is the highly characteristic portrait of Mrs. Thomas Agnew (303), a life-size figure seated at a table, wearing a purple dress enriched with white (a combination often seen in flowers), and looking up with a kindly smile.

MR. E. A. ABBEY.

We may now turn to an effective study of the "qualities" on a large and difficult scale, his first achievement in oil colours, by the renowned book illustrator of New York. It is an original and charming exercise in tone, tint, and line, each in a low key and all as beautifully harmonized as we could wish them. In A May Day Morning (109) we catch a glimpse of what Herrick saw when he went "a-maying" with his Corinna:—

Get up, get up for shame, the blooming morn
Upon her wings presents the god unshorne.
See how Aurora throws her faire
Fresh quitted odours through the air;
Get up, sweet slug-a-bed, and see
The dew bespangling herie and tree.
Each flower has wept, and bow'd toward the east,
Above an hour since, yet you not drest,
Nay! not so much as out of bed;
When all the birds have mattedens sey'd,
And sung their thankful hymnes; 'tis sin,
Nay, profanation to keep in,
When as a thousand virgins on this day
Spring, sooner than the lark, to fetch in May.

Then while Time serves, and we are but decaying,
Come, my Corinna, come, let's goe a Maying.

A lover and his lass are tripping along a garden path, near a wall laden with fruit, through an open door in which sunlight pours from the other side like powdered gold. The man is dressed in white, holds a mandolin under his arm, and, laughing gleefully, dances towards us, holding the maiden's hand. She is dressed in a gown of black with white stripes that are cunningly employed to express in the movements of her limbs

A winning wave, deserving note,
In the tempestuous petticoat, and a red and white kirtle. She is, in fact, the most telling element of the picture. On the top of the wall, distinct against the glowing sky, a cock claps his wings and crows loudly, saluting the "god unshorne," whose lustre flushes the edges of the clouds and veils the blueness of the firmament. The grace and spontaneity of the dancers, the broad, soft, and yet luminous effect with its diffused light and softened shadows, and the charms of tone and colour distinguishing this work are such as Herrick himself would delight in, and for it thank a painter possessed by his very spirit. Technically, of course, not a few of the difficulties of exact and searching art are evaded rather than overcome in this picture; more than enough, however, remains to make it one of the remarkable examples of the year.

MR. BRITON RIVIERE.

This Royal Academician's strength lies not in subtle harmonies of tone and colour, nor in what may be called the lyric phase of design, idyllic invention and graceful movements, but in pathetic efforts, touching expressions, accomplished draughtsmanship of a kind directly opposed to Mr. Abbey's, and in deep sympathy with the lives of men and dogs, the humour and the tragedy that belong to them. The Rus in Urbe (224) which is before us is in every respect divided from the "Hesperidean" theme we have just noticed, and yet it is not less sincere and worthy of admiration. The comparatively unpretending picture represents a street scene in a country town. A country lad has ensconced himself in the doorway of a house and sits on the step. He wears a smock frock, a black felt hat with a peacock's feather in it, heavy boots, and rough hose. A half-peeled stick is in his hand. He is not a very bright youth, and he looks at the busy unaccustomed scene in a half-curious, half-negligent way which tells volumes about his intelligence and energy. Not so it is with his companion, a most excited collie dog, round whose neck, which is rigid with wonder at the busy world he sees for the first time, the master's sturdy arm is tightly clasped, while the creature, with ears erect, an open mouth, and quivering tongue, stares with wide eyes at the bustling people round about him. The humour of the design is capital, and nothing could be more spirited than a reading of dog character worthy of Landseer's best time. The dog is admirably painted and drawn, from the fine and passionate energy of his face, the frill of bristles excitement makes rigid about his neck, to the legs that, stiffened to the claws, tremble with emotion. Contrariwise to Mr. Abbey's work, this picture fails where his excels, and its tones lack something of harmony, and its colours are in need of massing and breadth. The smock frock is most of all out of keeping. Mr. Riviere's health having suffered during the past year, he has not been able to complete more than 'Rus in Urbe' and 'Daniel's Answer to the King,' which, as our readers have learnt from our already published description, is now in Manchester.

MR. JOSEPH CLARK.

The artist who, with 'The Sick Child'—that happy compound of Wilkie and Edouard Frère—won distinction and a pleasant place in our memories thirty years ago, contributes to the Academy a piece of genre which either of those masters might own with pleasure. It is called The Cup that Cheers (1117). It depicts, with abundance of humour, a trio of old women grouped at a cottage table, and discussing hot tea, toast, and their neighbours' characters and fortunes. One dame, a capital figure, has poured her tea into a saucer, and, stooping over it, holds it with both her hands, which the artist has ingeniously made to look as if they were all thumbs. Her neighbour, more eager for scandal than hot bohea, leans forward and speaks with both hands raised. The third dame, who attends to the teapot, is a scandalized auditor. The design is first rate. The lighting of the well-painted interior, with its wealth of homely details, is soft, well considered, and true.

MR. HAYNES-WILLIAMS.

This painter, whose views of the interior of the palace at Fontainebleau we admired not long since at the Goupil Gallery, has in The Last Dance (721) sent to the Academy a picture superior to any of its forerunners. In it we have a stately ball-room where morning has vanquished the light of the candles on the walls (where they burn with a smoky glare that is cleverly treated) and the true colours of all the objects have become distinct. A pretty damsel in a pale amber dress sits on a couch of olive satin with a dark and handsome youth at her side, whose deep blue coat contrasts with the neighbouring colours, and gives force to them. A gentleman in brown approaches the pair of lovers, and asks to be allowed to take the last dance with the lady in an inner room. The favoured youth seems a little annoyed by the request, but he will not interfere. Of course the merit of character painting does not depend upon the interest or importance of the incidents an artist chooses to illustrate. The theme of 'The Last Dance' is, we need not say, trivial, but the expressions and actions of the figures are worthy of very high admiration because they are thoroughly true and delicately expressed. Technically speaking, and barring a little paintiness, it would be hard to overpraise the execution of the dresses. The sheen, crispness, and freshness of the garments are given with such felicity as we do not often see at the Salon, while such draughtsmanship as Mr. Haynes-Williams's is much rarer in England, where the training of painters mostly fails in unflinching finish, and in the imitation of textures and substances, and the effects of light upon them. In these matters we are far below Parisian standards. Very few indeed of our artists attempt to rival the exquisite workmanship of Meissonier, Vibert, and Zamacois, and not more than two or three are able even to approach the laboured, but somewhat lifeless fidelity and mechanic success of toiling imitators like M. F. Willems and M. Toudouze. This is the more remarkable because in no country is the characteristic technique of Metsu, Mieris, and Teniers more highly prized than in England. Mr. Williams's work is as happy in its way as that of the Frenchmen who astonish us yearly with faultless portraits of rooms in the Louvre, at Versailles or St. Germain, but his execution is more brilliant, crisp, and intelligent than theirs; it is, therefore, more pleasant to look at. It would be hard to surpass the floor, its brilliant reflections and aerial perspective, the foreshortening of the details of the furniture, the patterns on the various textiles and the wall, or to depict more firmly and more daintily the ornaments and hands and feet of the three figures. To the New Gallery and the Grosvenor Exhibition Mr. Williams sends pictures nearly as good as this, named respectively 'Une Lettre d'Amour' and 'The Sandal.'

MR. STANHOPE A. FORBES.

This gentleman, one of the most successful painters of what may be called minor genre pictures, has this year depicted an auction in a farmhouse parlour with at least as much spirit as he painted 'The Health of the Bride,' and with more brightness and clearness. He calls the picture By Order of the Court (1146), and it includes a numerous body of rustic bidders grouped in standing and sitting rows, while the auctioneer, seated in a chair placed on a table, offers for sale a clock which is held aloft by an awkward lad. A spirited competition goes on between a woman of the better class and her poorer, more demonstrative neighbour. The latter is watched with amusing eagerness by a rough girl at her side and a loutish boy who is placed behind her. All the spectators are capably conceived figures, admirably thought out, and executed with spirit. They are full of movement, highly dramatic and humorous, each man being cleverly connected with his neighbour by means of his looks and actions, while the expressions are extremely various. There is character in such incidents as the teapot being of "Britannia metal," the table ware of hideous patterns, and in company with uncouth figures of "china" in shocking colours. The blue plates, the ancient coal-scuttle, the battered books, and the desk of old mahogany bound with brass—a relic of another generation it must have been hard to part with—are all capital if subordinate points which ought not to be overlooked by those who study the humour of a picture. The lighting of the interior is extremely good, but its colours and chiaroscuro want massing and a simpler order.

MR. F. D. MILLET.

Mr. Millet has more than secured his position by How the Gossip Grew (151), another piece of humour like his 'Anthony Van Corlear' in last year's Academy. It is a delicate and brightly painted interior of a once handsome chamber, retaining traces of the quasi-Greek taste of the brothers Adam in the choice profiles of its decorations and sea-green walls picked out with gold. These forms and colours suit the clear open morning light pervading the room, where two young ladies are placed at a daintily set forth breakfast table. One of them reads aloud from a letter which has just arrived, and the other, listening, stops in the act of drinking tea. The expressions are very engaging, spontaneous, and spirited, and there is no caricature about them—a reticence rare in modern English genre, and reminding us of the better class of French genre. In such examples we expect to find the table equipage of silver as delicate, crisp, firmly painted, and fine in colour and modelling as this bright and delicately toned picture shows; the white tablecloth suits the ladies' pale blue and light amber dresses, as well as the green wall. The whole work has been carried out with good taste and complete research.

MR. H. W. B. DAVIS.

The painter of Picardy Dunes (242) has often depicted the charms of scenes such as Ruysdael and Huysman of Mechlin affected, but he has never done so more sympathetically than in the brilliant and harmonious example before us. The sunlight of an afternoon late in summer pervades the scene, and the long shadows of the sand-ridges and trees are faintly tinged with blue reflected from the sky, and stretch into the hollows on either hand, while the clear and golden light glows on the opposite sides of the ridges and the trees. In the largest hollow sheep are straying in search of the scanty herbage, and the splendid light renders more distinct the solid groups of pines whose green is almost black. One of the most beautiful parts of this fine piece is the sky, below of tender green merging into the warmer golden grey of the horizon, and above of pure turquoise darkening towards the zenith, where rosy clouds are slowly passing. The breadth and sweetness of the picture are equalled by its serenity. In respect to the last-named quality it is an unusually favourable specimen of Mr. Davis's powers at their best. His Ford on the Wye (780) is less poetical, but the mode of painting is equally fine. A very charming feature of this brilliant scene is the clear water racing over the rocky bottom. The light blueness of the sky is not less delightful than its reflection on the smoother spaces of the Wye. The white cattle who have waded into the river are such as Mr. Davis succeeds best with; the brightness of their sides, the azure tints of the shadows on their bodies, and the learned way in which they are reflected in the stream will be recognized by all lovers of nature. A Placid Morning on the Wye (68) is a view from a point quite different from that to which the charms of its reaches have attracted the cheap-trippers and breaks full of excursionists. Bright blue water is running swiftly towards us between low hills, and rippling among the stones. In the halcyon weather two indolent cows, that have come from the near meadow to drink at the stream, lazily raise their heads to look at us; their calves lie on the rich grass, and a wilderness of wild flowers adorns the bank. The sky, which differs from those of the other pictures in being almost entirely blue, is charmingly soft, full of light, and extremely bright.

MR. E. PARTON.

Mr. Parton has long accustomed us to pools, meadows, and silvery pastorals. His most important picture this year shows us that he has gone afield for a new subject, and found it in what he calls In the Heart of Normandy (362), a lovely vista of a stream, the clearness and smooth surface of which serve to reflect the sky and woods in white and grey and green hues that are admirably studied and painted. The sky, indicating autumn, is cloudy, pale, and dark grey and white; while the stream's banks are rich in foliage, which here glows in autumnal russet and gold, and there is splendid with the brilliant green of the second leaf. Upon the level water yellow leaves float slowly towards the front, and a softened light pervades the scene. It is a charming work, full of silveriness, touched with a less emphatic hand, and clearer than formerly. In The Spring

Time (368) represents a backwater of a river like the Thames or the stream of a flatter country. The still, greyish pool is nearly enclosed by tall ranks of last autumn's rushes and feathery wild grass, the seed of which droops in masses above the water; between the slender grey trunks of the trees glimpses may be caught of meadows in bright green; the early foliage is greener still. The whole is a true harmony of silvery greys, whites of various tints, and ashy greens, all in low and tender keys.

MR. C. WYLLIE.

This painter affects low meadows near the sea, shining expanses of mud and sand left bare by the receding tide, and reaches of smooth rivers in brilliant sunlight and clear daylight. In the present exhibition he has taken a new departure by depicting a growing twilight (888) on the Thames, a river-side road, and old houses of the Georgian time, with shops and rooms in which lamps have just been lit. We guess that it is near London because the air is somewhat foul with smoke whose dun and purplish brown mixes with the golden light of the moon, which is rising and gaining strength as she passes from behind the veil of earth-mists and denser air. The picture is decidedly charming in its colour, harmony of tone, and keeping. The reflections trembling as the water glances past us are perfectly fine and true. It is pleasant to find a new subject such as this.

MR. H. BATES.

Pandora (2117), the life-size nude statue in marble which this sculptor has sent to the Academy, has already (p. 443, ante) been praised in these columns. Pandora is kneeling on one knee, and holds her ivory casket on the other. The box is evidently new to her, and she seems to hold it almost timidly with both her hands. There is a brooding expression on her sweet face, which is devoid of that voluptuousness and elfishness and that stony, unsympathetic character which many able sculptors have thought best suited to the expression of Pandora as the gift to man of gods malign. The virginal elegance of the figure, and the classic charm of the bust, hands, and feet, are choice elements in a lovely work. Its spontaneous and natural air and the finish of the whole surface are worthy of the sculptor. The casket bears on its lid a charming group of Pandora descending earthwards, and carved upon its sides in low relief are panels representing scenes in her history. The same sculptor sends No. 2061, a life-size alto-relief in plaster of a dead Christ with two angels, one at the head, the other at the foot. It is conceived in a reverent and somewhat austere manner, well adapted to the future position of the work, which is to be the front of the altar table in the church of the Holy Trinity at Chelsea. The modelling of the nearly nude figure is careful, learned and sound, grave in style, and well finished according to a good type.

MR. ONSLOW FORD.

Perhaps the most conspicuous, and certainly one of the finest things in the Academy this year is the full-size model of the Gordon Memorial (1958), intended for the open space in front of the barracks at Brompton, Chatham. Gordon is seated on the lofty saddle of his camel far above our heads, and holds the famous cane in one hand. He wears a fez and the dress of honour the Khedive bestowed upon him. The trappings of the camel and other accessories tell well in this admirable and spirited group. The veracity of the figure and face of Gordon, his intelligent features, and a certain air of intense enthusiasm, tending to abstraction from things about him, are all that could be desired in this admirable fulfilment of a noble opportunity. The same sculptor has produced two statues for the Maharajah of Durbunjah, Bengal, and intended to decorate the hall of his palace. One of these is Music (2118), a half-draped life-size figure in bronze of a damsel of a slender and supple form and full contours, standing in an easy pose, with her feet near each other, and gracefully holding with one hand a lyre (formed of a goat's horns and a tortoise's shell), while the fingers of the other hand—just withdrawn from the strings of the instrument—are bent with the action of touching the chords. She looks down at the lyre, and seems to listen to its note before striking another. Her lifted brows, opened lips, and dropped eyelids tell us that she is singing to her own music with a veiled voice. The other statue, 'Dancing,' is at the New Gallery, and is described in another column. Mr. Ford has further sent to the Academy No. 2116, the statuette complete in bronze of Peace, of which the model was No. 1944 in the same gallery, 1887, and a bust of Sir Andrew Clarke (1974).

The reader may be glad to have a few notes, in the order of the Catalogue, on pictures to which we shall return by-and-by, but the mention of which will make this article a tolerably complete guide to the visitor on the opening of the exhibition next Monday. Mr. G. A. Storey's The Hungry Messenger (No. 5) is a clever piece of humour of the Puritan time. M. Fantin-Latour's Chrysanthèmes d'Été (13), Roses Trémières (35), and Roses (651) are delightful. Mr. R. W. Macbeth's The Cast Shoe (19) the Academicians have bought with the Chantry Fund, as they have likewise bought Sir F. Leighton's The Bath of Psyche (243). Mr. E. Long's La Pia de Tolomei (26) is a quasi-portrait of a lady in black. After Waterloo: "Sauve qui peut!" (123), the flight of Napoleon I. from the stricken field, is a highly dramatic work by Mr. A. C. Gow, full of incident and passion. Our Village (143), by Mr. H. Herkomer, is a pretty English idyl. The Cloud Chariots (156) is a glowing seascape, by Mr. W. A. Mackworth. We may further mention the Lingering Light (161) of Mr. W. G. Foster, full moonrise over a calm sea; the vigorous melodrama of Sir J. Gilbert, called "Onward!" (186), depicting a knight banneret charging; Mrs. Alma Tadema's Pet Goldfinch (188); Mr. E. Crofts's Whitehall (216), the execution of Charles I.; Mr. M. R. Corbett's Land of Fragrance (233), a charming idyl in his peculiar mood; Mr. McWhirter's Glimpse of Loch Katrine (271) and his Old Sherwood (279); Mr. J. B. Burgess's Freedom of the Press (337), Parisian priests horrified by newspaper attacks on their order, which one of them reads aloud; Sir J. E. Millais's Portrait of Mr. Gladstone and his Grandson (361), a life-size group, which is not his best work; Mr. F. Goodall's capital landscape, The Thames from Windsor Castle (366); Mr. N. Dawson's A Perilous Calling (394), a vivid sea-piece with Scarborough fishing-boats going out of harbour; Mr. G. F. Watts's Patient Life of Unrewarded Toil (437), an old white horse turned out to get his living how he can; Mr. A. Moore's Summer Night (487), half nudities of quasi-Greek girls; the brilliant and powerful Lucerne (554) of Mr. A. T. Nowell; Mr. J. M. Swan's Lioness defending her Cubs (614); the Earl of Carlisle's The Sacred Lake, Karnac (664); Mr. Lavery's The Bridge at Gretz (679); Mr. A. J. Hook's On the Lobster Ground (700); Mr. J. Charlton's Music of the Eager Pack (751); Mr. Chevallier Taylor's The Last Blessing (758); the Thistle-finches (951) of Mr. B. Hook; and Mr. A. East's October Glow (1104).

THE NEW GALLERY, REGENT STREET. (First Notice.)

THIS collection consists of nearly four hundred and fifty pictures, drawings, and sculptures. There are some fine things, the greater number of which are mentioned below, but the character of most of the pictures is extremely disappointing, and does not promise well for the future of British painting if, as some think, the most able and gifted of our artists are represented in the galleries of Regent Street. It is our bounden duty to say that the large majority of the pictures and sculptures betray a deplorable neglect of those graces of style and gifts of knowledge and finish which collectively make what we call fine art, and the absence of which in any marked degree is fatal to the intellectual or technical excellence of design. On every wall before us it is manifest that learned draughtsmanship is lacking where the ambition of the painters would seem to demand it most. Pure drawing (by which we mean accomplished outlining), faith in the true proportions of the human figure and its minor features, subtleties of execution, and those refinements of the surface which are so dear to artistic eyes, are conspicuous by their absence from at least three-fourths of the pictures. There is no want of vigour—in fact there is a feverish excess of it; but there is great lack of the elegance, taste, modesty, and finish which are the fruits of true culture, loyalty, and sincerity. With the exceptions we mention to-day and a few reserved for a future occasion the paintings as a rule fail to attain that degree of merit that we look for wherever fine art is prized and technical accomplishments are accepted at their true value. Two of the leading supporters of the Gallery, Mr. E. Burne Jones and Mr. Legros, being unrepresented, this exhibition, when compared with its forerunners, has opened under considerable disadvantages. On the other hand, Mr. Watts, Mr. Poynter, Mr. Alma Tadema, Mr. G. D. Leslie, Mr. J. Waterhouse, Mr. E. A. Waterlow, Mr. R. W. Macbeth, Prof. Costa, Mr. Hallé, Mr. D. Murray, the brothers Moore, Mr. J. Parker, Mr. E. Parton, Mr. Sargent, Mr. Adrian Stokes, Mr. Onslow Ford, Mr. A. Gilbert, Mr. C. Wyllie, and Mr. Haynes-Williams have contributed some excellent works.

No one knows better than Sir John Millais the value of sentiment in landscape, and very few indeed have been more happy in imparting that precious quality to the subjects (anything but sensational) that he handles in as masterly a fashion as if he had been a landscape painter all his life. We are all familiar with the creditable attempts of Van Schendel to deal with fogs and fish markets. The rays of the sun penetrating fog in a dense woodland—a subject which has very seldom been chosen by an artist—have never been more successfully dealt with than in Dew-drenched Furze (119), a picture our readers have already heard a good deal about. Sir John has borrowed from 'In Memoriam' a motto which tells us how the sun glows

On these dews that drench the furze,
And all the silvery gossamers
That twinkle into green and gold.

It aptly describes a picture of an autumnal scene in a dense wood, ending in a lofty mass of ruddy beeches, russet oaks, and grey larches, the tops of which are lost in vapours which fill the air. The mist has only just begun to yield to the sun's beams, which search it through and through and reveal the nearer foliage, the dark green of the gorse thicket, and the multitudinous ferns which hide the lower trunks of the trees. The pervading mist has condensed upon the furze, ferns, and leaves, and upon the gossamers, which glitter in silvery films amid the thicket. The firm, frank handling of the foliage and herbage is comparatively new in landscape art; it is, so to say, quite old-master like, and renders every element with that perfect freedom attainable only by a life's studies. Sir John told us truly that, if he had not painted the backgrounds of 'Ferdinand,' 'The Woodman's Daughter,' and 'A Huguenot' in the unflinching way we all know, he would never have gained power to generalize with such mastery—not omitting a touch of real finish—as in the picture before us. Although the pheasant in front is stiff and flat, the work at large deserves high praise for its breadth, simplicity, and homogeneity. Next to its veracity the student will admire its perfect freshness and originality.

One of the most beautiful things here illustrates Mr. Poynter's taste for classic art and antique themes. In grace, simplicity, and taste, although not in size and abundance of incident, No. 55, High Noon, equals the painter's contribution to the Academy, or, indeed, any of his previous works. The scene is the sea-shore, and the only figure is the nude figure of a girl in clear sunlight, with which her unusually rich and bright carnations assort thoroughly. She has just left the water, seated herself on a rock, and, with the fulness of life's enjoyment expressed in every limb, leans sideways and swings her feet, "feeling for cool air," as Browning had it, over a pool which the tide has left upon the sand. To shade her face from the sun she holds a palm-fan, and her dark eyes, skin of bronzed gold, bronze-brown hair, and ruddy girlish lips are distinct in its clear shadow. On the rest of her body—which seems to be, as Herrick said, so fair and ruddy is her flesh—the golden light of afternoon pours. The shadows are a little dark, as if those of an interior had been copied. With these choice carnations the painter has combined, in a harmony he has only attained quite lately, the whiteness of the linen the girl sits on, the darkness of the rocks and sea-weeds, the blue-green sea rippling in the sun, and the tawny colour of the sand. The modelling and drawing of this delicate nudity are first rate.

Of cream enclareted,

Mr. Alma Tadema is a liberal contributor. His two subject pictures, although small in size and comprising only two figures each, represent the most beautiful, if not the most ambitious, phase of his art. One of them is called In the Rose Garden (53), and depicts two damsels of the later Roman Empire. They are resting, in bright sunlight, on a bench of rich yellow Siena marble veined with black and red, into the back of which is inserted a long panel of bronze sculptured with figures. Over one end an enormous rose-bush spreads its arms, thickly laden with blossoms. One of the ladies lies on the seat with her head in the lap of her companion, who, playfully shaking the branches, shakes rose-leaves down upon herself and her friend. The latter is dressed in a tunic of prophet-green, with a tinge of gold to brighten it, and a mantle of warm dark grey, tinged with green, wrapped close about her; her elegant sandals are of citron colour set with dark blue stones, cut en cabochon, and laced with golden cord. The other maiden wears pale ash-green, and her bright auburn hair is bound with a gold fillet enriched with green stones. The sculpture on the back of the seat represents scenes in the life of man, his bathing at birth, his discipline at school, his initiation into the mysteries of religion, and so on. The beauty of the faces of the damsels, their spirited and spontaneous expressions, the vivacity of their attitudes, not less than the charms of the coloration and illumination of this picture, which are singularly brilliant and vivid, make No. 53 even more attractive than most Tademas. Eloquent Silence (51), by the same artist—another brilliant delineation of open air and sunlight on a white marble bench—displays very different tone and colour schemes, and a mode of lighting which is like, yet curiously distinct from, that of 'The Rose Garden,' with which it was never intended to "match." A dark-haired maiden, soon to be a bride, is represented sitting on a bench with both her hands in her lap, while she looks somewhat abstractedly before her, and with a dreamy and yet pleased expression seems to be contemplating her own future. At her side sits a stalwart, soldierly young noble, who, leaning forward, supports his chin in the palm of his left hand, while, with the walking staff in his right hand, he strives to mask his own emotions by pushing away the leaf of a flower which has fallen on the floor near his mistress's foot. His martial air assorts well with his sculpturesque features; his mantle, fastened at the shoulder with a fibula bearing the she-wolf of Rome, his muscular yet elegant arms, and the complex lacing of his sandals, bespeak his social status and his character as plainly as if we knew the name of his gens or the number of his slaves. A noble culture marks his face, and gives dignity to its fineness and intelligence to the submission with which he awaits the lady's time to end the eloquent silence of the interview. The lady's bust and arms are like those of a fine antique statue; her admirably designed drapery is especially beautiful; nothing could be more delicate and true than the pleats extending from her girdle to the hem above it; they are perfect in drawing, modelling, and in the aptitude of their design, which is subtly expressive of the forms within. Admirable, too, is the fitting of her dress about the shoulders as well as that of the larger folds enclosing her lower limbs, every line of which has been studied with care and with a full knowledge of the texture of the material, the weight of the folds, and their way of hanging down in some parts, and in others adapting themselves to the figure of the wearer. The effect of light upon the local colour of the fabric deserves as much attention as the modelling of the garment, exhaustive as the latter is. The pose of the lady's hands, the fingers of which approximate yet seemingly hesitate to lock with each other, evince the unremitting studies of the artist, his rare insight, and, above all, his close sympathy with the subject of his work, that is to say the figure of the damsel whom his imagination created ere his skill on the canvas achieved her counterfeit presentation.

Among the more carefully studied, brilliant, and sympathetic portraits in this exhibition is that of Miss McWhirter (52), daughter of the well-known landscape painter, a young girl wearing a blue skirt, a pink bodice, a large straw hat, and brown gloves, colours which have been effectively treated and ably harmonized with each other and the couch covered with dark blue near which she stands. The colour of the flesh and the colours of the dress are concentrated and emphasized by the scarlet poppies in the lady's hat. The picture may be compared with Mr. Alma Tadema's portraits in the Academy.—With her husband's pictures may be noticed Mrs. Alma Tadema's exercise in varieties of warm and cool white, with blue, and the carnations of a young girl, dressed in pure white (which sometimes tells as warm grey), who is playing at battledore and shuttlecock in a white chamber with a fireplace lined with Dutch tiles whose ground is white. It is called Battledore and Shuttlecock (148), and the title refers to the manner in which the girl plays for the amusement of a child sitting behind her in the lap of a nurse. A smaller production by the same artist is Self-Invited (118), showing how a little girl, with a face of inquiry and carrying a doll, has come to a room at the open door of which she stands. The face and attitude are natural, sincere, and spontaneous. The chiaroscuro and colour have been, like those of the painter's more important work, executed with care and a refined sense of the qualities which demand only a crisper and firmer touch to ensure that brilliancy of surface which is the making of such studies. A large panel of Dutch tiles painted in blue is an invaluable element in the coloration and chiaroscuro of this work.—Mr. Haynes-Williams contributes a sparkling and successful example of his invention and technical power in the interior of a gorgeous seventeenth century chamber which he calls Une Lettre d'Amour (4), where, through an open doorway we see into another room. Near the door a comely damsel, who has started up from her seat on receiving a letter, and is deeply touched by its contents, is retiring to read and consider them alone. Apart from the spontaneity of the figure's design, the brilliance of the colour, air, and lighting of the place, the characteristic art of this picture deserves the criticism we have elsewhere offered on the artist's contributions to the Academy. He has another specimen at the Grosvenor Exhibition, the title of which is 'The Sandal.'

Mr. C. E. Hallé's single figure of a knight mounting the rampart of a fortress (210), which we have already described, contains some very excellent painting of armour, its reflections, and local colour. His The Maiden and the Bird (201) has been improved since we mentioned it by its original title. A charming lady, evidently much in love, stands near a closed door in a garden wall, and is in the act of placing a letter where it may be found by-and-by. With a sort of appealing smile she turns to a dove fluttering near a fountain at her side, and bids the bird not to betray her. The graceful sentiment of the picture matches its soft lighting and agreeable colouring. In Fairyland (3) is a sympathetically designed figure of a little girl seated on the steps of a library. She has raised her eyes from the story she has been reading, and is looking forward in a day-dream. The Portrait of Sir C. Russell (206) is an excellent likeness, well executed. The whole-length figure of Mrs. Harry Taylor (41) is already known to the readers of p. 219, ante. Mr. Hallé's painting is a little thin, and there is less impasto than we should like to see.

A group of beautiful and natural landscapes, which may be said to indicate the vast improvement made of late in this country, may well be noticed at this point. Among them the fine, broad, harmonious, and tender Fallow (61) of Mr. C. Wyllie deserves a prominent place. It depicts Bosham, in Sussex, in all the glowing softness of a summer calm on an estuary in the mid-distance, the beautiful sea further off, and a great meadow in fallow, all alight with scarlet poppies and white horse daisies, which glitter among the sparse grass, while further off are the old village (whence Harold embarked for Normandy more than eight hundred years ago); its grave and dignified, though small church, which might have seen the great earl ride past with a hawk upon his fist, as he appears in the Bayeux tapestry; the red-roofed houses, old, but far less ancient, clustering near the water; and, further off, the downs rising in tender grey, whose sweet pearly tones are due to vapour drawn from the earth by the sun. In the harbour a few craft loiter, while in the air the clouds are, as a dead poet had it,

Long, and like fishes swimming, so charming are their hues, and so elegant are their forms half merged in the pale turquoise of the sky.—The pathetic mood of Mr. E. Parton is well marked in his "When daylight dies" (149). Its materials are a great grey cloud flushed with gold; a clump of trees with farm buildings in the centre is in the middle distance, half distinct in the still bright, though fading light, and in the leaf-strewn foreground a lady leaning against a tree and contemplating the scene.—Mr. A. Stokes, whose recent landscapes have commanded general admiration, is exceptionally fortunate in A Breaking Wave (97). Almost at our feet the sea is running in wide films and laced with froth and foam upon the level sands, and thus precedes the ponderous dark-green wave which, in all its slow might, rises ere it falls in thunder. The bluish levels of the further sea, the white crests of the distance, and the pale rosy lustre of the sky are all fine elements of a choice coast piece, the companions to which have gone to the Grosvenor Exhibition.—Mr. D. Murray's landscapes in Regent Street possess all the good qualities we have often admired in his pictures. Of these the reader will most enjoy "When daisies pied" (77), a soft and harmonious study of a flat country. Its chief feature is a curving occupation road between a hedge and a land drain, beyond which is a clump of willows and elms.

The re-delicac bread pictur
Mead
the gr still the s
the s leav them whos
and t
The undo apart of in three instr ness colou of M still mist of th coar
and train app stud plea but bod its exh mas
A (31)
Ari sor wh a tr
lyin att
the
the fle he he sec
Ri
bl al he hu sa
T P ou of st
m at
W sh
of n w s t g h
P i V
c d t l a g i a
v

The road is thickly studded with daisies. The delicacy and reticence of the colour and the breadth of the effect charm us, although the picture is not quite free from paintiness. The Meadow Mirror (142) is still more painty, and the greys tend to be chalky. The mirror is a still pool, whose slate-coloured surface reflects the soft white and grey clouds overhead. On the surface the water-lilies and their opened leaves float as if the wind had never touched them. Behind the water is a belt of willows, in whose gaps we see the pale mist-laden meadows and the level distance where all form is lost.

The Gentle Music of a By-gone Day (11) is undoubtedly Mr. Strudwick's best work; and, apart from the artist's Mantegnesque affectations of impossible draperies and artificial "airs," the three lovely damsels seated at music with their instruments charm us by the dreamy tenderness of their expressions. There is much refined colour in the picture.—The October Morning (13) of Mr. T. C. Farrer has a little too much paint; still it is a fine picture of a morning sun on mist and a calm stream. The restful sentiment of the work is acceptable.—In spite of excessive coarseness, a heavy touch, much bad drawing, and a crude surface, Mr. La Thangue's A Portrait (11) of an artist sitting at his easel, and apparently looking intently at a model, is a good study of the qualities. The face is not only unpleasant in its harshness and rough handling, but the features are out of drawing, while the body and legs do not agree. Notwithstanding its merit, such a work ought not to have been exhibited by an artist whose self-respect was not mastered by his vanity.

Although it is not a new picture, the Ariadne (31) of Mr. Watts has not been exhibited before. Ariadne sits on the shore and looks seaward, sorrowful and dishevelled. She is dressed in white, the tonality and local colour of which is a triumph of art, with her red zone loose and lying across her knees. The sentiment of the attitude and the pathos of the whole are more than powerful enough to convince us that when the artist has finished, as he intends to do, the flesh, extremities, and background, and set right the temporary disproportions of the naked arms, here will be a picture inferior to few in the second class of his works. No. 47, Little Red Riding Hood, a little child with widely opened blue eyes, as if she were amazed even more than alarmed by the appearance of one who asked after her aged grandmother, stands by a fence and hughererrand basket. The humour may be called sardonic, and it is spontaneous and genuine. The colour is very agreeable.—Mrs. A. Murch's Portrait of Mrs. Weston (45), life size, seated to our right in an arm-chair, and wearing a dress of deep red, is so spirited and has so much style and energy that it would be first rate if more finished and possessed of a finer surface and choicer draughtsmanship throughout.—Mr. W. B. Richmond sends, besides portraits we shall notice by-and-by, No. 72, a sort of allegory of Spring, in the form of a beautiful young maiden clad in quasi-Greek garments. She is walking through a cloudy landscape, where, as she passes, crocuses start from the sward, the thorns and other trees burst into blossom, and a gleam of light, cleaving the mist-laden air, attends her footsteps, while a score of doves in sheeny plumage hover near her. We hesitate to say if it is the moon we see amid the distant vapours. We do not care for the allegory or the sentiment of the design. It does not seem to be quite fresh; indeed, we think we have met with something of the kind before. But the damsel's spontaneous grace and vigorous movement, and the beauty of the colour centring in her draperies, are most acceptable.—The "O! lovely Spring!" (105) of Mr. G. F. Wetherbee, a sketch of a girl driving lambs in a sunny meadow clad in its freshest green, is exceedingly sympathetic and, broadly speaking, true. But the surface is so rough as to be unworthy of the beauty and vigour of the design, which merited the finest draughtsmanship, harmonious tones, clearer tints, and beauty which is not to be found in the girl's face and figure nor in the almost comical lambs. It is a charming picture, almost spoiled by the painter's recklessness of accomplishment and carelessness of his own future.

In Mr. O. Ford's fine statue called Dancing (399) we have the companion to 'Music,' which is described in our notice of the Academy. A long scarf attached to the back of her head swings as the figure turns rapidly on one foot; this drapery is spontaneously designed and carried out with extreme care and spirit, and it is so highly original and expressive that it aids the movement of the figure in an extraordinary manner. One of her hands is raised above her shoulders, the other extends downwards and outwards, and both unite in maintaining the balance of the figure and give energy to its attitude. The headresses of these statues are picturesque and novel. That of 'Music' consists of an owl, whose wings shift with the movement of the wearer's head; that of 'Dancing' is a parrot, whose wings are disposed in a similar manner.

SALES.

MESSRS. CHRISTIE, MANSON & WOODS sold during last week the following drawings, from the second portion of the Percy Collection:—J. M. W. Turner, Llanthony Abbey, 71*l.* H. Holbein, John Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, 90*l.*

The same auctioneers sold on the 26th and 28th ult. the following, from various collections. Drawings: Birket Foster, A View in the Weald of Kent, with a shepherd and a dog on a road, 157*l.*; The Crockery-Seller, and Feeding the Dogs, 52*l.*; Going to Market, 199*l.* F. Goodall, Felice Ballarini reciting Tasso to the Fishermen of Chioggia, 336*l.* W. Hunt, A Negro Boy, with a candle and a hot-chestnut stove, 63*l.*; Grapes and Apple, 63*l.* W. Wyld, Milan Cathedral, 55*l.* D. Cox, London from the Thames, 53*l.*; Tintern Abbey, 71*l.* C. Fielding, A Lake Scene, with cattle and figures, 168*l.* G. Barret, A Composition, sunset, 58*l.* Harlamoff, A Peasant Girl, 84*l.* J. Israëls, Interior of a Cottage, 126*l.* W. Langley, 'Men must Work, and Women must Weep,' 84*l.* J. Linnell, Haymaking, Midday Rest, 84*l.* T. Lloyd, Taking Home the Cow and Calf, 56*l.*; The Harvest Moon, 162*l.* L. Alma Tadema, Flora, 299*l.* J. M. W. Turner, La Haye Sainte, 78*l.* R. Thorne Waite, On the Sussex Downs, 94*l.* F. Walker, Father's Dinner, 70*l.* S. Prout, Schaffhausen, 52*l.* H. Macalium, Carting Seaweed, on the South Coast, 52*l.* Pictures: V. Capobianchi, The Mandolin Shop, 105*l.* J. Holland, Greenwich, 136*l.* C. M. Keisel, Apple Blossom, 147*l.* J. Breton, Interior of a Normandy Cabaret, with itinerant musicians and peasants playing cards, 640*l.* T. S. Cooper, Canterbury Meadows, with cows and sheep, 162*l.*; Sheep, in a mountainous landscape, 217*l.* E. W. Cooke, Dumbarton Castle, on the Clyde, 409*l.* D. Cox, Stepping Stones on the Conway, 288*l.* F. Dyckmans, A Blind Beggar and Girl, 131*l.* T. Faed, Pot Luck, 624*l.* E. Frère, An Interior, with a mother dressing a boy, 120*l.* K. Halswelle, Dolce far Niente, 462*l.*; Venice, 152*l.* H. Le Jeune, The Ride, 162*l.* J. Linnell, A Hayfield, with a wagon and haymakers, 294*l.*; The Harvest Field, 1,701*l.*; The Road through the Wood, with peasants driving cattle, 1,102*l.* Sir E. Landseer, Uncle Tom and his Wife for Sale, 1,291*l.* Sir J. E. Millais, Asleep, 1,470*l.* W. Muller, A Felucca leaving the Port of Rhodes, 472*l.*; A Woody Landscape, with children and ducks at a pond, 819*l.*; Children sailing a Boat, 1,470*l.*; The Slave Market at Montfaloot, Egypt, 215*l.* W. Mulready, A Landscape, with peasants, team of horses, and poultry in the foreground, 315*l.* L. Alma Tadema, The Studio, 483*l.* Adrian van Utrecht, Turkeys, Geese, and Poultry, 304*l.* L. Gallait, An Italian Mother and Child, 157*l.* T. Creswick, A Woody River Scene in Wales, with a peasant woman crossing a ford, 325*l.* C. Stanfield, The Bay of Palermo, early morning, with boats and figures, 535*l.* G. Chambers, Scheveningen Bay with Dutch Pincks, storm coming on, 147*l.* Sir A. W. Callcott, A Stiff Breeze, 315*l.* G. Lance, A Dead Peacock, with fruit and gold plate, on a table, 115*l.* W. Collins, The Pet Lamb, 115*l.* P. Nasmyth, An Extensive View, from Mr. Blackwell's, Harrow Weald Common, 304*l.*; A Woody Landscape, with cottage and windmill, 273*l.* J. Constable, Carrying Hay, 222*l.*

On Monday last Messrs. Puttick & Simpson dispersed a small private collection of coins. As will be seen, prices ranged high:—Edward VI. crown, 2*l.* 12*s.*; Elizabeth crown, 2*l.* 12*s.*; Elizabeth half-crown, m.m., 2*l.*; an Elizabeth sovereign with the crescent, 6*l.* 10*s.*; another of the same design, but Queen Mary, 7*l.* 10*s.*; a three-pound piece of Charles I., 1642, 10*l.* 10*s.*; a five-guinea piece of Charles II., 1670, 9*l.*; another of the same, with the elephant under the bust, 8*l.* 15*s.*; of James II., 10*l.* 10*s.*; a Queen Anne five-guinea piece, 1706, 9*l.* 15*s.*; a platina Coronation Medal of Victoria (only six were struck in this metal), 8*l.*; a brilliant pattern crown, Mint Master's specimen, 4*l.* 6*s.*; Oliver Cromwell sovereign, 1656, 6*l.*, and crown, 1658, 4*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*; a five-pound piece of George IV., 11*l.*; and a William III. five-guinea piece, 14*l.* The total amount realized was 475*l.*

FINE-ART Gossip.

We shall next week notice the exhibition at the Grosvenor Gallery, and, if space permits, conclude what we have to say about the pictures and sculptures at the New Gallery.

THE Royal Academicians have bought, with part of the Chantry Fund, Sir F. Leighton's 'Bath of Psyche,' now at Burlington House, and a water-colour drawing. It has been suggested in the Council that the R.A.s should buy works from exhibitions not their own, and in the latter instance the notion has been carried into effect. Sir John Gilbert's 'Autumn,' at the Water-Colour Society's Gallery, was desired for this purpose, but that artist would not part with it. A difficulty occurs in this connexion when, as is usual, the greater number of capital examples in the minor galleries have been sold before the Academicians know what is in their own exhibition.

TO DAY Messrs. Christie, Manson & Woods will sell the modern pictures, forty-four in all, collected by Mr. C. Neck, and including a large proportion of admirable examples, such as Mr. Hook's 'Nearest Way to School,' a coast piece, 1881, 'Cornish Mermaids,' 'The Cowherd's Mischief,' and 'It's an Ill Wind that does Nobody Good'; Linnell's 'Crossing the Bridge,' 'Woods and Forests,' 'Pointing the Way,' 'The Fishermen,' 'Sunrise,' 'A Sultry Day,' 'A Stormy Sunset,' 'The Happy Valley,' 'The Barley Harvest,' and others; Mr. McWhirter's 'Sunset, Genoa'; Sir J. Gilbert's 'After the Battle'; and works by Messrs. Pettie, A. Bonheur, E. de Blaas, Van Haanen, and Orchardson, and Mlle. R. Bonheur.

ON the 6th, 7th, 8th, and 9th inst. Messrs. Christie, Manson & Woods will sell the first portion (nearly 530 lots) of the collection of Mr. E. Joseph, the well-known dealer in objets d'art, miniatures, bric-à-brac, and the like, being old plate, snuff-boxes, porcelain, furniture, wood and ivory carvings, metal work, Venetian and other glass, Italian jewels, bronzes, medals, plaquettes, Urbino and Gubbio wares, enamels, arms, fans, manuscripts, rock crystal, and étuis. The second portion will be sold on the 20th, 21st, and 22nd inst., and the third portion on the 10th, 11th, 12th, and 13th prox. The same firm will sell on the 10th and 12th inst. the famous Redleaf Collection of pictures, 242 lots in all—works of Callcott; E. W. Cooke, 'Rouge et Noir' and 'The Interior of a Fisherman's Hut'; Gainsborough, 'A Woody Landscape,' Grosvenor Exhibition, 1885; Sir F. Grant's portrait of Sir E. Landseer; Sir E. Landseer's 'Trim' (a dog painted in two-and-a-half hours), 'A Highland Interior,' 'Grouse,' 'Ptarmigan,' 'The Shepherd's Grave,' 'None but the Brave deserve the Fair,' and many others; Mulready's 'Dog of Two Minds'; Reynolds's 'Meditation,' and 'Edwin' (which C. H. Hodges engraved); Turner's 'Sheerness'; T. Webster's 'The Smile,' and 'The Frown,' both engraved by C. W. Sharpe; Wilkie's 'Distraint for Rent,' 33½ in. by 50 in., engraved by Raimbach, R.A., 1815; 'The Jew's Harp,' engraved by Burnet, and 'The Village Festival,' sketch for the National Gallery picture; two Berchems, Smith's 34 and 37; two Hobbemas, Smith's 18, and another; Rembrandt's 'A Young Lady,' Smith's 576; as well as Ruysdaels, a Teniers, an A. van der Velde, and a P. Wouvermans, besides many drawings, among which is Hayter's portrait of Landseer, aged twelve.

THE Fine-Art Society has appointed to-day (Saturday) for the private view of a collection of "Animal Studies" by Madame H. Ronner; the public will be admitted to the gallery on Monday next. In Waterloo House, Pall Mall, may be seen Mr. W. E. Lockhart's picture, painted for the Queen, of the celebration in Westminster Abbey of Her Majesty's Jubilee, June 21st, 1887. At Messrs. Buck & Reid's, 179, New Bond Street, the "Cosmopolitan Drawings" of Mr. R. T. Pritchett are on view.

THE annual Report of the National Gallery states that six pictures have been bought with a parliamentary grant-in-aid, one with the Lewis Fund, four with the Clarke Bequest, and one with the Walker Bequest. The latter three funds are at the disposal of the Director of the Gallery, and beyond official or parliamentary meddling of any kind whatever. Mr. J. Stanforth Beckett bequeathed six paintings; Lady Mount-Temple gave Rossetti's 'Beata Beatrix'; Messrs. G. Holt, G. Salting, H. Ward, and L. S. Pratten, Mrs. Wells, and the Duke of Leinster severally gave a picture or series of drawings. It is stated that in the event of the barrack-yard being required for extensions of the National Gallery, the Government is prepared to remove the barracks. Lord Dufferin's Greuze, 'The Young Widow,' a loan, has been at his request returned to the owner; the Duke of Norfolk's Holbein's 'Duchess of Milan' was "temporarily withdrawn" for the Tudor Exhibition, and will therefore be lent again no doubt. The Treasury has proposed to Parliament a grant-in-aid of purchases for the Gallery, to be drawn in a lump sum from the Exchequer by the Trustees. More than half a million persons visited the Gallery on public days in 1889, i. e., an average of nearly 2,500 a day; on students' days (Thursdays and Fridays) nearly 40,000 visitors paid sixpence each for admission.

MONDAY, 12th inst., has been appointed for the private view, at 104, Bond Street, of an exhibition of oil and water-colour pictures of subjects exclusively Indian, the works of amateurs, military and civil officers, and others associated with the country. The public will be admitted on the 15th inst. The 19th Century Art Society's private view will occur on the 9th inst.

THE autumn exhibition of pictures by modern artists at the Manchester City Art Gallery will open at the beginning of September and remain open during the year.

THE French Chronique des Arts announces the death in Paris, on the 22nd ult., of M. Frédéric Spitzer, the renowned collector of works of art and antiquities. He was born at Presburg, Hungary, about 1815, and, while still very young, was sent to "business" in Vienna. At this time he had no knowledge of art or archaeology, but having scraped together a small sum of money he was fortunate enough to purchase with it a veritable Albert Dürer. Thenceforth his vocation was decided; he became a collector and dealer, a pursuit for which he was qualified by native energy and taste. During more than thirty years' dealings in France, England, and Germany he was extraordinarily successful. Settling in Paris, he built a handsome mansion in the Rue de Villejust, at the corner of the Avenue d'Eylau, and furnished it with the choicest examples, which with the utmost liberality he was accustomed to lend for public exhibition. His generosity in this respect was especially manifest at the Exhibitions of 1878 and 1889. During the later years of his life M. Spitzer was occupied in the preparation of a catalogue of his treasures, the first portion of which, dealing with antique examples of various kinds—ivories, mediæval objects of many descriptions, and tapestries—lies on our table for review. It is one of the most valuable publications of its class, of special value owing to the surpassing beauty of its illustrations in colours and black, as well as the research and learning of its notes by MM. Froehner, Darcel, Palustre, Müntz, and Molinier. The book is published in Paris by the Maison Quantin, whose London agent is Mr. Davis, 147, New Bond Street.

DR. WALDSTEIN finished his excavations at Platea in the second half of last month. The members of the American Archaeological School who assisted him there were Mr. Hunt, Messrs. Washington, Mr. Shelley, Mr. Hale, and Mr. Gray. Their first object was to make an accurate map of the ancient city, so far as it is now visible. The site has been thoroughly surveyed; the walls, which are over two and a half miles in circumference, have been measured; and they hope by the publication of their results to give a final account of what is now to be seen, which will beat the service of all students, whether archaeological, literary, or historical. A careful paper on the topography of the battle-field of Platea has also been prepared by Mr. Hunt, and will be illustrated by a new map drawn by Messrs. Hunt and Hale. Dr. Waldstein also carried on excavations at several points within and without the city walls, but he has not as yet succeeded in discovering any of the three important temples (Athena, Hera, Demeter). In the course of the excavations Dr. Waldstein came upon some interesting inscriptions, the most important of which is a large slab containing a portion of the famous edict of Diocletian, De Pretiis Rerum Venalium. Last year Dr. Waldstein found at Platea fifty-four lines of the Latin preamble. About half a mile from the spot where this was found another slab has now been discovered—of about the same dimensions and in the same form—of the body of this edict in the Greek text; and it appears to be likely that the preamble was given in Latin originally, whereas for the use of the people the text itself was published in Greek. The portion of the price list contained in this tablet is the one dealing with the price of textiles. A part of it is published and known from other fragments, but there are interesting variations even in this part. A column and a half of prices here given has hitherto been unknown, and supplies the beginning of chapter xviii. in Mr. Waddington's edition, hitherto wanting. Another interesting inscription records dedications on the part of women to a goddess, probably Artemis or Demeter, and contains a large number of interesting feminine names.

THE Nuova Antologia announces the discovery in the Margherita Garden, near Bologna, of an Etruscan stela, remarkable for some subjects represented on it not hitherto found on monuments of this kind:—

"The stela is sculptured on three sides. On the two principal faces occur, on the one the usual representation of the soul of the deceased borne to the under world in a biga; on the other, the figure of a woman clothed. The broad or transverse side of the stela is occupied by six carvings, five of which are subjects from Greek mythology. The first represents the monster Scylla with his legs terminating in the tail of a fish, and with a dagger in each of his uplifted hands. In the second the witch Circe, with a cup in each hand, has on one side a pig and on the other a man with a pig's head. In the third a Nereid is seated on a dolphin. In the fourth a woman is seen rushing forward violently and grasping in her right hand a sword, perhaps Canace. In the fifth is a woman with flowers in her hands, to whom it is difficult to assign a name. But the most interesting subject is that of the sixth compartment, where is seen a youth in sleeved tunic and with wings on his shoulders, in the act of flying. In his right hand he holds a hammer and an instrument like a carpenter's square. In his left hand he holds a strangely shaped saw."

At Eleusis a large Roman bath has been discovered similar to that found at Athens near the Olympeum. New expropriations will have to be made for its excavation.

IN demolishing the Jewish Ghetto at Florence some Roman remains have been discovered, amongst which are several fragmentary Latin inscriptions, one being dedicated to the "Genius Coloniae."

PROF. W. UNGER is finishing a large plate of the celebrated 'Sons of Rubens,' by that master, in the gallery of Prince Lichtenstein at Vienna. The largest etching he has done, 25×15½ in., is described as very brilliant and successful.

THE German Emperor has bought the magnificent collection of articles excavated by Herr von Chlingensberg from the burial-places near Bad Reichenhall. Herr von Chlingensberg began his excavations in 1885 and continued them until 1888. The results of his long labours have been scientifically arranged and catalogued, and are said to form the largest archaeological collection in Germany in private possession. They date from the fourth to the eighth century A.D., and will now be placed in the Berlin Völker-museum.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

ST. JAMES'S HALL.—Philharmonic Society.
CRYSTAL PALACE.—Mr. Mann's Benefit Concert.
CARL ROSA OPERA COMPANY.—'Lohengrin.' 'Thorgrim.

THE directors of the Philharmonic Society atoned for previous errors by the production of Antonin Dvorák's new Symphony in G at the third concert on Thursday last week. Even if the work had proved unworthy of the gifted Bohemian composer, its right to a hearing could not have been disputed. So far, however, from this being the case, we are inclined to regard it as superior to any of the previous symphonies from the same hand. It is free from the Beethovenish influences which are perceptible in the work in D, generally known as No. 1; it is far more genial and unlaboured than No. 2, in D minor; and, of course, it is riper and more evenly balanced than the early Symphony in F. We are told that it is a reflection of scenes in pastoral life, and that the second movement has a definite programme. This may be so, but Dvorák has wisely refrained from publishing any description of the work, and speculation on the matter is quite unnecessary, as the music speaks well for itself. The first movement is broad and energetic and full of effective points, but, on the whole, it is the least original portion of the symphony. The succeeding adagio in E flat is founded upon two singularly naïve and simple themes, but the effect of the movement is irresistible, thanks in some measure to the delicious orchestration. The same qualities, accentuated, characterize the allegretto-grazioso, which stands in place of a scherzo. No more unaffected music has ever been written, even by Haydn, and yet the impression left upon the mind is that of art work worthy of high consideration, simply because Dvorák, with all his wealth of inspiration, never permits freedom to degenerate into licence. The finale is the oddest, but not the least effective section of the symphony. There is a suggestion of military music in the opening for trumpets and drums, and the principal theme, which is given out in the first place by the violoncellos, has a pleasant archaic flavour. It is subjected in the course of the movement to a number of variations, in which the orchestral effects are ever changeful and charming, and the engaging and almost childlike method of expression is maintained to the final peroration. Throughout the symphony the composer's nationality makes itself apparent, and very strongly in the third and fourth movements, though the generally unsophisticated style of the music prevents any feeling of mannerism, and even where the laws of symphonic writing are discarded, as in the adagio, which commences in E flat and ends in C major, the cultured ear is not conscious of any unpleasant impression. A great composer once declared that the rules were his "most obedient humble servants," and Dvorák may say as much so long as he continues to pen such fresh and spontaneous works as the Symphony in G. As a matter of course the performance, under the composer's direction, was received with enthusiasm, the audience refusing to be satisfied until Dvorák had thrice bowed his thanks. Another striking feature of the concert was the rendering of Henselt's Pianoforte Concerto in F minor by M. Sapellnikoff. The young Russian pianist not only mastered the technical difficulties of the work with apparent ease, but displayed such beauty of touch and intelligence in his interpretation of the details of the concerto that he will be gladly heard in any of the more important classic works for the pianoforte. Mr. Edward German's Overture to 'Richard III,' of which we have already spoken in favourable terms, was very warmly welcomed as one of the few English compositions the Philharmonic directors have included in their scheme for the present season. An admirable performance of Mozart's 'Jupiter' Symphony, under Mr. Cowen's direction, closed the concert; and Miss Marian McKenzie was acceptable in the air "Chi vive amante," from Handel's 'Poro,' and Sir Arthur Sullivan's effective setting of Shakspeare's 'Willow Song.'

Mr. Manns, as usual, provided an interesting programme at his annual benefit concert on Saturday last, and the very large attendance was a gratifying proof of the esteem in which amateurs hold the admirable musician who for nearly thirty-five years has preserved the prestige of the Crystal Palace Saturday Concerts. The scheme did not contain a symphony, the item most nearly approaching to the highest form of orchestral music being a Serenade in D, by Miss E. M. Smyth, who, after study in Leipzig, has won considerable recognition by her compositions in several continental musical centres. There is much promise in her serenade. The thematic material in the four movements of the work is for the most part interesting, and, speaking generally, the music is pleasantly unconventional and picturesquely scored; but it is rather restless and not well constructed, the feeling left on the mind being that the composer has strung together ideas as they presented themselves, without consideration for symmetry and homogeneity. This, however, is a fault of youth and inexperience, and will probably be less apparent in future efforts. Miss Smyth's work was, on the whole, well received, and her career will be watched with interest. M. Sapellnikoff's rendering of Tschaiikowsky's Pianoforte Concerto in G, Op. 44, No. 2, was a magnificent display of technical ability; but a definite judgment on the work cannot be pronounced on a first hearing. The concerto abounds in energy and striking passages highly tinged with true Russian colour, but, like Tschaiikowsky's music generally, it lacks tenderness and repose. Yet another interesting item was the 'Lamentatio Davidis,' for bass voice, four trombones, and organ, by Heinrich Schütz. The combination was by no means rare in Germany in the seventeenth century, when the trombone was mainly used to strengthen the weak and unsatisfactory tones of the organ. The 'Lamentatio' is an expressive example of the genius of Bach's greatest predecessor in German church music, and it was, of course, admirably sung by Mr. Henschel. The overtures to 'Tannhäuser' and 'Der Freischütz' completed the orchestral programme, and further vocal items were contributed by Miss Macintyre and Mlle. Marie Mely, the latter a debutante who failed to secure much applause.

The performance of 'Lohengrin' at Drury Lane last Saturday was characterized throughout by honest effort, and some measure of success was attained. The embodiment of Elsa was, on the whole, a pleasant surprise. It cannot be said that Miss Amanda Fabris has a pure and sympathetic voice, but she wisely refrains from forcing it, even in dramatic situations, and her manner showed that she had grasped the spirit of Wagner's creation. She was throughout tender and dreamy rather than passionate, and made no attempt to transform Elsa into a melodramatic heroine. Mr. Barton McGuckin's Lohengrin remains an excellent impersonation; indeed, it has improved in some respects, particularly in the third act. Mlle. Tremelli as Ortrud and Mr. Max Eugene as Telramund were too stagey, and Mr. H. Pope as the King sang frequently out of tune. Remarkable promise was evinced by Mr. Ffrangcon Davies as the Herald. The young performer has a fine baritone voice, and his enunciation was perfect, which is more than can be said of any other member of the cast. The band and chorus were alike excellent, but the stage management was defective, owing, no doubt, to the work having been hastily prepared.

At the second performance of 'Thorgrim,' on Monday, an improvement was made at the commencement of the second act, the reception being eliminated and the march presented in a curtailed form before the rising of the curtain. Comparisons with Wagner's 'Tannhäuser' are, therefore, no longer possible at this point. A second hearing fully confirms our favourable opinion of the music; but it cannot be said that 'Thorgrim' possesses more than two of the four attributes desirable in an opera. The dramatic foundation is picturesque, but the characterization is feeble, while the music is almost uniformly effective where lyrical treatment is admissible, and weak in the few dramatic situations which occur in the course of the work. The merits and defects of 'Thorgrim' are, therefore, so nicely balanced that we are justified in regarding it as a work of much promise, and in expressing the confident hope that the author and composer will be more successful in their next joint production.

Musical Gossip.

THE second of Mr. Henschel's orchestral concerts for young people took place on Wednesday afternoon at St. James's Hall, the programme including Mozart's 'Linz' Symphony in C, the Overture to 'Der Freischütz,' the ballet music from Rubinstein's 'Peramora,' and other familiar selections not requiring any comment. Mrs. Henschel sang three of her husband's songs taken from Kingsley's 'Water-babies.'

AMONG the concerts of the past week were those of Miss Ethel and Mr. Harold Bauer at the Princes' Hall on Monday evening, at which a highly promising MS. Sonata for piano and violin in C minor, by Mr. Bauer, was performed; Miss Kate Flinn and Miss Agnes Janson, at the Steinway Hall on Wednesday evening, in which both young vocalists were heard to advantage in various solos and duets; and Signor Galiero, an Italian pianist, at the Princes' Hall on the same evening, in which the concert-giver appeared to much greater advantage as an executant than as a composer.

MENTION should have been made last week of Miss Dora Bright's concert, which took place at the Princes' Hall on Wednesday, the 23rd ult. The programme included a new suite for violin and piano by the concert-giver, which proved to be a melodious and pleasing composition, written in a musicianly style. Two expressive songs, also from the pen of Miss Bright, were introduced by Madame Clara Samuël. The programme included Brahms's Quartet in C minor, Op. 25, Schumann's 'Humoresque,' Op. 20, and Bennett's Trio in A, Op. 26. Among the performers were Mr. J. T. Carrodus, Miss C. Gates, Mr. Whitehouse, and Mr. Arthur Thompson.

MISS WINIFRED ROBINSON, who has much improved as a violinist, gave a concert at the Princes' Hall on Monday afternoon. Her programme included Mendelssohn's Quartet in D, Op. 44, No. 1; two movements from David's Violin Concerto in D minor, Op. 35; and two movements from Grieg's Sonata in C minor for piano and violin, Op. 45. Miss Robinson had the assistance of Miss Dora Bright, Miss Hilda Wilson, Miss Cecilia Gates, Mr. Gerald Walenn, and Mr. Whitehouse.

AT Mr. Stockley's last orchestral concert, in the Birmingham Town Hall on Thursday last week, a Symphony in C minor by Mr. Charles E. Stephens was performed for the first time. The work was composed more than a dozen years ago, but the composer has hitherto failed to secure it a hearing, even at the Philharmonic Concerts of which he is a director. So far as can be judged, the symphony made an extremely favourable impression on the audience, being characterized as bold, vigorous, full of taking melody, and thoroughly English in its unaffected expression. The opinion of a London audience on these points should be solicited at an early opportunity.

HIGHLY favourable mention is also made of a new Symphony in F minor by Christian Sinding, recently produced at Christiania. The work is said to be full of Scandinavian character.

Two genuine Amati violins are now on sale at Venice for 480*l*. The first, by Nicolo Amati, is dated 1618, and the second, by Geronimo, 1695. Both are said to be in perfect preservation.

THE scenic representation of Liezt's oratorio

'St. Elizabeth' at the Vienna Opera appears to be successful. The work has already been performed eight times.

CONCERTS, &c., NEXT WEEK.

- MON. Miss Margaret Wiles's Pianoforte Recital, 3, Princes' Hall.
 — Miss Emily Hall's Pianoforte Recital, 3, Steinway Hall.
 — Borough of Hackney Choral Association, 'The Red Cross Knight,' 8, Shoreditch Town Hall.
 — Miss Emily Lewis's Concert, 8, Steinway Hall.
 — Carl Rosa Opera Company, 'Thorgrim,' 8, Drury Lane.
 — Mr. Charles Coburn's Concert, 9, 30 St. James's Hall.
 TUES. Miss Elsie's Concert, 3, Princes' Hall.
 — Miss Mary Joseph's Musical Recital, 3, No. 1, Belgrave Square.
 — Mr. Lawrence Kellie's Vocal Recital, 3, 30, Steinway Hall.
 — Miss Hilda Wilson's Vocal Recital, 8, Steinway Hall.
 — Dr. Parry's United Welsh Choir Concert, 8, St. James's Hall.
 — Miss Ida Henry's Concert, 8, Princes' Hall.
 — Carl Rosa Opera Company, 'Faust,' 8, Drury Lane.
 WED. Carl Rosa Opera Company, 'Bohemian Girl,' 2; 'Carmen,' 8, Drury Lane.
 — Mr. Franz Kummel's Pianoforte Recital, 3, Steinway Hall.
 — Young People's Orchestral Concert, 3, St. James's Hall.
 — Miss Mercedes Elliott's Concert, 8, St. James's Hall.
 — Miss Mervyn Keatinge's Concert, 8, Steinway Hall.
 THURS. Miss Bessie Cox's Concert, 8, Steinway Hall.
 — Philharmonic Concert, 8, St. James's Hall.
 — Carl Rosa Opera Company, 8, Drury Lane.
 — Royal Amateur Orchestral Society's Concert, 9, Princes' Hall.
 FRI. M. Paderewski's Pianoforte Recital, 3, St. James's Hall.
 — Miss Mary Boland's Concert, 8, Steinway Hall.
 — Carl Rosa Opera Company, 8, Drury Lane.
 SAT. Carl Rosa Opera Company, 2 and 8, Drury Lane.
 — Madame Kaefer's Concert, 3, Steinway Hall.
 — Madame Teresa Carreno's Pianoforte Recital, 3, Princes' Hall.
 — Bach Choir, Brahms's 'German' Requiem, 3, St. James's Hall.
 — Royal Amateur Orchestral Society's Concert, 8, St. James's Hall.
 — Madame Liebart's Pupil's Concert, 8, 15, Steinway Hall.

DRAMA

THE WEEK.
GLOBE.—'Othello.'

THE experiment at the Globe Theatre of producing Shakespeare by a company of untrained or half-trained actors has met with as much success as was to be expected. So long, indeed, as Mr. Benson and his company confined themselves to comedy, they obtained a triumph, and they can point with legitimate pride to the fact that 'A Midsummer Night's Dream' has been played at the Globe for more nights than have been known since the famous revival by Charles Kean at the Princess's, in which case even the run was broken, extending over two seasons. With two representations of this comedy on Saturday last the season of Mr. Benson closed. On Thursday and Friday an unwise experiment was tried in the production of 'Othello.' In this an attempt was made to utilize afresh the means which had told with effect in 'A Midsummer Night's Dream.' An eager and a bustling crowd watched the arrival of Iago and Emilia and awaited that of Othello, while young urchins gambolled over the packages that had been landed from the vessel until they were driven away by the guards. Pretty enough in conception is this, and it may, if it is held worth while, be introduced for the future. Juvenile revels, however, though they may compensate for the shortcomings of Theseus or Lysander, will not make up for the absence of an Othello.

Mr. Benson, who played the Moor, presenting him, it may be incidentally said, as a man lighter in complexion than many inhabitants of Southern Europe, has unfortunately no grasp of the character, and no command of tragic expression. Some intelligence is shown in the reading: the effects sought by early actors at the outset of the third act were eschewed, and the groan and growl of the tragedian were absent. There was no pumping of the words or sawing of the air. There was, however, nothing in place of these things; the performance was flat and uninteresting until it became noisy and insincere. In the prolonged agony of Othello no trace of genuine passion was seen, and his sufferings left us unimpressed and wearied. An experiment of this class is, indeed, wholly beyond the power of Mr. Benson and his company, and should not have been attempted. The treatment of the text was in some respects unpardonable. Mr. Benson did not wholly emasculate the strong speech assigned Othello. Some instances of squeamishness are, however, scarcely conceivable. Upon his re-entry after the first scene with Iago Othello says, in language denoting as other words scarcely could his adoration for his wife and his passionate temperament:—

I had been happy if the general camp,
 Pioneers and all, had tasted her sweet body,
 So I had nothing known.

For the phrase, truly Shakespearean, which is in italics, Mr. Benson substituted 'had loved her,' or something equally contemptible. It needs no 'clerk from Oxenford' to supply us with readings such as this. By his two tragic productions Mr. Benson has lessened our obligation to him, and detracted seriously from the value of his experiment.

Dramatic Gossip.

'CHANGES,' a three-act comedy produced at Toole's Theatre on the afternoon of Friday in last week, written by Mr. John Aylmer, is a slight and an amateurish piece with scarcely the pretence of a plot. In a very weak interpretation Miss Mary Collette was pleasantly conspicuous.

ON Monday at the Grand Theatre Mrs. Bandmann-Palmer appeared as the heroine of an adaptation of Schiller's 'Mary Stuart,' by the Hon. Lewis Wingfield, in which Madame Modjeska was previously seen at the Court.

AMONG forthcoming novelties are a comedy by Mr. R. C. Carton, to be given at Terry's Theatre by Miss Grahame, and a farcical comedy by Richard Henry, entitled 'Division.'

'THE ANONYMOUS LETTER' is the title of a comedy by Mr. Mark Ambient and Mr. Frank Latimer, in which Miss Farrer and Mr. Leslie will appear at the Prince of Wales's Theatre.

MR. A. W. PINERO is going to read his play of 'The Profligate' in the theatre of the Birkbeck Institution on Friday evening, the 16th inst. The proceeds will be devoted to purchasing books for the library of the Institution.

A PLAY by M. G. de Maupassant and M. J. Normand is to be played at the Gymnase next winter. 'Docteur Rameau,' by M. G. Ohnet, will be produced at the same theatre at the beginning of the winter.

MESSRS. HUTCHINSON & Co. have in the press, in two volumes, 'The Life and Reminiscences of the late E. L. Blanchard,' with notes from the diaries of his father, W. L. Blanchard, by Mr. Clement Scott. The book will contain portraits and illustrations.

THE third volume of Ibsen's dramas, which will be published by Mr. Walter Scott, will contain Ibsen's three early plays, 'Lady Inger of Ostråt,' 'The Vikings at Helgeland,' and 'The Pretender.' These belong to the period 1855-64.

NEXT WEEK'S NOVELTIES AND REVIVALS.

- MON. Princess's (Evening). Production of 'Theodora,' adapted by Robert Buchanan from the French of Victorien Sardou.
 — Comedy, 'April Showers,' transferred from the Afternoon to the Evening Bill.
 WED. Haymarket (Afternoon). Revival of 'Comedy and Tragedy' and 'The Ballad-Monger,' and Production of 'Rachel,' a Dramatic Sketch.
 — Lyric (Afternoon). Miscellaneous Entertainment for the Benefit of Mr. Forbes Dawson.
 THURS. Comedy (Afternoon), 'A Modern Marriage,' in Four Acts, by Neville Doone.
 SAT. Criterion (Evening). Revival of 'She Stoops to Conquer.'

[These announcements are subject to changes of plan on the part of managers.]

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—J. W.—E. S.—received.
 No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO.'S
NEW BOOKS.

GLANCES at GREAT and LITTLE

MEN. By "PALADIN." 1 vol. crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.
 Contents: Oxford—Bishop Wilberforce—Some Preachers—The late Emperor of Brazil—Sir Bartle Frere—Anthony Trollope—Richard Wagner—Napoleon III.—George MacDonald—Emperor William I. and Prince Bismarck, &c.

A CENTURY of PAINTERS of the ENGLISH SCHOOL. Abridged and continued to the Present Time. By E. REDGRAVE, C.B. R.A., and S. REDGRAVE. New Edition. Large crown 8vo. cloth, 10s. 6d.; Roxburgh binding, 12s.

HOMES of TASTE: Economical

Hints on Furniture and Decoration. By J. E. PANTON, Author of 'From Kitchen to Garret,' &c. Post 8vo. cloth, 2s. 6d.

MUSICIANS (GREAT) SERIES.

Edited by the late Dr. F. HUEFFER.
 NEW VOLUME.

BEETHOVEN. By H. A. Rudall. Small post 8vo. cloth extra, 3s.

A HANDY GUIDE to DRY FLY-

FISHING, with a Series of Graduated Exercises for all who wish to Learn it. By COTSWOLD ISYS, M.A., Author of 'An Angler's Strange Experiences,' &c. Crown 8vo. cloth, 1s.

NEW NOVELS at ALL THE LIBRARIES.

The CONSPIRATOR: a Romance of

Real Life. By Count PAUL P.—. Edited by FRANK HARKUT. 2 vols. crown 8vo. cloth, 21s.

"There is no lack of startling incident and sensational adventure in this record of Russian oppression and Polish intrigue.....The interest of the story seldom flags." Speaker.

DUCHESS FRANCES: a Novel. By

SARAH TYTLER, Author of 'Citoyenne Jacqueline,' 'Lady Bell,' &c. SECOND EDITION. 2 vols. crown 8vo. cloth, 21s.

"The story is carefully told, and like all Miss Tytler's work, is based on conscientious research; and those who appreciate historical novels are certain to appreciate this vigorous and gracefully written story."—Leeds Mercury.

WORKS BY HENRY M. STANLEY.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITIONS. NOW READY.

The CONGO, and the FOUNDING of its FREE STATE: a Story of Work and Exploration. 2 vols. demy 8vo. with over 100 Full-Page and small Illustrations, 2 large Maps, and several smaller ones, cloth extra, 21s.

"His two handsome volumes deserve the attention of all interested in the present condition and the prospects of the great African continent."—Athenæum.

HOW I FOUND LIVINGSTONE;

including Four Months' Residence with Dr. Livingstone. With Map and Illustrations. Crown 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.

"*The Unabridged Edition, superior in paper and binding, and with the Original Maps, price 7s. 6d., can still be obtained.

"It is incomparably more lively than most books of African travel."—Saturday Review.

THROUGH the DARK CONTI-

NENT; from the Indian to the Atlantic Ocean. With Map and Illustrations. Crown 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.

"*The Unabridged Edition, superior in paper and binding, and with the Original Maps, price 12s. 6d., can still be obtained.

"Every page contains the record of some strange adventure, or the note of some valuable observation." Pall Mall Gazette.

MY KALULU: Prince, King, and

Slave. By H. M. STANLEY. Crown 8vo. cloth, 2s. 6d.; gilt edges, 3s. 6d.

"The book is extraordinarily fascinating, and will be read by every one, man or boy, with breathless interest from cover to cover."—Penny Illustrated Paper.

London:

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON, SEARLE & RIVINGTON
 (LIMITED),
 St. Dunstan's House, Fetter-lane, Fleet-street, E.C.

SATURDAY, MAY 10, 1890.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
A REPRINT OF LYRICAL BALLADS ...	599
THE PARLIAMENTARY REPRESENTATION OF CORNWALL ...	600
A NEW LIFE OF FOX ...	601
NOVELS OF THE WEEK ...	602
OUR LIBRARY TABLE—LIST OF NEW BOOKS ...	604-605
BEATRICE; A BIBLIOGRAPHICAL CURIOSITY—'HISTOIRE DES JOYAUX'; MR. EDWIN WAUGH; THE LETTERS OF LORD CHESTERFIELD TO HIS GODSON; THACKERAYANA; SALE; THE RECORD SOCIETY; THE BEATRICE EXHIBITION ...	605-606
LITERARY GOSSIP ...	606
SCIENCE—SCHOOL-BOOKS; GEOGRAPHICAL NOTES; ASTRONOMICAL NOTES; SOCIETIES; MEETINGS; GOSSIP ...	608-610
FINE ARTS—THE GROSVENOR EXHIBITION; THE NEW GALLERY; NOTES FROM CYPRUS; THE EXCAVATIONS AT MEGALOPOLIS; M. ROBERT-FLAURY; SALES; GOSSIP ...	610-615
MUSIC—THE WEEK; GOSSIP; CONCERTS, &c., NEXT WEEK ...	616-617
DRAMA—THE WEEK; GOSSIP; NEXT WEEK'S NOVEL-TITLES ...	617-618

LITERATURE

Lyrical Ballads. Reprinted from the First Edition of 1798. Edited by E. Dowden, LL.D. (Nutt.)

THIS reprint should be received as a welcome gift by the poor scholar. It is not called by the much-abused name of "facsimile," but it possesses all the advantages which could attach to that unattainable ideal. The little book is simply a neat, well-edited reprint, following its original line for line and page for page. The chief virtue of a reprint is to be correct, and how faithfully Prof. Dowden has endeavoured in this direction is indicated by his offering a sort of apology for venturing to leave the proper space between two words which the printer of the original had inadvertently run together in 'Simon Lee,' thus,—

Could leave both man and horsebehind.

The emendation carries a useful lesson to editors. When making reprints such as this of books produced in the leisurely days of the hand-press, it is well to examine more than one copy—desirable, even, to examine a dozen, if so many are available—for the text often varies more or less in copies of the same edition. The author, editor, or corrector seems to have been in the habit of examining the sheets as they left the press, and of stopping it occasionally to make a correction or an alteration. In the case of the 'Lyrical Ballads' this must have been done—so far, at least, as the sheet containing 'Simon Lee' is concerned, for in some copies the words in the line quoted are properly spaced. But Prof. Dowden has not confined his labours to securing the mechanical accuracy of his reprint. He has supplied an excellent preface, giving something of the history of the volume, and pointing out its significance in our literature; while his notes, though brief, are to the point, and bear evidence of being founded on an intimate knowledge of the several poems and of the various phases through which they have passed.

No book in modern English literature could be better worth reprinting in this scholarly fashion than the first issue of the 'Lyrical Ballads.' The original is rare and expensive, and is even more interesting to the student than to the book-hunter. To each it is just twice as attractive as any other first edition, seeing that it contains the early productions in their earliest "states" of two first-rate poets, each of whom is represented by work he never surpassed—the volume beginning with 'The Ancient Mariner,' and closing with the 'Lines' written a few miles above Tintern Abbey.' But a reprint such as this may well satisfy the student as putting within his reach that which has hitherto cost him either several guineas or several Museum headaches. For only by studying the poems grouped and detached as they are in this volume can their full significance individually, and in a still greater degree collectively, be adequately recognized. Within a few years of 1798 they were altered in form and mixed up with many others, and even in the editions of 1800-5 are difficult of access; while, in the case of Wordsworth at least, whether in the poet's own elaborate and often puzzling classifications, or in the more modern chronological editions, the poems are dispersed in a highly distracting manner. The volume of 1798 is a whole, and must be studied as such, whether the aim be to understand Coleridge or Wordsworth individually, or the two men in their relations to each other, or the pair in their relations to a movement in our literature not indeed initiated by them, but to which they supplied the first commanding and controlling impulse and influence. The fact that Coleridge and Wordsworth were close companions during the period of the composition of most of the poems has been long known in a general way; but the full extent of the intimacy of their intercourse was first revealed by the publication of extracts from Dorothy Wordsworth's Alfoxden journal in Prof. Knight's life of her brother (vol. i. pp. 131-43). And this journal, with its continuation at the Lakes, brings into strong relief the portrait, hitherto somewhat hazy, of Dorothy herself, and the influence she must have exercised on both the poets. That she was a woman of very remarkable mind, character, attainments, and influence was known or suspected from the way in which her brother has written of her in prose and verse; but how remarkable were her powers will not be fully known until these journals have been studied closely. It will probably be found that almost all of Coleridge's and Wordsworth's best work was inspired, and in greater part executed, while the poets were in daily companionship with Dorothy; that in a very practical way she gave them eyes and ears; and it may be hardly too much to say that, alike by the Quantocks and by the Lakes, these three sate

Side by side, full-summed in all their powers,
Dispensing harvest, sowing the To-be,
Self-reverent each and reverencing each,
Distinct in individualities,
But like each other ev'n as those who love.

Dorothy's strong points evidently were keen observation, rapid suggestion, and quick sympathy. She seems to have possessed these in greater degree than her brother, though not in so great degree as Coleridge. The influence of the two men on each other was strong and deep, but Coleridge's was by far the more active, as well as the finer and more penetrating; and the immense receptiveness of Wordsworth must have acted as a direct incitement to its exercise. The exercise was also a powerful stimulus to Coleridge's own genius, and if the direct product seems slight in bulk, the quality was almost unsurpassably fine, while much of its force must have passed into the work of his friend.

That the reception accorded to the 'Lyrical Ballads' was not enthusiastic is not quite so surprising as it has been the fashion to suppose. The most surprising thing about it is, perhaps, that the anonymous little book was noticed by most of the critical organs then extant. These behaved very well, considering the shock they received from both the good and the bad in the book, and it is even to their credit that they were sensible of a shock, for it shows they were not dead, but only dozing. Nor must it be forgotten that there were verses not a few in the volume which even now try the most devout Wordsworthian; that Wordsworth himself had uneasy doubts about 'The Ancient Mariner,' though he had none about 'Goody Blake'; that even Southey and Lloyd were very unsound; that the judgment of the friendly Bristol circle was summed up in Mrs. Coleridge's report to Thomas Poole, 'The "Lyrical Ballads" are not liked at all by any'; that, in short, no one seems to have really found salvation, save only Charles Lamb. The Monthly Magazine, which Coleridge called the "Aikin-void," and to which he had contributed many verses, had nothing to say but this:—

"The author of the 'Lyrical Ballads' has attempted to imitate the style of our old English versifiers with unusual success; 'The Ancient Mariners' [sic], however, on which he particularly prides himself, is, in our opinion, a particular exception; some of his pieces are beautiful but others stiff and laboured."

From this we gather that Dr. Aikin greatly preferred 'Goody Blake' to the 'Ancient Mariners.' The critic of the Monthly Review called the latter "the strangest story of a cock and a bull he ever saw on paper"; its drift he could not perceive, "unless the joke lay in depriving the wedding guest of his share of the feast"; but he allows that "there are in it poetical touches of an exquisite kind." He quotes part of 'The Nightingale' with warm approval, and winds up thus: "So much genius and originality are discovered in this publication that we wish to see another from the same hand, written on more elevated subjects and in a more cheerful disposition." The Analytical Review devoted four pages to the little book, quoting largely from the preface, in which it found "something sensible"; but the reviewer thought 'The Ancient Mariner' had in it "more of the extravagance of a mad German poet than of the simplicity of our ancient ballad-writers." "Our young rhymsters and blank-verse men," he adds (with evident allusion to Lamb and Lloyd), who are given to melancholy, are contrasted with the author of 'The Nightingale,' the opening passage of which is quoted for their benefit; and while selecting for special approval and quotation 'Goody Blake,' the reviewer is "particularly pleased" with 'The Thorn,' 'The Mad Mother,' and 'The Idiot Boy.' Nobody has a word, good or bad, for the Tintern 'Lines'—nobody, that is, besides Charles Lamb but Southey, who wrote admiringly and generously of the poem in the same Critical Review notice in which he called 'The Ancient Mariner' "a Dutch attempt at German sublimity, in which genius has been employed in producing a poem of little merit." And it was Southey alone who appears to have observed the 'Lines left on a Yew-tree Seat,' and nobody at all seems to have been attracted by the lines beginning "It is the first mild day of March," or those 'Written in Early Spring,' or the exquisite close of 'Simon Lee,' which shows how little the sweet influences of Cowper and Burns had up to that time affected the dry places of metropolitan criticism.

The sale of the volume was slow, but in a couple of years a fresh edition was printed, with an additional volume; in 1802, and again in 1805, the two volumes were reprinted, so that, all things considered, the 'Lyrical Ballads' did not fare badly. Of the single volume of 1798 we know that five hundred copies were printed; it is improbable that of the two-volume editions of 1800 and 1802 the numbers were smaller; so that we arrive at a total sale of 2,500 volumes, at five shillings each, between 1798 and 1805, say in seven years; and this when the population of the United Kingdom was somewhere between a third and a half of its present numbers, and the proportion of readers vastly smaller, while the value of money was considerably greater than now. It would be within the mark to estimate that, all things considered, the 625*l.* spent by the public between 1798 and 1805 on the first three editions of the 'Lyrical Ballads' would have to be quadrupled into 2,500*l.* to arrive at an equivalent for the present day. With these figures before them let our juvenile poets and their publishers decide whether the 'Lyrical Ballads' were a commercial failure.

Prof. Dowden's first intention, "to record the results of a complete collation of the several texts" of the poems, was abandoned, he tells us, because "it became evident that such a body of notes would add too much to the bulk of the little volume." The few examples given in the "Notes" whet the appetite for more. For instance, one would have been glad to have seen besides the rewritten passage in the 'Yew-tree Seat' the poet's wrestlings with the lines immediately following it:—

His only visitants a straggling sheep,
The stone-chat, or the glancing sand-piper;
And on these barren rocks with juniper,
And heath and thistle, thinly sprinkled o'er,
Fixing his downward eye.....

Thus the passage remained until 1815 (save that after 1798 the stranger's eye was "downcast"), when the second line was expanded into two, thus:—

The stone-chat, or the sand-lark, restless bird
Piping along the margin of the lake.

Later on the original line was restored, but the third and fourth were altered to

And on these barren rocks, with fern and heath
And juniper, and thistle sprinkled o'er, and so happily the passage was finally left.

The numerous phases through which 'The Female Vagrant' passed before she appeared in her due setting in 'Guilt and Sorrow' (1842) are alluded to in passing by the editor, and he adds that in its first form the poem ('Guilt and Sorrow') must have given expression to much of the writer's youthful revolutionary sentiments. This supposition is warranted not only by Wordsworth's account of the time (1794) and circumstances under which the poem was composed, but also by at least one of the stanzas printed in 1798, and reprinted in 1800, but which was dropped for ever after. The vagrant woman has just arrived in America with her soldier-husband:—

Oh! dreadful price of being to resign
All that is dear in being! better far
In Want's most lonely cave till death to pine,
Unseen, unheard, unwatched by any star;
Or in the streets and walks where proud men are,
Better our dying bodies to obtrude,
Than dog-like, wading at the heels of war,
Protract a curst existence, with the brood
That lap (their very nourishment) their brothers' blood.

Another stanza, describing the horrors of a stormed city, lingered till 1805; and yet another, whose existence was cut short at the same point, and which is worth quoting. Although the words are put into the untutored mouth of the female vagrant, they must be held to express the young revolutionary poet's own tolerant musings on the life led by a band of thieving scamps, whose depredations were carried on under the guise of "rough potters, trading soberly [unlike Peter Bell] with panniered asses driven from door to door." The stanza immediately preceded that now numbered xlv. of 'Guilt and Sorrow,' and is quite as good as anything in the Anti-Jacobin:—

My heart is touched to think that men like these,
The rude earth's tenants, were my first relief:
How kindly did they paint their vagrant ease!
And their long holiday that feared not grief,
For all belonged to all, and each was chief.
No plough their sinews strained; on grating road
No wain they drove, and yet the yellow sheaf
In every vale for their delight was stowed:
For them, in Nature's meads, the milky udder flowed.

The alterations made in the text of 'The Thorn' are peculiarly interesting, if only for the occasion of most of them—Coleridge's criticisms in the fourth chapter of his 'Biographia Literaria' (1817). He had before him Wordsworth's text of 1815, which was substantially that of 1798. Exception was taken to the foot-rule measurement of the muddy pond, and to part of the tenth and all of the five following stanzas, which were cruelly quoted in a footnote. Whether Wordsworth was grateful or not is unknown, but he was obedient, for the worst of the ineptitudes disappeared from future editions. They were partly balanced by the substitution of the stagey "grey-haired Wilfred of the Glen" for the more congruous "old Farmer Simpson." For evidence that there existed an actual thorn in the vicinity of a muddy pond we have not to rely merely on the poet's ex parte deposition, for both are mentioned in Dorothy's Alfoxden journal, wherein she wrote under April 20th, 1798, "Walked in the evening up the hill dividing the Coombes. Came home the Crookham way, by the thorn and the little muddy pond." And in the same journal we read that the 3rd of February, 1798, was "a mild morning, the windows open at breakfast"; that the party "walked with Coleridge over the hills"; and that "the red-breasts sang upon the leafless boughs"; and are inclined to suspect that the poet changed the month for a rhyme's sake, when he wrote:—

It is the first mild day of March,
Each minute sweeter than before,
The red-breast sings from the tall larch
That stands beside our door; and invited Dorothy to "put on her woodland dress, and give the day to idleness," and Coleridge to join him in dating "from to-day the opening of the year." There can be no doubt about the identity of the "one red leaf, the last of its clan," which dances in the first or Quantockian part of 'Christabel,' when we read Dorothy's entry for March 7th, how she (or they all) saw "one only leaf upon the top of the tree—the sole remaining leaf—dance round and round like a rag blown about by the wind." (This, with one or two similar hints, was noted by Prof. Dowden in his admirable article on 'Coleridge as a Poet' in last September's Fortnightly.) On May 6th the Wordsworths walked in the evening with Coleridge to Stowey, and "heard the nightingale; and saw a glow-worm," doubtless one of the many birds of "one low piping sound," and one of the many glow-worms in the shade which lighted up their love-torches, heard and seen in the company of the most gentle maid

Who dwelleth in her hospitable home
Hard by the Castle, and at latest eve (Ev'n like a Lady wov'd and dedicate
To something more than nature in the grove)
Glides through the pathways.

This is not the place proper to annotations of the 'Lyrical Ballads,' but more than enough, perhaps, has been said to indicate the interest, biographical as well as literary, which a study of the texts may be made to yield.

The Parliamentary Representation of Cornwall to 1832. By William Prideaux Courtney. (Privately printed.)

VARIOUS influences led to the great Reform Bill taking the shape that it ultimately did. It is now the common opinion that the existence of large industrial towns in the north of England was the chief cause of that sweeping change. Perhaps it ought to have been so, had men been guided entirely by reason; but the newspapers and pamphlets of the time lead one to think that the rotten boroughs had far greater influence on the public mind than the unrepresented centres of industry. Without any gross folly men in those times might argue that the interests of large towns were fully represented by Parliament as a whole, though they had no members of their own. The argument, if foolish, was specious. It is of a kind such as we often hear now when cognate subjects are discussed. The rotten boroughs were in a different plight. No one who believed that representative institutions were in themselves a good thing could by any sophistry reconcile their existence with justice. English people have never cared much for uniformity in political machinery so long as the Government discharged its functions efficiently; but the enormous preponderance given to Cornwall in Parliament was so evident an abuse that at the present day it seems wonderful that a single human being could be found capable of defending it.

Members of Parliament even now are not unfrequently ignorant of the history of the Lower House; but we imagine that their predecessors of sixty years ago had far less knowledge than they. It was commonly imagined, both inside the House and out of it, that the Cornish boroughs, though then mere villages, represented old towns that had fallen into decay. Had this been so, perhaps something might have been said in favour of their retaining their members. Sentimental reasons should never be ignored except after full consideration. As far, however, as the greater number of these constituencies were concerned, this argument, so often used, did not apply at all. They had, for the most part, never been populous places, but had been called into existence from purely corrupt motives. At the beginning of the sixteenth century there were but six parliamentary boroughs in Cornwall, all of them old towns which had been engaged largely in commercial transactions. On the death of Henry VIII. the advisers of the boy-king had a difficult part to play. They had determined on carrying out fully the ecclesiastical revolution begun by the dead monarch, but their power was far weaker than his had been. Henry's parliaments had been docile; but it did not follow that the desires of the ministers of a child would have the same weight as the will of a sovereign of powerful intellect and tremendous determination. Had the members of the House of Commons rebelled, it is possible that the monarch might have been dethroned, and certain that those who in Edward's name were carrying out the work of reform with such rash precipitancy would have found themselves in evil plight. It seemed, therefore, to these intriguers that one most simple means of packing the Lower House was to give the right of returning burgesses to obscure villages. Had these places belonged to independent landowners such a course would have tended to weaken the authority of the Crown; but care was taken in their selection, and as the Duchy of Cornwall was merged in the Crown for that and the two succeeding reigns, it is evident that these village members must have been during the whole period of the Tudor struggles unfailing supporters of the Crown. The Duchy possessed great power in almost all parts of Cornwall, and the revenues were at that time vested in the king. It is not clearly known what was the yearly sum derived from the real property and mineral dues, but it was certainly very large, and we believe constantly increasing. Small, too, as the Cornish villages were, there was never any intention of permitting them to be free in their choice of burgesses. The writ was almost always accompanied by a letter either nominating those who were to be chosen, or else bidding the constituents to confer with some trustworthy member of the Privy Council. As Mr. Courtney does not fail to point out, these boroughs occasionally sent eminent men to Parliament. Sir Francis Drake in the Parliament of 1584 represented the borough of Bossiney, and in 1774 Edward Gibbon was returned for the borough of Liskeard. Mr. Courtney names several other persons who have sat for Cornish boroughs of whom the county may well be proud; but, taken as a whole, little can be said for the men that Cornwall sent to the national councils. As time went on the average of character appears to have sunk lower and lower. It may be that we know more of the modern men than we do of those of the Tudor and Stuart times; but it certainly would seem, in spite of such a name as Gibbon's appearing in the list of members for Liskeard, that in the early years of George III. things had got to their worst. Bribery had become universal. In the general election of 1761 the king took an active part in selecting candidates, for the purpose of securing personal adherents who should support his wishes apart from those of his ministry.

We have most of us forgotten that it has become a mere matter of historic interest how unfairly great was the representation of Cornwall. Admitting, as most persons who are not partisans are inclined now to do, that extent of area as well as number of population should be taken into some account in forming electoral districts, still the disproportion between Cornwall and most other parts of England was vast:—

"For nearly two centuries and a half the county of Cornwall returned to the House of Commons forty-four members, and that number would have remained undiminished until 1832 had not the House a few years previously been moved by a sudden impulse of virtue into withdrawing from the deprived borough of Gram-pound its privilege of returning two members to Parliament. This total of forty-four members was within one of the number possessed by the entire kingdom of Scotland, and it exceeded by two the members assigned to the densely populated northern counties of Durham, Northumberland, and Yorkshire."

Mr. Courtney's introductory chapter will be found by far the most interesting to the reader who consults the work for political information; but the sketch of the history of each borough, which forms the greater part of the book, will be of much value to all who are interested in the local history of one of the most important of English counties.

Life of Charles James Fox. By Henry Offley Wakeman, M.A. (Allen & Co.)

It may be wrong to assert that Mr. Wakeman has an invincible prejudice against Charles James Fox as a statesman, and entertains a singular admiration for George III.'s most reprehensible acts; yet such is the impression which the perusal of this 'Life of Fox' will doubtless make upon the reader when he finds Mr. Wakeman writing with approval of the king's conduct in breaking up the political juntos which existed when he ascended the throne, and in forming a party which was known as that of the "King's Friends," and stating that George III.'s greatest service to the country consisted in undoing much of the mischief wrought by Walpole, who, as Mr. Wakeman says,

"in order to assure his own power, and to establish the Hanoverian dynasty upon the throne, had raised corruption to the dignity of a science. The ministerial majority, nominated for the most part by a few Whig borough-mongers, was kept together by an elaborate system of places and pensions. It was idle to say that a House of Commons so returned represented the nation. It represented the great Whig families, the Pelhams, the Cavendishes, the Bentincks, and the Russells, and it represented the great Whig families alone. When on the fall of Walpole they assumed the reins of government, they used their power to further the interest of their connexion. To a prescient statesman at the death of George II., England might well have seemed already a Venice of the North, slowly sinking under the deadening rule of a selfish and suspicious oligarchy of noble families."

The foregoing passage makes us think that Mr. Wakeman has either misread the history of the eighteenth century, or else has not read it at all. No electioneering agent of that day was better versed than George III. in the arts of corruption, and none practised them on a larger scale. He wrote to Lord North about administering "gold pills" when an adherent was to be gained. He intimated that, when a measure in which he had a personal interest was not carried in Parliament, he would "remember defaulters." Fox and Barré, among many others, had painful reason to know that the king's displeasure was no light punishment for a display of independence. These are historical facts which cannot be gainsaid. But the extraordinary thing, according to Mr. Wakeman, was that George III. saved the nation from becoming a Venice of the North. If the accession of that king had been postponed but a year longer the policy of Pitt would have borne its full fruit, and the house of Bourbon might have been rendered impotent for evil. How did George III. save England from the fate of sinking under "the selfish and suspicious oligarchy of noble families"? First, by sowing dissensions among them; second, by resorting to corruption. Mr. Wakeman's own words are: "The weapon of corruption, which had proved so effective in the hands of Walpole against the Tories, was wielded with still more telling effect by the king and Bute against the Whigs." The result was that, after "seven weary years of plot and counter-plot," the king obtained a minister after his own heart in the person of Lord North.

Why corruption should be condemned in Walpole and regarded with approval when practised by George III. is hard to understand. Indeed, such a friend as Mr. Wakeman is one from whom we should pray to be delivered. On Mr. Wakeman's own showing George III. was a corrupt and unscrupulous king, and yet he holds him up as a person worthy of praise. Of course if the king were in the right, then Fox was in the wrong, and the opposition between the two was one of the marked events of the time. Dr. Johnson was correct in calling Fox an extraordinary man who had divided the kingdom with Cæsar, "so that it was a doubt whether the kingdom should be ruled by the sceptre of George III. or the tongue of Fox"; and the son of Sir Robert Walpole, who is almost as noteworthy in English literature as his father is in English politics, has recorded many details about Fox that show how great was his popularity even when his political fortunes were at the lowest ebb. Writing about the general election in 1784, when every effort was made by the Prime Minister and the king to prevent Fox and his followers from being re-elected, Horace Walpole says that in order to defeat Fox the Court "sent at once a body of two hundred and eighty of the Guards to give their votes as householders, which is legal, but which my father in the most quiet seasons would not have dared to do."

He also writes:—

"In truth, Mr. Fox has all the popularity in Westminster; and, indeed, is so amiable and winning, that, could he have stood in person all over England, I question whether he would not have carried the Parliament."

A lady's compliment to him at the same time has its value, seeing that it was paid by Hannah More, who was not one of his admirers:—

"Unluckily for my principles, I met Fox canvassing the other day, and he looked so sensible and agreeable, that if I had not turned my eyes the other way, I believe it would have been all over with me."

The matters to which we have just referred are passed over by Mr. Wakeman, or if mentioned are treated in a perfunctory style. He is at pains to defend Fox's coalition with Lord North, and makes out a plausible case in his favour; yet we are as little disposed to agree with him in this case as in some instances where he bears harshly upon Fox. The episode of the India Bill is treated judiciously, and Mr. Wakeman gives Fox full credit for good intentions. He might have introduced a story to be found in Tom Taylor and Leslie's 'Life and Times of Sir Joshua Reynolds,' which has considerable value as an illustration of Fox's character. When Secretary of State in the Coalition Ministry the portrait of Fox was begun by Sir Joshua. The India Bill was then passing through the House of Commons, and it would have passed the Lords also had not George III. interposed and caused it to be thrown out. Being proud of it, Fox asked that he might be represented pointing with a finger towards a copy of the Bill. When the portrait was finished, the Bill had failed to pass into law and Fox had been dismissed from office. Then Sir Joshua thought it better to strike out the name of the Bill from the scroll in the picture. Fox wrote to him as follows:—

"If it is not too late to have one of the papers upon the table in my picture docketed 'A Bill for the better regulating the affairs of the E. I. Company,' &c., I shall be much obliged if you would get it done immediately. If my object in this were only a little vanity, I should not be so anxious about it; but as I have told many persons it would be so, and as I intend it shall be so whenever the picture goes home, the omission of the docket at the Exhibition at this particular time might be misconstrued into a desire of avoiding the public discussion upon a measure which will be always the pride of my life. This is the point upon which I am most anxious; but if another paper could be docketed 'Representation of the Commons to the King, March 15th, 1784,' it would be so much the better. I beg your pardon for troubling you upon these things, which may appear trifles, but which are not so, from the misconstructions that may be made."

None of Fox's speeches did him more credit than the one on the Westminster scrutiny; but of this no mention is made by Mr. Wakeman, who, though he prints several extracts from Fox's letters, does not attempt to exhibit him as an orator by giving well-chosen extracts from his speeches. Fox was not only an orator and a statesman, but he was also a man of letters, and a most interesting chapter might have been written concerning him in the latter capacity. The space at Mr. Wakeman's disposal was limited, and the difficulty of dealing with such a subject as a whole and in detail is not light; yet the task is one which could be easily discharged if the writer knew how to apportion his space. It is quite true, as Mr. Wakeman says in the first sentence of his preface, that "to write an adequate biography of Charles James Fox would be to write the history of the reign of George III.

in its social as well as its political aspects." No doubt a very large volume could be filled with a biography of Fox; but when a very small one is the limit, then the writer has to condense his materials and to select them. In making a due selection, that which concerns Fox personally ought to be chosen. There is no need for filling paragraphs or pages about Walpole or George III., the pressing requirement being to set forth Fox as a man and a statesman, and to render clear that which may seem obscure in his personal conduct and in the development of his character.

Nothing strikes the investigator of the period during which Fox lived and acted so much as the exceptional progress which he made from childhood to mature age. In his early days he was precocious and remarkable in many respects. Few men of his day had so many advantages and were cursed with so many drawbacks. His father did what he could to spoil him, and the father's cruel kindness led to his clever and promising son degenerating into a gamester and a man of fashion. If he had been an ordinary man he might have died without rising above the level in which his earlier years were passed. His eldest brother Stephen, who became the second Lord Holland and the father of the Lord Holland who is immortalized in Macaulay's essay, was as much addicted to the fashionable vices of the age as he; but Stephen left the world without any one, other than his relations, regretting his departure, while Charles lived to make a name as a statesman, and died amidst the regret of his enemies as well as of his friends. Why this should have occurred deserves a paragraph, if not a chapter, yet nothing is said about it by Mr. Wakeman. Indeed, he carefully avoids all difficult problems in Fox's career, and dwells upon those about which nothing need be written. He does not even give him any credit for one of the most creditable incidents in his life, that of ceasing to gamble. A man who becomes a gamester so young as he did seldom, if ever, is weaned from the pleasure of staking money at play, yet Fox achieved the difficult feat, and he merits praise for so doing.

Fox deserves another compliment from a biographer. He was a great politician, but his devotion to letters was scarcely less marked than his absorption in the politics of his party. Mr. Wakeman admits that Fox read the classics with genuine appreciation, yet he does not make it clear how eclectic and profound was Fox's taste as a critic and a scholar. We are almost inclined to regret that he ever busied himself with politics instead of spending his life in purely literary occupations. He read the greatest works of antiquity with the zest of a scholar, and while enjoying Homer and Virgil, Demosthenes and Cicero, he was quite as much at home in the classics of a later age, and he delighted in Ariosto and Racine, Cervantes and Calderon. Many men have been accomplished critics of the standard writers of other ages and countries than their own, but they have generally cared little for the writers of their own country and their own time. Fox is an exception. When a young man he was charmed with Goldsmith's 'Traveller'; on his deathbed he listened to the 'Village

Tales' of Crabbe; he heartily appreciated Burns; when others thought nothing of Cowper he expressed his admiration for his poems; and he was among the first to read and praise the 'Lyrical Ballads' of Wordsworth, and Scott's 'Lay of the Last Minstrel.' Works of fiction, from those of Fielding to those of Fanny Burney, delighted him during the hours which he could abstract from politics. Dryden was one of his special favourites. This was no merit in a day when Dryden's verse and prose gave pleasure to thousands, but it was much rarer then for any one to read, as Fox did, the works of Chaucer and pronounce them very good.

Much that is most creditable to Fox is omitted from this life by Mr. Wakeman. We do not suppose this is done intentionally. The truth is that Mr. Wakeman appears to lack the qualifications requisite for doing justice to such a many-sided and exceptional character as Fox, and his failure to produce an adequate 'Life' of him may have been a foregone conclusion.

NOVELS OF THE WEEK.

- The Failure of Elizabeth.* By E. Frances Poynter. 3 vols. (Bentley & Son.)
The Bishops' Bible. By D. Christie Murray and Henry Herman. 3 vols. (Chatto & Windus.)
The Miner's Right: a Tale of the Australian Goldfields. By Rolf Boldrewood. 3 vols. (Macmillan & Co.)
A New Othello. By Iza Duffus Hardy. 3 vols. (White & Co.)
By Order of the Czar: the Tragic Story of Anna Klossstock, Queen of the Ghetto. By J. Hatton. 3 vols. (Hutchinson & Co.)
Lucinda. By Major G. F. White. 3 vols. (Ward & Downey.)
Till the Great Assize. By Vere Clavering. 3 vols. (Hurst & Blackett.)
A Brummagem Baron. By John A. Bridges. 2 vols. (Ward & Downey.)
An Unfortunate Arrangement. By John Hill. 2 vols. (Same publishers.)
Sentenced! By Somerville Gibney. (Chatto & Windus.)
The House of the Wolf. By Stanley J. Weyman. (Longmans & Co.)
The Firm of Girdlestone. By A. Conan Doyle. (Chatto & Windus.)

If a little too long, 'The Failure of Elizabeth' is a pleasing, wholesome story, and Miss Poynter's carefully drawn distinctive characters can never fail to arouse interest. Elizabeth herself belongs to that charming type of fresh unspoiled girlhood which Miss Poynter knows well how to depict. Sent out alone into the world with the inexperience of seventeen years, it is scarcely surprising that this much neglected girl with her generous impulses should fall in love with the first person who interests himself in her. Unfortunately her hero is an elderly invalid clergyman of the worst type of vanity and sordid egotism, who having worked upon her too sensitive conscience, and dazzled her imagination by one sermon, eventually undertakes to mould her for the sake of her 300l. a year. Elizabeth's commendable failure to fulfil the dreary round of life expected of her, her final awakening to the discovery of her husband's weakness, the shattering of her ideal and the wreck of her faith cannot but arouse the sympathy of the reader. We are only glad to think that this chapter of her history is finally closed while she is still young, and, we hope, wholesome-minded enough to begin life anew under brighter and more worthy circumstances. It is difficult to believe either that Madame von Waldorf is Robert Holland's half-sister, or that her continued faith in him is anything but opposition to the Baroness von Leuwine's generous affection for Elizabeth. Miss Poynter gives a humorous description of life in a German pension, with its uncomfortable economies, and petty jealousies, and of the dogmatic tyranny exercised by the English chaplain and his wife.

The Murray-Herman copartnership has produced in 'The Bishops' Bible' a clever and touching story. Its interest is well sustained, and there is no particular straining after dramatic effects. It reveals, indeed, the subdued tone and the ecclesiastical flavour which its authors doubtless considered appropriate to the magazine in which it first appeared. Dr. Hay, the rector of Thorbury, his churchwarden, Isaac Stringer, and his squire, Marmaduke Boyer, are decidedly the best characters in the book. Stringer and his son Joe—especially the dogged, obstinate father, with his reserve of good nature—and, in a less degree, the squire and his son Frank, are cast in the same mould as the father and son in 'Rainbow Gold,' all alike being reminiscences of the Willets in 'Barnaby Rudge.' Probably enough Mr. Murray has had living models to work from, and in any case the figures stand out with lifelike boldness. The story of the Bishops' Bible, stolen from Thorbury Church by rascally renovators, and of the rector's troubles in connexion therewith, is admirably told.

Although 'The Miner's Right' deals with somewhat more conventional and less exciting conditions of life than 'Robbery under Arms,' and though it may on that account be less attractive for the generality of readers, it is nevertheless distinguished by very much the same qualities as those which singled out the earlier narrative from the ruck of its contemporaries. The veteran Australian who has made his mark as a novelist under the assumed name of Rolf Boldrewood has the gift of seeing clearly and reproducing the romantic side of real life; and the life which has passed under his eyes is exceptionally full of romance. He represents himself in his new story as Hereward Pole, a colonist from Kent, who paid ten shillings in 1854 for a miner's right in Tambora, New South Wales; and his three volumes make up a detailed picture of men and things under the circumstances described. The picture is unquestionably interesting, thanks to the very detail and fidelity which will tend to qualify its attractiveness for those who like excitement and incident before everything else.

Mesmerism is employed by the author of 'A New Othello' to create a batch of new situations. The latest name for the familiar facts of mesmerism is hypnotism, and the cleverest hypnotists have recently told us that they cannot induce a victim to commit an act altogether repugnant to his or her moral character. Miss Duffus Hardy requires her readers to believe that a professional mesmerist compels a refined girl to enter a man's room in the dead of night and poison him. This may or may not be possible—it is not for the man of letters to decide so great a controversy. In addition to the villainous compound who plays the titular rôle in the story—poor Othello!—there is a new Desdemona, who sings on the stage, and crosses the Atlantic more than once without her husband. The new Cassio has more to say for himself than his prototype in the play, and there is some very pretty fooling before the author assumes her tragic mood, and demonstrates what a jealous mesmerist may do when his blood is up. The closing chapters are tremendous in their intensity, and the reader is not at all likely to complain that Miss Duffus Hardy's new Othello is tame in his methods.

'By Order of the Czar,' as we learn from the publisher's preface, "has found great popularity in the newspaper media." There has, of course, been no opportunity of testing its popularity in Russia, for it would stand no chance of crossing the frontier, and the fact of its formal prohibition by the censorship is recorded twice over at the beginning of the first volume. To tell the truth, Mr. Hatton's story is not a fair picture of life in Russia, however accurately or plausibly it may depict Russian administration at its worst. The story is cleverly told, and it is a ghastly record of horrors, true at any rate in some of its details. The persecution of the Jews is not confined to the dominions of the Czar, nor are cruelty and oppression the sole characteristics of the Russian Government. With due reservations, the story of Anna Klostok may serve the purpose for which it was written. That is to say, it may be popular amongst its readers, and it may appeal to the conscience of any influential Russian who happens to come across these old facts in a new dress—improbable as the chance must appear. Mr. Hatton has evidently taken pains to work up his authorities, and the result is satisfactory enough so far as the fiction is concerned.

For badness of style and general incompetency it would be difficult to match 'Lucinda.' It is vulgar and long-winded too, and is put together in such a way as to defy every rule of composition. One conspicuous feature is the author's love of dates, and his mania for piloting his readers backwards and forwards, here, there, and everywhere, in bewildering fashion. The story is supposed to take place in the fifties, but for some unknown reason the slang is the slang of the eighties; there is a great deal of it, and of practical joking of a far from humorous, but not un-English type as well. There is a description also of a Woolwich establishment that is somewhat nauseating and not too funny, and of a young lady's mode of welcoming her guests that is not to be recommended. Were parents and guardians the least likely to take the book seriously the incomes of the cramming fraternity might suffer. Major White appears to have constituted himself an authority on the clothes question, amongst others. The following is one of the valuable conclusions he has arrived at:—"Ladies never know much about male garments except that they would always, in a general way, have men overdressed than underdressed."

The heroine of Vere Clavering's last novel is a colourless creature with twenty thousand pounds, who marries, in opposition to the wishes of her wealthy aunt, one Capt. Wilfred Ackroyd. Capt. Ackroyd woos Gladys Mervyn for the sake of her money, and then neglects her; but a very good young man, Basil Glendyne—the proper names in this story must have used up all the y's in the printer's case—falls in love with her. Ackroyd is a commonplace villain, as Basil and Gladys are commonplace in their goodness; and the three are reserved for a conventional rather than a commonplace fate.

The author of 'A Brummagem Baron' has things of a certain sort to say, and he says them with some energy and conviction. The life of a bookmaker followed by the making of quack pills and the degree of a "baron" is not represented as being a career of unmixed joy, nor entirely wretched either. Indeed, an air of truth is given to the story by a pretty strong touch of the commonplace and the absence of exaggeration and heightening of effects. The hero is a kind of average human being who, after a variety of adventures and incidents, works himself into the possession of an acquired morality. Then he is finally redeemed, without any high-falutin', by his love for a young girl. There is little sentiment and no affectation about the story, but there is a good deal of honest purpose and directness of treatment which makes it not bad reading.

'An Unfortunate Arrangement' is not in that tentative, yet pleasing vein which sometimes marks first novels, and justifies one in saying they "contain promise for the future." If there be promise in Mr. Hill's book it is hardly a promise of pleasantness. As a story it is less stupid than it is disagreeable, and the author's tone is vague, wrong-headed, and affectedly cynical. There is a woeful want of any rallying-point or central idea, which would alone mark the tale out for failure if nothing else did. Besides its vague unsatisfactoriness it is often actively unpleasant and vulgar, especially when Stanton, the cold-blooded pleasure-seeker, is brought on the stage, sometimes suddenly and autobiographically, but always inartistically. Through its pages also meanders a high-souled Scotch enthusiast who drinks more than is good for him, and plunges deeper in metaphysics than is good for the reader. This generous, but misguided person also writes verses, and divides his fortune with a worthless wretch. He is not very lifelike, and is probably a set-off against the mean poverty-stricken natures that surround him. Of the company are also youthful females who consume a great deal of champagne, and take their "favourite dish" in season, and out of it too.

Somerville Gibney relates a wonderful piece of detective ingenuity, showing how a man sentenced to death for a murder is saved by the acuteness of a friend, who discovers that the gun of the deceased has been scratched by a dog, and convinces the Home Secretary that it was the dog, not the sentenced man, who pulled the trigger and shot the victim. The elaboration of the amateur detective business is marvellous in its way. There is nothing else in the hundred and twenty pages of 'Sentenced!' which could induce a desire to read it.

'The House of the Wolf' is quite a brilliant affair—the ideal historical romance, in fact—a type of literature but too rare. St. Bartholomew's Eve is the moment chosen, and is described with uncommon skill and energy. The general presentation of the old place in the country and its people is also excellent. Some of the situations are dramatic and moving, and the play of action and incident is spirited, quick, and clear. In a word, the rendering of epoch, speech, and locality is first rate. The style is marked by finish and lightness, reminding the reader in places of Mr. Stevenson's way of treating such of his shorter episodes as 'The Sire de Maletroit's Door.' The main facts of the story, as Mr. Weyman gives them, are common ground and historically correct. The supposed source is an old French memoir used with considerable capacity and judgment, and with an eye for certain quick and delicate effects in human and natural scenery. The strong sense of illusion produced is not the result of any careful imitation, but of intimate knowledge, and a free and fearless touch besides. The flexibility with which Mr. Weyman uses his material, taking and leaving what he pleases, shows how well he has his subject in hand, and the power he has of investing dead deeds and days with a spirit and grace of his own. If the narrative of M. Anne de Caylus shows a more introspective and subjective touch than men of his century are usually credited with, the effect is so slight and happily given that a critic is not the least inclined to quarrel with it. The interest is largely human, and centres more than might be expected upon the individuality and characteristics of those who play their parts in this brief drama. The three young brothers, who set out on a rescue expedition to Paris, are carefully "differentiated," and the reader acquires a good notion of their various temperaments. Amongst the scenes which are strikingly good is one in which the brothers find themselves suddenly thrown into company with sundry strange elements and beings charged with dread and stealthy purposes of their own, soon to be revealed in the lurid light of the fatal dawn even then breaking over Paris.

Dr. Conan Doyle tells us that his book is a romance of the unromantic, and there we cannot agree with him, for it seems to us that commerce is full of the possibilities of romance. It is true that the romance of commerce does not always find so clever an exponent as Dr. Conan Doyle. The firm of Girdlestone consists of a father and son, as pretty a pair of villains as one may meet; they are African merchants, and grow rich in unholy ways. There comes an unlucky moment in the history of the firm when money is wanted, and then the hurly-burly begins. First there is the magnificent fraud of the great corner in diamonds, and we go to South Africa, where are wild adventurers and adventures. Then comes the slow and hideous torture of pretty Kate Harston, old Girdlestone's ward, whose fortune is aimed at by fair means or foul. The wicked and unhappy pair clutch at any one and anything which will yield money and save the reputation of the great firm, and strange scenes occur and strange folk figure in the tale before the last tragic scene in which they disappear for ever. The book is not without lighter touches to beguile the reader from the contemplation of the gruesome two, notably the examination, which is full of rollicking fun, and the grand football match, which, despite an occasional confusion between Scotch and English terms, would satisfy an expert and yet give a clear idea of the ruthless game to an ignorant outsider.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

MESSRS. BENTLEY & SON publish Lord Althorp, by Mr. Ernest Myers, a little biography of the great Lord Spencer under his best-known name—a volume which is unfortunately marred by the intrusion into it of the asperities of the politics of the present day. The book, which might have been of interest to a political student, is defaced by the introduction of statements concerning matters of our time, such as that which points out how, in the opinion of the writer, "the present leader of the Irish faction has been compelled to confess that he had deliberately lied to the House of Commons." The Athenæum is not concerned with the question whether or not Mr. Parnell has lied to the House of Commons, and we are quite content that Mr. Myers should think, if he pleases, that that is so. The writer of these lines of notice is one of those numerous Englishmen who have abstained from perusing a single line of the proceedings of the Special Commission and of the parliamentary debates upon the subject, and his reading does not fit him for dealing with the topic. But all historical students must regret to see a book which has been written in excellent style, and which would otherwise be impartial, spoiled by repeated allusions of the description named. In his preface Mr. Myers mentions his great indebtedness to the present Lord Spencer for the loan of his uncle's letters. We should have thought that the view probably taken by the present earl as to the opinions upon the Irish question which the third earl would have entertained if living might have influenced the biographer of the third earl so far as to have induced him to abstain from dragging in whole pages of references to the acts of the existing Irish Nationalist party. Mr. Myers draws a distinction between the times of Lord Althorp and the present as regards Irish affairs, by arguing that at the former date the Irish could not expect the removal of their grievances by the imperial Parliament, whereas the people of Great Britain are now so sincerely bent on removing their grievances that the removal of them may be safely trusted to Parliament. A few pages further on Mr. Myers himself states, however, that the House of Lords is hardly impartial upon questions that touch Church or land, and it is not the case that Irish affairs are even now wholly dissociated from either of those topics. The excision from the work of Mr. Myers of some ten or twenty pages would make it an excellent record of the career of a statesman less known than he deserves to be, although remembered by his party with respect.

UNDER the title of The Trials of a Country Parson (Unwin) Dr. Jessopp has reprinted from the magazines some pleasant essays which will please the many readers who delighted in his 'Arcady.' The same humour, the same genial temper, and the same knowledge of country folk which distinguished the earlier volume are to be found in its successor. The stories which Dr. Jessopp picks up in Arcady continue to be excellent:—

"It is very shocking to a sensitive person to hear the way in which the old people speak of their dead wives or husbands exactly as if they'd been horses or dogs. They are always proud of having been married more than once. 'You didn't think, Miss, as I'd had five wives, now did you? Ah! but I have though—leastways I buried five on 'em in the churchyard, that I did—and tree on 'em beenties!'"

On another occasion I playfully suggested, 'Don't you mix up your husbands now and then, Mrs. Page, when you talk about them?' 'Well, to tell you the truth, sir, I really do! But my third husband, he was a man! I don't mix him up. He got killed, fighting—you've heard tell o' that I make no doubt. The others warn't nothing to him. He'd ha' mixed them up quick enough if they'd interfered w' him, Lawk ah! He'd a made nothing of 'em!'

Dr. Jessopp has an essay of protest, thoroughly justified, against the wanton injury done to their churches by the clergy (who ought to cherish and preserve them), sometimes with and sometimes without a faculty, under the plea of "restoration." The clergyman with a taste for architecture is oftentimes even a greater vandal than Mr. Five per Cent., and the devastation he has managed to perpetrate during the last forty years is terrible to think of. Dr. Jessopp also argues against the "parson's freehold," and urges that the freehold of every church and glebe and the patronage of every living should be vested in a body of trustees, who should have the power of dismissing the incumbent for misconduct or inefficiency.

MR. SHARP'S Life of Browning (Scott) shows very considerable ability, although it is marred by traces of haste, the use of long words, and a somewhat excessive display of the author's familiarity with books in many languages. Of course Mr. Sharp has no new facts of importance to give, and, indeed, he wisely and frankly says so. The bulk of his volume consists of criticisms (mainly sensible and sound, if not particularly acute) of Browning's works, of which an excellent bibliography is supplied by Mr. Anderson. For a satisfactory biography we must wait till Mrs. Orr completes the task she has just begun. One novel fact—we believe it is a fact—may be mentioned here as it forms a link between two men of genius. Mr. Browning's wide acquaintance with the minor men of Italian history was largely due to his becoming acquainted with Stendhal when Stendhal was French consul at Civita Vecchia. Stendhal had a passion for the romance and crime to be found in the annals of many notable Italian houses during the Middle Ages and the Renaissance, and he inspired Browning with some of his own enthusiasm. Hence in a measure we owe 'The Ring and the Book' to the promptings of the French novelist.

We have received the Reports of the Free Libraries at Birmingham, Wigan, and Great Yarmouth. At Birmingham arrangements are being made for the erection of three additional branches; at Wigan the news-room is to be enlarged, and the letter D of the Catalogue of the Reference Library has been issued, and is now on our table; at Yarmouth the library is making signal progress. An Index Catalogue of the books in the Lending Library at Cardiff (Owen & Co.) has reached us, compiled by Mr. Ballinger; and so has a new number of the Indici e Cataloghi published by the Italian Government. It is the first part of the second volume of the valuable catalogue of the Palatine MSS. in the Central Library at Florence.

We have on our table The Beginnings of American Nationality, 1774 to 1789, by A. W. Small (Baltimore, Johns Hopkins University);—The State and Federal Governments of the United States, by W. Wilson, LL.D. (Boston, U.S., Heath);—The Ontario Township, by J. M. McEvoy, First Series, No. 1 (Toronto, Warwick & Sons);—Murray's Illustrated Penny Pocket Guide to Cheltenham (J. P. Murray);—A Short Comparative Grammar of Greek and Latin for Schools and Colleges, by V. Henry, translated by R. T. Elliott (Sonnenschein);—Passages for Practice in Translation at Sight: Part IV., Greek, by J. W. White (Boston, U.S., Ginn & Co.);—The Essentials of Method, by C. de Garmo (Boston, U.S., Heath);—National Education, by the Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster (Burns & Oates);—A Search for Knowledge, and other Papers, by A. N. Pearson (Melville, Mullen & Slade);—Recent Economic Changes, by D. A. Wells, LL.D.

(Longmans),—Spinal Concussion, by S. V. Cleverger, M.D. (F. A. Davis),—Combination and Coercion, by the Right Hon. G. Shaw Lefevre, M.P. (Kegan Paul & Co.),—The Old Order and the New, by J. M. Davidson (Reeves),—The Promotion of General Happiness, by M. Macmillan (Sonnenschein),—The Story of Bradshaw's Guide, by P. Fitzgerald (Field & Tuer),—Nocturnal London, by a late Secretary of the Legation to the Court of St. James's (Stanesby),—Little Dinners, by a Live Lord ('Society' Office),—Two Women or One? by H. Harland (Cassell),—Lost in a Bucket Shop, by C. J. Scotter (Field & Tuer),—The Great Doriini, by C. J. Willis (Gardner & Co.),—Fireside Flittings, by T. Hutchinson (Derby, Murray),—Heroes and Martyrs, and other Poems, by J. A. Langford (Fisher Unwin),—Sunlight and Shade, by E. A. Newton (G. J. Palmer),—Wallace, or the Battle of Stirling Bridge, an Historical Play in Five Acts, by C. Waddie (Edinburgh, Gemmell),—Tatters from a Student's Gown, by A. Mitchell (Aberdeen, Bisset),—Mary of Nazareth, a Legendary Poem, by Sir John Croker, Bart., Part III. (Burns & Oates),—The Water Lily, by F. Waters (Ottawa, Durie & Son),—Carmina Silvulae, Poems Original and Translated, by J. A. Story (Authors' Co-operative Publishing Company),—Milton's Comus, with Introduction and Notes by W. Bell (Macmillan),—The University Shakespeare: The Tempest, edited by Herbert A. Evans (R. Sutton & Co.),—The Three Banquets and Prison Poems, by Ida White (Sonnenschein),—Words of Light, Poems, by F. A. Bonney (Sydney, Turner & Henderson),—The Composition of the Four Gospels, a Critical Enquiry, by the Rev. A. Wright (Macmillan),—Theology and Piety: Alike Free, from the Point of View of Manchester New College, Oxford, by an Old Student (Kegan Paul & Co.),—The Messages of Christ, by the Rev. J. J. Ellis (Authors' Co-operative Publishing Company),—The Philosophy of the Mazdayasni Religion under the Sassanids, translated from the French of L. C. Casartelli, with Prefatory Remarks, Notes, and a brief Biographical Sketch of the Author, by Firoz J. D. J. Asa (Bombay, J. B. Karani),—Christian Theism, by the Rev. C. A. Row (Hodder & Stoughton),—From Strength to Strength, in Memoriam J. B. D. (Macmillan),—Simon Peter, his Early Life and Times, by Charles S. Robinson, D.D. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier),—and Jesus the Messiah, being an Abridged Edition of 'The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah,' by A. Edersheim, D.D. (Longmans).

LIST OF NEW BOOKS.

ENGLISH.

Theology.

Allen's (J. R.) The Monumental History of the Early British Church, 12mo. 3/6 cl.
Bailey's (H.) A Devotional Manual for the Clergy at Home or Abroad, 12mo. 2/6 cl.
Frazer's (J. G.) The Golden Bough, a Study in Comparative Religion, 2 vols. 8vo. 28/ cl.
Garner's (T. E.) The Title Deeds of the Church of England, 12mo. 3/6 cl.
Hodge's (A. A.) Evangelical Theology, a Course of Popular Lectures, cr. 8vo. 5/ cl.

Law.

Stephen's (H. L.) The Law of Support and Subsidence, 5/ cl.

Philosophy.

Fraser's (A. C.) Locke, 12mo. 3/6 cl. (Blackwood's Philosophical Classics.)
Lilly (W. S.) On Right and Wrong, 8vo. 12/ cl.

History and Biography.

Clinton's (H. R.) From Crete to Assaye, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.
Engel's (L.) From Handel to Hallé, Biographical Sketches, with Autobiographies of Profs. Huxley and Herkomer, 42/ McCarthy's (J. H.) The French Revolution, Vols. 1 and 2, 24/ Myers's (E.) Lord Althorp, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
Scottish National Memorial, edited by J. Paton, folio, 52/6 Timmis's (J. A.) Chronological, Historical, and Heraldic Charts of the Royal House of England, folio, 42/ cl.
Whately (Mary Louisa), The Life and Work of, by E. J. Whately, cr. 8vo. 2/ cl.

Geography and Travel.

Bridgman's (F. A.) Winters in Algeria, illus. roy. 8vo. 10/6 Chisholm's (G. G.) A Smaller Commercial Geography, 2/6 Levinsohn's (J.) The Story of my Wanderings in the Land of my Fathers, cr. 8vo. 2/ cl. gilt.

Science.

Backhouse's (J.) Handbook of European Birds, post 8vo. 10/6 Dawson's (Sir J. W.) Modern Ideas of Evolution as related to Revelation and Science, cr. 8vo. 5/ cl.

Dickinson's Rational Arithmetic, Addition and Subtraction Sheets, Nos. 1 and 2, 6/ each on roller.

Longman's Junior School Algebra, by W. S. Beard, with Answers, cr. 8vo. 2/ cl.

Longman's School Trigonometry, by Rev. F. Sparks, 2/6 cl.
McNally's (Surg. Major J.) Elements of Sanitary Science, 8/ Ripper's (W.) A Course of Instruction in Machine Drawing and Design for Technical Schools, &c., 4to. 25/ cl.
Shortland's (Vice-Admiral) Nautical Surveying, 8vo. 21/ cl.
Watson's (J.) Sketches of British Sporting Fishes, 3/6 cl.

General Literature.

Bell's (Mrs. H.) Will o' the Wisp, illus. cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
Boseley's (J.) The Living Loom, or Light on Factory Life, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
Brown's (T. M.) The Musgrove Ranch, a Tale of Southern California, cr. 8vo. 2/ cl.
Crommelin's (M.) Midge, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.
Curzon's (L. H.) The Blue Ribband of the Turf, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.
Dawson's (W. H.) Bismarck and State Socialism, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
Dixie's (Lady F.) Gloriana, or the Revolution of 1800, 6/ cl.
Dunboyne's (Lady) Heather and Roses, illus. cr. 8vo. 2/ cl.
Fitch's (J. G.) Notes on American Schools and Training Colleges, 12mo. 2/ cl.
Fleet's (F. R.) A Theory of Wit and Humour, cr. 8vo. 5/ cl.
Gilman's (M.) Social Lepers, a Realistic and Sensational Story of Society Life in New York, cr. 8vo. 2/5 swd.
Habberton's (J.) All he Knew, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
Haliburton's (H.) In Scottish Fields, cr. 8vo. 4/6 cl.
Keary's (G. F.) A Marriage of Convenience, 2 vols. cr. 8vo. 21/ Lang's (A.) From Prison to Paradise, a Story of English Peasant Life in 1557, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
Loomie's (L. C.) The Index Guide to Travel and Art Study in Europe, 12mo. 15/ leather.
Macleod's (H. D.) The Theory of Credit, Vol. 2, Part 1, 4/6 cl.
Madreyhijo's (L.) A Photographic Mystery, cr. 8vo. 6/ cl.
Molesworth's (Mrs.) Little Mother Bunch, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
Montagu's (J.) Camp and Studio, with 33 Plates and Cuts, 8vo. 10/6 cl.
Once upon a Time, or the Boy's Book of Adventures, 2/6 cl.
Pheps (E. S.) and Ward's (H. D.) The Master of the Magiclan, imperial 16mo. 7/6 cl.
Plumptre's (Mrs. F. H.) The Braille System for the Blind, arranged for "Seeing" Writers, 4to. 3/ cl.
Russell's (W. C.) Marooned, cr. 8vo. 3/6 cl.
Sargent's (G. E.) George Burley, his History, Experience, and Observations, cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
Stories of the Bāgh o' Bahār, being an Abstract made from the Original, by E. F. Parry, cr. 8vo. 2/ cl.
Troy Farm, by Author of 'Our Valley,' cr. 8vo. 2/ cl.
Walford's (L. B.) Mr. Smith, a Part of his Life, cr. 8vo. 2/ Walker's (F.) First Lessons in Political Economy, cr. 8vo. 5/ Westall (W.) and Stepiak's (S.) The Blind Musician (from the Russian of Korolenko), cr. 8vo. 2/6 cl.
Wood's (H. F.) The Englishman of the Rue Cain, 12mo. 2/

FOREIGN.

Theology.

Delff (H. K. H.) Das Vierte Evangelium, e. authent. Bericht, 2m.

Law.

Scansa (L.) Traité des Magasins Généraux, 7fr.
Fine Art and Archaeology.

Album Caran d'Ache, Vol. 2, 3fr. 50.
Lys Amara d'Helain-Pisan, et d'écrit de Savoie, mix en écrits par L. J. Gastine, et ornés d'images par E. Zier, 20fr.

Pillet (C.) Madame Vigée-Le Brun, 2fr. 50.

Philosophy.

Friedrich (W.) Lessing's Lehre v. der Seelenwanderung, 2m.

History and Biography.

Ayroles (J. B. J.) La Puelle devant l'Eglise de son Temps, 15fr.
Cars (Duc des) Mémoires du Duc des Cars, 2 vols. 15fr.
Instructions données aux Ambassadeurs de France depuis les Traités de Westphalie jusqu'à la Révolution: Russie, avec Introduction par A. Rambaud, Vol. 1, 20fr.
Mirabeau (Comtesse de) Le Prince de Talleyrand et la Maison d'Orléans, 3fr. 50.
Tissot (J. J.) Les Armées Allemandes sous Paris, 7fr. 50.
Zeller (J.) Habsbourg et Luxembourg, 7fr. 50.

Science.

Reich (E.) Physiologie d. Magischen, 10m.
Renard (A.) La Chimie appliquée à l'industrie, 20fr.
Vaschy (A.) Traité d'Electricité, 2 vols. 25fr.
Zimmermann (A.) Beiträge zur Morphologie u. Physiologie der Pflanzenzelle, 4m.

BEATRICE.

THROUGH Dante's hands, in dreamy vigil clasped,
A pale green bud shot skyward from the sod;
He bowed and sighed; then laid the prize he grasped,
A folded lily, at the feet of God.

There it has slowly opened, age by age,
And grown a star to lamp Man's heart to heaven;
Its perfume his divinest heritage,
Its love the rarest gift God's self hath given.

EDMUND GOSSE.

A BIBLIOGRAPHICAL CURIOSITY: 'HISTOIRE DES JOYAUX.'

Dublin, April 29, 1890.

IN the introduction to vol. i. of my recently published edition of Tavernier's 'Travels' I gave a brief account of Tavernier's relations with Samuel Chappuzeau, a historian and dramatical writer who, according to his own account, edited the 'Travels' with great reluctance, and in consequence only of the pressure which was brought to bear upon him by Louis XIV. at Tavernier's instance.

So far as I have been able to ascertain, there is no mention in the biographies of either of them of any previous relations having existed between them, and therefore the following discovery may be considered to have sufficient interest to justify this special notice.

It is necessary to premise that Tavernier's sixth and last voyage to the East lasted from November, 1663, to December, 1668, and that his first publication appeared in 1675—the 'Travels' following in 1676.

When searching the Philosophical Transactions for early notices of India, I came upon a review or abstract of a work entitled 'Histoire des Joyaux,' published at Geneva in 1665, and said to be by Le Sr. Chapuzeau (sic), and this abstract is sufficiently detailed to show a remarkable agreement in the facts quoted with some contained in certain of the chapters in the 'Travels,' while several of the incidents described are of a nature which connects them with Tavernier personally.

On inquiry I found the book to be of very great rarity; but while seeking for a copy my attention was attracted to a book with an identical title in English ('The History of Jewels') in a catalogue of second-hand books. On obtaining it I found that it was dated London, 1671, and that its contents were, so far as an opinion could be formed, identical with those of the 'Histoire,' but the names of the original author and the translator are not given. I have dealt with these points in App. vi. vol. ii. of Tavernier's 'Travels.'

Quite recently I have had the unexpected good fortune to obtain a copy of the original 'Histoire' itself. Except that it contains a considerable geographical appendix, it proves to be identical in contents with the English version. And as no author's name is given in it, the already mentioned review in the Philosophical Transactions is the sole authority for attributing the work to Chapuzeau (sic).

How he got access, as he most certainly must have done, to Tavernier's memoranda in 1665, while the latter was absent in India, and why the fact is not referred to in connexion with the controversies which took place between them, are questions that may never be answered; but I am glad to be able to add that they are now being investigated by Prof. Joret, of the University of Aix, whose devotion to Tavernier lore renders it probable that if ever they are to be answered he will succeed in doing so.

V. BALL.

MR. EDWIN WAUGH.

MR. EDWIN WAUGH, the Lancashire poet, whose illness we recently recorded, passed away on the last of April at his house in New Brighton, Cheshire. He was born at Rochdale in 1817, and was apprenticed there to Mr. Thomas Holden, a well-known bookseller and printer of the period. After working as a compositor for some years, he became secretary to the Lancashire Public School Association, the headquarters of which were in Manchester; but after occupying this post for nearly five years, Mr. Waugh gave his attention almost entirely to literature. Amongst his works may be named 'Lancashire Sketches,' 'Rambles in the Lake Country,' 'Rambles and Reveries,' &c. In 1861 he published, through Messrs. Whittaker & Co., 'Poems and Lancashire Songs,' which contains some of his most popular lyrics. About thirty-five years ago he wrote his well-known lyric 'Come whoom to thi' childer an' me,' and he at once became a local celebrity. He will doubtless be best remembered by his poems in the Lancashire dialect, though many of his numerous prose sketches, owing to the vein of humour pervading them, enjoy a wide popularity. Out of his native county Mr. Waugh was not so well known as might be supposed. One of his metropolitan admirers some years ago proposed to him to give a series of readings from his works in London, and the matter was discussed, but nothing came of it. The funeral of the deceased poet took place on Saturday last at the Kersal suburb of Manchester, where at one period he resided. Deputations were present from the Manchester Literary Club (of which he was one of the founders), the Arts Club, the Lancashire and Cheshire Antiquarian Society, the Manchester Geographical Society, and other clubs and associations. Canon Crane delivered an address before the interment.

THE LETTERS OF LORD CHESTERFIELD TO HIS GODSON.

Clarendon Press, Oxford, May 6, 1890.

YOUR correspondent who complains of the differences between the quarto and the octavo editions of Lord Carnarvon's 'Letters of Lord Chesterfield' has not, I think, realized their nature.

The quarto, as he remarks, will necessarily become a rare book, and twice the published price has already been paid for it. Practically the whole of its contents were unique, and saw the light for the first time at its publication.

The appendix, &c., which Lord Carnarvon has added to the octavo edition is merely a reprint of illustrative materials well known to every student of eighteenth century literature. At the time of the publication of the quarto edition these 'Stanhope Letters' (of which two editions appeared in 1817) were common enough; and to have loaded the volume with such matter would have been almost as superfluous as for Mr. Goschen to recite the multiplication table before delivering his Budget speech.

It came to our knowledge, however, that the appearance of Lord Carnarvon's volume caused the 'Stanhope Letters' to become more difficult to obtain; and when we found that an edition of the former was demanded for ordinary library purposes, Lord Carnarvon hoped it would be a convenience to the "general reader" to reprint the letters in small type as an appendix.

I cannot believe that any experienced book-collectors would in the least care to load their editio princeps with such well-known materials. They have probably got the original book on their shelves already, and would disdain a reprint, serviceable though it may prove to the ordinary reader.

Still, I should be obliged if any owners of the editio princeps, who do not possess these supplementary letters in their original form, will write to me, giving the number of their copy; and if any considerable demand arises, the Delegates of the Press will, I feel sure, be desirous to meet it.

P. LYTTELTON GELL.

THACKERAYANA.

British Museum, May 3, 1890.

In the Athenæum for January 1st, 1887, appeared a communication respecting the two undergraduate magazines, the Snob and the Gownsmen, to which Thackeray contributed while at Cambridge. It was there mentioned that in a MS. note in a copy of the Gownsmen believed to have belonged to Edward Fitzgerald, Thackeray's contributions to this periodical are stated to have been signed θ. The British Museum has very recently acquired a copy which formerly belonged to the Rev. John Forster, to whom it was given by Thackeray; and the vendor, a relative of Mr. Forster, states on the authority of the latter that the signature was θ. The contributions thus signed are more numerous and more Thackerayan than those signed with a theta, and it seems not unlikely that the ascription of the latter to Thackeray was merely grounded on the correspondence of his initial. On the other hand, it may remind us of Policeman X.

R. GARNETT.

SALE.

THE last two days of the sale of Mr. Gaisford's library at the rooms of Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson & Hodge showed no falling off in the extraordinarily high prices. Amongst the books more eagerly contested were the Shakespeareana. The First Folio, imperfect, sold for 198*l*.; the Second for 60*l*.; the Third for 168*l*.; the Fourth for 62*l*.; the first edition of Love's Labour Lost, 140*l*.; first edition of Sir John Oldcastle, 46*l*.; Midsommer Night's Dream, printed by Roberts and considered by Mr. Halliwell the first, 116*l*.; first edition of Much Ado about Nothing, 130*l*.; first edition of Merrie Wives of Windsor, 385*l*. (the highest price known); first edition of London Prodigal, 20*l*.; Pericles, 1619 edition, 36*l*.; Henry IV., 1622 edition, 17*l*.; Poems, first collected edition, 52*l*. Shaw's Dresses, largest paper, 32*l*. Shelley's Works, 119*l*. Shepheard's Calendar, 25*l*. Skelton's Works, 1568 edition, 31*l*. A Collection of Song-Books, 178*l*. 3*s*. Spenser's Complaints, first edition, 20*l*. 10*s*.; Faerie Queene, second edition of vol. i. and first of vol. ii., 20*l*. 10*s*.; first edition of Prothalamion, 8*l*. Sir W. Stirling-Maxwell's Artists of Spain, 15*l*. 10*s*. Sussex Illustrations, 57*l*. Swinburne's Poems and Ballads, both series, first editions, 37*l*. 19*s*. Taylor the Water-Poet's Works in folio, 11*l*.; and his separately printed Poems, 19*l*. 4*s*. Whitman's Leaves of Grass, the edition in type set up by himself, 5*l*. 7*s*. 6*d*. Wilbye's Madrigals, 27*l*. Wither's Poems, 89*l*. 4*s*. Woodde's Conflict of Conscience, 13*l*. 5*s*. Yonge's Musica Transalpina, 17*l*. The sale realized 9,236*l*. 15*s*. 6*d*.

THE RECORD SOCIETY.

THE first general meeting of the British Record Society was held on the 1st inst. Mr. Robert Harrison was in the chair, and Earl Beauchamp was elected President of the Society, and the Bishop of Oxford, Sir James Hannen, Sir Reginald Hanson, and the Hon. E. J. Phelps vice-presidents. Mr. Athill, Richmond Herald, was appointed honorary treasurer, and Mr. W. P. W. Phillimore honorary secretary and general editor. It was announced that Sir James Hannen had given his permission to print calendars to the Prerogative wills of Canterbury at Somerset House. The Society will print Mr. J. C. C. Smith's calendar to the wills from 1383 to 1558, some 40,000 to 50,000 in number. It is arranged lexicographically in one index, and it is hoped will be sent to the press at an early date.

THE BEATRICE EXHIBITION.

Florence, May 3, 1890.

THE drizzling rain and the cold of May 1st, though assuring the most timid of the improbability of any public commotion, was dispiriting enough to those who, under the guidance of Count Angelo de Gubernatis, have laboured indefatigably for the success of the Beatrice Exhibition. Nevertheless, by eleven o'clock the large arena of the Politeama was fairly filled. A graceful fantasia, composed for the occasion by Signor Walter, was performed by the orchestra. Then Count de Gubernatis, in a few well-chosen words, explained how this general competition of female industries was designed not only as a means for advancing the artistic and technical instruction of women, but also as a tribute to her to whom Dante's genius had erected an everlasting memorial. He was followed by the learned poetess Signora Brunamonti. Discussing the 'Vita Nuova' from every point of view and the condition of women through several centuries, she displayed her physical and mental gifts in an oration of an hour and a half. I fear, however, that such eloquence must have alarmed not a few of her audience as to some of the possible consequences of extending the education of her sex. In the evening every part of the theatre was crowded to hear the 'Maggiolata,' a May-day idyl set to bright and appropriate music by Prof. Matini, and executed by a numerous amateur choir dressed in thirteenth century costumes. The performance was most animated, picturesque, and successful. The tableaux vivants representing scenes from the 'Vita Nuova' have been eagerly expected, but are now postponed till the middle of the month.

In another week the exhibition will be far more complete; seen even in its present state, it is difficult to imagine how Count de Gubernatis, vanquishing much opposition, produced such a result from an idea conceived only four months ago. The gem of the fine-art gallery is undoubtedly a marble statue of the young Giotto by Amalia Duprè daughter of the late well-known sculptor whose 'Reminiscences' created so much interest a few years ago. The intent expression of the face and the modelling of the limbs are admirable. A painting of an old woman in spectacles by Pia Rovere is an excellent specimen of the realistic school untainted by vulgarity; the hands are capitally drawn. "Federica" (Francesca Ghigliani) sends a lady in Turkish attire sitting among Oriental draperies, cushions, rugs, and tiger skins; the picture glows with colour, and the texture of all the accessories is beautifully rendered in those broad touches which also distinguish her study of a peasant's head. Full-length figures by Ernestine Fabbri and — Ronghi show thorough training, whilst a well-arranged composition by Lilla Maldura of a girl draped in white by a fountain displays a good feeling for colour. I also much admired the 'Cameriera Svogliata' by A. Mirandoli. Harmonious, too, is the portrait of a dark-haired girl standing against a grey background, and dressed in dark slate-coloured gown relieved by a tan glove and a gleam of gold in belt and necklet. Amongst some elaborate interiors I may mention a salon in the Pitti by Argentina Bresca. The Countess Ada Francescetti-Mangilli is more ambitious and less successful with her very large canvas of the three Marias descending from Calvary. Contrary to my expectation, the standard of the art exhibited is higher in technique than in conception. The ceramic display is disappointing. A quantity of the most exquisite lace, embroidery, and needlework of all kinds is to be seen, but it is sad to think how severely young eyes must be strained before such perfection can be reached, and sad also is it to note the low value at which such labour is priced. In the Beatrice tribune is arranged a small collection of Dantesque relics: there are copies of the 'Divine Comedy' illustrated by Botticelli, Flaxman, and Doré, whilst most interesting of the manuscript copies is that lately obtained from the Ashburnham collection, which is annotated by the poet's son Pietro Dante.

E. H. HAMILTON.

Literary Gossip.

IT is reported that Mr. Stanley's forthcoming book has for preface an open letter addressed to "Dear Sir William" (MacKinnon), in which Mr. Stanley repeats his determination to testify to the hand of God before the eyes of men. He speaks, it is said, in somewhat contemptuous terms of Emin Pasha's vacillation.

MR. S. LANE-POOLE's memoir of Sir Richard Church, Generalissimo of the Greek army during the War of Independence, will be concluded in the July number of the English Historical Review. Mr. Poole is sanguine that the facts adduced will go far to disprove Finlay's unfavourable judgment of the general's conduct of the war.

MESSRS. CHAPMAN & HALL have in the press a work on the North-Western Frontier of India, dealing more especially with the Biloch and Pathân border tribes from Karachi to Kashmir. The work is by Mr. E. E. Oliver, under-secretary to the Public Works Department, Punjab, and it will be copiously illustrated by Mr. J. L. Kipling, principal of the Mayo School of Art, Lahore. The same publishers will shortly issue 'Old Sea Wings, Ways, and Words,' by Robert C. Leslie, with numerous illustrations.

'OPPOSITES,' the volume which Messrs. Blackwood are going to publish, by an author who assumes the pseudonym of Lewis Thornton, consists of essays dealing to a considerable extent with theological subjects. Such titles as 'Philosophy, Religious Thought, and the Bible,' 'Evolution,' 'Atheistic Christianity,' 'The Christ of Scripture,' and 'Theology' indicate the nature of the subjects discussed. The author, who by his own confession is far from orthodox, remarks: "Theology and religion may often be quite separate; and if history shows anything, I think it shows that they have usually been so. Therefore any remarks which may be felt obnoxious to theology, need not on that account be thought injurious to religion." He professedly takes the unpopular side on popular questions, and prefixes as his motto the lines of La Fontaine:—

L'homme est de feu pour le mensonge,
Il est de glace aux vérités.

THE annual meeting of the Chetham Society was held last week in Manchester under the presidentship of Chancellor Christie. Amongst the works in progress to be issued by the Society are the Poems of John Byrom and the Commonplace Book of Byrom, to be edited by Dr. Ward, of Owens College; 'A History of the Parish of St. Michael's-on-Wyre,' by Col. Fishwick; 'The Lancashire Recusants of 1716'; and 'A History of the Chapelry of Newton.'

THE Council of the Camden Society propose to issue three volumes during the next twelve months: (1) 'The Visitations of the Collegiate Church of Southwell,' edited by Mr. A. F. Leach. These visitations are of a different character from those given in Dr. Jessopp's book, and add to our knowledge of the condition of a collegiate church in the period immediately preceding the Reformation. (2) The first volume of 'The Clarke Papers.' These contain some new letters, and many speeches of Cromwell himself, edited by Mr. C. H. Firth. (3) 'Accounts of Henry, Earl of Derby (afterwards Henry IV.), during his Travels Abroad,' edited by Miss L. Toulmin Smith. She will have the co-operation of the Historical Society of East and West Prussia. The book illustrates the mode in which a wealthy prince travelled in distant regions towards the end of the fourteenth century, and affords valuable material for the biography of an English king before he came to the throne. It is, moreover, a contribution of some importance to the history of chivalry.

WE are pleased to say that of the last work of the lamented Mr. Blades, his "Bibliographical Miscellanies," the remaining essays are almost entirely finished and ready for publishing, especially the one on 'Chained Libraries.' It may be of interest to many if we add that Mr. Blades had a medal struck for his trade jubilee, which would have been celebrated on May 1st, but unfortunately he did not live to see that day. It is supposed he intended presenting it to his numerous printing and literary friends.

THE second volume of Mr. John S. Farmer's 'Slang and its Analogues' will be issued at the end of June. The whole work is so far forward that the third volume is expected to be ready early in November. Since the publication of vol. i. Messrs. Chatto & Windus have generously placed at Mr. Farmer's disposal the whole of the slang MS. collected by the late Mr. John Camden Hotten. Mr. A. P. Watt is the agent for the work.

MR. JEROME K. JEROME, author of 'The Idle Thoughts of an Idle Fellow'—which we learn has just reached its hundredth edition—is engaged on a work in a similar vein. It is to be published at the Leadenhall Press.

YET another series, to be entitled "Heinemann's International Library." It will contain translations of works by continental authors. The first volume will be 'In God's Way,' by Björnsterne Björnson, translated by Elizabeth Carmichael, and will be ready early in June; to be followed by 'Pierre and Jean,' by M. G. de Maupassant, translated by Clara Bell; and 'The Chief Justice,' by Emil Franzos, translated by Miles Corbet. The series will be edited by Mr. Edmund Gosse. Mr. Heinemann will issue during the season Mr. Harold Frederic's historical novel 'In the Valley,' now appearing in Scribner's Magazine.

MR. GEORGE ALLEN, of Orpington, is going to issue, at the end of May, the posthumous poems of Charles Mackay, LL.D., under the title of 'Gossamer and Snowdrift.' An introduction by his son, Mr. Eric Mackay, will be prefixed.

THE defeat of the Copyright Bill in the United States Congress will not cause much stir in this country, as it was generally expected that it would be thrown out. Its warmest supporters were far from sanguine. It is obvious that no measures of the kind can be expected to pass until a change comes over the ideas of the American people as to rights of foreign authors.

MR. JOSEPH HATTON writes:—

"As the announcement of the publication of 'By Order of the Czar' in Lovell's 'International Series,' with my consent and by special arrangement with me, has seriously interfered with a business understanding between my publishers in London and a New York house for the issue of a special American edition, will you permit me to say that Messrs. Lovell's announcement is entirely without my consent, asked or given? With the establishment of piracy as a regular business in the American book-trade there appears to have sprung up a game of 'bluff,' which would be amusing if it were not tragic. The other day a publisher on the other side stated, in an interview, that he had paid thousands of dollars to a certain English author by way of royalties on his books, the truth being that he had not paid the author in question as much as a single penny."

THE Hibbert Lectures of the late Rev. Dr. Hatch on 'The Origin and Growth of Religion, as illustrated by Greek Influence on Christianity,' which, owing to his serious illness and subsequent death, have been so long in the press, will probably be published this month. The editing of the portion of the lectures which remained unprinted at the time of Dr. Hatch's death has been committed by the trustees to the Rev. Dr. Fairbairn, Principal of Mansfield College, and the Rev. Dr. Sanday, of Oxford.

THE Villon Society is about to issue an English version of the 'Novels' of Baudouin de Villon, Boccaccio, and the 'Arabian Nights.' The translation will be in six volumes, of which three will be issued immediately, the remainder in the autumn.

THE new volume of the "Story of the Nations" series will appear next week. Entitled 'The Jews under the Romans,' it will deal with a phase of the history of the Hebrews quite distinct from that dealt with by Prof. W. K. Hosmer in 'The Jews.' The author in this case is the Rev. W. D. Morrison, M.A.

THE death is announced of the Rev. James A. Wylie, LL.D., of Edinburgh, at the age of eighty-two. He was the author of 'Scenes in the Holy Land,' 'A History of Protestantism' (a partisan pamphlet in three big volumes full of exploded fables, which had better never have been published), 'A History of the Scottish Nation,' and other works, and was also a frequent contributor to serial literature.

BY the publication of the seventh part (pp. 2016-2245) of the first series of Tabari's 'Annales,' edited by Prof. de Goeje, this important historical work is almost brought to a conclusion. The second and third series (A.H. 40-302) are complete, and only the final years of the first series (A.H. 15-39) remain to be printed. A minute index is of course necessary.

THE report on public instruction in Bengal for the year 1888-9 shows a very marked expansion of higher education, but little or no progress in the diffusion of elementary knowledge. The total number of pupils under instruction in the province was 1,482,150, being about 30,000 more than in the previous year. The spread of education among the upper classes is said to be due not so much to any increase of Government expenditure as to the efforts of the people themselves. It is estimated that only one boy in four is on the rolls of some school, and one girl in fifty-seven. The system of controlling public instruction by district boards, which has been in force now for two years, is reported to be working favourably.

THE demand for university education is to a marked extent on the increase in the North-Western Provinces of India. During the last five years the number of pupils in the college classes has increased by nearly 40 per cent., and close on the whole increase is contributed by students who are independent of Government support. This class of students has doubled during the last four years. The superior popularity of the literary as compared with the scientific course for the B.A. degree is remarkable. In the last year 81 students presented themselves for the former, and only 17 for the latter.

THE report on public instruction in Bombay for the year 1888-9 is a record of continued progress throughout the year in almost every branch of education. There are now in the presidency 582,853 pupils under instruction in 11,732 institutions, public and private.

Public institutions number 8,642, with 507,752 pupils; private institutions 3,090, with 75,101 pupils. Out of the total number of those who are of an age to go to school 28 per cent. of the boys and 3 per cent. of the girls are under instruction. The total expenditure of the Bombay educational department during the year was 5,453,328 rupees.

THE collected works of the distinguished theologian Dr. Karl Hase, whose death we recently announced, will be issued at Leipzig in twelve volumes. The collection will contain several posthumous writings, chiefly relating to ecclesiastical history and to the author's own life. The publication of them is expected to be completed in three years.

THE first number of Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper in its enlarged shape has reached us. The amount of matter is very large, the type is good, and the paper has been nicely worked off.

THE chief Parliamentary Papers of the week are the Accounts of the Metropolitan Gas Companies for 1889 (3d.); Return showing the Number of Experiments performed on Living Animals during 1889 (3d.); Report on the Finances of Egypt (3d.); Report of the Progress of the Ordnance Survey to December 31st, 1889 (2s. 3d.); Returns of Railway Accidents, with Reports, for 1889 (2s.); List of School Boards and School Attendance Committees in England and Wales, April 1st, 1890 (9d.); Life Assurance Companies, Statements of Account, &c. (2s. 6d.); and among the Trade Reports (Annual Series, 1890) there are France, Trade of the District of Havre (3d.), and Russia, Trade of the Consular District of Taganrog (2d.).

SCIENCE

SCHOOL-BOOKS.

Algebra: an Elementary Text-Book for the Higher Classes of Secondary Schools and for Colleges. By G. Chrystal, M.A. 2 vols. (Edinburgh, Black.)—This work consists of two large volumes, and the quantity of matter contained in them may be roughly estimated by their aggregate number of pages, which is 1,130. The word "elementary" should be struck out of the title-page, for, though the treatise opens with a philosophical discussion of the elements of algebra, it is altogether unsuitable for beginners. But this unimportant objection made, we have little to say that is not wholly favourable. It is the completest work on algebra that has yet come before us, and in lucidity of exposition it is second to none. The author views his subject from the high ground of the educationist, without reference to the exigencies of established examinations; yet neither the candidates who are training for such nor the teachers who prepare them will act wisely if they neglect his lessons. Little adapted as some of his chapters may be for their special needs, they will in others find expeditious and simple methods which we do not recollect having come across in any other text-book. We may instance as particularly neat and elegant the chapter on the "Summation of Series" in part ii. It is true that here, as elsewhere, the author occasionally employs symbols and principles which belong strictly to more advanced branches of mathematics; but the simplicity and brevity which he thus secures justify the innovation. With regard to another novelty we will let Prof. Chrystal speak for himself. In his preface to part ii. he says:—

"Chapters xxix. and xxx. may be regarded as an elementary illustration of the application of the modern Theory of Functions. They are intended to pave the way for the study of the recent works of continental mathematicians on the same subject. Incidentally, they contain all that is usually given in English works under the title of Analytical Trigonometry. If any one should be scandalized at this traversing of the boundaries of English examination subjects, I must ask him to recollect that the boundaries in question were never traced in accordance with the principles of modern science, and sometimes break the canon of common sense. One of the results of the old arrangement has been that treatises on Trigonometry, which is a geometrical application of Algebra, have been gradually growing into fragments more or less extensive of Algebra itself; so that Algebra has been disorganized to the detriment of Trigonometry; and a consecutive theory of the elementary functions has been impossible."

Interesting historical notes are numerous, and at the end of part ii. is given an alphabetical list of the various writers referred to, with an indication of the page or pages where each is spoken of. But the author has made some serious mistakes in constructing this index. All the references to part i. appear to be wrongly numbered; at least, out of several that we looked up we did not find a single one that was correct. This is all the more curious as we have only detected one error in the references to part ii. In "Cayley II., 33, 287," &c., the number 287 should be 288. It is probable that some general law governs this wholesale inaccuracy in the references to part i., though we have been unable to discover any. In that case a simple formula of correction might remove the inconvenience. We should much like to have the author's explanation of the phenomenon.

Euclid's Elements of Geometry. By H. M. Taylor, M.A. Books I. and II. (Cambridge, University Press.)—We cannot conscientiously say that we are wholly satisfied with this book, which Mr. Taylor has written at the request of the Syndics of the University Press. While admitting that some of his innovations are improvements upon Euclid's text, we fail to see the advantages of others. His proof of I. 5, for instance, though shorter than the one with which we are all familiar, is much less easily grasped by a beginner. Most boys, we believe, would experience no difficulty in swallowing the proposition wholesale as an axiom; and we are by no means sure that this would not be the best way of first presenting it. It would be a still shorter cut than that adopted by the author, and, in our opinion, less objectionable. Similar criticism applies to several others of his demonstrations.

Elementary Dynamics of Particles and Solids. By W. M. Hicks, F.R.S. (Macmillan & Co.)—This work differs in several respects from the generality of text-books of mechanics. One of its characteristics is that no separation is made in it between statics and kinetics, the author considering the former merely as a special case of the latter. The first chapter treats of simple rectilinear motion, both uniform and accelerated. Then comes a discussion on mass and momentum before the student is introduced to the notion of force. As the science of mechanics ultimately rests upon experimental laws, it must be admitted that this is a strictly logical procedure, though it will probably clash with the conservative instincts of most teachers. The book does not presuppose very advanced knowledge of pure mathematics. All the essential portions may be mastered by any one fairly conversant with elementary algebra and geometry. Trigonometry is very rarely appealed to, and the calculus never. The last four chapters, which treat of the motion of solid bodies, including moments of inertia, will especially interest engineers, a class of students which the author seems to have had principally in his mind throughout. The definitions and explanations are, on the whole, clear and accurate, though here and there we have come across expressions which some readers might find perplexing. For example, on p. 321 the author discusses the momentum of a body moving parallel to itself. The words in italics are not happily chosen, to say the least. Properly defined they might be convenient as an abbreviation, but no definition of them is given. The diagrams in the book are good, as are also the examples for practice, which are very numerous.

GEOGRAPHICAL NOTES.

THE Zho Valley expedition has resulted in the acquisition of a good deal of fresh geographical information at the hands of Lieut.-Col. T. H. Holdich, R.E., Lieut. R. J. L. Mackenzie, R.E., and Assistant-Surveyor Hira Sing, K.B., and in the annexation of a considerable expanse of country to the north-east of British Baluchistan and adjoining the British district of Dehra Ismail Khan. Col. Holdich has since been placed in charge of a special branch of the Quartermaster-General's (Intelligence) Department, which is to be charged with the duty of preparing trans-frontier maps. Col. Holdich's position as officer in charge of the Baluchistan Survey, and his experience and knowledge of Afghan topography, render him specially qualified for these new duties.

A recent despatch from Sir William Macgregor gives some interesting details about the island of Kiwai, a great detached deltaic mass lying in the entrance to the Fly River, about thirty-six by two and a half miles in extent. It is nowhere more than six feet above high-water level, and much of it is submerged in high tides. On two-thirds of its south-east shores the sea is encroaching, and the land would appear to be sinking. There are several villages along the coasts which seem exceptionally prosperous, having abundant and remarkably varied supplies of food. They all possess and cultivate the cocoa-nut and the sago palm, sugar-cane, and various vegetables, and, as the writer puts it, "it is impossible not to respect a people who cultivate thirty-six kinds of bananas, twenty kinds of yams, ten kinds of sweet potatoes, &c., and who use eleven kinds of fibre, and drain their gardens by ditches four yards apart. It should be possible to make such men good subjects of government if their rights are respected."

Under these conditions, he believes the island "will have a commercial future of considerable importance." Kiwai was visited two years ago by Mr. Theodore Bevan, whose account of the islanders, describing cannibal feasts, &c., was put to a crucial test, being translated and read to them in their own tongue. "Some roared with laughter; others looked at it much more seriously, and said it was 'karokaro auera' ('bitter language') and 'warame' ('not true'). Certainly no traces or evidence of such doings were to be found at the village described. For one hundred miles or more above Kiwai the mainland, with the exceptions of a few mounds of red clay, is not more than a foot above high-water level, and covered with an impenetrable mass of forest trees entangled with creepers.

Petermann's Mittheilungen publishes letters recently received from Emin Pasha. Writing on March 25th, 1888, the late governor of the Equatorial Province says rather despondingly, "We are lost unless Stanley arrives soon." With reference to the shrinking of the Albert Nyanza, Dr. Emin writes: "I do not remember so considerable a fall in the level of the lake or so prolonged a dry season during a thirteen years' residence in the country. At Wadelai the river can be forded with ease, whilst in the lake sandbanks and islands have made their appearance the existence of which was never before suspected by us."

Dr. Danckelman, in the latest Heft of the Mittheilungen aus den Deutschen Schutzgebieten, publishes the results of a very complete series of meteorological observations from Bismarckburg, a German station lying at an elevation of 2,300 feet in the interior of Upper Guinea. A comparison of these observations with those made at other places in the same region shows distinctly that the rainfall increases very rapidly as we reach the bottom of the Gulf of Guinea. The annual rainfall on the Gold Coast (Accra) is less than 30 in.; at Bismarckburg it is nearly 60 in., and at the mouth of the Niger, 140 in. The Harmattan of the Gold Coast differs essentially from the easterly wind bearing the same name in Senegambia. The latter is dry, but intensely hot, whilst the Harmattan of the Gold Coast, though dry, scarcely affects the temperature of the atmosphere, and is felt as a cold wind.

In the same periodical we meet with a report on Dr. Zintgraff's remarkable journey through the regions lying between Camarons and the Benue. Dr. Zintgraff was obliged to fight his way through the territories of the Banyang and Babe. Of 180 men whom he took with him, as many as twenty-four died—sixteen of them from exposure to a cold rain and hailstorm whilst camping at an elevation of 5,200 ft. above the sea.

Mr. Jackson is credibly reported to have reached Uganda from Mombaza, and to have made a treaty with King Mwanga which places that kingdom under British protection. This achievement places Mr. Jackson in the foremost rank of African explorers.

We have received a new edition of Mr. Stanford's Library Map of Africa, which appears to have been prepared with considerable care. The scale of the map—1 : 6,000,000, or 94 miles to the inch—is large, and a considerable amount of detail could thus be given without overcrowding it.

'Les Origines de l'Empire Français de l'Indo-Chine,' by M. A. Faure, in the Revue de Géographie, is historical rather than geographical, and illustrates very instructively how missionary enterprise in the East may ultimately lead to the foundation of European colonies.

The Journal of the Manchester Geographical Society publishes a valuable paper on the coins of China by Mr. C. T. Gardner, H.M.'s Consul at Tientsin, with numerous illustrations, as also a collection of negro melodies from Western Africa, collected by Governor Moloney, of Lagos. Some of these are not without merit. The members of the society evidently take a practical view of geographical studies, for they held their hundred and fourth meeting at Paris, when they called in a body at the Élysée, when "the President was introduced to them."

ASTRONOMICAL NOTES.

MESSRS. BROOKS AND SWIFT both note, in No. 2965 of the Astronomische Nachrichten, that they have made many very careful searches for the periodical comet of Brorsen without success, so that it would seem now to be another case of a lost comet. It was also looked for in December and January by Mr. Tebbutt at Windsor, New South Wales. Discovered in 1846, this comet was found to have a period of about five and a half years, and was last observed about the end of May, 1879, not being seen at the return calculated to take place in the autumn of 1884.

Prof. Pickering writes to the Astronomische Nachrichten (No. 2962) that an examination of a photographic plate taken by Mr. S. J. Bailey at the Olosica Station, in Peru, shows that the G and h lines due to hydrogen are bright in the spectrum of a star in the constellation Cælum, about a degree to the south of β Cæli. The spectrum when this was taken was as bright photographically as (and probably much brighter visually than) that of a star in the Cordoba Catalogue registered of the 7½ magnitude, and other plates showed it to be brighter than that of the latter star in September and October, 1889. Eye observations at the Harvard College Observatory gave its magnitude in February of the present year as only about 10½, and it would seem that the star in question is a long-period variable, belonging to the same class of objects as α Ceti, R Hydree, and R Leonis.

Dr. J. Palisa, of Vienna (already the discoverer of no fewer than seventy bodies of this class), observed two small planets about midnight on the 25th ult., one of which is undoubtedly new (reckoning, therefore, as No. 291); but it is uncertain whether the other is new, or only a rediscovery of Seylla, No. 155, which was discovered by Palisa himself nearly fifteen years ago, and of which the only observations hitherto made were those obtained in the year (1875) when it was first discovered.

The Berliner Astronomisches Jahrbuch for 1892 has recently been published. The only difference we notice in the data furnished as compared with those of previous years is that ephemerides for the small planets are no longer given except in the cases of nineteen which come into opposition during the present year.

SOCIETIES.

ROYAL.—May 1.—The President in the chair.—The list of candidates recommended for election into the Society was read.—The following papers were read: 'Magnetic Properties of Alloys of Nickel and Iron,' by Dr. Hopkinson; 'Photographic Determination of the Time-relations of the Changes which take place in Muscles during the Period of so-called "Latent Stimulation,"' by Prof. B. Sanderson; 'Note on an Experimental Investigation into the Pathology of Cancer,' by Messrs. C. A. Ballance and S. G. Shattock; and 'The Development of the Sympathetic Nervous System in Mammals,' by Prof. A. M. Paterson.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.—May 1.—Dr. J. Evans, President, in the chair.—His Eminence Cardinal Manning, through Rev. J. Morris, exhibited a mitre of white damask embroidered with gold, with red opheys, formerly belonging to St. Thomas of Canterbury, which was brought from Sens just fifty years ago by the late Cardinal Wiseman. This mitre Mr. Micklethwaite compared with another mitre of St. Thomas from the Treasury of Sens, engraved by Shaw, and expressed his opinion that this was St. Thomas's best mitre, and the forerunner of the form of mitre called in later times pretiosa. Cardinal Manning also exhibited his own pallium, concerning which Father Morris said that his Eminence had suggested that the three jewelled pins, which now are simply ornamental, were of practical use in the days of remote antiquity when the pall was a strip of woven wool, which could only be kept in its place by such means.—Before the discussion as to the archbishop whose tomb had been opened was resumed, Mr. W. H. St. John Hope, who had visited Canterbury on behalf of the Society and made a careful examination of the tomb in question, read a minute description of the various articles found in it, including a number of additional objects not exhibited on the last occasion. Father Morris, in resuming the discussion, referred to a MS. in the British Museum, which gave a pen-and-ink sketch, made in 1599, exactly resembling the tomb, but called in the MS. by the name of Odo; and he suggested the possibility that this tomb might be, not, indeed, the tomb or shrine of St. Odo, as the visitor in 1599 distinguished it from the tomb under notice, but perhaps the fellow shrine of St. Wilfrid, on the hypothesis of his having been newly enshrined by some prior of Christ Church. This theory was subsequently shown to be impossible by Mr. St. John Hope, who by careful measurements and examination had ascertained that there was not room for the tomb in the corona where the shrines of St. Odo and St. Wilfrid were; and, moreover, that the tomb and stone coffin were of one date and were made for their present place. As to the identity of the archbishop, Father Morris would have been inclined to call him Theobald, from the desiccated condition of the body and from the local tradition, which the MS. already mentioned takes back to 1599, if it were not conclusively proved that Mr. Scott Robertson was right in attributing this tomb to Archbishop Hubert Walter, by a list of archbishops written between 1517 and 1532, taken from Canterbury by Parker and deposited in the Corpus Christi College Library at Cambridge, in which Hubert Walter is described as buried "near the shrine of St. Thomas." By this another local tradition, which calls a tomb in the choir aisle by his name, is proved to be unfounded.—Dr. Freshfield spoke of the important part played by Archbishop Walter in English history, and of the interest attaching to the remains of so great a man.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF LITERATURE.—April 30.—Anniversary Meeting.—Sir P. Colquhoun, President, in the chair.—The address of the President having been read, the following were elected officers and Council for the ensuing year: President, Sir P. Colquhoun; Vice-Presidents, the Duke of Devonshire, Sir H. C. Rawlinson, Sir C. Nicholson, Sir C. Dickson, Sir C. T. Newton, J. Haynes, Dr. W. Knighton, Lord Halsbury, the Master of St. John's College, Cambridge, and the Duke of Northumberland; Council, P. W. Ames, F. Bennoch, J. W. Bone, E. W. Brabrook (Secretary), C. H. E. Carmichael (Foreign Secretary), Baron G. de Worms, W. H. Garrett, T. R. Gill (Librarian), Col. J. Hartley, Major A. Heales, E. G. Highton, R. A. D. Lithgow, Major G. A. Raikes, H. J. Reid, Dr. G. A. Tucker, Dr. G. G. Zerffi; Auditors, the Earl of Limerick and J. H. Heaton.

GEOLOGICAL.—April 30.—Dr. A. Geikie, President, in the chair.—Messrs. E. B. Lindon and E. M. Richards were elected Fellows.—The following communications were read: 'On certain Physical Peculiarities exhibited by the so-called "Raised Beaches" of Hope's Nose and the Thatcher Rock, Devon,' by Mr. D. Pidgeon, and 'The Devonian Rocks of South Devon,' by Mr. W. A. E. Ussher.

ARCHÆOLOGICAL INSTITUTE.—May 1.—Rev. Sir T. Baker, Bart., in the chair.—Chancellor Ferguson exhibited two "Dummy Picture-board Grenadiers," the property of the County Hotel Company at Carlisle. He said they represented grenadiers of the 2nd, or Queen's, Regiment, between the years 1712 and 1727. This regiment was raised in 1661 for service in Tangier, and, according to Lord Macaulay, because it had been intended for engagements against the heathen, bore the badge of the Paschal lamb. The Chancellor, however, pointed out that in 1684 the regiment had no badge at all; though later, as these dummies clearly showed, it bore a lamb pure and simple, while the Paschal lamb was not granted to it as a badge until the general warrant of 1751, which recites that the "ancient badge" of the regiment was a lamb, and therefore, by a curious non sequitur, ordained that it should carry on its colours the Paschal lamb.—Mr. J. Park Harrison said he had already mentioned in the first part of his paper 'On Anglo-Norman Ornament compared with Designs in Anglo-Saxon MSS.' (1) that the evidence obtained by Mr. J. H. Parker and Mr. Boust at Caen showed conclusively that the style now termed Norman did not exist in Normandy at the date of the Conquest; and (2) that there were numerous architectural details in illuminated MSS. of pre-Norman date which it could scarcely be doubted were derived from existing buildings. Photographs were exhibited of Saxon churches which exhibited similar features. He believed that Britton's view, that the Normans, when rebuilding English churches on a larger scale, adhered, both from policy and choice, to the severe style of architecture they brought with them, was generally correct. Whilst, however, Remigius built the three great portals at Lincoln in identically the same style as the Conqueror's church at Caen, the narrow arches on either side, if of contemporary date, afford an early instance of the adoption of roll mouldings and ornamented labels such as occur at Stow, as well as in the picture of "Dunstan" in the Cottonian MS. Claudius A 3, the date of which is c. 1000. Numerous features derived from Cædmon's "Paraphrase" and other illuminated MSS. of the same period were shown to correspond with details in Anglo-Norman churches. In Oxford Cathedral this was especially the case. And as the weathering of the majority of the choir capitals contrasts with the sharper lines of the carving believed to be of twelfth century date, this, Mr. Harrison said, would appear to afford sufficient proof that the interlacing stalks and other peculiarities in four of them, and the acanthus foliage in two, a revival of which, according to Prof. Westwood, took place in the tenth century, belong to the period which documentary evidence would lead one to select for them, viz. the beginning of the eleventh century. The "break of joint" which has been detected in the eastern half of the cathedral, and the fact that vaulting ribs were not contemplated when the choir aisles were built, point to the same conclusion.—Mr. A. Evans concurred with the views laid down by Mr. Harrison.—Sir H. Dryden, Bart., exhibited a tracing from a dummy grenadier guard.—Rev. G. I. Chester exhibited a large collection of bronze implements lately found in Egypt.

LINNEAN.—May 1.—Mr. J. G. Baker, V.P., in the chair.—Rev. J. T. Scott was admitted, and Messrs. J. H. Garrett and J. Young were elected Fellows; Dr. E. von Regel, of St. Petersburg, and Mr. S. Watson, of Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass., being elected Foreign Members.—Mr. M. Christy exhibited and made remarks on specimens of the so-called Bardfield oolite, which he had found growing abundantly not only in the neighbourhood of Bardfield

Essex, but over a considerable area to the north and west of it.—Mr. Buffham exhibited under the microscope specimens of Myristichia claviformis with plurilocular sporangia, and conjugation of Rhabdomenacratum, found upon Zostera maritima.—Rev. Prof. Henslow exhibited a collection of edible mollusca which he had recently brought from Malta, and described the native methods of collecting and cooking them.—Prof. Stewart exhibited some spirit specimens of a lizard in which the pineal eye was clearly apparent.—Mr. Sherring exhibited a series of excellent photographs which he had taken near Falmouth, and which showed the effects of climatic influence on the growth of several subtropical and rare plants cultivated in the open air.—A paper was read by Prof. W. Fream 'On a Quantitative Examination of Water-Meadow Herbage.'—This was followed by a paper from Mr. R. I. Pocock 'On some Old-World Species of Scorpions.'

INSTITUTION OF CIVIL ENGINEERS.—May 6.—Sir J. Coope, President, in the chair.—It was announced that ten Associate Members had been transferred to the class of Members, and that twenty gentlemen had been admitted as Students.—The monthly ballot resulted in the election of three Members and of thirty-one Associate Members.—The paper read was 'On the Screw-Propeller,' by Mr. S. W. Barnaby.

ROYAL INSTITUTION.—May 1.—Annual Meeting.—Sir J. C. Browne, Treas. and V.P., in the chair.—The annual report of the Committee of Visitors for the year 1889, testifying to the continued prosperity and efficient management of the Institution, was read and adopted. The real and funded property now amounts to above £2,000, entirely derived from the contributions and donations of the members. Fifty-one new members were elected in 1889. Sixty-three lectures and nineteen evening discourses were delivered in 1889. The books and pamphlets presented in 1889 amounted to about 283 volumes, making, with 539 volumes (including periodicals bound) purchased by the managers, a total of 822 volumes added to the library in the year. The following gentlemen were elected as officers for the ensuing year: President, the Duke of Northumberland; Treasurer, Sir J. C. Browne; Secretary, Sir F. Bramwell; Managers, Sir F. Abel, Sir B. Baker, Right Hon. A. J. Balfour, G. Berkley, W. Crookes, Warren W. De La Rue, E. Frankland, C. Hawksley, W. Huggins, D. E. Hughes, A. B. Kempe, Earl Percy, E. Pollock, W. C. Roberts-Austen, and B. W. Smith; Visitors, J. W. Barry, S. Bidwell, A. Carmichael, A. H. Church, E. H. Goold, G. Herbert, J. Hopkinson, J. W. Miers, Sir T. Pycroft, L. M. Rate, Sir O. Roberts, A. W. Rücker, J. B. Sedgwick, J. W. Swan, and T. E. Thorpe.

May 5.—The Duke of Northumberland, and afterwards Sir J. C. Browne, Treas. and V.P., in the chair.—The following Vice-Presidents for the ensuing year were announced: Sir F. Abel, W. Crookes, E. Frankland, W. Huggins, Earl Percy, B. W. Smith, Sir J. Crichton Browne, and Sir F. Bramwell.—Miss F. Busk, Mrs. J. I. Thornycroft, Messrs. H. Baldwin, A. R. Binnie, J. S. Jeans, A. K. Lloyd, R. A. Scott, J. J. Vezev, and L. Walters were elected Members.—Dr. J. Tyndall was elected Honorary Professor of Natural Philosophy, and Lord Rayleigh was elected Professor of Natural Philosophy.

SOCIETY OF ENGINEERS.—May 5.—Mr. H. Adams, President, in the chair.—A paper was read by Mr. F. H. Cheesewright 'On Breakwater Construction.'

SOCIETY OF BIBLICAL ARCHEOLOGY.—May 6.—Mr. P. Le Page Renouf, President, in the chair.—The following papers were read: 'The Priestly Character of the Earliest Egyptian Civilization,' by Mr. P. Le Page Renouf, and 'The Terms for "God" and "Sacrifice" in Accadian and Chinese,' by the Rev. C. J. Ball.

PHYSICAL.—May 2.—Prof. W. E. Ayrton, President, in the chair.—Mr. C. A. Carus-Wilson read a paper 'On the Distribution of Flow in a Strained Elastic Solid.'—Mr. C. V. Boys made two communications, 'On Photographs of Rapidly Moving Objects' and 'On the Oscillating Electric Spark.'

MEETINGS FOR THE ENSUING WEEK.

- MON. Aristotelian, 8.—'The Philosophical Conception of Property,' Prof. J. Brough.
—Surveyors' Institution, 8.—'Encroachment of the Sea on some Parts of the English Coast, and the best Means of Preventing it,' Mr. R. F. Grantham.
—Society of Arts, 8.—'Sugar, Tea, Coffee, and Cocoa, their Origin, Preparation, and Uses,' Lecture III., Mr. R. Bannister (Cantor Lecture).
—Library Association, 8.
—Geographical, 8.—'The Karun River and the Commercial Geography of South-West Persia,' Hon. G. Curzon.
TUES. Royal Institution, 8.—'Wood Engraving,' Mr. L. Fagan.
—Society of Architects, 7½.
—Photographic, 8.
—Colonial Institute, 8.
—Society of Arts, 8.—'The Use of Alloys in Art Metal-work,' Prof. W. C. Roberts-Austen.

- TUES. Anthropological Institute, 8.—'New Instrument for measuring the Velocity of the Arm or other Limb,' Mr. F. Galton; 'Ethnographical Basis of Language, with special reference to the Customs and Language of Hunza,' Dr. G. W. Leitner; 'Wildlife Circles,' Mr. A. L. Lewis.
—Civil Engineers, 8.—Discussion on Mr. S. W. Barnaby's Paper 'The Screw-Propeller'; 'The Kewick Water-Power Electric Light Station,' Messrs. W. F. J. Fawcett and E. W. Cowan.
WED. Cymrodorion, 8.—'The Development of Music in Wales from an Historical Point of View,' Mr. D. E. Evans.
—Society of Arts, 8.—Prof. Elinor Thomson's Electro-Magnetic Induction Experiments, Dr. J. A. Fleming.
—Geological, 8.—'The so-called Upper-Lias Clay of Down Cliffs,' Mr. S. S. Buckman; 'New Mammals from the Red and Norwich Crags,' Mr. E. T. Newton; 'Burrows and Tracks of Invertebrate Animals in Palaeozoic Rocks, and other Markings,' Sir J. W. Dawson; 'Contact-Alteration at New Galloway,' Miss M. J. Gardiner.
—Huguenot, 8.—'The President's (Sir H. A. Layard) Annual Address.
THURS. Royal Institution, 8.—'Flame and Explosives,' Prof. Dewar.
—Society of Arts, 8.—'Jamaica and its forthcoming Exhibition,' Mr. C. W. Evans; 'Design applied to Wood-Carving,' Lecture II., Mr. L. F. Day.
—Numismatic, 7.
—Electrical Engineers, 8.
—Chemical, 8.—'Reaction of Fellows; Diethylphosphoric Acid,' Prof. Thorpe and Mr. B. North; 'The Ten Isomeric Dichloronaphthalenes, and the Action of Chlorine on Naphthalene and Naphthalene Derivatives,' Prof. Armstrong and Mr. W. P. Wynne; 'A Thirteenth Naphthaquinone,' Prof. Meldola and Mr. F. Hughes.
—Historical, 8.—'The Desirability of treating History as a Science of Origins,' Mr. J. S. S. Glennie.
FRI. United Service Institution, 5.—'The Draught of Military Carriages,' Col. G. B. Hobart.
—Physical, 5.—'On Huggins's Gearing in Illustration of Electric Induction,' Lord Rayleigh; 'Dr. R. König's Researches on the Physical Basis of Music,' Prof. S. P. Thompson.
—Philosophical, 8.—'Anniversary; Address or Paper by Rev. Dr. R. Morris.
—Royal Institution, 9.—'The Photographic Image,' Prof. R. Meldola.
SAT. Royal Institution, 3.—'Excavating in Greece,' Dr. G. Waldstein.

Science Gossip.

DR. ST. GEORGE MIVART, F.R.S., has in the press an important 'Monograph of the Canidae.' In treating of dogs, jackals, wolves, and foxes, the author, though dealing mainly with wild species, does not ignore the domestic dog and the interesting question of its origin. The volume, which is to be issued to a limited number of subscribers by Mr. Porter, of Prince's Street, Cavendish Square, will be profusely illustrated by woodcuts, and by nearly fifty coloured plates drawn from nature, and hand-painted, by Mr. J. G. Keulemans.

AMONG the leading candidates for the second mastership in the City of London School—the second master is first mathematical master—are Mr. J. Brill, Mr. F. W. Hill, and Mr. R. W. Hogg, all Fellows of St. John's, Cambridge; Mr. W. E. Johnson, of King's, Cambridge, author of a new book on trigonometry; Mr. A. L. Selby, Lecturer in Physics at Queen's College, Oxford; Mr. A. W. Cave, who succeeded Mr. Pollard as head master of the Oxford High School; and Mr. E. S. Macaulay, of St. Paul's School. There is a very strong array of candidates, and the school is sure to develop strongly in mathematics under any one of them.

AN electrical laboratory is to be established at King's College, London, through the liberality of the late Sir William Siemens, whose widow has offered, in accordance with his intention, a sum of 6,000l. for the purpose. Mr. John Hopkinson, the well-known scientific engineer, is to be the first Professor of Electrical Engineering in the College.

We must call the attention of those interested in the fur-seal to the Investigation of the Fur-seal and other Fisheries of Alaska, published at Washington (Government Printing Office), or, to speak more correctly, of those who have a direct financial interest in the question. The report is not one which wearers of fur-seal will find good reading, and the points for the naturalist are not numerous.

FINE ARTS

ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS.—THE ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTIETH EXHIBITION IS NOW OPEN. —5, Pall Mall East, from 10 till 6.—Admission, 1s.; Catalogue, 1s. ALFRED D. FRIPP, R.W.S., Secretary.

THE LEGEND of the BRIAR ROSE, painted by E. BURNES JONES, A.R.A.

THE LEGEND of the BRIAR ROSE.—THE EXHIBITION of Mr. BURNES JONES'S Four Pictures is NOW OPEN at Messrs. Thos. Agnew & Sons' Old Bond Street Galleries, 29, Old Bond Street, W.—Admission, 1s. 10 to 5 o'clock.

THE GROSVENOR EXHIBITION.

This collection of nearly four hundred paintings and thirty-five sculptures is in every respect below the standard of its forerunners. Not one of the works is first rate, few of them are excellent, and no small number are so crude and defiant of taste as well as of technical principles that we are compelled to wonder how they obtained admission into a gallery with such honourable traditions as the Grosvenor's. The worst of them are outrages on the cardinal laws of art, and are not redeemed by any intrinsic merit. The names of the most conspicuous of these will suffice for the reader. Every visitor will be surprised by the strangeness and ugliness of Mr. Muhman's Harvesters, Evening (No. 30), a frightful libel on nature, only to be equalled by Mr. A. Melville's astounding Audrey and her Goats (109). We may class with these Mr. E. E. Simmons's Youth and Age (31), so far as its coarse painting is concerned; and Mr. W. Stott's Diana, Twilight and Dawn (190), but the last named must be a joke. We shall say something about it lower down.

On the whole, the best work of art here is Sir John Millais's whole-length, nearly life-size portrait of Master Ranken (60), a handsome boy of eight, wearing long light-brown hair, dressed in green velvet, and holding his cap in one hand. The spirit of the attitude, the ingenuous and intelligent face, the beauty of the colour throughout and of the complexion in particular, combine to make this work almost worthy of the painter's best time.—The next in the order of merit is Mr. J. M. Swan's Maternity (68), a life-size group of a lioness suckling her cubs. The best bit of humour in this capably painted piece is the serene and satisfied air of the mother lifting her face to look at her offspring. Unluckily, the lighting of the work is conventional, there is but little research in its execution, and there is no colour; indeed, the picture is practically a monochrome, and the textures of the hides are merely indicated, not represented. In consequence, though in many ways a capital work it is only half a picture, and more than half the difficulties of art are evaded.

So far as technical charms and a tasteful representation of the beauty of nature can go, very few things here surpass the flower pieces of M. H. Fantin-Latour, whose Lys et Roses (25), blush roses and yellow roses in a low vase, comes next on our notes. The flowers are painted with extraordinary artistic spirit; the lovely natural colours and brilliant lighting are handled with felicity irresistible by artists. The firm touch and brush-sweep of M. Fantin-Latour are things to be enjoyed and envied. The Marguerites (78), by the same hands, is simpler, but hardly less beautiful and quite as well painted. It is a brilliant study in white, pale green, and yellow.—The portrait of W. Q. Orchardson, Esq., R.A. (36), standing before an easel and looking as if he could not help taking himself quite seriously, is technically a perfect example of all the best qualities of his art. Have we not seen it before? It must have been painted some years ago.—Mrs. M. Stokes's Light of Light (82) depicts the Virgin seated on the floor of a stable by the side of her Son's cradle, and lost in a day-dream of His future (a frequent motive in art). The figures are nearly life size. The Virgin's face is illuminated by the radiance of the Saviour's form lying in the cradle. The expressions, although not spiritual in the higher sense, are good, sincere, and human. The effect, although the light is too red, is ably rendered, and the handling of the whole work attests the excellence of Mrs. Stokes's training and the very unusual amount of brush-power which she has at command, and which she exercises with frankness and judgment.

The First of September (149), by Mr. W.

Dendy Sadler, is as far removed from the academic technique of Mrs. Stokes as from her subject. All the figures in it are humorous and true; the lighting is excellent, and the whole is well finished. The motives of the design explain themselves, and the meaning of the painting is made clear. Still this picture is not quite so good as its counterpart the artist's 'Hunting Morn,' No. 1034 at the Academy, which we praised last week.—The Sandal (152) gave Mr. Haynes Williams an opportunity for painting a brilliantly lighted Louis XIV. interior, crowded with gilded and carved furniture, and two figures of pretty women in the costume of the Empire. A plump and comely damsel clad in white satin (whose "embonpoint," as Leigh Hunt delighted to call the sheeny smoothness of the material, our painter has dealt with successfully) sits in a Napoleon chair and muses with a pretty sentimental air, while a maid as comely as herself fastens a sandal round the dainty ankle placed on a stool for the purpose. The crisp execution of all the details, the taste with which the faces are painted, the aptness and elegance of such minor points as the white Greek fillet round the lady's dark hair, are enjoyable features in a work which is excellent in every respect except a tendency to paintiness that may in time become unpleasing, if not inartistic, and is even now rarely undiscoversable in Mr. Williams's work.—Mr. D. Murray's "Sweet is Evening's tranquil Hour" (181) is one of his prettiest pastorals. There is some lack of clearness and purity in the less deep half-tints and semi-tones, as well as of brilliancy in the higher tints, which are not so luminous as could be wished, but in all other respects it, without plagiarizing, reminds us of George Mason's exquisite art. It comprises a meadow flushed with evening light, and a winding road receding into the distance and passing an orchard of old fruit trees clad in spring foliage and laden with blossoms whose colour imparts a charm to the picture, while the much twisted boughs have a most attractive quaintness. On one of the boughs a boy is perched, who pipes to a milkmaid attending a cow, and all three figures are beautifully touched with sunlight. It is a true idyl, of which the original title, 'When Shepherds pipe on Oaten Straws,' aptly indicates the sentiment. A Summer Breeze (192), blowing through a group of grey and silvery willows on the edge of a pool, and swaying the tall flags and rushes at the waterside, resembles No. 181 in technical qualities, and indeed equals it. As the more or less truthful expression of the sentiment aimed at by an artist is one of the most admirable elements of his art—a truism it requires some courage to question—we recommend to our readers the poetry and sentiment of these and other works. It is a quaint kind of criticism which fails to discover the poetry that pervades pictures like these, yet there are some people who think poetry ought to be "printed on paper and bound in leather," as Browning said, and who will not have it otherwise. Such limited notions are, perhaps, due to the pedantic character of much of our school and college education. Sentiment of a minor kind, but still graceful and well expressed, is to be found in Mr. Murray's landscapes A Doubtful Crop (59) and Sundown (71). The former is rather slight; of the latter it may be said that it is luminous and effective. Still these less ambitious instances, as well as Mr. H. Moore's Sand-laden Surf (63), though it is a powerful sketch of breaking waves on a windy day, had better have remained at home.

Mr. K. Halswelle's Wet Day in a Country Town (186), which is wrongly named in the Catalogue, has, although it is roughly painted, a capital and true effect, and the colour is good.—The colour and handling of "Sail, Ho!" (219) of Mr. Brangwyn are disappointing, yet the design is worthy of high praise. The scene is the deck of a water-logged ship which is rolling slowly and heavily in the trough of the sea. The crew have stopped pumping, and have abandoned themselves to despair. Far off, and standing out ghost-like against the pale brassy light of the horizon, which the lowness of the deck makes very near to us, are seen the tall masts and wide canvas of a big ship. The vigour of the design is evinced in the gestures of the crew, the upheaving of waves against the sky, and the rolling masts of the rescuer.—In the Fourth Room another disaster at sea is represented with characteristic force and sympathy by Mr. W. L. Wyllie in a small, but brilliant, well-coloured, and thoroughly drawn work called The Wreck (258), an iron ship, with all her masts standing, which sits low and reels heavily in the sea that deluges her deck. The modelling of the sea could hardly be better, while Mr. Hook would admire its drawing and colour. Mr. Wyllie's unnamed piece, No. 263—a wide expanse of pale yellow sands, counter-checked with the blue shadows of the sunlight, and in the sea a combination of sapphire, ultramarine, turquoise, and grey-glass hues, such as summer makes in brilliant weather—is one of the finest of its kind. It is painted so brightly, touched so crisply, and graded with such admirable skill, that the whole is as stereoscopic as nature herself. As a specimen of draughtsmanship there is nothing better in any gallery of the year.—As an illustration of what art can do and what is desirable, it is instructive to compare this instance of about 20×12 in. with the Diana, Twilight and Dawn (190), of Mr. W. Stott, a picture which is painfully conspicuous in the East Gallery, and represents one of the boldest vagaries of the English Impressionists. Here the scene is a very damp and green meadow. Close to some slate-coloured water lies a naked nymph. She lies flat on her back, and her legs are stretched along a sloping bank of raw and almost unbroken green, meant for grass. Her figure and face have been designed, drawn, and painted in defiance of anything like grace of attitude and loveliness of form and colour. Of modelling, and that delightful art which excels in the skilful representation of the female figure, Mr. Stott is evidently and wilfully ignorant. He works as if all these charms, these ineffable beauties upon which painters of incomparable genius and power have lavished their labour without stint—while some of the best thought themselves happy in mastering but one of the charms of "the life," and humbly left to other students the task of dealing with the others—existed not at all and had never existed. Verily Mr. Stott, who calls himself "of Oldham," is a person of enterprise, and inspired by notions of design which may be original, although they are not happy. But he need not have insulted the public by adding to his unlovely nymph (who cannot be the Diana of the title) two ill-drawn girl attendants. Not satisfied with rejecting all charms of form and colour, the painter refuses to have anything to do with aerial perspective and tone, to the cultivation of which we understood that the Impressionists are expressly devoted. Knowing that the "Grosvenor" was founded for the encouragement of fine art, and for the study of beauty of all kinds, we wonder how this outrageously vulgar and foolish piece found its way here.

Of the less prominent pictures, let us more briefly say that Mr. S. A. Forbes's Road from a Market Town (4) is rather flat, but it is softly handled; Mr. A. Priestman's Laid up for Repairs (6) has good colour and air, but it hangs too high for fair criticism; Mr. Stott's Soft Winds (11), an estuary in grey and calm weather, is flat and painty, and by its low keys of tone and colour, its lack of modelling and finish, as well as of the effect of light of any kind, evades the difficulties of true art.—In the Anglesea (14) of Mr. H. Wilkinson the rocks are cleverly painted, and the colour of the beach is good.—Mr. Pettie's In the Dark Continent (19) is very cheap art indeed, and a most audacious pot-boiler of the lowest class. Much better is a clever and brilliant version in small of his best picture, called Finished Sketch of 'The Traitor' (127).—The Weekly Despatch (45) of Mr. Brangwyn is full of good-humoured satire, and would be a very good picture if it were less spotty, lighter in touch, and more finished.—M. G. Clausen's Girl at the Gate (51) will puzzle the visitor by her dismal expression. Except her depressing and inexplicable face, which is carefully and very well painted, there is little worthy of the name of art in this flat and dull commonplace, which is a sort of false Bastien Lepage. Apart from this the artist deserves credit for his desire to do what he rarely, if ever, did till now, i.e., produce with care a picture as a whole, and not a part of a picture, as hitherto.—The Breakers, Evening (80), of Mr. Adrian Stokes, compares unfavourably with his larger and very similar contribution to the New Gallery.—The Law's Delay (100) is a clever minor work of Mr. Yeames, his sole appearance of the season.—The Misty Morn (148) of Mr. E. Parton represents a calm, full stream flowing by groups of white-stemmed birches, and pleases us by its tenderness and vaporous mid-distance; it is a little painty.—Mr. A. Hacker's Mrs. C. G. Laurance (159), a portrait, is clever to excess, and needlessly demonstrative.—The Oporto (174) of Mr. C. N. Hemy is rather topographical than artistic, but it has many good points.—Although they are not masterpieces, we commend to the reader's attention Mr. H. Vos's Room in a Brussels Almshouse (248); Mr. W. Prehn's View towards the Hills at Green-castle (353); and Mr. J. A. Aitken's Pass of Glencoe (368).—Among the best pieces of sculpture are Mr. H. Bates's Hector (1); Mr. O. Ford's A Camel (12), and Study of a Head in Bronze (13); and also two capital busts (Nos. 25 and 27) by Mr. T. N. Maclean, which are careful and scholarly.

THE NEW GALLERY, REGENT STREET.

(Second and Concluding Notice.)

CONTINUED examination confirms the opinion we expressed last week, that, barring the noteworthy pictures, which are unusually few, this collection is unfortunately marked by a general neglect of those graces of style, knowledge, and finish which are essential to fine art. We shall notice in the order of the Catalogue the best and the worst of the pictures we passed over last week, beginning with the figure subjects, continuing with the portraits, and concluding with the landscapes and seascapes.

We cannot admire Mr. W. Maclaren's Fruit Time (No. 7), which illustrates the Italian custom of weighing pumpkins. The subject is not a good one, but in the hands of a vigorous painter inspired by love of colour, animated gesture, and beauty, a good picture might have been the result where picturesque costumes, variety of attitude, action, and character, comely damsels and good-looking young men, were introduceable at the artist's pleasure, to say nothing of sunlight, greenery, and flowers. The painter has achieved none of these things, but produced tame representations of commonplace persons; the illumination is dull, and he has painted in a hard and laboured manner.—Why Mr. J. T. Nettleship called his large picture, No. 8, The Adversary, is a greater mystery than why he painted it or how it found a conspicuous place here. It represents a huge python coiled up in a thicket near water where a tiger and tigress approach to drink. The snake is well drawn and ably modelled, but its colours—to which nature always imparts a certain beauty, fearsome as it is—are crude and coarse; the sole redeeming element of this feature of the work is the manner in which the blueness of the sky is reflected on the hideous panoply of the monster. In painting such a thing the artist displays his courage and indifference to Fortune. Obviously he cannot expect a purchaser, except it be the proprietor of a menagerie or the keeper of a zoological museum.

The title of The Four Maries (14), by Mr. J. E. Christie, is even a greater puzzle than that of 'The Adversary,' but it is consistent with reason that the ladies who are depicted in a field of coarse grass which is nearly surrounded by trees and hedges of the coarsest foliage, while the sky overhead is painty, may possibly bear the well-known name. But what then? They are doing nothing, they are not even grouped, and the whole is a sketch in crude colours and dark tones, made with heavy hands, and fortunate only in suggesting the effect of twilight on woods and grass. The worst of it is we are not quite sure whether daylight, or even sunlight, instead of twilight, was not intended.—The Old Pump (54) of Mr. E. A. Rowe is not a very valuable subject, but it includes a nicely painted figure of a little girl. The colouring and tones are also nice in their way.—Mr. A. Moore's head of A Young Girl (101) in a black skull cap, whose features are plump and quasi-classic and her complexion very fair, is of the type he has affected for many years, and has the charms of an animated expression, rosy flesh, and a sense of style. Apart from these elements this is an inconsiderable example of a somewhat mannered kind; it means nothing in particular, and is not particularly well drawn nor highly finished. It is probably a study for a head in a more ambitious work, and certainly should have been reserved for an exhibition of sketches, or, better still, for the painter's portfolio.

Mr. R. W. Macbeth is hardly at his best in the group called The Gipsy's Weary Way (108), although the figure of the woman is well designed and masculine. It manifests more power than sincerity, more vigour than taste, and as a subject is simply naught. The subject, indeed, would matter little if the technique justified the picture's existence; it cannot be said to do so unless we consider the work a mere pot-boiler. A far finer picture is Mr. Macbeth's Mother and Child (139), grouped in a happy way and full of natural character. The red dress of the matron and the complexions of both the figures are in harmony with each other, and were doubtless suggested by the colour of the lady's hair, which is pronounced, to say the least of it. The modelling is free, frank, and bold.—The Silent Adieu (103) of Mr. C. N. Henry marks a change in the sentiment as well as in the technical motives of an able painter who is not unfrequently unjust to himself in both respects. We are not quite sure whether morning or evening is intended in this dim and vapour-laden view of the sea. From the old-fashioned garden of an old cottage a graceful damsel is watching a schooner vanishing into the grey and shadowy distance with her lover. Her attitude is true and apt; her figure, although somewhat roughly painted, is spontaneous and original. The sea and land are seen under a soft and broad effect which is entirely different from those too sharply defined and hard views of nature the painter has produced so often that we have become tired of them. He likewise sends A Poor Catch (112), a fishing-boat returned to the pier-head. The time is late in the season, and the weather is about to change. The picture is as bright as usual, but less hard and mannered, and the sea is equal to the artist's best. In his Bass Fishing (1) the colour is richer, finer, and truer, and there is more energy than Mr. Colin Hunter's works can pretend to, but its surface is rough and coarse enough for the popular Associate.

Mr. G. H. Boughton's Winter in Brabant (113) is unusually acceptable because it is better finished and there is in it an animated figure of a lady who is really pretty, and not so painty as most of Mr. Boughton's figures. Dressed in silvery grey and pearly tints of pale green, she is placed in a snowy landscape. It cannot be said that paint is lacking in the picture, where the technical conventions Mr. Boughton always expects us to accept are only too evident; nevertheless, the pretty coloration of the whole work and the naturalness of the figure are welcome. If its every other element equalled these two, the value of the picture would be enhanced.—A large and ambitious painting by Mr. La Thangue is called Leaving Home (132) because it shows a girl parting from her people assembled at their garden-gate. Here everything, except some parts of the landscape, is ugly, although it would seem difficult to avoid charms of form, features, colour, light, shade, or lines of one sort or another. There is no sort of arrangement, no natural grace nor any art of composition, coloration, chiaroscuro, or movement in this work, but stiff and uncouth figures, awkwardly placed side by side, and not in relation with each other. They have no more vivacity than so many lay figures, and their faces are unattractive in every respect, and therefore cannot be true to nature. So much ugliness must have been hard to find. Technically speaking, there is in this perverse work one well-painted object, the old white pony, who, as if to emphasize the artist's scorn of elegance, even in the humblest form, is shown end on, and drawn as if he had been studied in one of the Noah's Arks of our childhood! A Boy Fishing (183) is less objectionable, but it is so chiefly because it is less ambitious. It is perverse in the same way, but in a minor degree, and there is nothing equal to the painting of the horse.

At no time have we had from the Hon. J. Collier a picture so good, sound, and well painted as that which he modestly, but very rightly styles A Study (141)—a title it deserves because there is more thought and knowledge in it than in most of his works. It is a life-size, whole-length figure of a comely young lady apparently asleep in a reclining chair. Essentially an exercise in pale amber and greyish hues, it is capably drawn and modelled with rare skill so as to be at once soft, broad, and firm. The closed eyes, restful pose, and pendent left arm inform us that the painter intended us to believe the lady is sleeping. Yet he must have known, when he drew her right hand raised and holding a fan, that the moment she lost consciousness in sleep mere gravitation would bring the hand down and straighten the arm; he must have known also that if her left hand hung downwards as he has painted it, even for a minute or two, the veins would swell in a way he has not represented.—Although the flesh is a little flushed, while its surface is polished and somewhat opaque, Mr. C. V. Prinsep's Study in Red (145), a life-size figure of a lady in a red dress, is masculine and sound.

Everybody expects from Heer van Haanen groups of Venetian wench and their admirers as picturesque and lively as in real life, but a good deal cleaner and more daintily dressed. His La Sagra, Venetian Popular Feast (154), contains, besides the usual lovers, a number of older folks and children. The materials are not fresh, but they have been used with spirit and energy; the technique of the picture is better than we have had from the artist of late, and indeed is, according to his standard, admirable. The sun-shadows are blacker than in nature.—The Persens (162) of Mr. C. N. Kennedy might be called a supplementary mistake to his equally ambitious production of last year, but his present subject being much more difficult than that of 'Neptune,' and the rescue of Andromeda having been dealt with by Sir F. Leighton and Mr. Burne Jones, to say nothing of old masters such as Rubens, Tintoret, and Veronese, the dangers of comparisons are considerable. The monster resembles an uncouth fish in an advanced stage of decomposition. Of all things art can deal with, monsters are the most difficult to painters who lack imagination, and whose technique is not quite so vigorous as Rubens's or Veronese's. Andromeda looks like a courtesan. Perseus is a very tame figure. His legs are girlish, and he holds Medusa's head as if he was afraid of it, although there is no reason whatever why he should be. When Ingres painted the cognate 'Roger et Angélique' he employed all his knowledge of form and expression, and imparted to his theme that intensity of subdued passion which was his noblest characteristic. The majestic vigour of Tintoret combined with his gorgeous palette to add power to that triumphant imagination which is manifest in the famous picture at the Hermitage. In No. 162 there is no passion, no form of a refined kind, no colour nor imagination, nor any symptoms of an effort to attain either, although something of the kind might be expected from the artist who had courage enough to work on a canvas so large as that in view. Mr. Kennedy has painted some capital portraits of ladies, but he has failed to make these whole-length portraits of two professional models pass muster for Perseus and Andromeda at the crisis of their fate.

The Lounging (187) of Miss A. Alma Tadema is poetical and suggestive. A girl seated with her back towards us is looking from a window at twilight and contemplating the day's decline. The blue dress has been drawn and painted with great care and skill, the modelling is thorough. A most difficult effect has been treated with honourable success. As if to contrast with this sympathetic and learned work on a canvas a twentieth of the size, we come next upon the large landscape with figures which Mr. J. J. Sargent calls Ightham Mote (188). It compels us to wonder why an artist of reputation should trifle with the world and produce a huge exercise in raw greens and dull purples, a lightless atmosphere laden with paint, and a company of ill-drawn, formless figures. We are accustomed to the eccentricities of Mr. Sargent, but never till now did we fail to discover charms of a sort, and sometimes valuable ones, in anything he did. To paint thus is to court failure.—No picture here is so charming and sweet, simple, and yet full of delicate art as Mr. G. D. Leslie's Perfect Bliss (236). It is a beautiful picture beautifully painted. We described it some time ago.

In the Balcony—besides Mr. E. R. Hughes's Portrait of Dorothy Parker (268); The Pyramid of Maydoom (281), by Mr. F. Dillon; Mr. R. S. Stanhope's Chillon (314); At a Florentine Wedding Feast (316), by Mrs. Stillman; Lady Lindsay's Design for Book 'About Robins' (356); Mr. A. Goodwin's Wells (362) and Lansanne (379); and Mr. J. Orrock's Canal Lock in Essex (372)—there are a number of drawings in different materials by Mr. Burne Jones, prepared for 'The Legend of the Briar Rose,' his 'Andromeda,' and others of his pictures. They extend from Nos. 320 to 355, and will reward any amount of attention.

The noteworthy portraits besides those to which we have already referred are as follows:—Mr. Herkomer's W. Cowkwell, Esq. (28), a life-size seated figure in full view, full of character, and painted in a frank, but not refined style; J. Grierson, Esq. (33), an admirable head and figure, in technique resembling No. 28; and Thomas Hawkley, Esq. (39), which is better than the other two in all respects, but especially in vraisemblance and ability in reading character. One of the best of Mr. Herkomer's works, the touches of humour about it are as welcome as its clever painting and deft draughtsmanship. Sir J. Pender (43) is not so good. Mr. H. G. Herkomer is not up to his mark at the New Gallery this year.—Mr. W. B. Richmond's best portrait, Louisa, Lady Ashburton (57), is also one of the best he has ever produced. The lady is dressed in black, and in three-quarters view to our left. Her face is full of character. The modelling of the flesh is, as usual with the artist, charmingly dexterous and clever, but less sound than we desire from so accomplished a painter. His Duchess of Manchester (247), seated before a convex mirror, is very attractive, but even less sound than usual;

Nº 3
the fl been
Mr. f stand a cap porti
Mrs. great dexte
the
W.
Swy
capit laid
Of alrea some mist
and hisle
and
the sma with outl
and nob pain
the whi of r men muc sen fille
The
the
W
of is (32 ligh
Mr
(44
Af
del del
of suc
spi dis fir ar de ar
De cle
W m th ar
w la fo is al
al
m ti
w
V
P to a b d a c b
T
w o
a m a s

the flesh is waxy, and the face looks as if it had been rouged, a look which ladies do not like.—Mr. Shannon's Sir A. Lyall (64), a whole-length standing figure, is well designed, spirited, and a capital likeness. This is the best of four portraits by Mr. Shannon.—Mr. E. Ward's Mrs. N. S. Jackson (66) is painted with a great deal of spirit in a coarse way, and is dexterous; but the figure and limbs, especially the legs, are very badly drawn.—The Sons of W. Herringham, Esq., M.D. (192), by Mrs. Swynnerton, two little boys in blue, has some capital qualities under a load of paint coarsely laid on, and in spite of many other crudities.

Of the landscapes, besides those we have already mentioned, we may praise Mr. E. A. Waterlow's Night before Shearing (6), which is somewhat slight and painty, but a fine effect of misty moonlight is sympathetically rendered, and the trees are cleverly painted.—Lord Carlisle's Claude's Villa (40) is good in colour and dignified in sentiment, but rather hard; the figures descending to the shore are too small. His Belinzona (37), seen between trees, with the grand hills in deep blue shadows, their outlines appearing rather hard against the rich and golden sky, treats a noble subject with noble sentiment.—There is a great deal more paint than real sentiment in Mr. Padgett's "As the red Moon rose o'er a Sussex Down" (2), of which the subject and composition are worthy of more care and greater refinement of treatment. Breaking Mists on Maiden Moor (62) is much better, and displays true feeling. It represents a view from a hillside over a valley that is filled with mist to the high blue ridges beyond. They are sharply defined against the sky; but there is more paint than fine art allows.—In A Wild Duck's Paradise (29) there is also an excess of paint, yet it has many capital qualities. It is by Mr. W. J. Laidlay.—The Meadow Dyke (32) of Mr. T. F. Goodall is bright and softly lighted, tender in colour, and generally good.—Mr. M. R. Corbett's On the Edge of the Wood (44) is a characteristic and poetical piece. The After-Glow (179) is still richer in colour and delicate tones of grey, blue, and yellow delightfully harmonized. It is quite worthy of the painter, who knows well how to manage such materials as sunset over a sandy waste and spindling trees scattered between us and the distant hills.—Bright, solid, sharply defined, firmly drawn, and full of knowledge of nature are the coast pieces of Mr. C. P. Knight, which deserved better places than they occupy. They are The Mayo Mountains (80), The Evening of a Day of Thunderstorms (234), and the brilliant, clear, and natural Estuary of the Exe at Low Water (258). In respect to the qualities here mentioned the pictures of Mr. Knight are the opposites of Mr. A. W. Hunt's rather weak and mannered Windsor Castle, Twilight (92), which is flat and seemingly as evanescent as a landscape seen in a dream, although noteworthy for tenderness of tone and silvery colour. It is not up to the artist's standard. Mr. Hunt also contributes Holy Island Castle (174), seen above a huge bank of vapour, a grander subject more powerfully treated. The tones and gradations of the air are highly artistic; still the work is by no means one of Mr. Hunt's best.—Very good is the Beam Field (46) of Mr. A. Parsons, a rich effect of sultry weather, full of tone and true in colour, in which warm clouds are gathering over the flat country, where dark brown stacks of bean haulm are ranked in a diagonal line across the scene; a village church appears amid trees in the distance, and the whole charms us by its harmony and repose. Fladbury Mill (233) is solid and firmly touched. The atmosphere is clear, but the picture as a whole is a little black.—The large Summer (78) of Mr. L. Thomson is notable for good sunlight and rich colour. The composition is simple, natural, and happy, and the trees on the bank above the river give it dignity.—The evening scene, with a violent effect of sunlight glaring above banks of trees and a gloomy foreground which Mr. R. W. Allan calls Homewards (96), is coarse and even vulgar in its obtrusiveness.—On the other hand, Mr. A. Lucas's In San Trovaso, Venice (117), the interior of a church hung with red, is modest, rich in tone and colour, and in treatment throughout sympathetic; the shadows are at once clear and dark.—Much better than his portraits of Lady Rayleigh (100) and the Hon. R. Strutt (102) is Mr. P. Burne Jones's sketch of a house and garden called Old Kensington (124), a good study of local character and colour which would charm us if the shadows were less black.—M. Mesdag's Early Morning on the Dutch Coast (126) differs little, if at all, from scores of pictures for which we are indebted to him.—Very beautiful indeed is the May (137) of Mr. W. M. Wyllie, a bright and harmonious landscape with a low horizon. The expansiveness of the glowing evening sky is admirable.—From the Malvern Hills (144), by Miss A. Alma Tadema, is a landscape without figures, and may therefore be placed here. It is impressive and beautiful. A glowing sky is seen beyond a high hill, while the nearer valley is lost in the deep blue shadow of the twilight—a capital piece of colour.

A noteworthy group of landscapes and coast pieces by Prof. Costa are hung in the South Room. They are Bocca d'Arno (207), a fine instance of colour and tone, although the subject is one of which it is easy to feel that the artist and those very numerous imitators of his mannerisms whose versions of his ideas and technique are to be met with here and elsewhere have treated it often enough; "They sleep by Day to strive by Night" (208), a beautiful instance of colour and drawing; and "If Love be dead why dost thou rise, O Sun?" (209), a most poetical and delicately graded picture of twilight on a calm grey lake and distant dark blue hills.

Among the pieces of sculpture it is our duty to praise Mr. A. Gilbert's Decorative Panel (402) of delicately modelled flowers in low relief and gilded, and Mr. H. Bates's finely designed and poetical trio of designs illustrating the Story of Psyche (407).—Mr. E. O. Ford's Dancing (399), a statue destined for India, we have already admired for its spirit, originality, and grace.

NOTES FROM CYPRUS.

Salamis, March 15, 1890.

SINCE our last report the work has been continued at the same rate. Men, women, and boys, we have, roughly, 150 engaged.

Having opened up the Agora throughout its length, two problems were left us: the hillock at the southern, the "Loutron" at the northern end. So far as this site is concerned, it is mainly to these two points that our efforts have been directed. The hillock proves to have been almost entirely a late accumulation within and about the inner and outer walls of what was probably an open court, perhaps enclosing an altar, but certainly representing the ara foci of the later city. Here were grouped the dedicatory statues and public inscriptions, a few of which we have been fortunate enough to recover. One of these I may mention here particularly, as it apparently bears record to a victory gained by Ptolemy Philometor, presumably over his brother Physkon. The record of the victory has been deliberately chiselled away, doubtless at the time when subsequently Cyprus came into Physkon's hands. With this inscription may, perhaps, be connected the remains of a colossal marble trophy (?) found near by; unfortunately no more than the stump and one thigh now remains. A second inscription from the same spot deals, it would seem, with fines inflicted for trespass on the lands of Zeus Olympios, and is of special interest. Not far from the hillock, and near the south-eastern end of the colonnade, we came upon a marble head (female) of more than life size. Unfortunately, though of very fair work, it was much mutilated, and we have failed to find the remainder of the statue.

A good deal of time, too, has been given to the Loutron itself, between which and the colonnade intervenes the wall of the later city, itself built upon the north front of the outer colonnade wall of the Agora. The Loutron was a fine building, with a length of 198 ft. and breadth of 75 ft., a proportion as nearly as possible of 3:8. The southern side was strengthened by piers having engaged columns at each angle; of these we have opened four, but, rather singularly, they are at irregular intervals. The west end had in front of this wall, itself 12 ft. thick, a second wall some 7 ft. 6 in. through, and standing 10 ft. away. The interior was vaulted, and apparently there were four arches to the width, as we have found a triple line of pedestals for the springs. The flooring was of cement, and was extraordinarily strong; in two days' work we only succeeded in cutting through 2 ft. 6 in. of it, and even then had not reached its limit. This agrees with other indications in confirming the traditional name of the site as the reservoir of Roman Salamis. Probably the piers, which are of immense strength, served as well to carry the continuation of the aqueduct as to support the building itself against the lateral pressure of the water within.

On our second site, that of the later shrine, near the Forest-guard's house, much progress has been made in clearing away the upper sand layer. The inner western wall has been laid bare, and has a length of 130 ft., with an intercolumniation varying around 8 ft. 6 in. Though poorly built it is in a remarkably sound condition, the lower courses unbroken, seven columns complete without a fracture, and almost every base in position. The columns are, according to late Roman practice, uneven in length, and the bases lie at different levels. The outer wall is 17 ft. 6 in. and 16 ft. 7 in. distant respectively, according as the measure is taken on the west end or the south side. As yet we have hardly got down to the older building which remains beneath; and the next fortnight's work will show what is the value of this lower layer.

As the Agora was gradually working itself out we tried probes to the west in the adjoining fields. This did not prove very satisfactory; for though they produced a certain number of remains, such as small marble statuettes, various terra-cottas, and objects in bone and bronze, they did not lead to anything beyond, and, except quite late foundations, opened no relics of buildings. Accordingly, early in the week just closing, we began to draft men off to a fresh site. This ridge, or rather its slope, bears a local name of good omen—the Dæmonostasion. Some probing was attempted, first on the hillcrest; but I soon found it advisable to move the men. Here, where the last billow of rising ground merges itself in the flat land of the ancient mouth of the Pedieus, we have within the last few days come for the first time upon a really ancient layer. Fragments of pottery are numerous upon the surface, and a few feet below there have come to light pieces of red-figured ware, of Cypriote vases of the older class, of "Kleinmeister" black figures (one such fragment inscribed), of earlier rude black figures with incised lines, and finally two portions of an amphora of early Rhodian work representing part of a zone of deer grazing. As yet we have fragments only, the sole objects moderately complete being heads in terra-cotta, one or two semi-Phœnician in style, the others probably fourth century, and certainly under the influence of developed Greek art. Thus we seem to have excellent promise for the near future, and, having passed beyond the narrower limits of later building, to have hit a corner of Salamis as it was long before the era of Evagoras. One point is puzzling—what this tract of ground was anciently remains as yet indeterminate. Everything would suggest a necropolis, at least so far as the finds are concerned; but against this we have the position of the site itself and the absence of anything that could be called a tomb. So far, however, the site has only been tapped; in our next report I trust we may be able to give a good account of it. H. A. TUBBS.

Salamis, March 31, 1890.

DURING the past fortnight good progress has been made with the sand site. The west wall is sufficiently cleared, and great part of the north wall. The work has now been transferred to the east side, and the principal object here aimed at is the finding of the east wall, especially the corners. The sand is very deep at this side, but the wall cannot now be far off. The site seems now to be rather an open court with stoa all round than a covered temple. Whether the east side is like the other three, or is occupied by a building, remains to be proved. The great fluted marble columns, the capital of one of which has been found, seem rather to point to the latter solution. As regards the finds the site is a disappointing one. It is singularly barren, and with the exception of some limestone fragments and a little terra-cotta head has so far yielded nothing worth mention which can be assigned to a period previous to the Roman. The large number of lumps of fused bronze suggest that there may have existed a goodly stock of statues in that material.

At the Agora there is little or nothing left to be done, and for the last week or more the site has not been worked. We may yet, however, go deeper in the hillock at the south end. The massive late constructions on the north defy everything short of dynamite.

We have, therefore, been chiefly occupied in seeking a new site. The slope full of fragments of promising pottery has already been reported. Another week's work was done on it, and it fully maintained its high quality. Interesting terra-cottas of excellent archaic and developed style continue to turn up, with specimens of the early Greek pottery of various types. The latter included a fragment of vase, probably Rhodian, with a large beast upon it painted in red, the head only outlined; a bit of "Kleinmeister" cylix with a female head of the well-known type; and a piece of red-figured Attic ware of the best fifth century style; also fragments resembling the early Corinthian makes. The neck of one black glazed vessel bears the scratched inscription ΣΩΤΗΡΟΣ. There being no sign of tombs, the supposition of a neighbouring early temple site was natural. Deep down below the surface the remnants of poorly built walls were found, but nothing could be made of them, and the better fragments seemed to lie uniformly near the surface. We sank shafts in every direction in the vicinity without finding what we sought, especially in and around the ruin known as the Campanopissa. I regret to say that a deplorable accident in one of these shafts cost one of our workmen his life.

Another venture has been made on the highest point in the ancient city. There are the lowest drums of two large limestone columns still in position; but the ground is heavily choked with late accumulations, and not much progress has yet been made. A Roman portrait head and fragments of a marble statuette of Aphrodite are all that the site has hitherto yielded.

We are now also probing two more sites. The one lies between the Agora and the granite columns where we first started. It is littered with the débris of a very large building, including numerous fragments of marble and blue blocks, and the drums and capitals of enormous columns of the same type as those of the Agora colonnades, but even larger. Two bases have been discovered in situ, but it is still too early to pronounce on our prospects. The other site is an outlying one, a rocky rise between the two branches of the river. Along the base of the rock we are finding numerous fragments of terra-cotta figures, ranging from a few inches in height to colossal size. Most of the figures are male and bearded, and adorned with colour, chiefly red and black. One, about two and a half feet high, is almost perfect. They are well executed, and seem to me to be of genuinely archaic style. With them we find scarabs, Cypriote pottery, and odds and ends. Certain terra-cotta fragments which appeared to-day are extremely interesting. They are decorated with elaborate patterns in red and black on light ground, and with human and animal figures of the very earliest type. There can be little doubt that we have hit upon the site of an early shrine, which may yield most important results.

The eastern end of the sand site, and any or all of the other three, may in the course of a week or two develop into a field for operations of first-rate importance. The excavations have, therefore, reached a critical and very interesting stage, and we hope to be able to give a good account of their results in the next report.

J. ARTHUR R. MUNRO.

Salamis, April 12, 1890.

It has not been possible in the fortnight covered by the present report to do anything like a fortnight's work. At first the usual March rains and then the beginning of the Easter festival have greatly interfered with the progress of the excavations proper, though enabling us to get forward with other work. And yet the fortnight has certainly been an eventful and prosperous one.

The last report showed that we had five sites then in hand. Since it was written two of these have been closed, not because they are worked out, but because, being in the first instance only experiments, the results did not justify us in carrying on their clearance beyond a certain point. The one opened walls of a building whose character could not be determined, and excavated at a greater depth an interesting layer of older remains, which unfortunately were entirely fragmentary; the other, from which came the Roman portraithead mentioned in last fortnight's report, seems to have been occupied by a large Roman house or small palace, and like the first had an older layer beneath, which also was productive of little beyond débris.

It is accordingly on the remaining three sites that the chief work has been done. These are the outlying shrine or Toumpa, a new and rather large site north-east of the Agora, and the temple in the sand by the house. The last has gained immensely in importance. The eastern end—that towards the house and the sea—presents a number of new problems, and these will require a good deal of labour for their solution. The fortnight began with the discovery of three statues—one life size, one just above ordinary stature, and the third a colossal figure. The first two are practically complete but for the heads, and are Roman "drapery" figures; the third, a female statue, preserved from the girdle down, is of far finer work. It may have been a divinity. All three are of white marble of different qualities.

By the side of the large statue was a limestone column standing upright; but a subsequent fall of sand has prevented our ascertaining whether it was in position. Not many feet away south-west is another limestone base drum, apparently in place; and as we have opened a third limestone column (prostrate) at the corresponding south-east end it would seem that there was a series, to which also a corner base (reused) at the south-west will belong. Thus we have a first older line than the marble columns which occupy the existing wall. A second series is that of large marble columns, fluted in later shallow fashion, which lie prostrate all along the line of the east end, and to which probably belong three capitals of delicate work and large size. The height of the columns—shaft only—is 21 ft. 9 in., and their top diameter 2 ft. 4½ in. The base end is in no case sufficiently cleared to enable its measure to be taken. Whether in these columns we have a more imposing sea frontage, the supports of a new building perhaps at right angles with the temple, or the remains of a slightly older temple on the same site, has yet to be seen. I may mention that these columns have suffered greatly in an attempt to cut them up and move them, perhaps at the time when Famagosta was being built. One series of the limestone columns (and an additional base seems to indicate that there were two series) has almost certainly belonged to an older temple, whose débris has been used for the later erection.

For long we have been puzzled as to what this temple was, and to whom it was dedicated; and the almost absolute want of inscriptions has made a decision impossible. Now at length a fragment of marble plaque has turned up, containing portions of twelve lines of an inscription, which indicates the shrine as that of Zeus; un- luckily the portion containing the epithet, if there were one, is, as will be seen from a squeeze I am sending, not to hand; so that it is impossible to say with entire certainty that we have found the temple of Zeus Salaminios. And yet any other conclusion seems hardly possible on a site of such magnitude and occupying so bold and important a position in the ancient city.

If we have indeed found the temple of Zeus Salaminios our other results will seem insignificant. Still, on one of the two sites of which I have hitherto given no account, we have opened a Cypriote shrine, plundered indeed, but of a good epoch. Some of the results from it were mentioned in our last report. Since then we have found several small objects, chiefly scarabs and porcelains, and in particular a seal with strange characters, which might be called "Hittite." Besides various terra-cotta and limestone figurines, more or less complete, there have also appeared large pieces of terra-cotta, perhaps from colossal statues, with elaborate and striking ornamentation in black and red, and in some cases with figures of men and animals almost "Tyrnthian" in character. Of building there is little or no trace; but the native rock which crops up on the crest of Toumpa has been cut and quarried in a strange style, and there is a report of a subterranean chamber.

The remaining site—though now nearly worked out—is of less moment, though of larger size. It seems to have consisted of a narrow central block running east to west, supported on huge limestone columns, and surrounded by at least two outer walls, the nearer of which also bore columns. The work is late, and the ground has been much built over, and even been used as a Turkish burial-place. On the southern side is a Roman sewer, which I traced for some 115 ft. underground in the direction of the Loutron.

H. A. TUBBS.

THE EXCAVATIONS AT MEGALOPOLIS.

British School, Athens, April 28, 1890.

THE excavations of this school at Megalopolis are proceeding in a very satisfactory manner, and it is now possible to estimate the results that will be attainable this season. It has proved that our first opinion as to the site was correct—that it is certain to yield very valuable results, but that it will require long and patient excavation before all those results can be attained. This is especially the case with the theatre, which seems likely to equal, if not to surpass, in interest any that has hitherto been excavated; but the soil will have to be removed to a depth of about 13 ft. in the orchestra before the stage, building, and seats can be properly cleared. This great accumulation is due to the nature of the embankment of the caves, which is partly artificial, and consists of a mound of earth held in by retaining walls; naturally a large amount of this earth has been carried down into the level ground below.

Some hopes of an easier and more sensational discovery seemed to be offered by the tumulus on the north bank of the Helisson, probably the same as that described by Pausanias as the tomb of Aristodemus. Local traditions describe fabulous treasures as hidden there; but though the round hillock has undoubtedly been used for burials, I am by no means sure that it is of artificial construction; indeed, I believe a natural formation is visible quite near its top. The cylindrical marble urn with gold ornaments, described in a previous report, naturally gave rise to considerable hope; but a closer examination of the gold diadem and disc shows that they are not prehistoric, as was at first supposed. The ornament on the diadem is not distinctive, but may very well be late Greek; and the disc, which is hollow, seems to be made by pressing a thin plate of gold against the two sides of a coin, which are thus very faintly reproduced; on one side the type of an eagle on a thunderbolt can be recognized, with an indistinct inscription underneath. A little deeper in than the marble urn was found a curved wall, which looked at first like the retaining wall for a heaped-up tumulus; but it proved to be of much smaller diameter, and only to occupy a small portion of the mound: it apparently was the remnant of a circular vaulted tomb; but the stones were small and bedded in lime mortar. It was, therefore, not much surprise to find inside nothing but a lamp of later Greek shape, an iron strigil, and some rough vases. It is, of course, possible that earlier tombs may lie deeper, or on the other side, and so we are still continuing our work. In later times numerous burials took place here, as is shown by many rough tile coffins and bones.

The stage buildings of the theatre and the square portico behind them have been described in a previous report. Numerous column bases, at various levels in the stoa, offer difficult and complicated problems that cannot yet be solved; but it seems clear that at least a part of it must have been roofed over. In front of the front wall of the stage building is a step descending towards the orchestra; but as the orchestra is still some four or five feet lower, it will be most interesting to see what more is to be found here. At present wherever the trenches approach this level they are filled with water, and consequently great delay has been caused; but a drain has now been dug through to the river, and we hope this difficulty will soon be removed. The same cause has prevented the front row of seats from being completely cleared, and only the top of it shows above the water at present. It consists not of a row of chairs, as at Athens, but of continuous benches, with arms only at the ends. The most interesting point is that the back of these benches, wherever as yet visible, contains inscriptions, and has evidently served as a record for the history of the theatre and other matters; we have thus only to clear the whole row to get a rich harvest of inscriptions. Whether there are also inscriptions on the lower part of the seats, as at Athens, cannot be discovered until the water is drained off.

Two altars also have been found, one to the east, one to the west of the theatre; that to the west is of considerable length, and is ornamented with metopes, thus confirming a theory of Dr. Dörpfeld as to the altar of Zeus at Olympia. Pausanias mentions two altars in this region, one to Hercules and one to Ares; but there is no evidence as yet to justify an identification. Our excavations have been visited by many friends; I may especially mention Dr. Dörpfeld and his party from the German School. He expressed the highest opinion of the interest of the theatre, and also made several valuable suggestions as to the work. Mr. Richards has now left Megalopolis, and Mr. Woodhouse has joined Mr. Loring in the direction of the work. I am able to send this report after a visit of a few days to the site.

ERNEST GARDNER.

M. ROBERT-FLEURY.

THE death is announced, at the great age of ninety-three, of the celebrated painter M. Robert-Fleury. He was born at Cologne in 1797, when that city was the chief town of the Departement de la Roer. He became a pupil of Girodet, Gros, and H. Vernet, and began exhibiting at the Salon as long ago as 1824. As was well said, he made his début like a master, and made as great a sensation as Sir F. Leighton did at the Academy on his first appearance. A Second-Class Medal rewarded the young artist. He was one of the most able and popular of the school of painting which, under the influence of the Romantic movement, devoted itself to incidents in the history of France, and his works became widely known through engravings. His 'Scène de la Saint-Barthélemy' and 'Le Colloque de Poissy' are at the Luxembourg; his 'L'Entrée de Clovis à Tours' is at Versailles. Among his other works were 'Les Derniers Moments de Montaigne,' 'Henri IV. rapporté au Louvre,' 'Une Scène d'Inquisition,' and 'Charles Quint au Monastère de Saint-Just.' In 1834 and 1835 he obtained First-Class Medals; and the same honour befell him at the International Exhibitions of 1855 and 1867, where his pictures formed an important part of the French collection. He was elected a member of the Académie des Beaux-Arts in 1850; he became a teacher at the École des Beaux-Arts in 1855, and head of the school in 1863. In 1865 he became director of the French Academy at Rome, but only held that post a year. He was made a chevalier of the Legion of Honour in 1836, an officer in 1849, and a commander in 1867. His 'Charles Quint au Monastère de Saint-Just,' and a scene from the life of Louis XIV., were at the International Exhibition in 1862, and spread his fame in England. He was the father of the well-known painter M. Tony Robert-Fleury.

SALES.

MESSRS. CHRISTIE, MANSON & WOODS sold on the 3rd inst. the following pictures, from the collection of Mr. C. Neck:—E. Ellis, A March Morning off the Cornish Coast, 178l. Sir J. Gilbert, A Woodland Scene, 162l.; After the Battle, 420l. H. W. B. Davis, On the French Coast, noon, 115l. Colin Hunter, Daybreak, Digging for Bait, 341l. J. Linnell, A Landscape, with shepherd and sheep, 320l.; The Old Oak Tree, 236l.; Crossing the Ford, sunset, 199l.; Pons Asinorum, 945l.; The Barley Harvest, 1,207l.; The Happy Valley, 987l.; A Stormy Sunset, 913l.; The Anglers, sunset, 152l.; A Sultry Day, 735l.; Sunrise, 756l.; The Fishermen, sunset, 735l.; Woods and Forests, 1,995l.; Pointing the Way, 1,197l.; Crossing the Bridge, 1,176l. J. Pettie, Dost know this Waterly? 420l.; Eugene Aram, 651l.; Reductio ad Absurdum, 162l. J. C. Hook, The Nearest Way to School, 1,417l.; Cornish Mermaids, 1,417l.; The Cowherd's Mischief, 635l.; "It's an ill wind that does nobody good," 2,572l. J. S. Noble, The Otter Hunt, 141l. A Bonheur, A Mountain Scene in Auvergne, shepherd and sheep, 330l. Harlamoff, The Flower Girls, 556l. C. van Haanen, Juliet, 336l. R. Bonheur, A French Picnic Party, 892l. M. Fisher, Evening, 126l.; A Kerry Pastoral, 315l.; A Sussex Pastoral, 262l. W. Q. Orchardson, A Morning Call, 472l.; In the Triforium, 315l. Also the following, the property of a gentleman: K. Halswelle, Hart's Lock Wood, and The Thames, looking towards Cliveden, 117l. E. A. Waterlow, Breezy Tintagel, 105l. A. S. Wortley, The Big Pack, 336l. G. D. Leslie, Whispering Leaves, 294l. E. Long, The Easter Vigil, 840l.; In the Welsh Mountains, 446l. V. Cole, Sinodun Hill, from Day's Lock, Dorchester, 745l. B. Riviere, After Naseby, 745l. F. Dicksee, Too Late, 997l. H. Macallum, Before the Sun goes Down, 315l.

The same auctioneers sold on the 5th inst. the following works by Randolph Caldecott, the property of Mr. C. J. Waddell. Drawings: John Gilpin, four works in colours, 30l. each; The Farmer's Boy, 32l.; Brighton in the Season, pen and ink, 39l.; A Quiet Rubber, in colours, 33l. Pictures: The Volunteer's Courtship, 47l.;

The Young Hussar, 94l. Also the following drawings, from various collections: J. M. W. Turner, Florence, 609l. T. M. Richardson, Lago di Garda, 52l. G. Barret, A Classical River Scene, with buildings, 94l. R. Anderson, Autumn on the Tweed, 65l. C. Green, A Sailor's Hornpipe, 68l. J. Linnell, Woodcutters, 99l. D. Cox, Hayfield, with white horse, 111l.; Kenilworth, 75l. J. Israëls, The Knitter, 50l. W. Hunt, A Boy blowing Bubbles, 56l. Carl Haag, A Greek Soldier and a Greek Woman, 70l.

The large collection of etchings and line engravings formed by Mr. J. Chaloner Smith, the author of the well-known book 'British Mezzotint Portraits Described,' has just been sold by auction by Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson & Hodge. The collection was remarkable for bulk rather than quality, but the following prices were noteworthy: Madame Ellen Gwynn and her two Sons, after Gascar, by A. Masson, 23l. 10s. History of a Young Woman, after G. Morland, by J. R. Smith, five plates out of the set printed in colours, 28l. A. D. Winius, by C. Visscher, 20l. The sale realized 2,230l. 2s. It will be recollected that the mezzotinto engravings were sold by Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson & Hodge two years ago, and realized 9,898l. 15s. 6d., so that the total sum produced by this collection is 12,128l. 17s. 6d.

Fine-Art Society.

It is said, we are sorry to hear, that the gateway of Lincoln's Inn, which the Benchers promised to spare in deference to the earnest representations made to them, is again in danger. The inn is unfortunately rich just at present, and Lord Grimthorpe, having pretty well destroyed everything of historical interest at St. Alban's, is longing to destroy some other relic of the past, and display his incompetence as an amateur architect.

A REPRESENTATIVE selection of the works of Alfred Stevens is being made by a small committee composed of those most interested in him and most closely connected with him, and will be reproduced for early publication by the Autotype Company. It will be accompanied by a brief essay by Mr. Hugh Stannus, one of his pupils. The issue proposed is a crown folio volume containing not fewer than fifty nor more than sixty full plates. Nearly all of the persons contributing drawings, &c., to the Royal Academy Exhibition have placed these originals at the service of the Autotype Company. Mr. Holford has given facilities for photographing the chief works by Stevens at Dorchester House, and the Marquise de Santurce, the drawing-room of whose house in Kensington Palace Gardens contains ten fine figure-paintings by Alfred Stevens, has been equally courteous.

MESSRS. CHRISTIE, MANSON & WOODS will sell on the 17th and 19th inst. the collections of pictures, drawings, and engravings belonging to the late Mr. F. W. Cosens, of Melbury Road. Among these are sketches by Rowlandson, J. Nash, J. F. Lewis, D. Cox, and De Wint; and pictures by Escoeurs; Fortuny, 'Views in Granada'; Jimenez, 'Reading the Ship-boy's Letter'; A. Schreyer, 'Bulgarian Carriers, 1873'; J. W. Oakes, 'A Summer's Day'; W. P. Frith, 'Portrait of C. Dickens' and 'Coming of Age,' 1849; W. Holman Hunt, 'Rienzi,' 1849; G. D. Leslie, 'The Empty Sleeve'; Sir J. E. Millais, 'Trust me!' R.A. 1862; L. Alma Tadema, 'Confidences,' 1869; J. C. Hook, 'The Valley on the Moor,' 1860; J. Phillip, 'Doubtful Fortune' and 'Presbyterian Catechizing,' 1847; C. Stanfield, 'Dort,' 1847; T. Faed, 'From Dawn to Sunset,' 1862; D. MacIise, 'Banquet Scene in "Macbeth,"' 1840; and, by Sir F. Leighton, 'Dante in Exile.'

At the Fine-Art Society's Gallery may be seen Madame H. Ronner's capital paintings of "Animal Life," 115 in number, comprising some good studies of cat and dog character, including bits of humour, clever draughtsmanship, and dexterous imitations of diverse skins. We prefer 'Dead Cock' (No. 3), 'Gem' (9), 'Kittens' (23), 'Typ' (34), 'Boy' (46), and 'Gem' (74).

MR. ALMA TADEMA's picture entitled 'Eloquent Silence,' which we described last week in criticizing the New Gallery Exhibition, will be etched by M. Arendsen and published by Mr. Lefevre.

A CORRESPONDENT writes:—

"With regard to the notice of Mr. Abbey's picture, 'A May Day Morning' (No. 109), in your article on the Royal Academy, is it not somewhat opposed to the usual order of things for even 'a lover and his lass' to find 'a wall laden with fruit' on a May Day morning?"

Our admiration of the picture ran away with us, but we live in hope of Mr. Abbey's forgiveness for omitting "trees" after "fruit." The sentence to which our acute correspondent refers should have been, as he may have guessed, "a wall laden with fruit trees." In our notice of Sir F. Leighton's 'Solitude' the words "the genius of a" were accidentally omitted before the word "spring."

THE first volume of Mr. S. Lane Poole's 'Catalogue of the Additions made to the Collection of Oriental Coins in the British Museum,' since the publication of his original catalogue, which has been announced for some time, has now appeared. It contains the description of about two thousand coins, and is illustrated by twenty autotype plates. The second volume is almost entirely in type and will shortly be published. It describes about seven hundred coins, chiefly of the North African, Arabian, and Mongol dynasties, and will be illustrated by nine plates. Among the curiosities of this volume is a coin struck by the late Mahdi. A general index to the ten volumes of catalogue and additions will be appended, with the view of assisting the historical student as much as the special numismatist. The catalogue of the fine series of glass coin-weights, by the same scholar, is also in the press. The whole Arabic collection of the Medal Room, with the exception of the Mogul Emperors of India, has now been described by Mr. Lane-Poole. The work is issued by order of the Trustees of the Museum, and sold by Mr. Quaritch and other publishers.

AN architectural museum is to be formed at King's College with liberal aid from Mr. Banister Fletcher (the present Master of the Carpenters' Company), who has likewise undertaken the Professorship of Architecture.

THE sculptor Camille Demesmay has died at Besançon, aged seventy-four years. He executed the statue of Mademoiselle de Montpensier which is in the garden of the Luxembourg, and many statues of saints for churches in Paris and elsewhere. He won a medal of the Second Class in 1848.

WE learn from the Troad that Dr. Schliemann and Dr. Dörpfeld will continue their excavations there for two years, as they intend to bring to light the greater part, if not the whole, of the ancient city. The present campaign will last till the end of June and will be resumed in the autumn.

AMONG the more daring and wasteful propositions of the so-called archaeologists who desire to destroy everything by "restoring" it may be reckoned the desire to pull down and rebuild the Tour de l'Horloge at Auxerre, one of the most venerable and valuable relics of the ancient city.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

ST. JAMES'S HALL.—'Nebuchadnezzar,' a Dramatic Cantata, by Dr. Joseph Parry. 'Gwen,' a Cantata, by J. Haydn Parry.

A PERFORMANCE was given in St. James's Hall on Tuesday evening which in one sense is probably unique. The programme contained two cantatas the composers of which are father and son. Dr. Joseph Parry, principal of the Musical College of Wales at Swansea, is not unknown to the metropolis, his oratorio 'Emmanuel' having been performed some few years ago, and his smaller choral compositions many times by Tonic Sol-fa choirs. In 'Nebuchadnezzar,' or Scenes in Babylon, he has abandoned the Handel style which was conspicuous in 'Emmanuel,' and has sought to give expression to his ideas in modern phraseology. The libretto, founded on the narrative as we find it in the book of Daniel, deals with the miraculous deliverance of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, and the subsequent deposition and restoration of the Babylonian monarch. The subsidiary title 'Scenes in Babylon' precludes adverse criticism respecting the fragmentary nature of the treatment and the want of dramatic feeling in the details. Still it must be said that the adapter has utterly failed to impart any semblance of life to his characters or any picturesqueness to his scenes. Dr. Parry's music is nearer akin in spirit to Spohr than to that of any other great composer, but it lacks earnestness and breadth of style. Even in the choruses of the worshippers of Jehovah there is little contrapuntal elaboration, and the best number is a prayer of the Hebrews, which is afterwards taken up by the repentant king. This, however, is extremely simple. Much is made of a "Dedication March" in which choirs of magicians, Hebrews, the king's guards, and Babylonians are eventually welded together in polyphonic harmony. Musicians know how work of this sort is constructed, but to the average listener it is extremely clever. The present example is trivial in subject-matter, and the final cadence recalls the soldiers' chorus in 'Faust.' It cannot be said that 'Nebuchadnezzar' is either ineffective or unmusically, but neither can it be said that it worthily illustrates its theme.

Dr. Parry's son, Mr. J. Haydn Parry, is a professor at the Guildhall School of Music, and the ladies' choir of that institution took part in the performance of his cantata 'Gwen,' the choruses of which are written for female voices only. The libretto, by Mr. J. Young Evans, deals with a Welsh legend, in which Gwen, a water-nymph, weds Meurig, a cowherd, on condition that if he strikes her three times without cause she will return to the lake. In the course of twelve years he deals the fatal blows and she is summoned back to her watery home. Many varieties of this story exist, both in Oriental and European fairy lore, and the present version is as suitable as any for musical treatment. Nothing whatever can be said in favour of Mr. Evans's verse, which belongs to the worst class of "words for music," but the arrangement shows some intelligence, and Mr. Parry's setting is excellent, having regard to the fact that the work is primarily intended for ladies' choirs. The flow of unaffected melody is scarcely checked throughout, and the ballad-like character of the solos will not prove any bar to the success of the cantata. But the composer might surely have avoided such glaring reminiscences of Gounod as are scattered up and down the work. Sometimes the plagiarism was so palpable—as, for instance, on p. 10 of the vocal score—that many in the audience were unable to repress a smile. 'Gwen' would, of course, prove more effective in a small room than in St. James's Hall; but the composer need not confine himself to works for students. He is evidently an able musician, from whom much may be expected. As regards the rendering of both works, the Guildhall School choir may be unreservedly praised; but the male voices of the United Welsh Choir in 'Nebuchadnezzar' were rather uncertain, perhaps from insufficient rehearsal. The solos received justice from Mrs. Mary Davies, Miss Eleanor Rees, Mr. Maldwyn Humphreys, Mr. Hirwen Jones, Mr. Lucas Williams, and Mr. David Hughes. The cantatas were conducted by their respective composers, and were warmly received by a large audience.

Musical Gossip.

THE Carl Rosa opera season, which concludes this evening, has been, on the whole, very satisfactory, though some mistakes have been made, from ignorance of the present requirements of London audiences. Forty performances of ten operas have been given, but 'The Talisman,' 'The Rose of Castille,' 'The Pearl Fishers,' and 'La Juive,' which were named in the prospectus, have not been mounted. Concerning the first three of these works not much regret need be felt, but a revival of Halévy's work would have been interesting.

THE appearance of the Bristol Orpheus Glee Society in London has given rise to erroneous statements to the effect that part-music for male voices is not cultivated in the metropolis. This is far from being the case, but the associations which practise this form of music meet for the most part in private. One of the most fully equipped of these bodies is the South London Musical Club, which gave a performance at the Gresham Hall, Brixton, on Tuesday evening. A number of glees and part-songs, and Grieg's 'Landkennung' were sung in admirable style under the direction of Mr. Charles Stevens. Among the soloists was Miss Burghes, a young pianist, who displayed much promise in pieces by Mendelssohn and Liszt.

THE choice of Dr. F. Bridge as musical professor at Gresham College is one that cannot fail to commend itself to the public and the profession. For the future the appointment is to be annual; but there is little doubt that Dr. Bridge will be permitted to hold the office so long as he wishes to retain it. A better successor to the late Dr. Wylde could not have been found.

MR. J. S. SHEDLOCK is about to translate Wagner's letters to Uhlig, Fischer, and Heine. The book will be published by Messrs. H. Grevel & Co.

THE concert given by Miss Synge in the Princes' Hall on Thursday afternoon last week was too miscellaneous to be of interest. Miss Synge appears to be a pianist of some ability, but she was only heard in some minor pieces and some rather clever trifles of her own composition. The rest of the programme does not call for comment.

HERR HANS WESSELY gave an excellent concert at the Princes' Hall on the same evening. He was heard to much advantage in Max Bruch's Violin Concerto in G minor, with piano-forte accompaniment, and Brahms's Sonata in D minor for piano and violin, Op. 108, in which he was assisted by Madame Haas.

ON the same evening the recently formed Brixton Choral Society gave a performance of the first and second parts of 'The Creation,' Mr. Walter Macfarren's 'Brighton' Symphony, and Mendelssohn's 'Loreley.' Under the able direction of Mr. Douglas Redman the society bids fair to take high rank among suburban associations.

The last concert of the Strolling Players' Society, at St. James's Hall on Saturday evening, was made up of works not often heard in the concert-room, and at a less busy time would have commanded more attention than it can now receive. The programme included a rather uninteresting symphony by Verhulst, to whom Schumann dedicated his 'Overture, Scherzo, and Finale'; Méhul's overture, 'Le Jeune Henri'; and Massenet's 'Suite Égyptienne,' from his 'Hérodiade.' The playing, under the direction of Mr. Norfolk Megone, was for the most part highly creditable.

It was earnestly hoped that the unhealthy excitement concerning musical "prodigies" had evaporated, and the appearance of Miss Elsie Hall, described as "the Australian child pianiste," aged twelve, at the Steinway Hall on Monday afternoon, happily afforded no ground for the supposition that it is likely to be revived. The audience was very small, and not by any means demonstrative. It appears that Miss Hall has played with success in Germany, and has gained attention from the Queen of Württemberg. She has recently won a scholarship at the Royal College of Music, and there, for the present, she should remain in quiet pursuit of her studies, the authorities enforcing the rule that forbids the appearance of students on the public platform. The child has unquestionable talent, and if it is permitted to develop in a legitimate manner she should do well. She went through the pianoforte part in Rheinberger's Quartet in E flat very carefully, and among her solo performances that of Mendelssohn's 'Lied ohne Worte,' commonly known as 'The Bees' Wedding,' was perhaps the most successful. But the thin tone, the evident effort with which many of the passages were attacked, and the number of false notes afforded evidence of the trying nature of the task imposed upon the little player. The Messrs. Hann assisted in the concerted music, and Mrs. Trust and Mr. Gabriel Thorpe contributed some songs.

MISS MARGARET WILD's pianoforte recital at the Princes' Hall on the same afternoon was an entertainment of a more legitimate nature. The young executant displayed good technique in Beethoven's Sonata in E flat, Op. 27, No. 1, and Schumann's in G minor, Op. 22; but her most successful effort was in three of Scarlatti's pieces. Miss Wild has excellent fingers, and only needs to put more heart into her work to become a wholly acceptable pianist.

THE Borough of Hackney Choral Association made a successful conclusion to its season on Monday, when Mr. Prout's cantata 'The Red Cross Knight' was performed, with Miss Zippora Monteith, Madame Orlando Morgan, Mr. James Gawthrop, Mr. Bantock Pierpoint, and Mr. W. H. Brereton as the principal vocalists. This society maintains its honourable position, notwithstanding the rapid increase in large and efficient suburban musical associations.

THE Misses Marianne and Clara Eissler's concert at the Princes' Hall on Tuesday afternoon was very successful, the first-named young artist giving a highly creditable, and even brilliant, rendering of Dr. Mackenzie's 'Pibroch.' She was less satisfactory in Spohr's 'Dramatic' Concerto, being apparently somewhat nervous. Miss Clara Eissler's harp solos were extremely well played. The concert-givers were assisted by Miss Emmy Eissler, Mr. John Thomas, Mr. Durward Lely, and Signor Foli.

BARE mention must suffice concerning Miss Ida Henry's chamber concert at the Princes' Hall, and Miss Hilda Wilson's second vocal recital at the Steinway Hall, both of which took place on Tuesday evening.

THE last of the Young People's Orchestral Concerts took place on Wednesday, the principal items in the programme being Beethoven's Symphony in C, No. 1; three movements of Grieg's 'Peer Gynt' Suite; and the Overtures to 'Genoveva' and 'Rienzi.' Mrs. Henschel, as before, contributed some songs. We are glad to learn that Mr. Henschel is satisfied with the measure of success he has already received in this useful enterprise, and that it will be resumed next season.

THE programme of Mr. Franz Rummel's pianoforte recital at the Steinway Hall on Wednesday afternoon included Bach's Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue (the Hans von Bülow version); Beethoven's Sonata in A flat, Op. 110; Schumann's Fantasia in C, Op. 17, and a number of pieces by Chopin. The player showed very powerful technique, but the tone was too loud for such a small room.

MISS MEREDYTH ELLIOTT gave a miscellaneous concert at St. James's Hall on Wednesday evening. A feature of the programme was Schumann's 'Phantasietücke,' Op. 88, played by Misses Nellie, Kate, and Mabel Chaplin. Several vocalists and a choir of 250 voices, under the direction of Mr. W. Carter, assisted the concert-giver, who was highly successful in her songs.

AN extra concert was given at the Crystal Palace last Saturday, the performance consisting of 'The Golden Legend,' with Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Marian McKenzie, Mr. Henry Piercy, and Mr. Watkin Mills as the soloists. The rendering was exceedingly praiseworthy in every respect, the efforts of the choir being above the average, while the principal vocalists secured nearly a perfect ensemble.

SOME of the New York papers speak in contemptuous terms of the old-fashioned absurdities perpetrated during the performances of Italian opera by the Abbey-Grau troupe. On one occasion during a performance of 'Lakmé' Madame Patti was called upon to sing 'Home, sweet Home,' and complied. This is one of the chief reasons why the educated musical public give their preference to German opera.

DURING the German opera season in New York, recently concluded, sixty-five performances were given, of which thirty-five were devoted to Wagner. These produced an average of 688*l.* each, while the remainder only reached an average of 553*l.*

M. GEVAERT has just published at Brussels the first part of a 'Cours Méthodique d'Orchestration,' which, according to the continental journals, promises to be an important work.

Le Monde Artistico, of Milan, states that the condition of Signor Faccio is not so hopeless as was at first imagined, a recovery being, if not probable, at any rate not impossible.

CONCERTS, &c., NEXT WEEK.

MON.	Miss Beata Francis and Miss Helen Meason's Concert, 3, St. James's Hall.
—	Highbury Philharmonic Society, 'The Spectre's Bride,' &c., 8, Highbury Athenæum.
TUES.	Mr. Sidney Vainya's Piano and Song Recital, 3, Steinway Hall.
—	Royal Artillery Band Concert, 3, St. James's Hall.
—	Mr. Henry Phillips's Concert, 3, St. James's Hall.
—	Gluck's 'Ophéus and Eurydice,' 8, Theatre Royal, Cambridge.
—	Mrs. Marguerite Hall and Mr. William Nichol's Vocal Recital, 8, 30, Steinway Hall.
WED.	Mr. Franz Rummel's Pianoforte Recital, 3, Steinway Hall.
—	Miss Isabel Thorpe-Davis's Concert, 8, Steinway Hall.
—	Patti Concert, 8, Albert Hall.
—	Mr. Ernest Kiver's Concert, 8, Princes' Hall.
THURS.	Mr. Albert Henning's Concert, 8, Steinway Hall.
FRI.	Herr Svanenhagen's Pianoforte Recital, 3, St. James's Hall.
—	Miss Elsie Hall's Pianoforte Recital, 3, Steinway Hall.
—	Mr. Max Hirsch and Mr. Schönberger's Vocal and Pianoforte Recital, 8, 30, Steinway Hall.
SAT.	Madame Marie Rozé's Concert, 3, St. James's Hall.
—	Mr. E. H. Thorne's Concert, 3, Princes' Hall.
—	Mr. Isidore de Lara's Vocal Recital, 3, Steinway Hall.
—	Madame Madeline Schiller's Orchestral Concert, 8, 30, Princes' Hall.

DRAMA

THE WEEK.

ST. JAMES'S.—'Esther Sandraz,' a Drama in Three Acts. From the French of A. Belot by Sydney Grundy.

PRINCES'S.—'Theodora,' a Play in Six Acts and Seven Tableaux. Adapted from Victorien Sardou by Robert Buchanan.

'ESTHER SANDRAZ' does not improve on acquaintance. We are accustomed to the presentation on the stage of femmes de glace, de feu, de sang, and what not, and have almost lost hope of seeing again on the stage a type of respectable womanhood. Nothing, however, except the desire to present a series of striking pictures could induce an actress to select a heroine at once so unsympathetic and so untrue to herself as Esther Sandraz. With the original work of M. Belot, 'La Femme de Glace,' we are unfamiliar, and we are unable accordingly to judge how Mr. Grundy has dealt with a necessarily intractable subject. His play can, however, add nothing to his reputation. Esther Sandraz is at the outset a feminine counterpart to the Armand Duval of M. Alexandre Dumas, and the great situation of the first act of the play which bears her name is simply a reversal of that in the fourth act of 'La Dame aux Camélias.' In place of a man insulting and outraging his late mistress before an assemblage of courtesans and their companions, we have, with the same surroundings and in the same manner, a woman vilipending her lover and throwing at his feet the diamonds with which he has loaded her. With the scene thus obtained all that is genuinely powerful in the piece ends. The remaining two acts are occupied with a duel between a wife who, loving another, has married a man who is indifferent to her, and her husband's mistress, who, with her husband's reluctantly extorted sanction, has entered her house as her companion. Without being superfluously squeamish, it is pardonable to say with Lear, 'Fie, fie, fie! pah, pah! Give me an ounce of civet, good apothecary, to sweeten my imagination.' Morality, however, is the less shocked inasmuch as the whole idea is futile. Esther Sandraz, who poses as a goddess of vengeance and incarnation of hate, is a weak creature who is talked over in half a minute. Her presence in the house of Madame Vandelle is not so much an outrage as an absurdity; and her death at the hands of her former lover, who afterwards commits suicide, gives no idea of fatefulness, but conveys the notion that accident has freed us from a very cross woman and a very foolish gentleman.

All that can be said in favour of the play is that it gives rise to theatrical, not dramatic situations, and that it accordingly furnishes an actress with opportunities. Mrs. Langtry in delivering her arraignment of her perjured lover looks uncommonly handsome and speaks with considerable power. She subsequently changes moods with an effective waywardness and petulance, and is alternately caressing and acrimonious. This she does with ease and effect, and she dies with all becoming penitence, slain in mistake for another. Miss Marion Lea was excellent as the wife; Mr. Arthur Bourchier played with earnestness and truth to nature in a sentimental character; and Mr. Everill was moderately funny in a comic rôle.

The superstition or tradition that the feminine possessors of immoderate passions and ambitions must be imperious and majestic creatures has died, and Lady Macbeth even may now be seen with a blonde wig. It is, therefore, impossible to say that a being so innocent and ethereal-looking as Miss Grace Hawthorne presents may not have been the Messalina-like creature whom Procopius depicts. Miss Hawthorne possesses, however, no tragic gifts. In appearing as Theodora she has taken much pains, and she has, for the time at least, conquered the worst of her mannerisms. There are aspects, indeed, in which her performance inspires something not far short of admiration. She assigns the character in the early scenes a sort of humour, and her defiance of her angry spouse has a quiet simplicity that is effective. With all the advance that she has made, and with all her efforts, she is incapable of passion, and in the stronger scenes she is tedious or extravagant. A cry which she utters after taking poison is only strident and displeasing, and conveys no notion of torture; and her actions over the body of her dead lover are insincere and even inept. As a whole, her performance is creditable, but it is not good enough to vindicate her experiment. Mr. W. H. Vernon played with marked power as Justinian; Mr. Cartwright was seen to fair advantage as Marcellus; and Mr. Leonard Boyne promised well as Andreas, but failed to reach the stronger aspects of the character. As is seen by what has previously been said, Mr. Buchanan makes the empress die of poison which she takes instead of by the bowstring. As the real Theodora died of cancer, one form of death is as pardonable as the other. The innovation is only so far unfortunate as it introduces a scene in which Miss Hawthorne is seen at her worst. 'Theodora' is well mounted, and scenery, dresses, and decorations are worthy of much praise.

Dramatic Gossip.

MR. IRVING reappeared on Saturday afternoon last as Louis XI., the greatest and subtlest of his comic creations. Miss Coleridge was Marie; Mr. Macklin, Coitier; and Mr. W. Terriss, who returned to his old home, Nemours. On the 19th inst. and during the week 'Louis XI.' will form the evening's entertainment.

THE long connexion between Mr. Gilbert and Sir Arthur Sullivan is now severed, Mr. Gilbert seceding also from association with Mr. D'Oyly Carte.

On Tuesday 'She Stoops to Conquer' was withdrawn from the Vaudeville, and 'Miss Tom-boy,' Mr. Buchanan's adaptation of 'The Relapse,' hitherto seen at afternoon representations, was placed on the evening's bills.

MR. BENSON's company, recently performing at the Globe, has appeared during the past week at the Grand Theatre in 'A Midsummer Night's Dream,' and on one occasion in 'Hamlet.'

'RACHEL,' a very lachrymose sketch by Miss Clo Graves, was given on Wednesday afternoon at the Haymarket, Miss Laura Villiers playing the heroine. On the same occasion Miss Julia Neilson played Clarice, the heroine of Mr. Gilbert's 'Comedy and Tragedy.' In this character, created at the Lyceum by Miss Mary Anderson, Miss Neilson showed her possession of much emotional power. Mr. F. Terry was D'Aulnay, and Mr. Lewis Waller the Regent Orleans. 'The Ballad-Monger,' with Mr. Tree as Gringoire, was also played.

NEXT WEEK'S NOVELTIES AND REVIVALS.

MON. Drury Lane (Evening), 'Paul Kaurar.'
— Lyceum (Evening), Revival of 'The Belle.'
TUES. And Wed. Savoy (Afternoon), 'The Perry Girl.'
SAT. Royalty (Evening), Revival of 'The Barister.'

[These announcements are subject to changes of plan on the part of managers.]

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—J. M.—A. E. L.—C. H.—W. J. A.—R. H. B.—J. G. R.—C. E. L.—H. J.—H. Q.—received.
No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

TWO ADDITIONS TO LOW'S STANDARD NOVELS,
6s. SERIES.

SPRINGHAVEN: a Tale of the Great War. By R. D. BLACKMORE, Author of 'Lorna Doone,' &c. With numerous Illustrations by Alfred Parsons and F. Barnard. Small post 8vo. cloth, 6s.

Of 'Springhaven' the Saturday Review says: "The story is one of Mr. Blackmore's best. A fine touch of romance reveals the author of 'Lorna Doone' on almost every page.The portraits of Nelson and Napoleon are marvelously true and lifelike."

"'Splendid' and 'glorious' are strong terms, but they are scarcely too strong for application to some parts of 'Springhaven.'The story is among the author's best; and to read it is a most invigorating tonic."

Illustrated London News.

The PENANCE of JOHN LOGAN;

and other Stories. By WILLIAM BLACK, Author of 'A Princess of Thule,' 'A Daughter of Heth,' &c. Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

"'The Penance of John Logan' is so well contrived, so brightly told, and so lifelike, that its simple pathos is irresistible."—Athenæum.

NEW NOVEL AT ALL THE LIBRARIES.

The CONSPIRATOR: a Romance of

Real Life. By Count PAUL P—, Edited by FRANK HARKUT. 2 vols. crown 8vo. cloth, 21s.

"There is no lack of startling incident and sensational adventure in this record of Russian oppression and Polish intrigue.The interest of the story seldom flags."

Speaker.

GLANCES at GREAT and LITTLE

MEN. By "PALADIN." 1 vol. crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

Contents: Oxford—Bishop Wilberforce—Some Preachers—The late Emperor of Brazil—Sir Bartle Frere—Anthony Trollope—Richard Wagner—Napoleon III.—George MacDonald—Emperor William I. and Prince Bismarck, &c.

A CENTURY of PAINTERS of the ENGLISH SCHOOL. Abridged and continued to the Present Time. By R. REDGRAVE, C.B. R.A., and S. REDGRAVE. New Edition. Large crown 8vo. cloth, 10s. 6d.; Roxburgh binding, 12s.

HOMES of TASTE: Economical

Hints on Furniture and Decoration. By J. E. PANTON, Author of 'From Kitchen to Garrett,' &c. Post 8vo. cloth, 2s. 6d.

GREAT MUSICIANS SERIES.

Edited by the late Dr. F. HUEFFER.

NEW VOLUME.

BEETHOVEN. By H. A. Rudall. Small post 8vo. cloth extra, 3s.

SLIDE VALVE GEARS: an Explanation of the Action and Construction of Plain and Cut-off Slide Valves. By FREDERIC A. HALSEY, Member of the American Society of Mechanical Engineers, &c. 1 vol. royal 8vo. cloth, 8s. 6d.

HANDY GUIDE-BOOK to the JAPANESE ISLANDS. With Maps and Plans. Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s. 6d.

THE "NURSING RECORD" SERIES OF MANUALS AND TEXT-BOOKS.

No. 1. LECTURES to NURSES on ANTISEPTICS in SURGERY. By E. STANMORE BISHOP, F.R.C.S., &c. Hon. Surgeon-Anesthetist's Hospital, Manchester. Crown 8vo. boards, 2s.

UNDER THE DIRECT SANCTION OF HER MAJESTY.

LOW'S HANDBOOK to the CHARITIES of LONDON for 1890. Giving the Objects, Date of Formation, Office, Income, Expenditure, Invested Funds, Bankers, Treasurers, and Secretaries of over a thousand Charitable Institutions. Fifty-fourth Year. Revised according to the latest Reports. Small crown 8vo. paper cover, 1s.; cloth, bound, 1s. 6d.

London:

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON, SEARLE & RIVINGTON
(LIMITED),

St. Dunstan's House, Fetter-lane, Fleet-street, E.C.

MESSRS. BELL'S NEW BOOKS.

MEHAYIL EL HAYIL.

FROM STRENGTH TO STRENGTH.

Lessons for the Use of Jewish Children.

Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

[Now ready.]

Popular Edition, crown 8vo. cloth, 2s. 6d.

MEMORIALS OF THE HON. ION KEITH-FALCONER,

Late Lord Almoner's Professor of Arabic in the University of Cambridge, and Missionary to the Mohammedans of Southern Arabia.

By the Rev. ROBERT SINKER, B.D.,

Librarian of Trinity College, Cambridge.

With Portrait and Map. Sixth Edition.

[Immediately.]

EDUCATION FROM THE CRADLE.

A Book for Young Mothers and all who have to do with Children.

By Princess MARY OUROUSSOW.

Translated by Mrs. FIELDING.

Wide fcap. 8vo. handsomely bound in white and gold, 4s. 6d.

Cheaper Edition, cloth, 2s.

[Ready shortly.]

SABRINÆ COROLLA

IN HORTULIS REGIÆ SCHOLÆ SALOPIENSIS

CONTEXUERUNT TRES VIRI FLORIBUS LEGENDIS.

Editio Quarta. Large wide post 8vo. 10s. 6d.

[Now ready.]

PRUDENTIUS.

Selected Passages, with Verse Translations on the Opposite Pages.

By the Rev. F. ST. JOHN THACKERAY,

Late Assistant Master, Eton College.

Crown 8vo. 6s.

[Immediately.]

NOTES ON ROULETTES AND GLISSETTES.

By W. H. BESANT, D.Sc. F.R.S.,

Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge.

Second Edition, Enlarged. Crown 8vo. 5s.

[Cambridge Mathematical Series.]

THE WORKS OF FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS.

Whiston's Translation, thoroughly Revised

By the Rev. A. R. SHILLETO, M.A.

With Topographical and Geographical Notes by Colonel Sir C. W. WILSON, K.C.B.

In 5 vols. each 3s. 6d.

[Bohn's Standard Library.]

BRYAN'S DICTIONARY OF PAINTERS.

New Edition, thoroughly Revised and Enlarged

By WALTER ARMSTRONG and others.

In 2 vols. imperial 8vo. buckram, 3l. 3s.

"A book which no collector and no public library can possibly do without."—Times.

TEUTONIC MYTHOLOGY.

By JACOB GRIMM.

Translated from the Fourth Edition, with Notes and

Appendix,

By JAMES STEPHEN STALLYBRASS.

Demy 8vo. 4 vols. 3l. 3s.; or separately, Vols. I. to III., each 15s.; Vol. IV., 18s.

"The best extant introduction to the studies of mythology and folk-lore. A handbook for travellers abroad and observers at home."—MR. F. YORK POWELL, in the Athenæum.

"These three volumes [Vols. I., II., and III.] are a store of curious learning."—Spectator.

"This volume [Vol. IV.] is a wonderful compilation, and abounds in erudition."—Western Antiquary.

"In a volume so thickly built up of facts, it is hardly possible to say where we have derived the most instruction, as every page has been valuable to us."—In a Review on Vol. IV., Notes and Queries.

A NEW and COMPLETE CATALOGUE of WORKS published by Messrs. BELL sent, post free, on application.

London: GEORGE BELL & SONS, York-street,
Covent-garden.

SATURDAY, MAY 17, 1890.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
AUTHORITY IN RELIGION	633
THE GROWTH OF ENGLISH INDUSTRY	634
THE ART OF WAR IN THE MIDDLE AGES	635
THE EARLY BIOGRAPHERS OF DANTE	636
NOVELS OF THE WEEK	637
RECENT VERSE	638
LOCAL ANTIQUARIAN LITERATURE	639
OUR LIBRARY TABLE—LIST OF NEW BOOKS	640
CROSSING THE BAR; AMERICAN COPYRIGHT; THE STORY OF A SONNET; THE ANONYMOUS 'BORCE DE CONSOLATION'; SALES; DR. FORCHHAMMER ...	641
LITERARY GOSSIP	642
SCIENCE—THE PARIS OBSERVATORY; SOCIETIES; MEET- INGS; GOSSIP	643-644
FINE ARTS—THE ROYAL ACADEMY; THE SALON; SALES; GOSSIP	644-648
MUSIC—THE WEEK; GOSSIP; CONCERTS, &c., NEXT WEEK	648-650
DRAMA—THE WEEK; GOSSIP; NEXT WEEK'S NOVEL- TIES	650

LITERATURE

The Seat of Authority in Religion. By James Martineau. (Longmans & Co.)

THE present volume, though it forms a natural completion to the series of the author's works, appeals rather to that class of readers to whom his previous and more technical discussions would be unintelligible or distasteful, but who nevertheless, through the mere fact of breathing the atmosphere of the present day, are vaguely conscious that a transformation is being wrought in the sphere of religion, and would gladly avail themselves of any sure means, if such can be found, of estimating its extent and direction. We say sure, for it by no means follows that learning and ability on the part of an author dealing with the history or the philosophy of religion will of themselves secure him a fair hearing in many quarters, unless he display the badge of the apologist as a sign that particular conclusions may be taken throughout as prejudged in a particular sense. The kind of reception accorded in certain circles to the book called 'Supernatural Religion' is evidence of this. But in dealing with Dr. Martineau the task of the critic is at the outset lightened by the fact that, competence apart, his character needs no vindication. For in him the professor of philosophy may almost be said to have been subordinate to the minister of religion. And though many people may reasonably be startled at first by the coolness with which documents are dissected and the assurance with which conclusions are dismissed, which, as dogmas or the ground of dogmas, should still be entitled to respectful vindication, we venture to think that they will yet find much to console them in these eloquent pages. Granted that the main tendencies of those who in England are still quaintly called "the Tübingen critics" are blessed rather than cursed in the volume before us, we can yet point to the exposition and defence of theism in its loftiest sense as to a mine of material out of which the hard-pressed apologist may forge new and powerful weapons for the war against materialism and agnosticism.

Dr. Martineau's own solution of the problem to determine the seat of authority in religion forms the substance of his first book, which is divided into four chapters, entitled respectively "God in Nature,"

"God in Humanity," "Utilitarian Substitute for Authority," and "God in History." They will not detain us long, seeing that not only are they in the main a reproduction of a series of papers contributed by the author to an American journal, but the ethical doctrine they contain is merely a summary of that more fully set forth and defended in 'Types of Ethical Theory.' The author's task in the first chapter—to show that the great discovery of modern science, that of the infinite extent and duration of the universe, has not shaken the ground of theistic faith—is an easy one. "No one," he well remarks, "could ever have supposed that religion was hurt by these discoveries, had not Christendom unhappily bound up its religion with the physics of Moses and of Paul." But we think that Dr. Martineau is a little unjust when he takes the popular expounders of the doctrine of development to task for calling attention rather to the supposed origin of man at a point low down in the scale of being than to the dignified position he has managed to climb to as "the child of God." For the man of science moves in a sphere of facts of which to him no one is more common or unclear than another, and in estimating their relative importance he can hardly be expected to confuse the character of his work by borrowing the language or the standards of the divine and the man of taste.

In dealing with "God in History" Dr. Martineau is confronted by the problem how to distinguish what is of God from what is of men. And the principle of division which he proposes as a solution appears to be somewhat arbitrary and unreal. It is, of course, important that a Unitarian, determined to avoid the very semblance of pantheism, should be able to charge upon the human element what may be called the crimes and the failures of history. But on the other hand he is bound to leave due scope for the activity of the moral and personal governor. So "it is God," we are told,

"who inspires for man to realize. The ideals are his: the actuals that come out of them, or that fail to come out of them, are ours. Where there is nothing to be seen but bare conservation of what good there is, or, at best, only a local extension of it to classes or regions not brought up to its level, the human will is the chief agent, working on its own prosaic and un aspiring flat, and content to stand alone. Where there is continuous growth, and advance to loftier stages of life and character, and the men of each generation leave the world better than they found it, there we are on the vestiges of the divine Agent, and trace his moral government in history."

And it is in the former class that Dr. Martineau places what he calls "the great stationary civilizations of Egypt or Eastern Asia." In the first place, it is difficult to see how the original inspiration can be altogether acquitted of what seems to be defective or perverse in its realization. If what came out of it was a failure, then the seeds of failure must have been latent in it from the first. And in the second place this theory seems to take no account of the diversity of national type as a cause of the diversity of national performance. Because the Egyptian civilization, which through centuries was very far from being stationary, has left a record less fruitful from our present point of view than that of the Greek, we have no right whatever to import a moral tone into our judgment of the difference between them, as if nations, forsooth, started fair in a race for the same ideals. It may well be that a stationary civilization—assuming that such a thing exists or ever existed—performs some necessary function in the general economy. But as we are unfortunately in complete ignorance of the ultimate end towards which human effort is being guided or is drifting, any attempt to arrange the phenomena of civilization in order of merit on a moral scale must be futile and presumptuous. "Dans le jeu de tir à la cible auquel s'amuse l'humanité, le point atteint paraît le point visé."

Having found, therefore, for authority in religion its seat in an intuitional assurance, the author passes on in the second book to examine the pretensions of those who, while recognizing authority, place it, either in an infallible Church as the Catholics, or in an infallible book as the Protestants. Dr. Martineau has little to say directly about the Anglican Church; but seeing that it presents the remarkable spectacle of being divided into two great parties (not to speak of minor subdivisions), one of which loves to conjure with precisely those words and phrases which are most abhorred by the other, members of both schools will be sure to find what is for them wholesome and relevant in one section or the other.

Dr. Newman long ago discovered that to be deep in history is to cease to be Protestant; but Dr. Martineau, who sets out from the Catholic position, holds most decidedly that to be deeper in history is to cease to be Catholic. And his reasons for addressing himself to this part of the inquiry first are in these times well worthy of attention:—

"To this Catholic theory let us first turn; the more so, because to punish our imperfect exorcism of evil spirits at the Reformation, it is fast returning from the dry places of controversy in which it could never rest, and, finding in many minds the mediæval chamber swept and garnished, enters in to resume possession."

Dr. Martineau then examines in order the four divine marks or "notes"—of Unity, Sanctity, Universality, and Apostolicity—"which make any mistake of the true Church of God impossible." It will probably be urged that the facts and arguments are not new which our author brings forward to demolish the groundwork of these theories; but it is easy to reply that, trite though they be, they can never be insisted upon too often.

"That so stupendous a claim should appeal to tests so inadequate would be impossible, were it not that it has had to confront nothing but pretension weaker than itself, and already pledged to its most vulnerable premises. If we take for granted, that, somewhere upon earth, there must be a divine institute, and only one, for the distribution of grace and the organization of true dogma; and if the only question be, whether what we find at Lambeth, at Geneva, or at Rome, looks most like this long-lived and world-wide establishment—these 'notes' serve readily enough to pick out the Catholic Church; being, in fact, invented for this very purpose. As between different pretenders to the same ideal, they may be conclusive. But if we dismiss that ideal assumption, and look first at what is real; if we relieve the Church of her rivals, and ask her to begin at the beginning, and speak to us from the primitive ground of humanity alone,—then we shall need other marks than these to convince us that there is nothing diviner upon earth than a spiritual corporation which can have a Borgia for its head, the councils of Ephesus and Constance for boards of justice, and the index and encyclicals as its expressions of pastoral wisdom."

It is hardly necessary to follow Dr. Martineau in his rapid survey of the development of typical dogmas from fluid beginnings into their present compact and settled form. The facts should be familiar to every one who has acquired so much as a smattering of ecclesiastical history. So undeniable are they, that a doctrine of "development" has had to be specially invented to account for them and bring their history within the system of the Church. According to this doctrine the life of a dogma is sharply divided into two periods:—the former a kind of sacred Sturm und Drang period, in which the dogma-germ throws out luxuriant forms of life in the heated atmosphere of controversy. Then comes the infallible decree, not of natural but of divine selection, which out of the different competing forms fixes upon this or that as the fittest to survive. Thenceforth there is nothing but unity. Now, whatever may be thought of this doctrine as an attempt to exhibit any process that is real, there is a slight moral difficulty attaching to its consequences so far as the individual is concerned:—

"Living in the former period, you may go wrong without offence; living in the latter, your heterodoxy is perdition: under the very same conditions of thought, your relations to God are inverted. The definitions of the Church have thus the effect not of simply declaring, but of constantly altering, the terms of acceptance with God: and if, being in error, you die the day before a Vatican decree, you may pass to the seats of the blessed; if the day after, you join the Devil and his angels."

With regard to the note of Sanctity, it has sometimes been urged by ingenious apologists, in view of facts which it is hopeless to attempt to deny or explain away, such as the crimes and vices during certain centuries of the Papacy and the Inquisition—granted that these phenomena present much that is shocking to a refined sentiment of humanity or morality, the essential, implicit sanctity of the Church is not contaminated or impaired by such external defects in her organism. Nay, more, may we not devoutly believe that such notes and blemishes fulfil a providential purpose in the ecclesiastical economy as "trials of faith"? Dr. Martineau will have none of this plausible pleading:—

"If by sanctity be meant some occult quality which magically appeals to the favour of God, it is of no avail in evidence, being itself out of sight. A 'note' that is invisible is a contradiction and a nonentity. If the word denote self-dedication to a perfect Moral Will, this interior state of mind will manifest itself in an habitual elevation of aim, purity of life, disinterestedness of work, quickness of compassion, and balanced loyalty to truth and love, legible to every eye familiar with the language of character. When I pass through Church history in search of these, I doubtless find them, but in such sparse and partial gleams from a wilderness of passion and of wrong, that secular history itself, though less inspiring in its supreme heights, is less dreary on its ordinary levels, and less dreadful in its darker depths."

The ground rapidly surveyed by Dr. Martineau in the chapter on Protestants and the Scriptures has already been covered by the author of 'Supernatural Religion,' many of whose conclusions will here be found reaffirmed; and the investigation is interesting, not for its novelty, but as showing the effect on the mind of a trained philosopher and expositor of a study of Christian evidences conducted with the aid of the newest lights upon the subject. Space, however, will not allow us to do more than indicate a few of the conclusions arrived at.

The most striking feature of our author's treatment of the fourth Gospel is seen when he comes to deal with its relation to the Apocalypse. He accepts without hesitation the rather rash theory of the character and composition of the latter which was put forward by Vischer in 1886 under the distinguished imprimatur of Harnack, and which explains it as "a Jewish apocalypse, with Christian interpolations, set in a Christian frame."

"What, then, is the effect of the new discovery (if such it be) respecting the Apocalypse on the question of authorship for the fourth Gospel? Simply this: the Apocalypse is put out of court altogether as a witness in the case. Stripped of its own apostolic pretension, it has nothing to say either for or against that of the Gospel; and the old argument against either from its violent contrast with the other can no longer be pressed."

The relation of the fourth Gospel to the Paschal controversy is examined in some detail, and the conclusion of the whole matter, as it presents itself to Dr. Martineau, is summed up as follows:—

"From all quarters, then, does evidence flow in, that the only Gospel which is composed and not merely compiled and edited, and for which, therefore, a single writer is responsible, has its birthday in the middle of the second century, and is not the work of a witness at all."

The familiar problem raised by the conflicting testimony of the Acts of the Apostles and the Pauline letters with regard chiefly to the state of parties in the primitive Church is solved by Dr. Martineau in a manner which will appear startling to those who do not possess some acquaintance with the main results of continental investigation:—

"Of the apostolic age judged by its genuine memorials, the Book of Acts gives a distorted and highly ideal representation, changing the characteristics of the principal personages, suppressing its most serious dissensions, and assimilating its incompatible theologies. The author stands at a distance from its inner conflicts, and sees only the results which in their subsidence they have wrought out. He has been called a Pauline disciple; but he betrays not the slightest insight into the system of thought which distinguished the apostle of the Gentiles, or sympathy with his special genius. He has been regarded as representing the Catholic, as opposed to the Judaic version of the Gospel; but he does so only by abolishing the difference between them, attributing the broadest liberality to the apostles at Jerusalem, and treating Christian universality as Judaism rightly developed."

Dr. Martineau then examines the different theories of His person and work which have grown up around the figure of Jesus. He does so, of course, from the Unitarian point of view. He holds, in the first place, that Jesus never assumed the character or claimed the title of Messiah, that He simply took up the Baptist's message that the kingdom of God was at hand, without pointing to Himself as the destined ruler of that kingdom; and the numerous passages in the synoptic Gospels in which Jesus is made to use unequivocal Messianic language of Himself are explained by Dr. Martineau as due to the constructive imagination of the writers, who, having framed for themselves a Messianic theory of the person of Jesus, moulded their accounts accordingly:

"They were drawn to him and held fast by the power of a penetrating and subduing personality, the effect of which was a mystery to themselves, and their vain attempts to solve the mystery have left us the unfortunate legacy of a Christian mythology."

The question of the term Son of Man so often applied to Himself by Jesus is more complicated. Harnack affirms decidedly that it means "nothing else than Messiah." But Dr. Martineau, while admitting that the term came to acquire a Messianic complexion, would assign this later development to the period between the ministry of Jesus and the fall of the Jewish state, and recognizes in the supposed genuine examples of its use by Our Lord rather a survival of the characteristic thought of Ezekiel, that is to say,—

"an intensification, in the awful presence and communion of the Most High, of the conscious weakness, unworthiness, nothingness, of the human agent, when called to be the organ of a Divine intent..... This is probably the thought which commended the term 'Son of Man' to the preference of Jesus; and as it thus comes from his lips it exactly expresses the trustful self-surrender, the blended fearlessness and tenderness before men, the shrinking from words of praise, 'Why callest thou me good?' the pathetic calmness of the uplooking and uplifting life, which speak in all the features of his portraiture."

It has been impossible within the limits of a short review to do justice to a work like the present—to its varied learning and its high enthusiasm for the cause of spiritual religion. Its appearance is above all an event wholesome for these times, in which the mediæval conception of religion, under a partly new and distinctly plausible disguise, makes a powerful appeal to all such as are sensible of the picturesque charm of what is venerable. It is from this point of view that the volume is a welcome sign, for it gives hope and confidence for the future.

Growth of English Industry and Commerce.—Early and Middle Ages. By W. Cunningham, D.D. (Cambridge, University Press.)

It may be hoped that the reissue of Dr. Cunningham's important treatise as a practically new work is destined to mark an era in the making of historical text-books. The time must soon come, if it has not already arrived, when the judicious historian will abstain from exclusive theorizing on his own account, and will devote himself instead to collecting and digesting the scattered essays of specialists and the periodical publications of learned societies at home and abroad. Dr. Cunningham's list of authorities occupies eighteen pages, and that this is no empty display of erudition is evident from a mere glance at the foot-notes of almost any page.

As far as we can judge no single authority of any weight has been omitted, and yet the authority of the historian who has so conscientiously presented this mass of evidence for our convenient inspection is proclaimed in every line. He is himself a master of his subject, and we are the more grateful for his self-effacement, inasmuch as his compilation is in no way lacking in force and originality. Dr. Cunningham frankly differs from such an authority as Prof. Thorold Rogers on several points connected with the economic lessons of the fourteenth century, and he is not prepared to admit all Mr. Seebohm's deductions from the surveys and rentals of the twelfth. The merits of these questions are, however, impartially placed before us.

Under the head of "Early Changes in England," a fair, and in many respects an independent, account is given of rural economy before the Conquest. The good work done by the Danes as pioneers of commercial activity is recognized, and we are tempted hereby to meditate on the fallen state of the great water-ways as avenues of commerce and means of the subjects' enjoyment. We are reminded, too, that slavery was prevalent in the north of Europe perhaps as late as the middle of the twelfth century, and that the Irish bishops actually "incited their flocks to boycott the English slave-dealer" as long ago as 1172.

In the division on "Feudalism" Dr. Cunningham has possibly missed an opportunity of elucidating several difficulties connected with the expansion and diminution of the feudal revenue. Certainly most of the authorities from whom he cites have attempted nothing in this direction. The chapter on "Royal Charters" is also somewhat curtailed, but amends are made by a scholarly essay on "Royal Inquisitions." The author is at his best, because most original, in the chapter on "Foreign Inter-course." No English scholar can compete with him on this ground, and he worthily maintains the character of English scholarship in a department hitherto monopolized by foreign writers. The chapter on "Royal, Municipal, and Manorial Economy" seems all too short, but the subject is treated of elsewhere. Dr. Cunningham enjoys the credit of having elucidated much that was obscure in the manorial treatises of Walter de Henley and Fleta, and still more may be expected from his promised edition of the first-named author. Usury is naturally a frequent topic in these pages, and is discussed with laudable moderation. It should be noticed, however, that Dr. Cunningham gives a slightly erroneous interpretation of the typical transaction between a Jewish usurer and his Christian debtor by following a mistake in a twelfth century charter. We cannot go so far as to admit an ecclesiastical or official connivance at usury. The prevailing sentiment against its practice was confirmed by the ordinances both of the Church and the Government. Certainly usury did not hamper trade, for trade itself was under a dark cloud of disability; but none the less it was a canker eating away the heart of the flower of the nation. The Jewish community was expelled under the pressure of public opinion expressed by Churchmen jealous of their pious bequests and by laymen burdened with debts, both appealing successfully to the greed of the Crown. The popular sentiment, however, was not a whit less strong against Lombard usurers or degenerate native brokers, as is proved by the proceedings against such offenders by the citizens of London in 1377. In a concluding chapter on "Changes of Opinion" under the Tudors Dr. Cunningham shows that "the sentiment against usury survived," though it was no longer possible for men to point to its evil effects. In fact, the employment of capital was destined to effect the reconstruction of society on a new basis.

Dr. Cunningham's sketch of the growth of the revenue during the fourteenth century carries more weight with it than the similar description of an earlier period. The chapter on "Commercial Policy and Inter-course" is excellent, though perhaps the most interesting portion of the book is that in which the decay of the manorial system and the consequent depression of tillage and development of internal trade are described. The commercial relations of England under the rival houses of Lancaster and York are of even vaster importance, and the "mercantile policy" of Tudor sovereigns is portrayed in a masterly sketch. Dr. Cunningham is almost scrupulous in the matter of terminology; but we venture to doubt whether it is technically correct to use the title of "Russian Company" previous to the reconstruction of the Muscovy Company under William III. Several important documents are printed in an appendix, a Minister's Account of 1402 being of especial value for illustrating the manorial economy of the period which followed the great social revolution of the fourteenth century.

Die Entwicklung des Kriegswesens und der Kriegführung in der Ritterzeit. By G. Köhler, Major-General. Vol. III. Parts I.—III. (Breslau, Koebner.)

Two years ago we noticed the first two volumes of General Köhler's 'Art of War in the Middle Ages.' The work is now completed in a third volume, which, after the German fashion, is itself composed of three stout parts, varying in thickness from 350 to 550 pages. These sections treat respectively of arms and armour, military usages and institutions, and strategy and tactics.

It is impossible to speak without respect of the laborious industry which General Köhler displays in all the sections of his book. He has steadily worked through a bulk of original authorities such as no other writer in his province has ever dared to attack. In German mediæval history he is, naturally enough, at his best, and no English reader can fail to find in his pages references to many useful sources of information which were previously unknown on this side of the North Sea. There is also much that is new in his list of authorities for Italian and Slavonic military matters, though in the former department the thirteenth century seems to have received more attention than the fourteenth. As a treasury and storehouse of information for the writers of the future the book will, in short, be invaluable. In itself, however, it can hardly be said to be easy or agreeable reading, owing to the extraordinary ground plan which General Köhler has laid out.

Instead of treating his subject chronologically, and tracing the development of the art of war from its beginnings in the Byzantine army down to the revolution caused by the general introduction of firearms, the author has preferred to write a series of disconnected theses. The first two volumes consist of a number of detached sketches of battles, sometimes preceded by short introductions pointing out their historical or military importance. These little monographs are (I. iv) "to give the history of war a sure basis, and to get rid of all uncritical views." They extend from Hastings to Agincourt, covering the 350 years which are indicated by the title of the book, 'Kriegswesen in der Ritterzeit.' The three parts of the third volume then take up the history of the art of war from a different point of view, each starting de novo from the eleventh century and going down to the end of the Hussite wars. The first section of the volume gives not only one history of arms and armour, but another of fortification, each kept carefully separate and forming a distinct whole. The third section keeps the history of strategy apart from that of tactics in a similar manner. The result of this scheme of arrangement is that a general idea of the state of the art of war, at any particular moment during the period covered by this book, can only be formed by extracting data out of five different sections and putting them together. A chronological treatment of the subject would have been more satisfactory to the reader, and, we should have thought, not more difficult to the writer. The index which General Köhler promises to construct will be of some use in repairing this fault, but till it appears the 2,900 pages of the work form a wilderness in which the inquirer may wander for long without finding the fact for which he is searching.

In the newly published sections the point which will strike the English reader as newest and most interesting is the discussion of the status of the military classes in Europe. Nothing is more curious than the diversity of the nomenclature of feudalism in different countries. The three words "knight," "squire," "serjeant," which we know so well in the English chronicles, are not to be lightly translated into the German equivalents, Ritter, Knecht, Sarient, still less into the Latin miles, armiger, serviens. Knecht, for example, as General Köhler shows, may mean in one place a man of noble blood who has not yet received knighthood, in another a mere mounted "serjeant," in a third an ordinary foot-soldier, in a fourth the unarmed personal attendant of a knight. When Knecht is pedantically turned into the Latin word servus, the most ridiculous results follow in nomenclature, e.g., a document speaks of a knight Benger of Enthringen and his brother Albert "adhuc servus," by which is meant not that Albert was unfree, but merely that he was still a "squire," to use the English term. The curious fact that the word (Knecht, knight) which in England designated the higher grade of the military hierarchy was reserved for the lower in Germany, is explained by General Köhler as an effect of mere chance. The word originally meant (like our "thegn") "serviens," "dependent," and was equally applicable to all the sovereign's military following, small and great. "The English, therefore, had as good right to use the expression for the higher grade of 'servientes,' when in the twelfth century they became a 'militaris ordo,' as the Germans had to restrict it to the humbler fights, and give the word 'Ritter' as the usual name for the higher."

We are glad to notice that in the matter of tactics General Köhler accords full credit to the Byzantines; most continental writers (even M. Delpach, from whom better things might have been expected) entirely ignore them. It is a pity that the general has not gone on to give a few examples of Byzantine fights; Durazzo is the only one which he notices, and there the fighting on the Emperor's side was done almost entirely by the Varangians, the main body of the army having been too distant to bring aid to its rash vanguard. Myriokephalon as an example of a defeat, and Larissa as an example of a victory, would have been excellent subjects for comment. Manzikert and Zimisce's battles in Bulgaria are not described with sufficient minuteness by the chroniclers to make it easy to realize their details.

A great part of the history of tactics in the second section of this volume is taken up with the discussion of a point which we do not remember to have seen argued out before—whether the word cuneus, habitually used for a body of troops by writers of the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth centuries, is to be taken literally, and translated by "a wedge-shaped column." The general holds that it should so be rendered under all circumstances; but we must confess that when we find authors speaking of the same body of troops first as globus, then as cuneus, or describing an army drawn up behind palisades to fight a defensive battle as forming a cuneus, we are inclined to think that it may often mean nothing more than a dense mass of men, as opposed to a line. The wedge-shaped order was, of course, very frequently used in all ages, both for cavalry and infantry; the Allemanni at Casilinum as early as A.D. 553 are described as "drawn up in the shape of a Greek Delta," and Saxo Grammaticus supplies an elaborate description of such a column. But chroniclers are often inexact in their use of words, partly because as churchmen they were little versed in military affairs, partly because they missed the exact meaning of the Latin terms they employed—acies and agmen, for example, are used indifferently by many authors. This being so, we may hold that cuneus often means nothing more than column.

Considering the excellence of the work he has done, it is, perhaps, strange to find General Köhler guilty of some extraordinary vagaries in his estimate of the value of original authorities. English writers, for example, will be surprised to hear that he takes seriously Henry of Huntingdon's account of British battles in A.D. 556, and remarks that "the Britons on these occasions must have put very few horsemen into the field." Geoffrey of Monmouth's account of battles in B.C. 500 might as well be quoted as Henry of Huntingdon's tales of battles in A.D. 500.

Much of General Köhler's book is written in a highly polemical and occasionally arrogant style. He is an author of sufficient merit to make us wish that he would remember that divergence from his views does not necessarily postulate in other writers either idiocy or moral turpitude.

Dante and his Early Biographers. By Edward Moore, D.D. (Rivingtons.)

DR. MOORE is a striking example of the unique fascination which the great Florentine exercises upon his votaries; no pains are deemed too great, no line of speculation too thorny or abstruse, no point too minute or disputable, when Dante is in question. Not content with producing that monument of erudite labour, the 'Contributions to the Textual Criticism of the Divina Commedia,' Dr. Moore lectured diligently on Dante in University College, London; and, after completing his term of office, he brings out this volume on Dantesque biography—a volume which, though not large in bulk, is packed very close indeed with facts, compendiums, discussions, and deductions, and raises various considerations novel, or almost wholly novel, to the English reader. We have just said, and we say it with regret, that Dr. Moore has now "completed" his work as Barlow Lecturer; the three years for which the lectureship is tenable having in his case expired last year, and another lecturer, a native Italian, having been appointed in succession. If that gentleman confers half as much distinction on the post as his predecessor did, he need not be dissatisfied.

In the present volume, as in others, Dr. Moore takes a clear view of his subject as a whole, fixes at once on the salient points, and disposes of them with great perspicuity and method. His tone of writing, though argumentative, is not heavy, but is relieved by lightness of touch and good feeling partaking of good humour. The book is based on three of the Barlow Lectures of 1889. We shall best consult our readers' interests by giving a brief abstract of the contents, without much comment of our own. The author classes as early biographies of Dante the writings of five authors—Boccaccio, Lionardo Aretino, Filippo Villani, Manetti, and Giovanni Maria Filelfo. Boccaccio was born in 1313, when Dante was still alive; Filelfo died in 1480. Each of the biographies is carefully analyzed, so as to exhibit its character and the degree of credit which it reasonably claims. Some minor biographical notices (such as that by Giovanni Villani) are also considered; and the last chapter deals with "personal traits and characteristics of Dante, as gathered from the early biographers, and illustrated by passages in his own writings."

The first point brought up for debate is one on which Dr. Moore appears to be the only English critic, and it is a point which, as soon as raised, is found to offer ample material for discussion. Two separate, but in many respects uniform, lives of Dante are attributed to Boccaccio—one being termed, for clearness' sake, the 'Vita,' and the other the 'Compendio'; and the question arises, Did Boccaccio really write both of these, or only one, and which of the two? The Italian and German writers who have treated this matter differ considerably in their conclusions. Dr. Moore arrives at the result, and maintains it by arguments at once solid and ingenious, that the 'Vita' is the earlier and the genuine work, and that the 'Com-

